"Listen," said Juan; "I wish you to work for me."

"How?" replied the monk, astonished.

"I will give you three reals per day."

"That is not possible!"

"We will commence to-day. Behold them."

He drew them from his pocket, and placed them in his hand. The brother, still more astonished, took the three pieces of money and made the sign of the cross.

"Every day," pursued Juan, "when you come here, I will give you the same; also the bottle of wine, which is brought me, and which I have not touched. The one of to-day is yet uncorked; you can assure yourself of it."

The monk thought he was dreaming. He opened the bottle, which was real, and his stomach, for a long time frozen with the cold water of the rocks, was re-animated by the good wine, and he became gay and good-natured.

"What must I do for that?" he asked.

"Nothing," replied Juan. "You come here every day as a brother laborer, to work the earth, but you must leave the earth untilled and the place idle. At the end of a month, you must declare that in spite of your zeal, the stripes of the discipline have produced no more effect than the exhortations of Father Romero."

"I understand; and afterwards?"

"We shall see; that is a gain for me."

"And for me," added the monk, hiding the three pieces of money under his frock. "But yet," said he, with a movement of fear and hesitation, "if it should become known!"

"That is your look out, my brother; they can discover that I have given you money, but not that you have not given me the punishment."

"That is true," replied the monk, re-assured by this reasoning.

Faithful to this new covenant, he came each day at the same hour with the exactitude of the cure. He received the three reals, drank his bottle of wine, and left, well pleased with his duty. Juan was equally so.

Now that his executioner had become his friend, Juan spoke many times of an escape, promising him if he would second him, to give him not only three reals but three ducats per day. The monk asked nothing better, but it was impossible. The doors of the tower and principal entrance were closed with bars of iron, and secured by three locks, the keys of which the curé kept. The other brother redeemers—three besides himself—were devoted to the archbishop, and Acalpuco had not the audacity to brave the dangers; and at the least noise, at the least cry of alarm, the twenty or thirty peasants who composed the village would run to aid the curé, and die for the archbishop. As to escape by address or cunning, that was equally impossible, for the porter who kept the outward gate would permit none to pass, except bearing a written order from the curé.

Juan was desperate. Days passed, and his situation did not change. His modest treasure diminished each day, and with the end of that, would come the end of Acalpuco's devotion. He was astonished that he never heard any noise of growings from those who underwent the scourge. Acalpuco explained to him that the praying desk contained a gag and cords, wherewith the poor penitents were fastened to the desk in the attitude of devotion, and in that posture received the stripes. He now knew the secret of the praying desk, and from that moment, could not repress a shudder when he looked at it.

That day, when left to himself, he piled the couch, table and fatal praying desk upon the bed, and mounted to the window to look upon the beautiful country he seemed destined never more to see. While looking upward at the beautiful expanse of blue sky, across which white clouds slowly drifted, his thoughts were called to earth by the sound of a guitar played with great skill. He saw the cure Romero and about thirty men, women and children forming the parish of Aigador, ranged in a circle round five or six Bohemians, who were either dancing or playing the guitar. He stayed listening to the music. But what was his surprise when, in the Bohemian who played the guitar in the centre, he thought he recognized his friend Pedralvi! Soon it was impossible for him to doubt; for he listened to the song with which he accompanied the guitar:

"Tra, la, la, la, la, la, ye who listen from the high battlements, recognize a friend!"

These words were spoken, or rather chanted in Arabic, and the unknown jargon amused the curé and his assistants very much.

"Tra, la, la, la, la," continued Pedralvi, chanting, "listen to me well. Consent this evening to be baptized, tra, la, la, la, then to-morrow, at early morning, thou wilt be conducted to the church, and I shall see you there, tra, la, la, la, and I will deliver thee, tra, la, la, la, la; and if you do not oppose us, tra, la, la, la, la, we will thrash them all, beginning with the curé, who is before me and who listens to me this moment like an idiot, tra, la, la, la, la, la, la, la, la, la!"

Pedralvi terminated his song by an original variation on the guitar, so fine that all applauded. Several times Pedralvi repeated his song, as if to make sure; and in the midst of his song, Juan repeated the cry a little louder than the song, which he hoped reached the watchful ears of his friend. A little pebble thrown at the window made him believe that his voice had been heard and understood.

Pedralvi, with a happy heart, descended to the inn at the foot of the mountain, and there passed a peaceful night, persuaded that in the morning he would deliver his friend. Alas! the latter had recognized his faithful friend Pedralvi, had listened with all his ears, had not lost one word of the song, but understood not one syllable, for the simple reason that he did not understand a word of Arabic.

The next morning, Pedralvi went to the church, but no new convert was to be baptized; all was silent. All that day he hung round the tower, expecting to see the doors open and his friend led out. Vain hope!

The archbishop, faithful to his promise, came again to look after his convert. Arrived at the tower, he was angry, and astonished to hear from Romero that Juan yet remained unconverted in spite of the dreadful scourge. Juan was asleep on his bed, dreaming of his friend Pedralvi and freedom, when the door opened, and the archbishop, Romero and four brothers entered the room, and before he could collect his thoughts or make any resistance, he was stripped, gagged and bound before the fatal praying desk. Sending the men into an adjoining room, the archbishop remained alone with the obstinate Moor, and exhorted him with a gentle voice. Juan could not speak for the gag which closed his mouth, but he made a gesture of anger with his head. The bishop proceeded calmly:

"If you suffer now, just think of the torments you must endure hereafter, if you remain obstinate."

Juan, trembling with rage, made another gesture of fury.

"I feel for you," cried the prelate, in a tearful voice; "I pity you. My brother, I feel ready to join hands, and kneel at your side and pray for you, for the safety of your soul. Consent to be converted, and receive the baptism. Do not answer; I see you cannot; but make me some sign of your head, that you desire it, and the bonds shall fall from your body, like the bonds of heresy from your soul."

Juan remained motionless.

"A single gesture and you are free, and shall go with me to my palace at Valencia, where unspeakable delights await you. You wish it, my son, do you not?"

Juan made no gesture.

"But if you persist in impenitence," continued the prelate, with anger, "I shall not forget that God permits me both to pardon and chastise, and the second I shall do. I go to call the brother redeemers; it is you who desire it. A gesture, a sign of consent, can still stop me. Once more I implore you to listen to me. I desire only your safety, the welfare of your soul. If you have been made to suffer, it is only to save your soul. Make the gesture, the sign, and you are free."

Juan still remained motionless, and the archbishop rose to call in his men.

CHAPTER XX.

THE ALGUAZILS OF THE ARCHBISHOP.

AFTER having passed all the day walking round the church, Pedralvi became convinced that the exit of his friend had been prevented, and fearing to excite suspicion, he retired, with his men, to the hotel of Aigador, a little further off. This hotel was one of the most miserable in Spain, hardly affording a decent shelter for himself and men, but he had sworn to deliver Juan, and must be ready to profit by any event.

Towards evening, a large troop of men passed not far from the hotel, and went towards the mountain. Two hours afterwards they returned, and came to the inn for lodgings. The innkeeper declared that he had but one chamber, which was occupied by some Bohemians, who paid well and could not be turned out. The alguazils were enraged to think that they, the escort to the archbishop, were so received. The hotel keeper, with hat in hand, became more humble as they became insolent. Pedralvi, who had listened to the dispute from the window, here interposed, and invited the alguazils to share his room, which was large, and could easily accommodate the six alguazils and his five men, and they would cheerfully give up their beds to the tired soldiers of the prelate.

All was amicably arranged, and the alguazils also accepted the offer of the young Bohemian to sup with him. The request was plenty, and wine circulated freely. Being warmed with the sparkling wine, these men became communicative, and Pedralvi learned that their object was to convey to Valencia the converts made by the brother redeemers. Pedralvi listened eagerly, and he made the wine, which he contrived to drug, circulate more freely still. After supper, the alguazils took the beds offered them, and quickly undressing, were soon in a sound sleep.

Pedralvi explained to his men his plan. They had promised Don Delascar and his son Yezid to free their young master, and by this ruse they would be well armed and almost protected. Day had hardly begun to break, when Pedralvi and his men followed out their intentions. The Moors rose quickly, and without any noise, they speedily clothed themselves in the dresses of the alguazils, forgetting neither plumed hat nor poignard. They left without noise, closing the chamber door and double locking it. No one was awake in the house, not even the host, and they were on their way perfectly unknown.

In spite of their rapid march, it was broad daylight when they reached the towers. Pedralvi knocked at the gate and demanded admission for the men of the archbishop. The gate was instantly opened, and Pedralvi and his men found themselves in the court.

"We come, my father," said Pedralvi, to Romero, and his voice was wholly unlike that of the Bohemian who sang the day before in the yard, "to ask you for the prisoners we are to conduct to Valencia."

"Enter—enter, senior archers."

And they entered the inner court.

"I have five neophytes disposed to follow you—five Jews, who are good Christians. There is one other, but he cannot follow you; it is a Moor."

"A Moor!" eagerly said Pedralvi.

"Yes—an obstinate heretic, who will not be converted. He minds neither exhortation nor scourge."

Pedralvi wanted to choke the pious curé.

"Finally, will you believe it," pursued the curé, with great admiration; "this very moment the archbishop himself is exhorting him in there;" and he pointed to a door on the right. "I will go and find the others, blessed ones, who have opened their eyes to the light, and will now take their place among the blest."

He had hardly disappeared, when Pedralvi, unable to curb his impatience, walked towards the door which conducted to the tower. His companions followed him. The sight he saw made his blood curdle; it was of poor Sevilla, gagged and kneeling before the archbishop, who was exhorting him. The prelate, irritated at finding all his eloquence in vain, was about to open the door. Seeing the black dresses of the archers, he cried:

"Let justice be done, and Heaven be avenged!"

"You shall be obeyed, senior," replied Pedralvi; and running to Juan, he removed the gag.

"What do you say?" cried the prelate, with surprise.

But without giving him time to recover his astonishment, or call for aid, Pedralvi closed his mouth with the gag he took from Juan, and forced him upon his knees before the praying desk; for the archbishop was far from inspiring the Moors with the same respect as the Spaniards; on the contrary, they hated him as their executioner and chief persecutor. Unable to utter a cry, or help himself, he was bound, kneeling before the praying desk, with his proud forehead touching the earth. Pedralvi, always thoughtful, brought with him the dress of the sixth alguazil, and in that Juan was clothed, and placed in the middle of their ranks. They entered the court and were waiting impatiently, when the curé appeared, leading the five converted Jews, converted in spite of themselves to Christians.

"See them," said the curé, with a triumphant air. "I give them up to you."

"Very well," said Pedralvi, who made haste to go.

"Where are you going?" said the curé.

"To rejoin the bishop, who awaits us."

"Is he not in the tower?"

"No," said Pedralvi. "He descended to the church, leaving you to execute prompt justice upon the prisoner, who remains as obstinate as ever, in spite of his kind exhortations."

"Well," replied the curé; "I will go with you, and receive the orders from the bishop."

"His orders are that you go first to the prisoner, and afterwards come to him and give him an account of all that has passed."

"I obey." And he called to one of the brothers, who was crossing the court, and asked to have Acalpuco sent to him.

The gate was opened. Pedralvi, his companions and converts filed through it, and pretended to take the road towards the church. Pedralvi had taken a very different road, more difficult but more sure, in the middle of the rocks. At the end of an hour's march, they came to a place where three roads met. Pedralvi said to the Jews whom they had escorted in silence:

"You are free, my friends."

"Free!" cried they.—"free!"

"Need not be Christians, unless you wish. That road conducts to Valencia; the two others somewhere else."

The Jews took the two other roads, and disappeared.

When the Moors were alone, Juan, overwhelmed with joy and gratitude, threw himself into Pedralvi's arms. They walked on for two hours longer, when they found some friends of Pedralvi's waiting. Juan's mantle of black was exchanged for a cavalier's dress; the alguazils' dresses were thrown from the rocks into a raging torrent. A handsome, powerful horse was furnished Juan, and with the best wishes of his friends, he was sent on his way to Madrid, while Pedralvi and his friends returned to Don Delascar, with the joyful news of Juan Sevilla's release.

Juan travelled on happily. He had just entered a piece of wood, when he saw a man on horseback going the same way as himself. Juan, enveloped in his robe, his forehead shaded by a broad chapeau, said nothing, nor raised his head, but passed his fellow-traveller in silence. The other, as he passed, cried out:

"Friend, am I on the right road to Toledo?"

At this voice, too well known, and which always made him tremble, Juan raised his eyes, and beheld in a fine uniform Captain Josef Baptista. He nodded in the affirmative.

"Are you sure it is the right road to Toledo?"

"Yes," briefly answered Juan.

That single word seemed to arouse some feeling in his companion's breast, for from that moment he endeavored to gain sight of Juan's face by all the means in his power. Juan, impatient, thought that at any risk he must get rid of his spying companion.

Raising his hat and drawing his pistol, he exclaimed: "Captain Josef Baptista!"

The latter trembled in his turn.

"Gain the opening, or I fire on you. There will be one bandit less in Spain."

The firm air of the young man, his menacing voice, and above all, the pistol with which he was armed, dispersed all Josef Baptista's doubts.

"Au revoir!" cried he, looking at Juan in a mocking way.

He put spurs to his horse, and an instant after disappeared in the dense wood. Sevilla was rid of him; but the sight of him alone left a painful feeling in his heart, and his mind was filled with presentiments. Never had he met the captain without the meeting bringing him some great misfortune, and this time it was not a vain presentiment—a chimerical fear. The captain was the man to denounce him at the nearest village. Prudence warned Juan not to follow the road he had taken. He left the grand road and struck into a by-way. He travelled three-quarters of an hour in the midst of a rich, well-cultivated country, and arrived at a fine forest through which the road passed. He followed it without hesitation, persuaded that it would conduct him to some habitation. Finally, after about half an hour, he found himself in front of a chateau built in Gothic style. On one side was a large garden, then filled with people, who seemed to have assembled to celebrate some great fête.

A young peasant, seeing the handsomely-dressed stranger, came forward and offered him a glass of wine. Juan accepted it, and asked the peasant, after drinking:

"Whom does this chateau belong to?"

"To a Portuguese senor, who lives here, but rarely visits his chateau. This is the first time I have seen him—I, who am the gardener of the chateau, which proves how seldom he comes here."

"And why does he come to-day?"

"To be married."

"That is different," said Juan. "And who is this Portuguese lord?"

"The Duke de Santarem."

"I understand now the rejoicings," said Juan, "since the proprietor of this rich domain is to marry. Whom does he marry?"

"A lady of Madrid," answered the gardener; "the daughter of an old soldier, who is not rich but handsome—the handsomest woman in Spain."

"Truly?" said Juan, interested in spite of himself; "and when is this marriage to be celebrated?"

"This very moment. Do you not hear the bells? The marriage ought not to take place till to-morrow, but it was by an order from the court that it takes place to-day. Hold!" continued the gardener; "the ringing of the bells redoubles, and I heard the organ; it is doubtless the moment of the benediction. Come, senor, let us approach, and we may, perhaps, see them at a distance."

Juan followed mechanically, and awaited for a few moments before the church door. But he saw nothing, for a crowd was before him. Suddenly a movement was made by the people, and Juan was carried by the pressure into the church, and found himself beside a pillar quite near to the entrance, and the bridegroom who, having given his arm to his bride, was leading her out. In the features of the groom, he recognized a strong likeness to Captain Josef Baptista, so strong a likeness, that Juan, who had lived in such intimate connection with the captain, believed it was he for a moment. He drew his hand across his eyes, as if to clear his sight, and looked again. He saw this time, not ten steps from him, leaning upon the arm of the Duke de Santarem, his only love, his only dream, the happiness of his life, his adored Alitea, beautiful and pale, dressed in bridal costume. With haggard eye and tightly-closed lips, she advanced, seeing nothing, hearing nothing.

He wished to call, "Alitea—Alitea, it is I!" His tongue refused to articulate. He wished to advance; the crowd would not admit of it, and his knees trembled and bent under him. At last, uttering a deep, despairing sound, half sigh, half cry, he fainted.

CHAPTER XXI.

THE GIRL AND THE STRANGER.

JUAN remained for a long time insensible. When he recovered his consciousness, he found himself lying in the deserted old church. He little by little recovered his strength. He heard the clock of the chateau strike ten. He rose with anger; he ran to the great door, but it was closed. A slight noise at the end of the chapel caused him to look round, and Juan saw a little light advancing slowly. He stepped to one side. A woman entered and approached the altar; then she knelt and prayed fervently. He heard the name of Alitea pronounced. That name had an irresistible charm for him. He drew near and listened, hardly daring to breathe. He heard her murmur the name of Fernand, and finally his own. He fell on his knees, weeping, as he exclaimed:

"Blessed be you who have not forgotten me,—you who pray for me!"

The young girl raised herself in affright, but at the well-known voice, she stopped, and trembling with joy, she said:

"Who is it? Who speaks?"

"O what happiness for us—for poor Alitea! who this very hour said to me: 'If I could at least see him once before I die!'"

"She said that?" cried Juan, trembling with joy.

"Silence!" replied Carmina, for she it was, putting her hand upon Juan's lips; "not a word, and follow me. Come, come!"

She took his hand, opened the little door by which she had entered, and which communicated with the chateau.

They walked through a long corridor, hearing at a distance the merry-making of the villagers, who danced in a large saloon below. Juan followed his conductress in silence. They at last reached a little ante-chamber, brilliantly lighted.

"Wait," said Carmina, "till I forewarn Alitea, for surprise and joy will do her harm."

And she entered the apartments of the bride. Juan felt his heart beat violently, and he hardly dared breathe. He was obliged to seat himself, and each minute that he waited seemed an age. Carmina returned, having been gone but an instant. She held the door open, and said but one word: "Enter!"

Juan sprang into the chamber, and the door closed behind him. He saw Alitea, pale, with her hair hanging in disorder over her shoulders. She was seated at an open secretary, and held in her hand some papers, which she let fall upon seeing Juan. She uttered a cry and threw herself into his arms.

"I see thee—I see thee at last! Thou hast returned to us!"

"Yes; but the most unhappy of men, since I arrived too late—since I could not save you."

"I see thee at last—I could hope for no more happiness!"

And speaking so, she held him closely to her heart and kissed him; and Juan, beside himself with joy and grief, felt ready to drop. He had never hoped for such great happiness, but he felt cold and despairing when Alitea embraced him again and cried:

"My brother—my best beloved brother!"

The blow was struck; he felt a dreadful pain. He pushed Alitea aside, while he looked at her with an angry, wild eye.

"Son of Alberique, my brother, what have I done to you?" said Alitea, with her sweet voice. "Why do you fly from me, when I have only you to console me?"

The sweet voice had its effect. He made a violent effort to command himself—to smile, as he said:

"Pardon my weakness. I, who have so many times conquered sadness, was conquered by joy. Since two days how many emotions, how many sufferings! I was already ill. I have the fever, and fever brings delirium."

He spoke truly. Alitea seized his burning hand, and seating him beside her, loaded him with kind attentions, not knowing that she only increased what she wished to allay.

"You, my sister?" murmured Juan, in a trembling voice,—"my sister!" and he repeated the words, now his safety, his talisman, his only defence: "My sister!" Then turning towards her his sad eyes, where a smile broke in the midst of tears: "That name brings nothing to my heart; for a long time I have cherished for you the tenderness of a brother. But what my heart divined, my mind cannot comprehend."

"I will explain it," cried Alitea. And seeing him look round uneasily, she added: "Fear nothing. The duke cannot enter here without my permission. If I was not able to escape this fatal marriage, I have at least reserved my liberties and rights, and no one, not even he, can take them from me."

Then she told him that under Philip II. an edict went forth that every Moorish child must be baptized as soon as born. Don Delascar d'Alberique and his wife Amina had one son, Yezid, who was seven years old, and did not come under that law; but shortly afterwards, Amina gave birth to a girl, Alitea, and rather than have her baptized, and become a Christian, she gave her to a faithful slave, who took her out of the kingdom. When she was five or six years old, the old Don Delascar, who had always cared for the child, her mother having died soon after her birth, seeing her seldom, but supplying every want or wish, came to her and told her the secret, which she must guard as her life, for her father and Yezid would be executed if the truth came to light. He placed her under the care of Don Juan d'Aguilar, his noble friend, who brought her up exactly like his own daughter.

"My noble father has always loaded me with gold and jewels, diamonds and precious stones, which explains to you the source of the riches which have astonished you and others. All went happily, until the death of the good Don Juan," continued Alitea. "When he died, it was decided that I should follow Carmina and live with her aunt, the Countess Altamira, an infamous woman!"

"What do you say?" exclaimed Juan, astonished.

"Yes; you will know that by-and-by. During your absence, a man came to me—the Count de Lerma. Carmina had a protector—her lover Fernand; but I had none—not even you, for you were away. The minister came to propose to me the marriage with the Duke de Santarem. The king wished it. He believed me to be the daughter of a soldier killed in Ireland. I could say nothing to him, save to ask time to deliberate, to consult with myself, or rather my father and brother. I wrote to them, it being the only means of hearing from them, and the writing which I believed sacred betrayed me—yes, the minister of the king, the Count de Lerma, respects nothing."

"What do I hear!" exclaimed Juan, indignantly.

"The next morning," pursued Alitea, "he entered my chamber. I refused, and he requested to speak with me alone. I granted him the interview."

"I proposed to you the marriage with the Duke de Santarem," said the minister, "and I feel sure that you are too devoted a daughter, too tender a sister to refuse; for by refusing, you condemn your father and brother to the prison and to the funeral pile."

"How so?" cried I.

"Daughter of the Moor Alberique, sister of Yezid Delascar, behold the letter that you addressed to them! No other proofs are necessary to condemn them, and the proofs you yourself have furnished. If I give this letter to Sandoval the inquisitor, both are lost; whilst if you consent to marry the Duke de Santarem, I return you the letter."

"Give it to me, then," cried I. "I consent!"

"That shall be my wedding present; I swear it to you! After the benediction of the priest, I will give it to you."

"Now, brother, you know all. Why they should wish to marry me, to bind me to the Duke de Santarem, I do not know. You who could help me stayed away. Why did you not come, and where were you all the time?"

"I was hastening to you," said Juan, with despair,—"you who make part of my joy, of my happiness; but was arrested by our enemies, and imprisoned by them."

And he related in a few words all that had happened to him, the dangers which he had escaped, but which still menaced him,—dangers which he had forgotten while with Alitea, when a great noise filled the chateau; cries and quick steps were heard in the middle of the night. Alitea implored Juan to go, but outside the door he entered the noise seemed to be loudest. Opening a richly-carved panel of wood, Alitea called Juan softly:

"Go now, my brother, if you love me. You descend a little staircase now, at the foot of which is a door opening upon the park; here is the key. The park joins the forest, and then flight is easy. Adieu then, and we will soon meet at Madrid," she said, embracing him.

"Adieu, adieu!" cried Joao, almost beside himself. And disengaging her from his arms, he descended hastily the secret staircase, while he heard above some one knocking loudly at the door of Alitea's chamber.

The day when the Count de Lerma returned to the hotel of the countess to learn Alitea's answer, the day when, in spite of herself, Alitea consented to marry the Duke de Santarem, Carmina, rendered wretched by the unhappiness of her dearly-loved friend, wrote to Fernand a whole account of the affair, begging him to prevent the marriage if he could.

Fernand turned pale when he read the letter, and regretted that he had sent the Duke de Santarem to Madrid. The proofs of his guilt were correct, and upon sending them to the Count de Lerma, he had recompensed the traitor instead of punishing him. The Count de Lerma, who was always without pity for imprudent or guilty men, had become the protector of the conspirator, and given him an amiable wife, the handsomest woman in Spain. It was a piece of intolerable injustice and tyranny, the reason of which Fernand could not understand.

The Count de Lerma had commanded the marriage to be celebrated at the duke's chateau, in the environs of Toledo, that it might make no noise in Madrid. The Duke de Santarem asked no questions, but obeyed. All the preparations were made secretly, and in the most profound silence.

A few days after this, Don Delascar and Yezid were walking in the garden, consulting upon the means of delivering their adopted son and brother, Juan Sevilla, then prisoner of the archbishop, when a note was brought to Don Delascar, containing these words:

"They wish to marry Alitea to the Duke de Santarem. If it is without your wish or knowledge, hasten; you've no time to lose."

"Whence comes this advice?" cried Alberique, startled, and giving the letter to his son.

Yezid read it over. It bore no signature. He looked at the envelope, and saw upon the seal the word always in Arabic characters, the word engraven upon the torquoise that Margaret had accepted from him. He trembled with emotion and fear, and said to the old man, in a low voice:

"We must believe this letter; it is true."

"Why?"

"It comes from the queen, my father."

"We must set out instantly, then," replied the old man.

The Duke de Santarem arrived at his chateau on Saturday, to be ready to receive his bride on Monday. The night before he left, he received a note from Alitea, who wished to speak to him, and who begged him to release her from this marriage which she had been obliged to consent to.

"I thank you many times, senora," replied the duke; "my frankness shall equal yours. I will tell you that it is in spite of myself and against my will that I marry you. I have no desire to marry at all; if I had," he added, gallantly, "I could not wish for or find a more amiable or beautiful bride."

"Truly!" cried Alitea, while her eyes flashed with joy; "then why not renounce this marriage? Why consent to it?"

"Because I am forced to do so by the prime minister; because, if I refuse, there awaits me the prison, and perhaps, in fact, without doubt, death."

"Ah!" said Alitea, scornfully, "that is the motive."

"A sufficiently powerful one, it seems to me," said the duke, smilingly; "and you, senora, shall remain your own mistress and I my own master."

Alitea remained silent for a few moments, then spoke in a low, firm voice:

"There is in all this a mystery I cannot understand."

"Nor I either, senora; I swear it."

"I will believe it," replied Alitea; "but deign, senor duke, to listen to me a moment, then you can retire. I believe that in marrying you I save my father's life; that I do still more, that I save yours also. You ought to be content with that sacrifice, and demand nothing more. I reserve for myself my liberty of feelings and actions, and I will defend them at the price of my life."

"Fear nothing, senora," said the duke, bowing; "I will respect them; I swear it to you."

"I accept the oath, senor duke; and now, whenever you wish, I am ready to obey the orders of the minister."

With the majesty of a queen, she made a sign with her hand for him to withdraw, and the duke, ashamed, humiliated, furious, left, muttering between his teeth:

"Why the deuce did I have anything to do with the cursed conspiracy!"

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

THE BASHI-BAZOUK.

Our picture represents, in the foreground, one of those famous irregular horsemen, who, during the Crimean war, did such good service in the field, though guilty of some outbreaks, and, in general, difficult to manage, from their wild spirit of independence and insubordination. The specimen we present is highly striking from his cavalier air, and his picturesque ornamental dress, to say nothing of the perfect armory of weapons he carries about him—gun, sabre, carbine, pistol, pignard and knife. In the distance is a horse, with the curious Turkish saddle and shovel-stirrups, so peculiar to horse-furniture in the East. What with those stirrups—the leathers of which are kept short, and from which the foot is not readily disengaged—and the high pommel and croupe of the saddle, every facility is afforded to the rider to maintain his seat, which is the more important, as in action the irregular cavalry are accustomed to raise their horses nearly bolt upright on their hind legs, in order to give a ponderous weight to the blow of their sharp sabres as they descend. It has been remarked of the Russians killed and mutilated in battle with the Bashi-Bazouks, that no slight wounds were observed upon their persons. Limbs are cut off as cleanly as by surgical operation, and sometimes heads are completely severed from the trunk. The Bashi-Bazouks perform the same service in the Turkish, as the Cossacks do in that of the Russian ranks. These wild horsemen of the East manage their animals with wonderful skill; men and horses seem to thrive on air and exercise, with little else to boot. They live in the saddle, and are wary and watchful; and as an irregular cavalry for outpost duty, they are invaluable, freeing the regular troops from the most harassing duties. In the Crimean war they proved more than a match for their Cossack antagonists.

VILLA REALE, PROMENADE OF NAPLES.

The accompanying picture crowded with figures, bright with falling water, and umbrageous with foliage, beyond which piles of palatial architecture close the view, affords us a good idea of this favorite promenade of the Italians—as great a resort as the garden of the Tuileries at Paris, or Unter den Linden at Berlin. It is a public walk on the border of the sea, and about 4500 palms in length. Perhaps here in ancient times was the Plaga Olimpica, where Naples celebrated the games and the Fete of Jove. This long tract of ground, lying between the sea and the hill called the Vomero, was first ornamented with trees and fountains by the viceroys, the Duke di Medina, in 1692, under Charles II. But it did not assume the form of a public garden until the reign of Ferdinand I., who enclosed it with iron railings about 1780. The portion of the villa which our sketch presents is the first of three divisions; the second portion, which was added in 1807, is a kind of thick grove, and is adorned by two temples erected to Tasso and Virgil, respectively, in 1819; the third part, which was added in 1834, extends 1500 palms along the sea, and, less ornamental than the other portions, is occupied by the lazzaroni, who draw up their boats and dry their nets upon it. The width of the really cultivated parts is about 200 palms. Five long avenues run through the villa, separated by rows of acacias, willow and ilex. It is embellished by many fountains and more than fifty statues in marble, which, though they are not of very highest art, are still respectable copies of chef-d'œuvres of Greek and Roman sculpture. The great vase, which adorns the fountain represented in our sketch, is formed of one single piece of Egyptian granite, the diameter of which is not less than twelve palms. It formerly adorned the Temple of Neptune, at Paestum, and replaces in the villa the celebrated group of the Toro Farnesi, which has been removed to the Museum. Around this fountain throng continually innumerable idlers—pretty bonnes, with their adopted children; children, too, of an older growth, who either look at the bonnes or the Muscovy ducks, as their tastes may direct them. Look down the great central walk at certain hours of the day, and you will find fine dresses and artificial manners in abundance; whilst modesty, in a scanty garment, shrinks away in some one of those shadier and narrower paths by the side. Not unlikely is it either that, in the very obscurest avenue of all, you may sometimes see two persons discussing subjects which they dare not enter upon in the streets, and looking right and left, as if thought itself were a sin. That lofty building at the extremity is Pizzo Falcone. There was a villa of Lucullus formerly where now are barracks, and it looks down upon the Castel d'Oro, once the island of Megari. Does any point in the world command a finer view than Pizzo Falcone? The Rev. Mr. Prime, in his interesting book of travels, says:—"The garden of the Villa Reale is open to the public only one day in the year; but it is always more or less frequented by travellers. Of so much importance was a visit to this park once regarded by the common people, that the young women were in the habit of stipulating in their marriage contracts, that their husbands should take them there at least once a year." This, however, is only one of the manifold attractions of Naples—attractive which compensate for filth, beggars, lazzaroni, and extortions practised by a poverty-stricken people on all strangers who are unfortunately provided with money. "See Naples and die!" is a proverbial expression with the Italians, as if, after seeing Naples, all the pleasures and attractions of life were exhausted. Art and nature here have combined to produce a most seductive mingling of beauties. The climate is paradisiacal—the beauties of the bay of Naples have not been exaggerated. Then there are Vesuvius and Pompeii, and a thousand scenes haunted by glorious or pleasing memories. No wonder, then, that travellers from all parts of the world are constantly pouring into this enchanted city, though, to an American, the pleasure arising from contemplating such matchless scenery is marred by evidences of the destitution of the masses of the people.

THE BASHI-BAZOUK.

VILLA REALE, THE FAMOUS PROMENADE OF NAPLES.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

SONG.

BY W. L. SHOEMAKER.

The tempest is wildly roaring
Through the lonely streets to-night,
And the flashes of the sun come pouring
Through the air with a ghastly light.
But I rush from my dreamy chamber,
And its fire-light clear and warm,
The fever within me defying
The wrath of the wintry storm.

Not a single star is gleaming
To-night in the dismal skies,
But yonder a lamp is beaming,
More fair to my eager eyes.
It streams from thy chamber-window
Far forth on the darkened air,
And the snow-flakes, madly whirling,
It illumines with a resolute glare.

I come to be near thee, dearest!
For the longing within my breast,
That glows with love sincerest,
It will not let me rest.
And I brave the angry tempest,
And my eyes I upward strain,
As I muse on thy glorious beauty,
Thy beauty and thy disdain.

My song—canst thou not hear it,
(When the wind is breathing low),
Like the wailing of a spirit
In the realms of pain and woe?
Give me but one love-token!
O, let thy beauty bright
But shine from thy window on me,
Like a star through the clouds of night!

And my soul shall be filled with gladness,
And my heart with hope beat high,
And this fever, and pain, and madness,
Like spirits unblest shall fly.
For I love—I love thee only,
With a passion beyond compare:
The hope of thy love is rapture,
Thy disdain is dark despair.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

WILLIAM THE RED.

BY HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT.

THE great conqueror had gone to his rest, but not in the land which he had won with his sword; nor did his bones lie among the people which he created. A Norseman by descent, a Frenchman by nature, he was buried in the land of his birth, yet not even there, buried in peace.

He died, as he had lived, a warrior, and fearless, but not, as he had lived, in the performance of great achievements. It was a trivial quarrel and a scurrilous jest, which spurred the great soldier to his last and unworthiest enterprise.

He was residing in the capital of his Norman province, at Rouen, after enmity had arisen between himself and Philip of France; and, in consequence of his increasing corpulence, was taking medicine to reduce the protuberance of his abdomen, which not only detracted from the majesty of his person, but impaired his agility and power.

"The king of England," said Philip, "is lying-in at Rouen, and keeps his bed, like a woman after her delivery."

The jest was retailed to William, who was furiously incensed, far beyond what one would conceive to have been the effect of so poor a sarcasm on so wise a man.

"When I go to my churching, after my confinement," said he, grimly, "I will make him an offering of a hundred thousand candles."

He swore this "by the resurrection and glory of God," says William of Malmesbury; "for he was wont purposely to swear such oaths as by the very form of his mouth would strike terror into the minds of his hearers." Be this as it may, such oaths as he swore, he was exceeding apt to fulfil, especially when they were of this nature. Therefore, as soon as he was in condition to take horse, when the harvest fields were white, the vineyards purple, and the orchards in full bearing, through the fair land of France he rode forth in vengeful jest to light his churching candles. Havoc and devastation followed everywhere his footsteps. Nothing could assuage his irritated mind, so determined was he to revenge this injurious taunt at the expense of multitudes.

At last, he caused to be set on fire the flourishing city of Nantes, which was totally consumed, together with the church of St. Mary's; and, as is affirmed, a reclus, who had a cell within the sacred pile, and did not choose to leave it, even in that emergency, perished in the flames. That the death of William immediately followed, and was in some way connected with this vindictive retribution of church-burning in lieu of candle-lighting, appears to be well established; but what precisely the accident was, or how produced, which led to his death, is not so apparent. There is ever a tendency on the part of the monkish historians of this date to ascribe all fatal accidents befalling great men, to direct retributory judgments from on high. So, in this case, we find that the offending member of the conqueror, namely, his protuberant abdomen, from an innocent joke on whose fair round proportions the desecration of St. Mary's church arose, as we have seen, must also be made the means of his punishment.

Some say that, in superintending the progress of the sacrilegious incendiarism, he approached so nearly to the conflagration that the heat of the flames added to that of the weather—for it was in August—operated on his gross habit of body and produced an incurable disorder. By others it is asserted that, in leaping a dangerous ditch, that unwieldy prominence of his person, impinging violently on his saddle-bow, was fatally ruptured. At all events, it is conceded that he made a good ending of his stirring and troublesome life. He caused all his political prisoners to be released; distributed treasures to the various churches of his own dominions, of which he had always been a munificent patron; repaired, out of his own private purse, all the depredations he had committed in his late fit of ferocious vengeance, especially those committed on the holy St. Mary; performed his Christian duties by confession; received the communion; and died, it seems, in peace with all men, the priests especially, whom he had benefited most in his latter days.

His knights and barons, it appears, he had not fully gratified, nor was he in over and above good odor with them. He had somewhat interfered in behalf of the conquered Saxons, whom, as soon as they had become his people, he had the absurdity to consider as in some remote degree entitled to his justice and protection; while the great barons, who had helped him to conquer them, regarded them only as flocks to be fleeced, or money-bags to be squeezed to the utmost.

Perhaps the cause which gave him the ill-will of his military nobles may have stood him in as good stead, in the place to which he took his darkling way on the sixth day of September, 1087, as the masses and requiems of his priests which he had bought at such a price of gold. In the first instance, however, it had nearly cost him a place in which to slumber out the sleep of ages. For, being royally embalmed, he was carried down the Seine to Caen, for interment, amid a great concourse of ecclesiastics, few of the knighthood attending; but when his mortal remains were about to be consigned to earth, a certain knight, to whose patrimony the place belonged, loudly exclaimed that it was a robbery, and forbade his burial. Nor, it appears, could he, who had "taken seizen" of two great and powerful principalities, and held them as long as he lived, as of his own right, by his sword, command, when he was dead, so small a space of his vast dominions as the six feet of earth which would suffice for his long home.

The only one of his sons who was present, Henry, afterwards king of England, and the first of his name, known by his honorable attribute of Beauclerc, from his learning and accomplishments in an unlearned age, caused the sum of sixty shillings to be paid on the spot, and the same sum afterwards, to the obstreperous landholder, and so purchased the right of repose in the grave to the great conqueror, who had caused honorably to be entombed the corpse of his perjured rival and enemy, when he had the power to refuse it; since Harold died under ban of excommunication.

Of his other sons, the older, Robert, surnamed Curthose, from his diminutive stature, was in France, actually waging war against his father and his native land, at the time of William's death. On his father's conquest of England he had aspired to the possession of Normandy, in his own right, during the life time of that prince, and on being prevented from his ambitious designs, immediately fled into France and broke into open rebellion. Nevertheless, his father bequeathed to him his patrimonial duchy, while to his second, William the Red, he left his conquered kingdom. Henry, the best and wisest of his sons, had needs rest content with the appanage of his mother, Matilda, daughter of the great Earl of Flanders.

It is said that William foretold that this, the disinherited Henry, would be in the end the greatest and richest of his offspring. He doubtless did not lack the sagacity to foresee that he was best and wisest, but how he could predict what was contingent on his more direct heirs leaving no successors, cannot be so well divined. This may be set down, with small fear of error, as of the true prophecies easily delivered after the occurrence of the events foretold.

"William, the son of William, was born," says William of Malmesbury, "in Normandy, many years before his father came to England, and being educated with extreme care by his parents, as he had naturally an ambitious mind, he at length reached the summit of dignity. He would, no doubt, have been a prince incomparable in our time, had not his father's greatness eclipsed him, and had not the fates cut short his years too early for his maturer age to correct errors contracted by the licentiousness of power and the impetuosity of youth. When childhood was passed, he spent the period of youth in military occupations, in riding, throwing the dart, contending with his elders in obedience, with those of his own age in action; and he esteemed it injurious to his reputation, if he was not the foremost to take arms in military commotions—unless he was the first to challenge the adversary, or were challenged to overcome him. To his father he was ever dutiful, always exerting himself in his right in battle, ever at his side in peace. His hopes gradually expanding, he already aspired after the succession, especially on the rejection of his elder brother, while the tender age of the younger gave him no uneasiness. Thus adopted by his father, during his last illness, he set out to take possession of the kingdom ere the king had breathed his last; when being gladly received by the people, and obtaining the keys of the treasury, he by these means subjected all England to his will. Archbishop Larfranc, the grand mover in everything, had educated him and made him a knight, and now he favored his pretensions to the throne. By his authority and assistance William was crowned on the day of the Saints Cornas and Damian, and passed the rest of the winter quietly and with general favor."

Notwithstanding this favorable narrative of the candid historian of Malmesbury, whose often severe strictures on the Norman kings of this epoch render his testimony, when given in their favor, unimpeachable, it appears that William had considerable difficulty in assuming his title. Larfranc, it is true, crowned him on the authority of a rescript from his father, recommending him to do so, in the presence of a few nobles, clerical and military, suddenly convened, in the hope that so prompt a measure would disarm faction and set to rest all opposition. And so it did, for the moment; but the whole proceeding lacked the sanction of precedent and ceremonials, and the great barons of the realm were uneasy and discontented. Robert of Normandy, who had succeeded peacefully to the patrimonial dukedom, claimed the English throne, likewise, as his by birthright and indefeasible inheritance; and the barons, both of England and Normandy, espoused the cause of Robert, who was the more popular, as the more jovial in manners, and, above all, the more liberal in his dealings.

Odo, the Bishop of Bayeux, the paternal uncle of the two princes, also espoused the cause of his elder nephew, as did prince Henry take arms on the same side. Many of the high English barons had recourse to expatriation, emigrating to the fiefs which they held in Normandy, and it was evident that the sword was once more to decide,

Which had the better cause; in that success
Concludes the victor innocent, the vanquished
Most miserably guilty.

In this dilemma, William the Red casts himself into the hands of his English subjects, and by granting them certain remissions from the severe and cruel forest laws, and the right of hunting on their own lands, he succeeded in raising them effectually into a party, and so obtained his ends by their means.

It would seem that he either well understood himself, the habits and peculiarities of these his semi-civilized and oppressed subjects, or that he had those about him who both knew their national peculiarities and knew how to profit by them. For, it is related, that once when, either from active disaffection to his cause, or from indifference whether cause should gain, as in neither case they could profit by the victory, the Saxons refused to assemble in arms, he compelled the presence and service of a large army, with which in the end he conquered the opposite factions by the simple threat of proclaiming every one who should not appear in arms at the appointed place and time, "Hiding!"

The true sense of this term of opprobrium is not now discoverable, but it is known to have implied infamy of the meanest and most sordid kind, so that there was no extremity a Saxon would not risk rather than incur that appellation.

The Norman must have had both sagacity and resource, who, in so early a period of the Saxon conquest, could take advantage of a peculiarity of his reluctant subjects, and turn them by it victoriously to his own purposes. Audacity he must have had enough, to venture on arming the Helots—for the Saxons of that day were little better—against the class of military nobles, whose authority, since they were but a handful in number, rested more on the opinion of their invincibility than on their actual prowess. Confidence he must have had, in the highest, in his own resources, or he could never have believed himself able, after putting down the Norman faction by Saxon arms, to resume his own place at the head of his feudal nobility, and replace the nobility in their predominating height of pride above the quiescent natives. Yet all this he did.

In one brief campaign he made England his own; in a second, he carried his arms into Normandy; came to terms with Robert, who not only resigned all pretensions to the crown of England, but yielded to him some castles, and the monastery of Feschamp, with its appanages beyond the sea; and then, in conjunction with Robert, reduced Henry, who had set himself up against both parties, as unjustly deprived of his natural rights, to obedience. Decidedly, there was in this man, had it been called out by circumstances, the wisdom and energy of his father, as there was much of a noble and fitful generosity, deformed at times by a sort of buffoonish pantagruelism, and obscured at others by licentiousness and gluttony.

One of these instances of his magnanimity is thus related by the historian I have already quoted, as are one or two circumstances, less creditable to him as a prince, to which I shall have occasion to refer hereafter, as well as to a graphic and striking portrait of his person when in his prime. The following incident occurred while the two elder brothers were besieging Henry, in his singular hill-fortress of Mont St. Michel, on the coast of Normandy.

"The king, going out of his tent and observing the enemy at a distance, proudly passing, rushed unattended against a large party, spurred on by the impetuosity of his courage, and at the same time confident that none would dare resist him. Presently his horse, which he had that day purchased for fifteen marks of silver, being killed under him, he was thrown down, and for a long time dragged by his foot; the strength of his mail, however, prevented his being hurt. The soldier who had unhorsed him was at this instant drawing his sword to strike him, when terrified at the extremity of his danger, he cried: 'Hold, rascal; I am the king of England!' The whole troop trembled at the well-known voice of the prostrate monarch, and immediately raised him respectfully from the ground, and brought him another horse. Leaping into the saddle without assistance, and darting a keen look on the bystanders—

"'Who unhorsed me?' said he.

"While the rest were silent through fear, the bold perpetrator of the deed readily defended himself, saying:

"'It was I—who took you, not for a king, but for a soldier.'

"The king, soothed, and regaining the serenity of his countenance, exclaimed:

"'By the crucifix at Lucca,' for that was his oath, 'henceforth you shall be mine, and, placed on my roll, shall receive the recompense of this gallant service.'

After his return to England, he waged war with the Scots and with the Welch, both unsuccessfully, though without sustaining any notable defeat. His martial enterprises, however, led him into difficulties, for he was by nature liberal to excess, careless and ignorant of the value of money, and, being pressed to pay largely his necessary soldiery, being fond of splendor, and being inordinately cheated on all sides by his servants, he was, one may say, in some sort compelled to acts of extortion towards his subjects, in order to support his state.

Two absurd anecdotes show the means by which he was oftentimes reduced to straits for money, and the methods by which he strove to raise the wind, when short of funds for the supplies of his palace.

One morning when he was putting on his war boots, he asked his chamberlain what they cost, and when he replied "Three shillings," indignantly, and in a rage, he cried out:

"How, villain! how long has the king worn boots of so paltry a price! Go bring me a pair worth a mark of silver."

He went, and bringing him a pair much cheaper, told him falsely they had cost as he had ordered.

"Ay!" said the king, "these are suitable to royal majesty."

Shortly after, being poor and pressed for money, a Jew, whose son had apostatized to Christianity, offered the king sixty marks if he would compel the youth to recant. William the Red set himself to work to earn his sixty marks; but, the young apostate proving obdurate, and saying something which provoked the king's anger, he lost his temper and kicked the circumcised Christian out of the room. He claimed, however, the reward of the father, and, on his remonstrating that his son was not reconverted, after all, replied that, whether or no, the king could not lose his time for nothing, but to make it square, he would be content with thirty marks, which the Jew incontinently was compelled to fork over.

Had he never done worse than this, he certainly did not deserve the name and character which he bears in history. But I fear we must admit that he was sensual, avaricious, and given to rapine and extortion. It is clear, however, that he had offended his clergy, who would have winked hard at his luxury, licentiousness and soft vices, had he indulged their greed—that he had offended his nobles by employing Saxon churls against the gentle blood of Normandy, then by relaxing the forest laws towards the subject race, and afterwards enforcing them stringently against the nobles. He had none, therefore, of the dominant race to defend his memory after they had destroyed him; for there is every reason for believing that the legend of his being accidentally shot in the new forest by Sir Walter Lynch, is a mere fabrication to conceal his murder, by his own Norman nobles, in revenge for his severities against infringement of the forest law.

"He began," says William of Malinesbury, once more, "and completed one very noble edifice (Westminster Hall) in London, sparing no expense to manifest the greatness of his liberality. Should any one be desirous to know the make of his person, he is to understand that he was well set, his complexion florid, his hair yellow; of open countenance; different colored eyes, varying with certain glittering specks; of astonishing strength, though not very tall, and his belly rather projecting; of no eloquence, but remarkable for a hesitation of speech, especially when angry."

In a word, he was the son of his father and of circumstances. Not a good king nor a good man, surely; but in his position he might have done worse. Many, both kings and men, stand fairer in history, who were in truth, far worse than William Rufus.

THE LOVE OF HOME.

It is only shallow-minded pretenders who either make distinguished origin a matter of personal merit, or obscure origin a matter of personal reproach. Taunt and scoffing at the humble condition of early life affects nobody in America but those who are foolish enough to indulge in them, and they are generally sufficiently punished by rebuke. A man who is not ashamed of himself need not be ashamed of his early condition. It did happen to me to be born in a log cabin, raised among the snow-drifts of New Hampshire, at a period so early that when the smoke first rose from its rude chimney, and curled over its frozen hills, there was no similar evidence of a white man's habitation between it and the settlements on the rivers of Canada. Its remains still exist; I make it an annual visit. I carry my children to it, and teach them the hardships endured by the generation gone before them. I love to dwell on the tender recollections, the kindred ties, the early affections, and the narrations and incidents which mingle with all I know of this primitive family abode; I weep to think that none of those who inhabited it are now among the living; and if ever I fail in affectionate veneration for him who raised it, and defended it against savage violence and destruction, cherished all domestic comforts beneath its roof, and through the fire and blood of seven years' revolutionary war, shrink from no toil, no sacrifice, to serve his country, and to raise his children to a condition better than his own; may my name and that of my posterity be blotted forever from the memory of mankind.—Daniel Webster.

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of BalloU's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. BalloU, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 68,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

[Written for BalloU's Pictorial.]

A THREAD OF QUEEN CITY LIFE.

BY HETTY FENWOOD.

"Will you go to Sumner's to-night?" inquired Paul Fenton of Cecil Stanley. "They give splendid suppers, sparkling Catawba, Longworth's best, and his daughter, Alice, has the finest blue eyes in the galaxy of beauty that meets this evening."

"No! I'm sick and tired of parties. Fides of young ladies placed against the wall, with their drapery of just such length, the same bare arms and low necks; their smiles and graces put on for the occasion. Bah! just as the cakes and oysters, to look their very best!"

"Come, come!" said Paul, "you are growing cynical. What will the ladies say, if the accomplished Cecil Stanley, the Western Count D'Orsay, should deprive the dear creatures of his fascinating presence? Besides, there is to be the new star, Ianthe."

The compliment, or the prospect of a new conquest, had the desired effect, and Cecil jokingly replied:

"Well, be it so; it would be cruel enough to withdraw this evening. I'll be there at ten, precisely."

The young men parted—Cecil to lounge off the day at the Burnet House, while Paul was obliged to hop the counter in a wholesale house on Pearl Street.

Night came, and at the Sumners' all was brilliancy and gaiety. White kids and blue ribbons flourished on the perfumed air. "Music arose with its voluptuous swell," and Mrs. Sumner walked a queen through her luxurious apartments, receiving her guests with the bland smiles and compliments usual on such festive occasions.

Paul was standing by a table, admiring some costly engravings, with the blue eyes of Alice Sumner floating in liquid beauty upon him, as he made sundry remarks upon their respective merits. Mrs. Sumner called to Alice, and while she was pretending to arrange her collar, warned her of encouraging the addresses of "that forward, conceited Fenton, for he was nothing but a clerk, and to save her witty sayings for the coming of Cecil Stanley." Alice was one of those clay-faced pretty girls, a perfect inanity, and was made to turn and move like a puppet in the hands of her ambitious mother. Of course she returned a colder answer to Paul's questions, and soon left the room on some frivolous errand.

Soon the servant announced "Cecil Stanley," and the cynosore of all eyes appeared. He was certainly a tall, fine-looking young man, dressed in faultless taste; yet he gave, as he entered the room, a quizzical, haughty look, on all present, as though royal blood flowed in his veins, hearts his playthings, and the smiles of beauty his rightful possession. The reputation of his great wealth, and his handsome person had, by designing mamas, made him the best match of the season.

But his heartlessness was a mere crust, like the sparkling wine that floats in rosiest beauty beneath the white froth and bubbles of the surface. The hook and line, with fashionable bait, had been thrown out by the Queen City belles, but Cecil, too wary, had remained as unapproachable as ever. Taking the arm of Paul, he was about to promenade into the music room, when he reminded him of his promise to be introduced to Ianthe.

"Is that she, surrounded by that knot of dangles? She is vain and conceited, I'll warrant; only writes for the admiration that follows—not for anything nobler, or because she can't help it, as some do. Humph! a pretty woman like her with genius; all nonsense, I know!"

"Never mind," whispered Paul, "you can see for yourself."

As Cecil approached the lady, he saw she was dressed in simple taste, yet the material was of the finest fabric. The dark hair was swept back with its wealth of beauty from a high, spiritual brow, while beneath, a pair of dark lustrous eyes beamed in splendor full upon him. Just such a pair he had dreamed of in his college days; there they were now, mirroring beauty and intelligence in real life. That glance was enough, the invincible Count D'Orsay was vanquished. The introduction was passed, and Cecil exhibited his best politeness. The lady evidently waited for him to make some remark besides the usual compliments of the evening. At length Cecil asked:

"Isn't it strange that human beings pass so much of this short life in meeting together just to be pleased and amused? and yet it is a source of annoyance and enmity to all (at least to myself), except the debutants in their first season. Many go for fear of otherwise offending their hostess, others for supper, and again some because they don't like to be out of date and forgotten."

"Yes," she answered, "there are many motives for attending any gathering. Could the heart of each guest be laid open to our gaze we should find a curious medley. What did you come for?"

"I must be gallant enough to say that the desire of seeing you had something to do with it."

"And you were disappointed in finding me vain and conceited, were you?" she archly inquired.

"Ah! you overheard my foolish remark, did you?" said Cecil. "Forgive me, for no one in looking fully in your noble face would ever accuse you of vanity. You were turned partly from me when I said what I did," continued Cecil, deprecatingly.

"Thank you for the implied compliment," said Ianthe. "But what better can ladies do? We are expected to be pert and witty, or else we are voted dull and old-maidish. Most gentlemen are armed with idleness or business, and wish to be entertained with some lively woman's prattle, and then, forsooth, half of you will call her 'vain and conceited.' On the other hand, if we read history and logic, talk fluently on law and philosophy, or even politics, then comes the hue and cry of a strong-minded woman; such if they had the power would be the disorganizers of society, we will let them alone, and so they are neglected, of course."

"But we should avoid those extremes. Now I admire a sensible yet lively companion, and I contend, in spite of your argument, that woman never, in the history of the world, ruled with so much influence, or her caprice was never so firm, as at the present time. Her white hand can unlock any storehouse of knowledge, and sensible persons will sustain her in the effort."

Supper was announced, and offering his arm to Ianthe, Cecil had never been more graceful in those little attentions which show the gentleman and the man of the world, than on this eventful night.

"Cecil is at last in danger of falling in love," whispered Paul to Alice, who stood by him pouting at Stanley's neglect.

She considered Paul "next best," however, and listened with more attention to his conversation than she had done an hour or so before. Alas! for the elaborate blanc manges, the cakes and the fruits, their destruction is at hand! Soon Cecil and Ianthe turned from the omnivorous crowd, and entered the deserted drawing-room.

"Do you believe in love at first sight?" asked Cecil. "We read of it in novels and plays. Why did it ever creep into their authors' brains, if it is impossible?"

"I think it depends something on the temperament. In persons of warm, quick impulses, confidence is not a plant of slow growth, and they find their beau idéal embodied according to their fancy, and like the bird, they recognize their life's mate at once. Some carry their certainties," she continued, "of all that is high and noble, in their countenances, and is it necessary that there should be a companionship of months or years before they can be appreciated?"

"No, indeed," said Cecil, in a lower tone. "I have always been an opponent to your doctrine until to-night."

Whether it was the lady's argument, or the soul-bearing eyes resting on his musing face, he did not say.

The company was dispersing; carriages and hacks rolled away with the tired seekers of pleasure, their gloves soiled, a little cross, and glad to reach their pillows, to meet in dream-land their loves in purer, holier communion.

"So soon," said Cecil, as Ianthe arose to pay her retiring compliments to her hostess. "I hope you will do me the favor of allowing me to call upon you on the morrow."

"Yes," said Ianthe, "if you will never call me vain and conceited," as she seated herself in the carriage with her mother, who, like all women past thirty, has not been considered of enough consequence to introduce to our reader.

"Eh! my fine fellow," said Paul to Cecil, soon after, "they say (that little bird which tells all the news) you are caught at last in the meshes of that little mischievous rascal, Cupid. Who would have thought on the day of Sumner's party that the misanthropic, enmied Stanley would have fallen head and ears in love with a blue-stocking, the most detestable of all the feminine gender to your lordship, when there are so many of our Queen City belles dying with envy? Ah, fortunate Ianthe! Wonders will never cease! I am prepared for telegraphic despatches to the moon, balloon travelling, or anything else surprising!"

"Hold your peace, you coxcomb. Is there not a beam in your own eye? Your engagement with Alice Sumner, I'm sure, is the talk of our whole set. Let me congratulate you upon your success in winning so fair a flower. But my Ianthe: I say, Paul, she is a treasure, a jewel more brilliant than dwells in India's secret mines; and she has a heart that loves as fondly and truly as the heroines of her song. We are to be married in St. John's Church next week. I shall ever thank you for urging me to that hateful party, as it seemed to me then. Destiny seems to turn upon an unimportant circumstance in the history of an individual, at least so, Paul, in my case. Now, for a long and happy life with Ianthe, and if wealth can minister to the slightest wish, it shall be freely given. I have something to love and live for. I only hope that you will be as happy as I am."

Cecil disappeared down the street, and Paul went into the store, soliloquizing: "I wonder if these blue-stockings do make good wives! I'll bet a hat that Cecil will be at the club within a year, complaining of shirts buttonless, yawning rents in his stockings, and dickeys ironed with the griddle. Nous verrons."

We roll our dramatic curtain again, and enter the home of Ianthe. Everything that heart or taste could desire evidently adorns the magnificent dwelling; and what is better, on looking around, order and neatness reign here. No dust mars the rich, costly velvets; servants are orderly, and from basement to attic we find everything "tip top." Underneath her genius, Ianthe had a stratum of common sense. All the talent in the world could never make a happy home for a husband unless it is accompanied with neatness and industry. It is a great mistake for a wife to suppose because he is wealthy and able to hire servants, that there is no need of care and responsibility. This she knew well, and acted as a sensible woman would. Let fame sing ever so syren a strain, she heard it not, when it interfered with the happiness of him she loved. Love makes a good wife, and nothing else will; all the initiation into the mysteries of housekeeping, and "the right bringing up" by the best of managers, will not do it. Nothing but the home chords of love and feeling will bind the Samson to make him weak as other men, and the way to a man's heart is through his "stomach," as a piquant writer says.

Time is defined by the author of the "Tin Trumpet" to be the vehicle that carries everything into nothing. "We talk," he says, "of spending our time, as if it were so much interest of a perpetual annuity; whereas we are all living upon our capital, and he who wastes a single day throws away that which can never be recalled or recovered."

THE VILLAGE SCHOOL.

It affords us particular pleasure to call the attention of our readers to the large engraving herewith presented, of one of the most celebrated pictures of the modern school of art, from the pencil of the great Scottish painter, the lamented Sir David Wilkie. This picture was drawn expressly for the Pictorial. For the use of the original, a large-sized steel engraving, executed in London, we are indebted to George G. Clapp, 24 Winter Street, it being one of the many choice works of art in his valuable repository. Messrs. Masury, Silsbee and Case of this city, reduced the picture to its present size by the photographic process, in which they are so eminently skilled, producing a perfect fac-simile, mathematically correct in all its proportions. The copy was then placed in the hands of Mr. Barry and drawn on wood, and was engraved by Mr. Damoreau, in a style of careful execution, and exhibiting much artistic feeling. It is one of those interiors that Wilkie delighted to paint, and the light and shade are managed with his accustomed taste. The first impression is excellent. The pedagogue on his awful throne and the mass of pupils first attract attention. Then, while the parts are all kept subordinate, you perceive, on examination, a wonderful variety of physiognomy. In the class engaged in recitation, one boy is prompting another; shielded by them, a mischievous urchin is distorting his face to frighten a young child; while some are diligently writing in their copy books, others are "sky-farking," and one poor boy whose seat has been overturned, is pointing in despair to his blotted writing-book. At the right, an idle boy and girl are playing at "cut's crutle," while a poor incorrigible dunce or hopeless idler is backed up against the wall, behind the master's chair, mourning over his disgrace. This is one of those admirable works which can be referred to again and again, and each time with increased pleasure. It is considered by connoisseurs one of the most meritorious of Wilkie's numerous productions. Some account of the artist, a man whose works have become classical, and whose fame is co-extensive with civilization, will not prove unacceptable to our readers. David Wilkie was the third son of the Rev. David Wilkie, minister of Cults, in Fifeshire, Scotland, by his third wife, Isabella Lister, daughter of Mr. James Lister, of Pitlessie mill, in the same parish. Young Wilkie, from his earliest years, evinced a strong character, a subdued fervor, a quick perception of the picturesque, and great imitative power. His drawings were made on his slate at school, and when about twelve years old he began to delineate on paper the scenes and groups of figures which struck his fancy. Though his predilection for art caused his father much uneasiness at first, he finally yielded to the wishes of his son, and the future artist departed for Edinburgh, where he commenced studying at the Trustees' Academy, an institution founded, it would seem, principally for the purpose of improving the taste of mechanics, by the study of the models of art. Here he applied himself diligently to study anatomy and drawing the human figure, and Allan Cunningham thinks it fortunate that there were at the time no pictures at hand to seduce the young pupil from the study of the dry but necessary elements of art. Shortly afterwards he made some drawings in oil. "When his fellow students," says Cunningham, "followed him into his two-pair-of-stairs study in Nicholson Street, they found all in keeping, they said, with his demeanor in the academy. The Bible, the 'Gentle Shepherd,' a sketch or two on the wall, a table and a few chairs, with a fiddle, whose strings, when he grew tired with drawing, he touched to a favorite air, were the chief articles. Neither his figures covered with silk, nor easels of polished mahogany were there; a few brushes, and a few colors, and a palette made by his own hands, may be added. The fiddle was to him then, and long after, a useful instrument. Its music, he said, not only soothed himself, but put his live models, who sat for his shepherds and husbandmen, into the sort of humor which he desired; nay, he often pleased so much that one of them, an old rough mendicant, 'whose vallets before and behind did hang,' to whom he played a welcome air, refused the pence when offered, and strode down the stairs, saying: 'Hout! put up your pennies, man! I was e'en as glad of the spring as ye were!' He sometimes, too, in a land where living models of any other part save the head or hand are difficult to be obtained for love or money, made himself into his own model, and with a bared foot, a bared ankle, or a bared knee, would sit at the looking-glass till he confessed that he was almost benumbed by exposure. Nor did he desist when a friend knocked; he would say, 'come in; nor move from his posture, but deliberately explain his object, and continue to draw till he had made his sketch.' While yet at the academy, and before he had reached his eighteenth year, Wilkie had begun to paint portraits, and dashed out the first bold idea of the "Village Politicians," afterwards elaborated into one of his most popular and celebrated pictures. A picture, the materials of which were collected in the neighborhood of his home, "Pitlessie Fair," created quite a sensation at Edinburgh, and gave earnest of his future greatness. After painting portraits for bread, for a short time, he finally made up his mind to try his fortune in London, and with a few pictures and letters of introduction, arrived at that city in 1802. Notwithstanding his anxiety for the future, he was stimulated by the society of artists and the congregated works of art he beheld. He entered himself at once as a student of the Royal Academy, which he diligently attended. For a time he struggled along, economizing his small means, but doubting whether he should succeed in obtaining a permanent foothold in the metropolis. At last, the Earl of Mansfield, delighted with his "Petlessie Fair," gave him a commission, and his picture of the "Vil-

standing his sudden fame, his pencil did not command high prices, his "Blind Fiddler" he received only fifty guineas, though Sir George Beaumont afterwards doubled that sum. He occupied at this period a very anomalous position; he was crowned with laurels, obliged to practise the utmost economy to meet his expenses. He continued to study hard and to paint diligently, he went a good deal into society—being courted by the most eminent men and women of the age, such as Sidney Smith, Wolcott, Godwin, Leigh Hunt, Lord and Lady Lansdowne, and the most distinguished of his brother artists. "Village Festival," the "Cut Finger," and several other domestic shared. "Duncan Gray," an illustration of one of Burns's ballads, was sold for 330 guineas. In the year 1814 he visited Paris, where the classical school of David and his pupils, with which he had little sympathy, was in vogue. He carried with him some of his prints—his principal works had been engraved—but found little encouragement. "He was struck with the novelty of everything, particularly with the picturesque old city of Rouen, with its quaintly-dressed population and Gothic streets—the magnificence of the capital impressed him, but had little to lay hold of his peculiar task; and, after a careful examination of the galleries, and having seen the 'ateliers' of the principal painters, he returned to London in July, 1814, little influenced by his insight into French life and art." But he was particularly pleased with a trip he made to Holland and Belgium, where he revelled in the pictures of Ostade and Teniers. In 1817 he went down to Scotland to obtain sketches for pictures of Scottish life—his peculiar forte. The nobles of the land delighted to show him honor, but it was with his visit to Sir Walter Scott—then in the height of his prosperity, keeping open house at Abbotsford, hunting, shooting and planting all day, and yet pouring forth, as if by magic, romance after romance with astonishing rapidity—that he was most impressed. During his stay, William Laidlaw, immortalized in the life of Scott, took Wilkie a ramble up the Yarrow, showing him all the scenery by the way, and brought him to Altrive, to introduce him to Hogg. Here they found the shepherd in his cottage, and while he was preparing for them a cheerful breakfast, Laidlaw pointed out to Wilkie some objects that he thought might interest him. The poet on this began to look and listen. "I had not," says Laidlaw, "introduced Wilkie as an artist, and it is probable he had taken him, as he did a great poet, for a horse-comer. He, however, turned round to me, exclaiming: 'Laidlaw! this is not the great Mr. Wilkie?' 'It is just the great Mr. Wilkie, Hogg,' I replied. 'Mr. Wilkie,' exclaimed the shepherd, seizing him by the hand, 'I cannot tell how proud I am to see you in my house, and how glad I am to see you are so young a man.' When I told Scott of Hogg's reception of Wilkie, 'The fellow,' said he; 'it was the finest compliment ever paid to man!' While at Abbotsford, Wilkie painted a fanciful picture of Scott and his family, in the garb of Scottish peasants, and a fine portrait of Sir Walter himself. On his return to London, he commenced a series of pictures illustrative of the recent patriotic struggle of all ranks against their French invaders. Of these, the most conspicuous and best known is the 'Defence of Saragossa,' an heroic resistance, which deserved to be immortalized by Wilkie, as it has been by the author of 'Childe Harold.' Angustina, the maid of Saragossa, stepping over the body of her lover, takes his place at the gun, and Don Palafox (whose portrait he was enabled to obtain) and other personages figure in this striking and animated composition. After having visited Seville, and other parts of Spain, after having studied in the Italian, German and Spanish galleries, and adopted a new style of painting, the effect of which he was anxious to try on the public mind, he returned home. In May, 1829, he exhibited six pictures, all but one on Italian and Spanish subjects, and displaying in place of his former somewhat metallic and cool, gray tones and careful touch, the broad, vigorous handling and rich color he had learned by studying Correggio, Rembrandt, Velasquez and Murillo. For George IV. he painted, by command, a picture representing that monarch's entrance into Edinburgh, which, however, did not add much to his reputation. On the death of George IV. he was continued by his successor, William IV., in the office of principal painter in ordinary to the crown, and enjoyed a large amount of incidental patronage. He produced at this time his picture of "John Knox preaching before the Congregation," ordered by Sir Robert Peel, who became his warm friend and patronizer. Much of his time was taken up with court portraiture. Among his distinguished sitters were Queen Adelaide and the Duke of Wellington. On the 15th day of June, 1830, Wilkie received the honor of knighthood. On the death of William IV., Queen Victoria continued him in his office of painter in ordinary, and showed him many marks of favor. In 1840 he made a visit to the Holy Land for the purpose of seeking among the very scenes of the Bible for local hints and characteristics to impress an air of truth upon pictures on sacred themes. He travelled through Germany, re-visiting the various galleries of art, and by way of the Danube, proceeded to Constantinople. Here he made many striking sketches and valuable notes. He painted a portrait of the sultan, at the latter's request, for the Queen of England, and gave the artist a splendid gold snuff-box, in token of his satisfaction. From Constantinople he went to Smyrna and thence to the Holy Land, and was deeply impressed by the sacred scenes he visited. The excitement of travel and the heat of the climate proved too much for Wilkie's enfeebled constitution, and he died on board the Oriental steamer, on his way home, not far from Gibraltar, on the 1st of June, 1840, at the age of 66. His death produced a profound sensation in England, not only among lovers of art, but among all who enjoyed his friendly and acquaintance. His fame, as an artist, rests on his faithful picture of humble life, like that which we have selected as an illustration. He has been termed the Scottish Hogarth, but there is in none of his works the bitter satire of the English painter; his rebukes are gentle, and his humor genial. The high moral tone of all his pictures is a prominent characteristic, and cannot be too highly commended. Many of them are master-pieces of genius.

THE VILLAGE SCHOOL—FROM A CELEBRATED PAINTING BY SIR DAVID WILKIE.

large Politicians" was the result. At the exhibition of the Royal Academy it was completely successful—for it was happily of that class which appeals as powerfully to the sense and feeling of the common observer, as to the judgment of the educated artist or amateur—the dramatic vigor with which the story is told, and the inimitable character came home to the former as much as the fine grouping, masterly arrangement of light and shade, and breadth of style satisfied the critical requirements of the latter. Wilkie was placed at once first in the public estimation as the painter of life, and every new picture from his hand was looked for as a public feast. The "Blind Fiddler," and "Alfred in the Neatherd's Cottage," were next produced. But at this time, notwithstanding added to his reputation. Wilkie did not disdain the use of the invention assisted Wilkie is obvious. It materially served his arrangements of light and shade, and his grouping. His ideas of general effect were also regulated by it; and if his Lilliputian upholsterer had little box, furnished the inside with chairs, tables, cupboards, a clock, doors, windows, stools, and all the other et ceteras necessary to the apartment he wished to express on his canvass; placed candlesticks on the tables; plates, dishes, cups, and spoons, in the cupboard; paper on the walls, carpeted the floor, and hung the window-curtains, and in a house in London with his mother and sister. This year he respect made his Lilliputian parlor or kitchen snug and comfortable for the reception of his Lilliputian company. This being done, he turned to London in July, 1814, little influenced by his insight into French life and art. But he was particularly pleased with a trip he made to Holland and Belgium, where he revelled in the pictures of Ostade and Teniers. In 1817 he went down to Scotland to obtain sketches for pictures of Scottish life—his peculiar forte. The nobles of the land delighted to show him honor, but it was with his visit to Sir Walter Scott—then in the height of his prosperity, keeping open house at Abbotsford, hunting, shooting and planting all day, and yet pouring forth, as if by magic, romance after romance with astonishing rapidity—that he was most impressed. During his stay, William Laidlaw, immortalized in the life of Scott, took Wilkie a ramble up the Yarrow, showing the climate proved too much for Wilkie's enfeebled constitution, and he died on board the Oriental steamer, on his way home, not far from Gibraltar, on the 1st of June, 1840, at the age of 66. His death produced a profound sensation in England, not only among lovers of art, but among all who enjoyed his friendly and acquaintance. His fame, as an artist, rests on his faithful picture of humble life, like that which we have selected as an illustration. He has been termed the Scottish Hogarth, but there is in none of his works the bitter satire of the English painter; his rebukes are gentle, and his humor genial. The high moral tone of all his pictures is a prominent characteristic, and cannot be too highly commended. Many of them are master-pieces of genius.

the climate proved too much for Wilkie's enfeebled constitution, and he died on board the Oriental steamer, on his way home, not far from Gibraltar, on the 1st of June, 1840, at the age of 66. His death produced a profound sensation in England, not only among lovers of art, but among all who enjoyed his friendly and acquaintance. His fame, as an artist, rests on his faithful picture of humble life, like that which we have selected as an illustration. He has been termed the Scottish Hogarth, but there is in none of his works the bitter satire of the English painter; his rebukes are gentle, and his humor genial. The high moral tone of all his pictures is a prominent characteristic, and cannot be too highly commended. Many of them are master-pieces of genius.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

AMBITION AND PLEASURE.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Of comes Ambition in my musing hours,
And whispers, "Strive to climb the lofty hill
Of fame—its summit reached, most brilliant flowers
Invite thy grasp. Strive with an earnest will,
And thou shalt pass from height to height, until Thy feet upon its topmost point are placed;
Thy spirit then shall drink its utmost fill
Of new delights—thy brow with wreaths be graced,
And glory's draughts thou'lt drink, most pleasant to the taste."

But Pleasure, syren nymph, doth intervene.
And tries to charm me with her lute-like voice:
"Why strive with toil laborious to glean
The flowers of fame? nay, let thy soul rejoice—
In halls of Pleasure there await thy choice
Allurements which thou ne'er hast dreamed upon;
Secluded from all worldly strife and noise,
Thou'lt learn ambition's rugged paths to shun,
And leave to others fame—how empty when 'tis won!"

My heart accepts them both—my aim shall be
A true ambition, but no race for fame
Shall draw my mind entirely from thee,
O syren Pleasure! Thou a partial claim
Upon my heart shalt have, and if my name
Shall ever be among the great enrolled,
To thee, at least, shall be no conscious shame:
Nor thirst for fame, for pleasure or for gold,
O blest content can lure me from thy peaceful fold.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MR. JONES.

BY RALPH TITON.

"INDEED, mama, I could not think of it for a moment; besides, who knows anything about him?" And Miss Annette Spangle, with a very decided toss of her head, resumed her task of inditing a number of little gilt-edged notes, which were to inform numerous persons the unlimited amount of pleasure which she anticipated from their company upon a certain evening. "Drafts to ten days sight without grace," her matter-of-fact uncle Sampson termed them, "and payable at the bank of fashion." He was a retired merchant, passed fifty, and moreover a bachelor—and the Spangles were not without their expectations concerning him; hence his words had considerable weight in their family transactions. Rich uncles who can leave their property to whom they please, rarely lack attentions; while their sayings, however plain and commonplace, are always items for profound consideration.

"I dare say, my dear, that you know best," said the pliant mother. "I only spoke of inviting Mr. Jones on account of your uncle, who is very partial to him, you know."

"Why is he, I wonder?"

"I am sure, Annette, I do not know. Your uncle is unaccountable in his likes and dislikes; but this young man has a strange influence over him, and I do not think it would be prudent in us to slight him."

"But, mama, he is nobody."

"How do you know that?"

"Because, if he was fashionably connected, as a stranger, he would have letters of introduction to some one at least."

"He appears well-bred, and his looks are certainly prepossessing."
"So might a good-looking footman. Depend upon it, mama, a young man who belongs to a good family, would not seek to force his way into strange society, without at least mentioning who he was, or from whence he came."

"He may be a little eccentric."

"Eccentricity is only allowable in old bachelors and rich uncles, and barely tolerable in them. If this Mr. Jones refrains from speaking of his family, it is only for the reason that he is ashamed of them."

"That does not follow as a matter of course; but you have decided, then, not to invite him?"

"I would like to humor uncle in any reasonable matter; but as for thinking we are obliged to open our house to every stray sporting acquaintance of his, it is indulging his whims altogether too far."

"Indeed!" exclaimed the voice of a fair girl which just entered.

"Why, Kate, how did you get in?"

"Through the doorway, to be sure; but, Netty, who is the gentleman who is so unfortunate as to be excluded from your party?"

"That Mr. Jones—one of uncle John's acquaintances—whom you have met here several times."

"Poor fellow! What has he done, pray?"

"Nothing very flagrant, I believe; but then, you know, that we do not feel authorized in thrusting a mere chance acquaintance, of whom we know nothing, into the society of our friends."

"And what do you say, Mrs. Spangle?"

"Why, Miss Dexter, upon brother Sampson's account, I am in favor of sending him a card; but I do not insist. It is Netty's party, and she may do as she pleases."

"And I incline to your opinion."

"You do not mean it, Kate Dexter!"

"But I do, Miss Netty Spangle; for of all the young men whom it has been my fortune to meet, I think him to be the most sensible; and I like to see a man, and not a dose of walking insipidity."

"I believe I was mistaken, Kate. I have just remembered that he has a friend, and a very fashionable one, too. After all, I think we must invite him."

"I am glad to hear you say that, my dear."

"Why, mama, we shall certainly be justified in introducing him as the friend of the gay Kate Dexter."

"Certainly, Annette."

"I protest against that!" exclaimed Kate, laughing. "But if the young man cannot pass without my endorsement, he shall certainly have it."

"Well, he cannot; but you should be careful how you endorse young gentlemen until you have seen cousin Frank."

"Indeed! Now it strikes me I have heard you say, that you have never seen this Mr. Frank Weston."

"Never since we were mere children."

"Well, I will wager that your nice cousin will not prove himself the superior of this quiet Mr. Jones, either in breeding or personal appearance."

"We shall see, Kate; but I will not dispute with you. Make a conquest of this Mr. Jones, by all means, if he suits you; but as for myself, I shall not waste my time upon any unknown personage."

"When will this famous cousin arrive?"

"Before the party comes off, I hope. In fact, he has written to papa, that he may be expected some time next week."

While the ladies are pursuing a conversation, which was doubtless more interesting to themselves than the reader, we will explain a little. The Spangles were not wealthy, although they moved in what they termed "the best society." Mr. Spangle was a man of fair abilities, who rejoiced in the title of judge—a dignity which he fancied he wore with a becoming grace. His income was liberal, but barely sufficient to cover his yearly expenses; and his daughter at an early age was shown the necessity of providing herself with a wealthy husband, if she wished to maintain her position in society.

Kate Dexter was differently situated. Her father was a practical merchant—a particular friend of Mr. Sampson's—and still a hard worker, although he enjoyed an ample fortune. He had chosen his wife from a humble family, whose beauty and goodness he considered an ample dowry. Their daughter inherited her mother's beauty, and much of her father's sterling common sense. She was a general favorite, and spoke her mind with a fearlessness that particularly delighted the blunt bachelor friend of her father's.

As for Mr. Jones, no one seemed to know who he was, or where he belonged. He suddenly appeared in the place in the company of Mr. Sampson, who introduced him to the Spangles as his friend; but further he could not or would not say concerning him.

The young ladies had taken leave of each other, and Kate had just issued from the gateway, when the merry jingle of sleigh-bells was heard approaching, and her name was pronounced by a hearty, bluff voice.

"Ah, Mr. Sampson, you have a fine morning for a ride," she said.

The sleigh had also another occupant, who gracefully raised his fur cap to the fair girl, exposing a fine set of features, and a mass of jetty curls.

"Whither are you bound, Kate?" asked Mr. Sampson.

"Homeward, sir."

"And I dare say would not object to riding."

"It will give me great pleasure to relinquish my seat to Miss Dexter," said the other, leaping from the sleigh.

"O, I could not think of disturbing Mr. Jones. I can easily walk."

"Hey day! How quickly young blood flows!" exclaimed Mr. Sampson. "Jones, come back! I want you to understand, sir, that I claim the honor of assisting that madcap girl into the sleigh. It will be enough for you to have the pleasure of riding with her, of which I shall be deprived."

"But, sir—"

"Not a word! I mean to have my own way in this matter! I am here for the purpose of calling upon my sister, and would rather have the horse moving than standing still in the cold. In with you, Kate, and a merry ride to you!"

An expressive smile lighted his features as the young people rode swiftly away. He stood for a few moments watching their retreating forms, and then hastily entered the house.

"Brother, I am glad to see you," said Mrs. Spangle; "your friend Kate has just left us."

"Yes, she and Jones are off in my sleigh for a ride."

"I wonder at her, uncle," said Annette.

"You do! On what account, I should like to know?"

"What can she know of this Jones?"

"Zounds, girl! Has she not eyes to see for herself?"

"I would not ride with a man of whom I knew nothing."

"But Kate has sense enough to know that her father's friend would not encourage an acquaintance with an unworthy object; while my niece does not give me credit for so much propriety."

"But, uncle, what do you know of him?"

"I know that he is the best fellow that I have seen for many a day, and am satisfied to place him among my best friends."

"I sometimes think, brother," said Mrs. Spangle, "that you know more of him than you choose to tell."

"And so do I, uncle."

"The deuce you do! Well, perhaps, when you find out, you will inform me! Whoever, or whatever he is, he will certainly cause no mischief in this family; for the studied coldness with which you have ever treated him has sufficiently repelled any further advance that he might otherwise have made. And let me tell Miss Annette, that disdain is no beautifier of the features, and young men are not apt to be attracted by it."

Days passed on, and the mysterious Jones was often seen at the Dexters, while the sturdy head of that family seemed wonderfully pleased with him. As the sleighing was fine, Kate was so well satisfied with her first ride, that she often repeated it. Annette shook her young scheming head, and hoped that her friend would not be a sufferer from her imprudence. Uncle Sampson snapped his fingers, and indulged in a quiet laugh whenever the name of Jones was mentioned.

The day of the party at length arrived, and the Spangles of course were all bustle and confusion. To their great regret, not one word had been heard from "Cousin Frank." And Annette felt mortified that she had said so much to her young friends about him; for, to tell the truth, the party had been planned solely on his account. Kate laughed and bantered her friend, who retorted by ridiculing the unknown Jones.

At a fashionable hour the guests began to assemble. Annette looked weary and disappointed, for no intelligence had been received from her expected cousin, and she feared that the affair would prove a failure on this account. At a late hour, Uncle Sampson and his friend, Mr. Jones, was announced. Kate's bright eyes seemed to increase their brilliancy at that moment, and a faint glow was observable stealing over her fair features.

"Ladies and gentlemen," said Mr. Sampson, with a preparatory "ahem," "allow me to introduce my nephew."

The young man, perfectly self-possessed, bowed gracefully to the company, and a slight smile rested upon his features as he met the bewildered gaze of Annette.

"There has been a little masking here, I will allow, to please a whim of an old bachelor uncle," said Mr. Sampson, with a mirthful twinkle of his usually cold gray eye; "but those of us who have known my nephew by the romantic name of Mr. Jones, will doubtless like him none the less as Mr. Frank Weston."

"What, cousin Frank!" exclaimed Annette. "Ah, uncle, what a plot you have sprung upon us!"

Kate Dexter had darted from the room upon the announcement; but she soon returned leaning upon the arm of the ridevant Jones, looking particularly pleased and happy. All in good time—as the reader would doubtless have it—she became Mrs. Frank Weston, and never regretted the moment when she became the endorser of the unknown Jones. Annette is still angling for a rich husband; and when she finds one, we shall be happy to inform all who may be interested in the matter.

THORWALDSEN.

In a review of Thorwaldsen's Leben, by Thiele, second volume, Leipzig, 1856, we find an interesting artistic anecdote, well illustrative of artists' idiosyncrasies:

"One summer evening, in 1820, the secretary of the Hanoverian embassy at Rome, while riding through Albano, was struck with the beauty of a girl about thirteen years old, who sat knitting at the door of a very humble house. Subsequently he introduced the girl, Vittoria by name, and her mother at the German embassy, where every one was fascinated by her marvellous beauty, being pleased by her noble carriage and picturesque dress—and through their means she was brought to Rome, and introduced to the artists. Sculptor after sculptor modelled her bust; and the painters, with Horace Vernet at their head, strove to do justice to her in portraits, of which there are no fewer than twenty-four in existence. But all confessed themselves vanquished in the contest, and unanimously declared that not one of them had seized the entire beauty of their model. The most curious fact, however, in this little history is, that when the various busts and portraits were compared, there were scarcely two that bore any semblance to each other; an additional proof that each man sees things, not as they really are, but as they appear to him through his peculiar mental media. Thorwaldsen tried his hand with the rest, but was not more successful. He subsequently used his bust of Vittoria for the head of the young mother and her children, in the group of John the Baptist preaching in the wilderness, which he executed for the Church of the Virgin, at Copenhagen."

BROKEN HEARTS.

Some time ago we alluded to two cases of sudden death, which had recently occurred, and which could not properly be classed under any ordinary title of disease. We have just come across an anecdote related by Dr. J. K. Mitchell, while lecturing to his pupils, in Jefferson College, upon diseases of the heart, and which furnishes an additional proof that the expression "broken-hearted" is not merely figurative. On one occasion, in the early period of his life, he accompanied, as a surgeon, a packet that sailed from Liverpool to one of the American ports. The captain frequently conversed with him respecting a lady who had promised to become his bride on his return from that voyage. Upon this subject he evinced great warmth of feeling, and showed Dr. Mitchell some costly jewels, ornaments, etc., which he intended to present as bridal presents. On reaching his destination, he was abruptly informed that the lady had married some one else. Instantly the captain was observed to clap his hands to his breast, and fall heavily to the ground; he was taken up and conveyed to his cabin on board the vessel. Dr. Mitchell was immediately summoned, but before he reached the poor captain he was dead. A post-mortem examination revealed the cause of his unfortunate disease—his heart was found literally torn in twain! The tremendous propulsion of blood consequent upon such a violent nervous shock, forced the powerful muscular tissues asunder, and life was at an end.—Philadelphia Sun.

POETIC PICTURE OF LONDON.

Do you know a city, reader, with miles—thousands of miles of streets?—with houses—huge blocks of brute matter pierced with holes, no more, as regards any hidden laws of beauty, yet at twilight toiling down into grandeur, and at midnight massing into mountains of black marble, with a monotonous splendor of repetition worthy of Hades, and not to be matched this side of Purgatory? For buttresses of shadow, and rank and file of colossal darkness veiling life, is there anything to equal London by night? It may be ruin, it may be dead empire; but there it is, eluding the eye, mocking the sense, and filling the brain with a repetition which is inconceivably sublime. Talk of Paris, with its glittering whiteness, its fountain-squares, its columns and arches, its monster domes, its swift, narrow river, chained and subjugated with bridges, its stainless sapphire air, and light, laughing, restless clouds—what is that to London, on a bright March blustering day with its million chimneys, each one with its own banner of white smoke, its torrent rush of endless crowds, rough and tumultuous, and its great canopy of vapor, fire-veined, now sun-smitten, now driven up in tempest-heaps, now thinning and growing glorified with light?—G. W. Thornbury.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

W. A. R.

BY REVEREND.

O ye who read of the warlike deed,
Whose rider doth proudly seem;
Of the "musket's flash and cannon's crash,"
And the sabre's "lightning gleam!"

Do you never think
On the fond hearts broke,
Through the charge of that steel,
And that sabre's stroke?

Their bayonets bright reflect the light,
And martial strains are heard,
As the drums and fife inspire new life,
And the bugles peal "the word."

Beneath this shell
Of pomp and show,
Lie, concealed, the seeds
Of death and woe.

To the charge they spring, while their sabres ring,
And the hurled cannon roar;
Their standards gay, in the breezes play,
As their columns to battle pour.

Widows, how many
Will be to-night!
Orphans, how many
Ere morning light!

They're mingled in fight: O God! what a sight
The smoke shuts out from day!
While the drum's deep roll seems loudly to call
The angel of death to his prey!

The time is night: by the pale moonlight
Fond mothers weep over the slain;
And with looks of despair, young orphans fair
Flud their father's cold corse on the plain.

A maiden, as pure
As the angels above her,
Dies, weeping, embracing
The form of her lover.

To the arch-fiend alone does war owe its birth;
How long, O how long, shall it ravage the earth?

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

YES OR NO.

BY ELLA HARTWELL.

It was a lovely evening in August, and the gay throng, at one of our fashionable watering-places, were nearly all enjoying the evening sea-breezes. In the vacated parlor of the principal hotel, and half-reclining upon a lounge near the open window, was a young girl, watching with much interest the different groups scattered around, though apparently with no desire to join them. There was an utter listlessness in her attitude and in the drooping eye-lash, that contrasted strangely with the gay laugh and the music of merry voices that came floating in on the evening air. She was evidently about seventeen years of age, a beautiful creature, but exceedingly small and fragile; heavy masses of jet-black hair fell in ringlets around a head of exquisite contour, while the high, intellectual forehead and languid look of the dark, brilliant eye impressed one at once with the idea that her physical strength was not equal to her mental.

Lizzie Gay had experienced both the sunshine and shadow of life. She was born in England; her father was a highly respected merchant, and though not wealthy, was able to gratify his wife and daughter with every needed desire. He had met her mother at a large party; and captivated by her grace and beauty, had, after a slight acquaintance, made proposals of marriage to her, which were accepted. There was, however, little sympathy between them. She was too purely selfish to appreciate a mind like Horace Gay's, and the wealth of his love centered on his only child Lizzie.

He was her only teacher, and took great delight in the ardent and enthusiasm which she manifested in her studies. He died when Lizzie was only nine, and though for a time she was quite inconsolable at the loss of her best friend, her grief gradually wore away, and in her books she found constant pleasure. It was little to Mrs. Gay's taste to direct the education of her daughter; and at the age of eleven, she was sent to a private school in Paris, where her mother had friends, and where she remained until her mother's second marriage, two years afterward.

Lizzie was much pleased with her new father. Mrs. Gay, in her second choice, had secured a fortune. Mr. Jackson was a wealthy gentleman from New York, a man of many peculiar traits of character, and not many sound moral principles. He, however, possessed a kind heart, with the pleasant faculty of making all around him happy. He had met Mrs. Gay while travelling in France, and they having been mutually pleased with each other, her second marriage, like the first, had been a hasty one.

Lizzie and her new father were fast friends from the first; and during a long and lingering illness with which she was afflicted, after their arrival at their new home in New York, she received from him every kind attention.

At the time we first introduced Lizzie to the reader, she was making her first acquaintance with the fashionable world; for though a gay woman herself, and mingling much in society, Mrs. Jackson had been careful to treat Lizzie as a young girl, knowing that she would no longer be considered young after the introduction of her daughter. This summer, Mr. Jackson's entreaties had prevailed, and Lizzie had been allowed to accompany them to their chosen resort.

"What! all alone, Lizzie, this pleasant evening!" said a pleasant voice at the parlor door. "You must have been lonesome here."

"O, no—not lonesome, uncle," said Lizzie, turning her eyes on the speaker; "you know I am well used to keeping myself company, and this evening I have really enjoyed watching the gay throng. I was just conjecturing whether this large company of people were as happy as they really seemed."

"You had better decide that question at some other time," said her companion. "For the present, I came for you to walk with me."

"I had much rather sit here and talk, uncle," replied Lizzie.

"But I wish to walk. I have something in particular to say to you this evening. Remember, in one week, I leave for California. You will not refuse?" This was said half-pleadingly, half-commandingly.

"No," said Lizzie. "I see I must overcome any excessive laziness." And rising, she left the room to equip herself for the walk.

Her companion watched her as she left, and a half-triumphant smile lit up his features. He was a younger brother of Mr. Jackson's, a strikingly handsome man, but with a haughty, conceited air quite repulsive. He had been married, but his wife having died about a year before, he had since made his home in his brother's family. He had even made a pet of Lizzie; and she returned his kindness with sincere love, and even considered him the kindest of uncles.

Lizzie soon made her appearance, and taking his arm, they wended their way towards the beach. They walked along some time in silence.

"Why is it, uncle," said Lizzie, at length, "that you are obliged to leave for California, just in the gayest of the season? I am sure there will be little pleasure in staying here after you are gone."

"I am glad to hear you say that, Lizzie," said he, turning to her abruptly. "I can better ask you a question I was wishing to ask. Lizzie, do you—can you love me?"

Astonished at the question, no less than the impassioned manner of the speaker, she answered, after a moment's pause:

"Certainly—as my uncle. Have I not always appeared to?"

"I do not mean that, Lizzie," he replied, quickly. "I never knew until since I thought of leaving home how necessary you had become to my happiness—how very dear you were to me. Only tell me, Lizzie, that this love is returned—that you will become my wife."

"Uncle, you have always been very kind to me, and I assure you I appreciate it, and shall always wish you well, but I must answer truly. I cannot love you as you wish. I never thought of you as other than a kind uncle. I do not—cannot understand this."

It was in vain that Mr. Jackson, pleaded,—he who had flattered himself that the most gifted ladies would feel flattered by his attentions, was decidedly refused. Was it this that made him plead so earnestly, as they returned to the hotel, or to urge her as they parted for the night, to think more favorably of him, and give him a satisfactory answer on the morrow.

Any one seeing Lizzie Gay, as she entered her room that night and threw herself sobbing on her bed, would have hardly imagined it had been the same Lizzie they had seen sitting so listlessly at the window, the early part of the evening. The words spoken by her uncle had highly excited her, and the greater part of the night she spent in tears, to think that he of all others should have offered himself to her.

What would her father think? She could not go to him or her mother for advice in this matter; and so silently and alone, she thought it over, at one moment, so unwilling was she to grieve her uncle, half-flattering herself that she loved him well enough to become his wife, and the next, banishing the idea as absurd. After a short sleep, she was able to look upon the subject more calmly. She excused herself from breakfast on the plea of a bad headache. But when, in the course of the morning, she received a note from her uncle, inviting her to join him in a short ride, she immediately accepted.

Her uncle met her with his usual kind inquiries for her health. They had ridden but a short distance, when they overtook Lizzie's father, and much to her surprise and consternation, her uncle stopped and invited him to ride. Sitting between the two, Lizzie's situation was by no means a pleasant one, and she felt much provoked with her uncle for his comparative want of consideration. A few common-place remarks passed between them, when Lizzie's uncle, turning to her, said:

"Lizzie, have you thought more favorably of the proposals I made you last evening? Remember how much my happiness depends on your answer."

Half-provoked (and she would have been still more so had she seen the mischievous twinkle in the eyes of both father and uncle), she answered him haughtily:

"I have considered, and if you needed a witness, then father will hear that I answer you—no."

Had the earth opened beneath her, she could not have been more surprised than at the appearance of her father, who, falling back in the carriage, clapped his hands in perfect glee.

"What does this mean?" she asked.

"Mean? My little pet, Lizzie," said her father, as soon as he could speak, "why simply that your conceited uncle here imagined you were in love with him, and made a bet of five hundred dollars with me that you would accept if he offered himself. I knew better; and now, brother, after a fair trial, what do you think of it?"

"I think it is evident she does not appreciate me," replied her uncle, after a short pause; "honestly, though, I have learned a good lesson, though at Lizzie's expense. I think the five hundred dollars should be long to her."

"And so it shall, with another five hundred, which I will add to it," said her father.

But the thousand dollars was little compensation to Lizzie Gay for what she had suffered; and though she forgave both her father and uncle, she could never forget that she had been trifled with, or cease to be thankful that she had answered "no" instead of "yes."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SUMMER RESIDENCE OF LAMARTINE.

BY W. S. C.

WITHOUT stopping to justify the natural curiosity inspired by the homes of living men of genius, let me invite you to the summer residence of Lamartine, and afterwards to his present abode in Paris.

On the right of the route from Marnon to Moulins, a short distance from the former town, at the bottom of a little valley planted with vines and walnut trees, rises the chateau of Monceaux, the favorite summer residence of Lamartine, during several years past. This chateau dates from the commencement of the eighteenth century. Its principal front is turned towards the south. A double exterior staircase, separated by an enormous mass of boxwood, ends on the first story in a wide stair-head, forming a terrace. From this terrace, you discover the valley just mentioned. On the opposite side, high and uncultivated hills shelter the chateau from the north wind, and permit no other horizon than their own gray and naked outlines.

The ordinary entrance is towards the north. In the centre of the court, a grass-plot; on one side, the offices; on the other, the chapel; in fact, a perron of several steps conducting to the vestibule. This hall is adorned with a group of angels bearing a cross of the holy-water basin at the church of St. Germain l'Auxerrois, executed by Gouffroy after the designs of Mme. de Lamartine.

On this vestibule opens the principal parlor, a vast gallery extending almost the entire length of the front. On the panels of wood-work, tropical birds stretch their brilliant and variegated wings. On one side, a chimney surmounted by a Venice glass bas-relief; here, a stand covered with books and albums, with its accompanying arm-chairs, their cushions well-pressed; there, bronzes and statuettes, with two splendid busts of Lamartine, this by d'Orsay, that by Brion. On the other side, a billiard-table, with its white and red balls slumbering lazily on the green cloth, and, suspended to the wood-work on the wall, oriental pipes, the gift of Sultan Mahmoud.

This gallery has been crowded with illustrious and numerous visitors. Balzac has there dreamed aloud some of his dreams of fortune and glory. George Sand has met there Dumas; Eugene Pelletan with Jules Sandeau. Alexandre Dumas has made the parlor ring with his sparkling chit-chat. The late Mme. de Girardin used to indulge there in the charms of witty and fine conversation, with Lamartine's niece, Mme. de Pierresol, who joins to the erudition of a benedictine the grace and wit of a woman of distinction. And Listz, whenever he visited France, returned there a constant and welcome guest.

There is another parlor at Monceaux, called the summer-parlor. It is on the basement story, and opens to the south on the gardens. Besides remarkable pictures, the work of Mme. de Lamartine, you admire one of Gudin's sea-views, offered to the mistress of the house by Eugene Sue, in remembrance of her gracious hospitality, and several paintings of Italian masters, given by the Grand Duke of Tuscany to M. de Lamartine when he was charge d'affaires at Florence in 1828.

In the dining-hall, coffers and sideboards in oak, sculptured and inwrought by a marvellous chisel, attest the patience and the genius of some unknown artist.

The bed-chamber is of great simplicity: two twin beds with canopies, separated by a Christ in ivory, pious souvenir of the mother of Lamartine.

A private staircase leads from the chamber to the working-closet, or study, which communicates also by a narrow passage with the large parlors on the first story. On one side of the study, a couch, at the head of which is the portrait of Julia, the poet's only daughter, who died in the East. Behind this bed, a trophy of Turkish arms given by the Sultan. In the middle of the room, an arm-chair, and a table strewn with papers, pens and little Spanish cigarettes, short and perfumed.

It is on this table that were written more than one magnificent episode of Joelynn, and many eloquent pages of the Girondins. There, at a later period, Lamartine created the Civilisateur, and, still more recently, conceived the plan of his Cours Familier de Littérature, which, in spite of the critics and of heartless detractors, has awakened, by its appeal to the public, universal sympathy on both sides of the Atlantic. Lamartine has himself expressed to me his sense of the cordial welcome of M. Desplaces, as his friend, by the citizens of the United States. I fear, however, that the latter have been outdone by the Emperor of Brazil and his subjects in manifestations of sympathy. If this be so, there are indeed more ways than one to account for it, but this is not the place to indicate them.

We must be contented to be judged by that which people can discern and handle; that which they can have among them most at leisure, is most likely to be well examined and duly estimated. —Londor.

JOHN VAN BUREN, ESQ.

In pursuance of our plan of publishing authentic portraits of the prominent men of the time, we present our readers, on this page, with a likeness of John Van Buren, Esq., of New York, drawn expressly for us by Barry, after a beautiful ambrotype by Meade Brothers, of New York. The head is an intellectual one, and will be readily recognized by all who have ever seen the original. Notwithstanding the eminence to which Mr. Van Buren has risen, his career offers but few salient points to the biographer, and those chiefly of a political character, which, of course, prevents their discussion in these columns. John Van Buren is the eldest son of President Van Buren, who has filled so large a space in our history, and occupied so much of the attention of the world. Although abroad it may aid an ambitious young man to be possessed of a historic name, it is of no assistance on this side of the water. We Americans are no believers in hereditary ability. On the contrary, we are so jealous of all hereditary distinction that we rather err in the opposite direction, and are apt to scan almost too critically the claims of blood relatives of distinguished Americans. Some of Mr. Irving's relatives are gifted writers, but we think their family name is a positive disadvantage to them—for as the public recognized only one Washington, so they acknowledge only one Irving. Therefore, when we see the bearer of an eminent name rise to distinction in any walk of life, we may safely say of him that he has risen in spite of his birth. We reverence the architect of his own fortunes; we receive with doubt the man who comes before us with transmitted honor. We long ago abrogated the law of primogeniture, and we virtually protest against the transmission of valuable qualities as well as valuable property. The practical result of this feeling is that the son of a prominent man has to work a little harder than the son of a nobody. The subject of our sketch has worked hard and achieved a position for himself. To his father's political fortune he was never indebted in the least. He early marked out his own pathway and followed whither it led. Liberally educated, he was always an industrious student. Having selected the law for a profession, after the usual preliminary course he was admitted to the bar and produced an immediate impression. Gifted with a fine face and person, with great oratorical and logical ability, sharp, witty, humorous, self-possessed and well-read, he combined all the elements of legal success. His profession is a fortune to him, and, though he has mingled largely in politics, he will probably always rely on the law for a support. He is pronounced by good judges one of the best political stump-speakers we have, and in the large audiences he attracts whenever his name is announced, there are always many who, while dissenting radically from his doctrines, are amused and pleased by his manner. No interruption ever disconcerts him, and he receives the sharpest sally from an opponent with good humor, because he is always ready with a repartee. During the presidency of his father, Mr. Van Buren visited Europe and was everywhere well received, particularly in England, where he was especially honored—even in highest circles. If, for his reception, he was indebted to his father's position, his own manners and accomplishments maintained him in his true rank, as a fitting representative of his countrymen. Mr. Van Buren has been engaged in many important suits, and has conducted them with singular adroitness and success. He is now in the prime of life, with an established public reputation, and in private, the confirmed favorite of a very wide circle of friends and acquaintances, to whom he is endeared by his talents, his information, his amenity of manner and his generous warm-heartedness. His success as a lawyer at the New York bar, remarkable as it is for the talent of its members, is a proof of uncommon capacity and of severe application to legal study.

JOHN VAN BUREN.

VIEW OF COMMUNIPAW, NEW JERSEY.

The accompanying view is from the pencil of Hill, and brings distinctly before us the quiet, unpretending village that stretches along the water, with its clumps of trees, its modest houses, some of them antique and moss-grown, its projecting wharves, its lines of boats upon the stream, and its various small craft dotting the placid mirror in front. Communipaw is at present a small village, celebrated neither for its wealth, influence nor fashion; but it has greater claims to respect and attention. According to tradition, it is the spot on which the first Dutch colony landed, the nest-egg from which New York was hatched, the first expedition to the opposite shores of Manhattan being undertaken by "Oloffe, the dreamer," in the ship "Goede Vrouw," from this very point. Washington Irving has immortalized it in his "History of New York," and sundry articles and legends written for the Knickerbocker Magazine. He writes: "It is pleasantly situated among rural scenery, in that beautiful part of the Jersey shore, known in ancient legends as Favonia, and commands a grand prospect of the bay of New York. It is within half an hour's sail of the latter place, provided you have a fair wind, and may be distinctly seen from that city. Nay it is a well known fact which I can testify from my own experience, that on a clear, still summer evening, one may hear from the Battery of New York the obstreperous peals of broad-mouthed laughter of the Dutch negroes of Communipaw, who, like most other negroes, are famous for their risible powers." The inhabitants are almost without exception, oystermen or market-gardeners, and although the tourist might be disappointed at not finding them dressed in wide boots and wider breeches, laced jackets and high-crowned hats, they still retain the original love of tobacco for which their ancestors were so famous. Still they are a quiet and temperate race, and it is worthy of remark, that no hotel, boarding-house or groggery has found place amongst them, notwithstanding its close propinquity to the city. The author of the Knickerbocker History of New York states that, after founding the place, "a brisk trade in furs soon opened. The Dutch traders were scrupulously honest in their dealings, and purchased by weight, establishing as an invariable rule of avoidance, that the hand of a Dutchman weighed one pound, and his foot two pounds. It is true the simple Indians were often puzzled by the great disproportion between bulk and weight, for, let them place a bundle of fur never so large in one scale, and a Dutchman put his hand or foot in the other, the handle was sure to kick the beam. Never was a package of furs known to weigh more than two pounds in the market of Communipaw." In the drawing, the third and sixth houses, counting from the right, are of stone, and are all that remain of the old Dutch mansions. There are many places in New York State, however, where the inhabitants preserve distinctly the traces of their Dutch original, and where are many relics of olden time.

PUTNAM AS A SPY.

Among the officers of the Revolutionary army, none, probably, possessed more originality than General Putnam, who was eccentric and fearless, blunt in his manners, the daring soldier without the polish of a gentleman. He might well be called the Marion of the North, though he disliked disguise, probably from the fact of his lisp, which was very apt to overthrow any trickery which he might have in view. At that time, a stronghold called Harseneck, some miles from New York, was in the hands of the British. Putnam, with a few sturdy patriots, was lurking in the vicinity, bent on driving them from the place. Tired of lurking in ambush, the men began to be impatient, and importuned the general with the question as to when they were to have a bout with the foe. One morning he made a speech something to the following effect, which convinced them that something was in the wind: "Fellows, you have been idle too long, and so has the ox-team and the bag of corn. If I come back, I will let you know the particulars; if I should not, let them have it, by hook or by crook." He soon afterwards mounted his ox-cart, dressed as one of the commonest order of Yankee farmers, and was soon at Buck's tavern, which was in possession of the British troops. No sooner did the officers espy him than they began to question him as to his whereabouts, and finding him a complete simpleton as they thought, they began to quiz him, and threatened to seize his corn and fodder. "How much do you ask for your whole concern?" asked they. "For mercy's sake, gentlemen," replied the mock clodhopper, with the most deplorable look of entreaty, "only let me off, and you shall have my hull team and load for nothing, and if that don't dew, I'll give my word I'll return to-morrow, and pay you heartily for your kindness and condescension." "Well," said they, "we'll take your word. Leave the team and provender with us, and we won't require any bad bail for your appearance." Putnam gave up the team, and sauntered about for an hour or so, gaining all the information he wished. He then returned to his men and told them of the foe, and the plan of attack. The morning came, and with it sallied out the gallant band. The British were handled with rough hands, and when they surrendered to General Putnam, the clodhopper, he sarcastically remarked: "Gentlemen, I have kept my word. I told you I would call and pay you for your kindness and condescension."—Revolutionary Reminiscences.

COMMUNIPAW, NEW JERSEY.

The Poet's Corner.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

BY THE SEASHORE.

BY ROSE MERTON.

The autumn day is dying,
Twilight's shades descending fast:
The autumn winds are sighing
For the summer that is past.

As the flowers of summer perished
In all their golden prime,
So the hopes I fondly cherished
Have gone with the summer-time!

The summer days will come again
With blooming flower and tree;
But, O, the summer of the heart
Will come no more to me!

The waves break on the barren shore,
With a low and mournful sound;
The yellow leaves all withered lie
Upon the chill, cold ground.

The moaning sound of the "sad sea waves"
Tells my heart of pleasures past—
The withered leaves of dead, cold love,
Too warm—too fond to last!

THE NEED OF LOVE.

The love of all
(To risk, in turn, a woman's paradox.)
Is but a small thing to the love of one.
You bid a hungry child be satisfied
With a heritage of many cornfields: nay,
He says he's hungry—he would rather have
That little barley-cake you keep from him
While reckoning up his harvests.—MRS. BROWNING.

SUNSET.

The sun sets, and the blushing water turns
To a blue, star-spangled, foam-tipped, wavy sea
Of beauty. Yonder sweeps a brave white sail,
Bending as gracefully in evening's breeze
As a skater on the glassy ice.—BRANARD.

HOME.

Fashion can charm, and feeling bless
With sweeter hours than fashion knows;
There is no calmer quietness
Than home around the bosom throws.—PERCIVAL.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

Pliny Miles, the Iceland traveller, looked in upon us to-day, with his loud, hearty laugh, and cordial grip. Mr. Miles is the well-known "Communi-paw," European correspondent of the Boston Post and other American journals, and the fast friend of postal reforms. . . . We thank W. R. O., who writes us from Logansport, Indiana, for his kind expressions of good will. He says:—"A vast improvement has taken place since I first saw the Pictorial. A bound volume of the Pictorial is more acceptable to a lady for a holiday present than a volume of any magazine on the continent." . . . How can a physician expect to understand such an order as the following when written on his slate?—"Please call at Thomson's and nickerlize his baby?" . . . Some of the severest labors in life are the poorest paid. The parish clerk of Wink-leigh, England, has a salary of a guinea a year for winding up the church clock daily. To earn this sum he has to travel 102 miles, ascend and descend 29,000 steps, and haul up 18 tons weight 3600 yards. . . . Our friends in Bangor are getting rather extravagant; they have lately completed the erection of a church edifice of a very magnificent character, costing sixty thousand dollars. It is known as St. John's Church, and will seat about two thousand persons. . . . The editor of the Philadelphia Bulletin is perfectly welcome to copy column after column from our paper—but wouldn't it appear a little more honorable in him to give the customary credit? . . . An Indiana paper relates, as a singular circumstance, that a defeated candidate out there has become insane. That is nothing new; there are very few sane politicians anywhere. . . . To-day's mail brings us a note from our old friend, John G. Saxé, the poet. We referred, in a late number of the gossip department, to his long and serious illness; but feel rejoiced to know that he is now fast recovering. . . . It is a singular fact, that duels and suicides are unknown among the Turks. They believe in predestination, and are rigidly opposed to the idea of hastening death by arsenic. . . . Our contemporaries are perfectly welcome to copy our biographical notice of Peter Nassau, the oldest man in America, whose portrait we published lately; but we beg leave to observe that the sketch of his life originated with "Ballou's Pictorial," and not with the "Pennsylvania." . . . We heard an old gentleman remark, the other day, that the "backbone of the winter was broken," but we beg leave to differ from him. The spine of "Old Hems" will last some weeks to come. . . . Mrs. General Gaines has commenced another suit for her father's estate; she is a lady of infinite courage and perseverance. We remember seeing her a few years since—a fine-looking woman, who, if personal attractions had weight, could never lose a suit. . . . A new sort of cannon ball has been invented, which, it is said, will penetrate even granite bulwarks. If "hunger will break through stone walls," we don't see why artillery shouldn't. . . . Americans are immense favorites with the Russian government. It is stated that the English employees of the czar are to be dismissed, and Yankees substituted in their places. . . . The screw of the steam frigate Niagara, made in New York, weighs 30,000 pounds—powerful enough, one would think, to screw mouey out of a miser. . . . We are indebted to the "Lynn Bay State" for a complimentary notice of "Ballou's Pictorial." Glad you liked the Lynn series of illustrations, neighbor Joselyn. . . . One of the pioneers of Western Virginia died the other day—John Lowery—100 years of age. . . . The increase of gold from California the past year over the preceding, was about forty millions of dollars. . . . A very pleasant lounge in these dull days is Balch's picture store, in Tremont Row, next the Temple. It is refreshing to look on green meadows, and grazing cattle, and purring streams, in midwinter. . . . We are afraid the New Yorkers will not be able to win Mrs. Wood away from Manager Barry, and that she will continue to waste her sweetness in "the provinces," as they call it—meaning the Boston Theatre. Complimentary fellows, those New York editors! . . . What typographical gems those books of poetry are that Ticknor & Fields are constantly getting up. Poetry-publishing is their speciality, and they never place their gems in a poor setting. . . . Mr. Brackett has cast his statue of the Rev. Hosea Ballou in plaster. Now comes the laborious work of blocking out, chiselling and finishing the marble after the model. . . . We saw some splendid pears in Palmer's window, in School Street, the other day—a glass plate intervening. They were worth at least sixpence a look. . . . So the charming Laura Keane has yielded to the power of love, and is nearly through her honeymoon. A Mr. Leutze is the happy man. . . . We can't help grumbling at the weather now and then; but after all, winter is a glorious season. It braces mind and muscle, and enables us to work, work, work. It is all very fine to talk about lolling in a hammock under a palm-tree under the tropics—but laziness and mosquitoes are not very desirable things, after all. . . . On a pleasant hill in the country, not far from where "one of us" "hangs out his banner on the outward wall," the ladies and gentlemen—grown-up folks—enjoy costing as much as the boys and girls. Often, of a moonlight evening, as we dash by in the train, we hear their merry voices, and see them whiz down the icy slope at a rate of speed that is reproachful even to the locomotive. . . . Laughed consumedly the other day at a street incident. A painter's apprentice, quite poorly clad, was lettering a door-post, when he dropped his brush. A most magnificently-got-up colored gentleman—a real diamond blazing on his shirt front—paused, stooped, and, with infinite grace, handed the fallen implement to the sign-painter. The latter would have thanked him, but his courteous friend checked him with a wave of his jewelled hand, and said:—"Nebber mind—de Emperor Charles V. picked up de pencil of Massa Titian!" . . . January seems to be a fatal month to greatness. Among those who have died in this month, we recall Charlemagne, Charles I., Fenelon, Peter the Great, Congreve, Halley, Fontenelle, Linnaeus, Howard, Louis XVI., Gibbon, Lavater, William Pitt, George III., Dr. Jenner, Niebuhr, Dr. Follen and sweet Mary Mitford. . . . That was a beautiful idea of Horace Mann, comparing the death of an infant to a bird struck down by a fowler in the midst of his morning song. . . . "Give me back my youth!" were the last words of Walcott (Peter Pindar). Richter says:—"Remember, that when years shall be passed, and your feet shall stumble on the dark mountain, you will cry bitterly, but cry in vain, 'O, youth, return! O, give me back my early days!'" . . . Some biographers are no more reliable than "John Phoenix," when he states that "George Washington was born of poor but honest parents, in the city of Genoa, in the year 1694." . . . The engravings belonging to the late Francis C. Gray, of this city, were valued at $30,000, and he bequeathed them to the Boston Athenæum—and with previous donations and purchases, make that department of the institution the richest in the country. . . . During the year 1856, 195 persons have lost their lives by railroad accidents, and 355 by steamboat disasters—an increase, in both cases, over the preceding year. . . . If Russia and Switzerland go to war, we predict the triumph of the sons of Tell. A mountainous country, defended by freemen, is invincible. . . . An excellent idea has just been started in this State—the formation of farmers' circulating libraries (the libraries to be composed of agricultural books only) in our large farming towns. . . . Capt. Ericsson has been awarded $13,000 by the Court of Claims for his application of a ship propeller and steam machinery, and for superintending the building of the steamer Princeton. Capt. Ericsson is a most worthy man, has met with heavy losses in his attempts to improve steam navigation, and we rejoice to learn that his merits have been so promptly recognized. . . . It is said that the Klamath (California) county jail consists of a live oak tree, with a chain and staple attached. Criminals, of course, have plenty of air when confined to such quarters. . . . Dr. James Copeland censures the practice of making children sleep with aged persons. In such cases, the children almost invariably become sick. . . . Curious coincidences in the style of partnership firms are sometimes observable. A tailoring establishment was managed by "Cumb & Settle;" and there is an oyster-house in Nashville, Tennessee, kept by Adams & Eves. . . . We have two first rate French landscapists established here in Boston—Rondel and Morvillier. It is worth while to drop into Balch's, Tremont Row, and notice some of their productions. . . . We suppose Leigh Hunt only spoke of poetical translations, when he said, "Translations are no more like the original, than a walking-stick is like a flowering bough." The prose of one language may be rendered into acceptable prose in another tongue, but the fine aroma of poetry is lost in the process. We'll may the Germans call translation "upsetting." Poor Goethe has been frequently capsize in this manner. . . . Those persons are much mistaken who picture the sages of antiquity as solemn, long-faced individuals who never "smiled" (we don't allude to their habits of temperance). Pascal says:—"We commonly picture Plato and Aristotle in stately robes, and as personages always grave and solemn. They were good fellows, who laughed like others with their friends. . . . We plead guilty to a liking for fine dresses for ladies, but not in men. 'He was so well dressed,' said somebody to Beau Brummel, speaking of a third person, 'that people would turn and look at him.'—'Then he was not well dressed,' said that great master of the art of costume. . . . Madame Rachel, certainly the greatest living actress, has no thought of dying just yet, we are happy to learn. Her trip to Egypt has improved her health, and she will yet delight admiring audiences with her splendid impersonations. . . . There is no time of the day like the morning for literary labor. Webster and John Quincy Adams were both early risers. Sir Walter Scott wrote most of his romances when his guests at Abbotsford thought him abed and asleep. Lamartine gets to work at six in the morning and finishes by noon, when he breakfasts; and this is the practice of the most brilliant French writers of the day. They give the morning to work—the afternoon to recreation, exercise and society. . . . The Paris correspondent of the Boston Atlas says:—"Ben's wheelbarrow has been a 'Chariot of Fame,' and the name of Ben: Perley Poore is circling the earth with the martial airs of England. The West Newbury road is likely to prove to him, what the St. Denis road was to the first bishop of Paris—you remember he was canonized for walking with his head in his hand from Paris to St. Denis." . . . Gen. Persifer F. Smith has been confirmed in the new brigadier-generalship by the United States Senate. He was a gallant officer of the Mexican war, and his brave rifles circulated a good report of themselves. . . . "Kissing customs" vary according to localities. When an enterprising young gentleman steals a kiss from an Alabama girl, she says, "I reckon it's my time now," and gives him a box on the ear that he is likely to remember for a week afterwards. Munkind, turtle-doves and pigeons are the only animals that we know of that practice kissing. . . . The sayings of children are often strikingly original. On one of our fine frosty evenings, a child, pointing to the stars, asked, with great earnestness and simplicity, "Mother, what are those? Are they little gimlet-holes to let the glory through?" That child will be a poet, if he lives to manhood. . . . Women are the severest satirists of women. It was Lady Blessington who said:—"I do believe there is no creature under heaven more wholly heartless, or more disposed to be mischievous, than a fine lady." . . . Our city has changed somewhat in manners from the good old days when "Capt. Stone was sentenced to pay a hundred pounds, and prohibited coming within the patent on pain of death, for calling Mr. Ludlow (one of the justices) a just-ess." That was a pretty severe penalty for an execrable pun. . . . There is a passage in Nahum, chap. 2: 4, which might be thought prophetic of railroads. The sacred writer, speaking of chariots, says:—"They shall seem like torches; they shall run like the lightnings." There cannot be a better description of an illuminated night express train.

CRUELTY OF GREEK BRIGANDS.

The process resorted to by the robbers for discovering the whereabouts of hidden repositories, was a cruel, but effective one. A kettle full of oil was set on the fire. If the unfortunate woman, who protested that she was ignorant where her husband had hid his treasure, relented in view of the coming torture, she was not molested. But if she persisted in her obstinacy, or really did not know where it was, the scalding fluid was poured upon her neck, breast and body. Five or six were subjected to this inhuman treatment; others were merely beaten; and one whom we saw boasted that, though the ruffians stabbed her in several places, she had not betrayed her husband's trust.—Baird's Modern Greece.

Choice Miscellany.

THE ROPE-DANCER.

It is in the humbler classes of society that the most beautiful sparks of virtue often shine. A fire broke out at Alencon, which produced dreadful ravages. An entire family was saved by an unknown man, who scaled the walls with a wonderful agility, treading the burning beams, and who extricated victim after victim, in the midst of acclamations. This man was Joseph Plege, who exercised the profession of a rope-dancer; and it was the dexterity and agility developed by his occupation that enabled him to save a whole family, by venturing on narrow and moving surfaces to snatch them from the flames. The company to which the worthy Plege belonged were preparing to quit Alencon, but their departure was delayed to give him a benefit. The theatre was crowded in every part, and thunders of applause greeted the courageous rope-dancer, who, covered with burns and bruises, endeavored to merit the enthusiasm by which he was overwhelmed. When the receipts, which were considerable, were handed to him, Plege presented the whole amount to the family he had saved. "These poor people," said he, "are ruined; what good shall I have done to have saved them from the flames, if I leave them to the horrors of starvation?" The authorities gave a medal of honor to the brave man who had displayed so much devotion and virtue. Home Journal.

THE HUMAN FACE.

The expression of the face is a beautiful distinction of humanity. We are little aware of the influence which it constantly exerts. If the dumb animal, on whom man exercises his cruelty—if the horse or dog, when suffering by a blow from the violence of man, could turn upon him with a look of indignation or appeal, could any one resist the power of the mute expostulation? How extraordinary, too, the difference of expression in the human face, by which the recognition of personal identity is secured! On this small surface, nine inches by six, are depicted such various traits, that, among the millions of inhabitants on the earth, no two have the same lineaments. What dire confusion would ensue if all countenances were alike—if fathers did not know their own children by sight, nor husbands their wives! But now we can pick out friends from among the multitudes of the assembled universe. —Dr. Dewey.

BOOTS IN RUSSIA.

The Russians are essentially a booted people. The commonality do not understand shoes at all; and when they have no boots, either go barefooted, or else thrust their extremities into atrocious canoes of plaited birch-bark. Next to a handsome kakoschnik or tiara head-dress, the article of costume most coveted by a peasant woman is a pair of full-sized men's boots. One of the prettiest young English ladies I ever knew used to wear Wellington boots, and had a way of tapping their polished sides with her parasol handle that well nigh drove me distracted; but let that pass—a booted Russian female is quite another sort of personage. In the streets of St. Petersburg, the "sign of the leg" or a huge jack-boot with a tremendous spur, all painted the brightest scarlet, is to be found on legions of houses. The common soldiers wear mighty boots, as our native brigade, after Alma, knew full well; and if you make a morning call on a Russian gentleman, you will very probably find him giving audience to his bootmaker.—Russia and the Russians.

THE STAGE IN SHAKESPEARE'S TIME.

It was strown with green rushes, just as private rooms were in the richest houses; for carpets were, as yet, seldom used. Sometimes it was matted over, as it was for the play of "Henry the Eighth," the night the Globe was burned down. The curtains of silk or worsted did not draw up as they do now, or let down, as in the Roman theatres, but opened in the middle, and sliding with rings, attached to an iron rod, drew back like window or bed-curtains of the present day. The boys of the theatre let out stools at sixpence each to those gallants who wished to dangle the groundlings who stood in the yard or pit. Some lay on the rushes and played at cards and smoked; others drank wine or beer. The apprentices in the cheap second gallery cracked nuts and nibbled apples just as they do now.—Saturday Evening Gazette.

New Publications.

FAMILIAR ASTRONOMY. By HANNAL M. BOUVIER. Philadelphia: Childs & Peterson. 1857. 8vo. pp. 430.

This admirable work is modestly put forth by its accomplished author simply as an "Introduction to the Study of the Heavens," though it contains about as much information as the general reader would care to acquire. It is beautifully and liberally illustrated by maps and engravings, and has a comprehensive astronomical dictionary, and a valuable treatise on the use of the globe. Its arrangement is admirable, and for its accuracy the leading astronomers of the age have vouched. The book is got up in the beautiful style which has gained so high a reputation for Messrs. Childs & Peterson. For sale by Phillips, Sampson & Co.

OUR GRANDMOTHER'S STORIES AND AUNT KATE'S FIRESIDE MEMORIES. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 1857.

A pretty illustrated juvenile work, that cannot fail to interest and improve the very young readers to whose tastes it is specially adapted.

RELIGIOUS TRUTH ILLUSTRATED FROM SCIENCE. By EDWARD HITCHCOCK, D.D., LL.D. Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 442.

This volume consists of a collection of sermons mostly devoted to the illustration and proof of religious truth by scientific facts and principles. The argumentative portion is forcible and ingenious, and couched in language at once elegant and nervous. Dr. Hitchcock's book cannot fail to make a profound impression.

POEMS BY HENRY WADSWORTH LONGFELLOW. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 2 vols. 1857.

Though we have here Longfellow's complete works compressed into two diamond volumes that a lady may carry in her reticule, yet the type is large and distinct—and we know of no more acceptable present to a lady than this elegant edition. It is embellished by a fine head of the poet.

SONOS OF SUMMER. By RICHARD HENRY STODDARD. Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 1857. 18mo. pp. 229.

Another volume of poems from "Parnassus Corner." Mr. Stoddard's volume is replete with genuine inspiration. In its fullness of imagery and passionate tenderness, he reminds us of the poetry of the East; and we feel sure that he will be generously appreciated.

WORDS FOR THE HOUR. By the author of "Passion-Flowers." Boston: Ticknor, Fields & Co. 12mo. pp. 165.

There is a sterling ring in Mrs. Howe's productions, which are all characterized by vigor and originality of thought. She is sometimes careless as to the setting of her gems, but they flash with diamond lustre notwithstanding.

ESSAYS BIOGRAPHICAL AND CRITICAL. By HENRY T. TUCKERMAN. Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co. 1857. 8vo. pp. 475.

The value of biography depends almost entirely upon the manner in which it is written. A mere agglomeration of facts and dates is but little worth. Mr. Tuckerman's biographies—embracing the lights of literature, science, art and politics, representative of almost every walk of life—are written with grace, with discrimination, and with thorough appreciation. They are truly "studies of character," and form a glorious intellectual portrait gallery.

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

ALLEGORICAL REPRESENTATION OF WINTER.

[For description, see page 93.]

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 14, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM } Vol. XII., No. 7.—Whole No. 293.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

STATE OF TENNESSEE.

The fine emblematic picture on this page was designed expressly for the Pictorial by Billings, and has been engraved in the highest style of art by Andrew. In the circle are the State arms, with the plough and olive branch, typical of peace and agriculture, in the shield, and a boat laden with cotton gliding over the surface of the river. In the foreground is a spirited group of horses and mules. To the left are a sugar-house and farm hands; to the right a group of cattle. The State of Tennessee is bounded north by Kentucky and Virginia, east by North Carolina, from which it is separated by the Alleghany Mountains; south by Georgia, Alabama and Mississippi, and west by Arkansas and Missouri, from which it is divided by the Mississippi River. It includes an area of about 45,000 square miles. The first settlers were from North Carolina, who built Fort London, in East Tennessee, in 1757. Constant forays of the Indians impeded the progress of colonization, until after the Revolution. It originally formed a part of the possessions of North Carolina, but was finally ceded to the United States, and was admitted a sovereign State in 1796. Among the distinguished leaders this gallant State furnished to the war of 1812, was General Andrew Jackson, who won immortality by his conduct in that war. Tennessee has sent two presidents to Washington—Jackson and Polk. The population of the State, in 1850, was 1,002,717. Of the entire population, 103 were engaged in mining, 227,739 in agriculture, 2217 in commerce, 17,185 in manufactures, 55 in ocean navigation, 302 in internal navigation, and 2042 in the learned professions. The surface of the State is agreeably diversified, and its area embraces mountain, hill and valley, much of the soil being of extraordinary fertility. Gold has been found in this State, and iron, salt, coal and copper exist in abundance. The rivers afford abundant means of transportation, and all of them ultimately reach the Mississippi. According to the census of 1850, there were 72,735 farms, occupying 5,175,173 acres of improved land. Among the forest trees are pine, sugar-maple, juniper, red cedar, savin, poplar, hickory, walnut, oak, beech, sycamore and cherry. Among the wild animals are deer, raccoons, foxes and squirrels. The natural water power, with its abundance of coal and other fuel, when its railroad system is completed, must make it a great manufacturing State. In 1850, there were 2861 manufacturing establishments. On January 1, 1855, there were 517 miles of completed railroad in the State. Tennessee has but little foreign commerce, but a large domestic trade. Her educational establishments are numerous and noted. According to the census of 1850, there were eight colleges, one theological school, one medical school, 2680 public schools, with 104,117 pupils, and $198,511 income; 264 academies and other schools, with $155,000 income; and attending schools, as returned by families, 146,200. In the same year, there were 2027 churches. There were also eight daily, two tri-weekly and thirty-six weekly newspapers, circulating 2,139,644 copies. The literary resources of the State are well developed.

STATE of TENNESSEE.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—OR—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCRIBE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XXII.

THE BRIDAL NIGHT.

RETURNING to his chateau, the Duke de Santarem soon had a visit from his confessor, who brought a letter from the Count de Lerma, appointing that very day for his marriage. The good monk had scarcely left, when a valet announced a cavalier arrived from Madrid. It was Don Fernand d'Albayda. The duke remembered him to have been the one who caused his arrest at Lisbon; and trembling with rage and fear, he desired him to be shown in. Don Fernand entered, and as he bowed, the duke cried with impatience: "I know what brings you here; it is useless, for I consent to all. I will marry her; all the world wishes it, to commence with you." He spoke, thinking that Don Fernand had come on the part of the duke, and was surprised when he answered:

"I wish the contrary, and I came to oppose it."

"You?"

"Yes. The person you pretend you are to marry is the friend, the sister of my betrothed; she belongs to my family, and I will defend her. Or, as I think the marriage is against her will—"

"I know more than you, for she has declared to me she does not wish it."

"Knowing that, you will still persist?"

"Yes. I have my reasons. I will say to you, senor, that I will marry or not, as suits me," coldly answered the duke.

"Then you are a coward—a villain! What place and how will you meet me?" answered Fernand, bowing.

"A challenge—a challenge! that is the first happiness that has come to me to-day. Choose yourself, Senor Fernand; all will please me."

"To-morrow is fixed for your marriage, I believe?"

"To-day or to-morrow—little matter."

"This evening, then, in the park, I will meet you, when the clock strikes eight. I will kill you, and thus at least prevent the marriage."

So saying, the two separated,—the duke smiling to think that his adversary knew nothing of his hasty marriage.

The marriage had taken place, as we have seen, in presence of the confessor Cordova, Carmina, Juan, and all the vassals of the duke. As the party left the church, the corregidor Josue Calzado, who figured in the first pages of our story, arrived with a despatch from the minister for the bride.

When Alitea had closed the door to the secret stairway after Juan, she walked calmly to the door at which she heard the knocking, and opened it. She started with surprise when she saw before her Don Fernand d'Albayda, for she believed him still in Lisbon, and scarcely paid any attention to the corregidor, who was overwhelming her with condolences. The bride of but a few hours was now a widow! These were the first words she caught. Her heart beat fast with joy. Who could blame her? Hastily she learned that Don Fernand had come to the corregidor's house at nine o'clock, with the news that the Duke de Santarem had been found dead in his park.

Gravely Alitea replied to the corregidor:

"Our duty is to institute a severe, active search after the guilty. He ought to be punished; I wish—I demand it. It is my duty to pursue him, and I will do so rigorously."

"Like the noble woman that you are," said Fernand; "and I am ready to second you with my name and power."

At this moment, Pacheco, the corregidor's nephew, entered, wholly out of breath.

"I believe I have found the murderous wretch, and we will cross-question him, if you wish it, my uncle," he stammered out, as soon as he could speak.

At this moment, all eyes were directed towards a young man who walked painfully between four alguazils. His shirt, covered with blood, showed that he was wounded in the breast and shoulder. He raised proudly his pale, calm face, as he entered, and Fernand and Alitea were frightened as they recognized, the one his friend, the other her brother. It was Yezid!

An alguazil gave the chief the papers, seized upon the prisoner, and the corregidor said, bluntly:

"Approach and answer."

"He cannot answer," exclaimed Alitea, tremblingly; "he is not in a state for it, it is evident. He is badly wounded." And she hastened forward a large cushioned chair, placed him in it, and hastened to hand him some wine and dress his wounds, saying, as she did so, to the corregidor: "He must be revived, for if he loses consciousness, nothing will be gained from him."

"Very just," he replied, and made a sign for Pacheco, his nephew, to go and execute some orders he gave him. Then the corregidor began to overlook the papers. "I see by the superscriptions to these letters that his name is Yezid d'Alberique, and that he lives in Valencia."

Alitea trembled with affright, and Fernand exclaimed impatiently:

"In a moment, senor corregidor, and we will examine them together."

"As you wish; and while awaiting you, I can commence the report, as my nephew proposed. Will you show me a place where I shall not disturb the duchess by it?"

"Here, senor, here," said Alitea, and opened the door of a little ante-chamber adjoining, whose windows looked out on the park. "You will find there all that you need in writing."

The corregidor and two or three of his men entered the room, and at last Yezid found himself alone with Fernand and Alitea, who said to him, despairingly:

"Thou, Yezid! thou, my brother!"

Fernand, at this name, made a gesture of surprise.

"Yes, my friend," replied Yezid, looking at him and holding Alitea's hand; "my well beloved sister, whom I did not wish to be sacrificed, and I came to defend her."

"You also?" cried Fernand.

"Ah! is that why you left Lisbon, Senor Fernand?" said Alitea.

"Yes, yes, senora. I did not know that you had a brother, and thought that the affianced husband of Carmina perhaps could save you."

"I understand," said Yezid, speaking painfully,—"I understand now. I arrived at Madrid, but did not find the Duke de Santarem; then I came here; it was about seven o'clock. I wished to speak with him. A young girl told me he received no one, but he was probably walking in the park. Then I retraced my steps, and met the duke. We met in a solitary alley. I spoke:

"To marry a young girl, senor, it is necessary to have the consent of her parents and relations, and you have not asked mine."

"Who are you?"

"The brother of Alitea."

"What does that matter?"

"It matters that you cannot marry her."

"The marriage is consummated before God and men."

"Ah—well! what God and men have left undone, I will do; and I drew my sword."

"You come too late," he answered me; "another awaits me for the same reason, and I owe him the preference; you afterwards."

"I placed myself before him, and barred his passage."

"Me first?"

"Impossible. They await me."

"I will prevent you from making another step," and I struck his face. Furious, he drew his sword; he attacked me with great vigor, and the combat lasted a long time. I felt that I was wounded, and my strength was leaving me; but I thought of you, my sister,—of my father, who had said to me, 'Deliver your sister.' Then I threw myself upon him; I struck him and killed him. I have fulfilled my promise. Thou art free, my sister."

"And thou art lost!" cried the young girl, weeping. "Thou hast fought a duel, and the corregidor knows thy name—Yezid, son of the Moor d'Alberique."

"And the Moors," said Fernand, "cannot either carry arms or fight a duel; the laws of Philip II. forbid it."

"I know that well," replied Yezid; "I know that I have defied them. Death is the portion of those of us who kill a Christian."

"But we will protect you," cried Fernand.

"Perhaps," replied Yezid, shaking his head doubtfully.

"I am sure," said Alitea. "We will obtain thy pardon. If we could prevent the first searches, and hide you in some retreat!"

"I know of one," replied Yezid, "in the house of my father; once there, I defy the inquisitors to find me."

"It would be necessary to reach Valencia, and, in your state, that would be almost impossible. If we had only twenty-four hours advance, then we might—"

"But we have not one, my dear sister," continued Yezid, half-smiling. "It is necessary to be resigned. When the corregidor comes back, I will avow all to him."

"No, no; I conjure you, my brother; avow nothing yet."

"What good is it to hide the truth? I cannot do it always."

"Be silent!" cried Fernand. "They return."

It was Pacheco, pale and trembling. His teeth chattered and his knees knocked together, and yet his face expressed satisfaction. "My uncle—my uncle!" said he, entering.

"What is the matter?" asked Fernand. "What do you wish to say to the corregidor?"

"That he is right. Senor, the Duke de Santarem is not dead!"

At this news, Alitea turned pale; Fernand placed his hand upon his sword, and Yezid half raised himself.

"You found him in the park, and he had returned to life?" said Fernand, seeking to hide his anxiety.

"No. I saw him ascending the grand staircase. He walked so quickly that I could scarcely overtake him; but I did, and it was he. To prove it, I seized hold of his mantle, and he impatiently asked the reason. I told him my uncle wished to see and speak with him,—that it was necessary, and gave him my reasons; and in spite of his resistance—for he resisted me strongly and impatiently,—I called two of my men, and have brought him before the duchess. Where is my uncle?"

Alitea, unable to speak, showed him the little room. Pacheco left, and at the door he entered, appeared a man led by two alguazils. He was enveloped in a black mantle, and his face was hidden by a gray hat, surmounted by a red feather.

"It is the man I saw in the park!" exclaimed Fernand.

At these words, the unknown, by a sudden movement, escaped from his guards. At the same moment his hat fell off, and Alitea, Yezid and Fernand simultaneously uttered a cry of astonishment and terror.

It was the Duke de Santarem! It was at least the height, figure and face of the Duke de Santarem. For any one less pre-occupied, or less interested, it was easy to see that the present duke was older, stronger, squarer built than the other; that in his face was something gross and common, instead of the exceedingly refined air of the other.

All these things Fernand and Alitea remarked. Fernand made a sign to the alguazils to retire, and approached the unknown quickly, and putting into his hand a purse filled with gold, said:

"This evening, until to-morrow, obstinately maintain that you are the Duke de Santarem, and your fortune is made."

Before the unknown could answer, the door of the little saloon opened. The corregidor, radiant with joy, appeared, followed by his nephew and three aids.

"Pacheco was not mistaken," cried he. "Is it possible that senor the Duke de Santarem has returned to us?"

"Yes, senor corregidor," replied the unknown, without being disconcerted, and he extended his hand with a certain dignity to the magistrate which completed the illusion. The worthy corregidor seized it, and pressed it between his own to testify his joy at seeing him safe.

"I was right, and I pray senor duke will pardon my error, nearly fatal, for it came near causing the illness of the senora."

"I have not recovered yet," replied Alitea, pale and trembling.

"And," continued the magistrate, "it needs only the presence of her husband to completely cure her. And now that the duke is alive and well, I wish to have explained how the mistake was made,—how Yezid d'Alberique came to be wounded?"

At the name of Yezid, the unknown raised his head, and looked at the young man attentively. The corregidor remarked the gesture, and said, laughing:

"Yes, senor; they accused this young man with having killed the duke, and we find him on the contrary alive and unharmed, while the young man is wounded. How can that be explained?"

"Very easily," said Fernand, with a coolness and readiness which frightened Yezid and Alitea, and puzzled the unknown.

"This evening I arrived from Madrid, to speak to the Duke de Santarem, on the part of the Count de Lerma. I came too late. Senor duke was walking in the park, I was told, and I was hastening to join him, when I came upon a man stretched in one of the paths. I believed naturally that it was the duke whom I sought. I tried to bring him to life, but in vain; and then believing him dead, I sought aid, and after walking two hours, I came to the hotel where you slept. During that time, there had been a duel; I must confess it to you. Of the two adversaries, one, the Duke de Santarem, conquered; the other, Senor Yezid, although dangerously wounded, was led by your men here. That is the whole truth."

"The entire truth," repeated the unknown, with dignity. "I ought," continued the false Santarem, "to add a word to the recital of my friend, Fernand d'Albayda: it is that I returned to my house, to send aid to my noble and generous adversary, and in order not to expose him, I decided to go to him myself. It was a duty I owed him, and I was going to fulfil it, when one of your men saw me, and brought me hither. Upon the subject of our quarrel, I can say," added he, "nothing more. It is one of the secrets which I cannot betray."

"I ask nothing more," said the corregidor, with respect.

"The most important thing to be done is to care for this young gentleman, whom my husband frees from all blame."

"I hope," replied the unknown, "he will do me the honor to accept an apartment in my chateau. I shall be offended if he lodges elsewhere."

Yezid bowed with an assenting motion, and Fernand gave him his arm.

"And I, senors," said Alitea, "if senor duke will permit it, will show him to his apartments."

The unknown bowed, and receiving graciously the salute of Fernand and Yezid, threw himself upon a couch near the fire, and looked with a pleased, patronizing air upon the corregidor, Josue Calzado.

During the time, with hearts oppressed with joy, and hardly daring to breathe, the three friends, instead of ascending the grand staircase, now went towards the court. The carriage which brought Fernand from Madrid was still standing at the door, and Yezid and his friend got in.

"Now, sister dear, I have the twenty-four hours you asked."

With a throbbing heart, Alitea rushed up the staircase, and turning, was just descending, when Pacheco appeared, and said to her: "Senor the Duke de Santarem wishes to see the duchess."

CHAPTER XXIII.

THE DUKE AND DUCHESS.

TREMBLINGLY Alitea entered the apartment, and the duke exclaimed:

"Madame, the poor corregidor dies of hunger, and myself also. Cannot we have a supper here at the fireside?"

"Yes, certainly; remain, and it shall be served to you." And Alitea hastened to get a tray, which she brought herself, fearing that any of the domestics who brought it would not be as easily deceived by the false duke as the poor corregidor. Over their wine, the time passed very quickly to the unknown and the corregidor; but to Alitea, who thought of her brother, the time passed slowly.

After having supped, the duke invited the worthy corregidor to lodge with him, which invitation Josue Calzado accepted. The duke led the corregidor out, and called aloud to his servants:

"Conduct senor corregidor to his apartments."

"What is that?" said Alitea, rousing herself from the reverie in which she was plunged.

"Nothing; senora pays no attention," said the duke, closing the door, locking it and drawing out the key. "It was the corregidor, who remains with us."

Alitea looked around her with alarm. She was alone, in the night, with an unknown man. She had not any reason to fear him, it is true; on the contrary, he had served her with zeal, devotion and intelligence. Nevertheless, Alitea trembled. She felt reassured by seeing him remain near the fireplace. Outside they heard the domestics retiring to their rooms. After the house had been quiet for more than an hour, Alitea ventured to address a word to the stranger.

"You came to our aid generously, señor. It was difficult, and you acted well your part. I will not ask how you came to be in the chateau, for you have done such a good service that it conceals everything. You must now need rest. I will show you to a room."

"Do not trouble yourself about me. I will rest for a while here." And he threw himself upon the couch, and seemed in a few minutes to be sound asleep.

Seeing that, the young girl wished to retire herself to the chamber she had shown the false duke, but could not do so without passing by him, and perhaps disturbing him; so she remained seated, watching the unknown, who, she found to her horror, did not really sleep, for he from time to time unclasped his eyes.

An hour passed so. All noises in the chateau had entirely ceased. It was probable that the unknown had waited for that, for he now raised his head, and seeing Alitea awake and watching him he said:

"Is it possible, senora, that you do not sleep?"

"No, señor. I awaited your awakening, to pray you to go into the next room and leave me mine."

"Aha!" said the unknown, with a mocking smile; "you forget that this evening, when I wished to leave, you would not permit me to do so. You begged me to remain, and I promise to remain, and I keep my word. See now the gratitude of fine ladies!"

"I am not ungrateful," said Alitea. "The noble knight, Fernand d'Alhaya, promised to make your fortune. I agreed to fulfil his promise. What do you wish?"

"What do I wish? I wish the money which belongs to me, which is my due."

"Nothing belongs to you."

"Am I not the Duke de Santarem, your husband? I am here in my own house, and all is mine."

Alitea glanced towards the bell. He interpreted her look.

"What would you do?—call your people? Your cries will not free you. I am your husband; you yourself have acknowledged it; they know it, and they will go away at my voice; for you are my wife. Give me your diamonds."

"Sooner die!" replied Alitea, looking around her in agony. She saw no arms, no means of defence or death.

"Help me! To my aid, Señor Josue Calzado! señor corregidor!" cried she, with all her might.

"And if the corregidor should come, you will lose those you love—that Yezid, that Moor, who is your lover, and whom I have saved. They will go and seize him in his chamber, where he lies wounded and bleeding."

"Would to Heaven he were there, to defend me and chastise thee, thou who art only a villain!"

"A villain—a villain who loves thy gold! who will brave death and the executioners for it!"

He tried to clasp her in his arms. She escaped him, and as quick as lightning, she rushed to the other side of the room, opened a window, and threw herself out. The unknown uttered a cry of horror. He had followed her; was near her, and with a vigorous hand, seized her and drew her back from the abyss, clasping his pale, almost fainting victim to his heart.

"God of my fathers, aid me!"

"God is not here," said the bandit, laughing; "he lives too high to hear you."

That moment, as if to answer his blasphemy, a terrible explosion was heard. The brigand uttered a cry of rage and pain. His left arm was broken. He turned, and by the light of the lamps burning in the apartment, he saw Juan, pale and with disordered hair, who presented to his breast a second pistol. He recoiled, frightened for the first time by the apparition and arms before him.

"God, whom you defy, sends me to thee, Captain Josef Baptista; for I have old debts to pay!"

Alitea, meanwhile, had pulled the bell-cord violently. At the pistol-shot which resounded through the still house, at the noise of the bell, the servants, the corregidor and his men were awakened, and descended the staircase. Alitea, taking the key, opened the door, and the corregidor was the first to enter, and seeing Josef Baptista bleeding, he cried with despair:

"Señor Duke de Santarem wounded? And I who ought to protect him!"

"Spare yourself the trouble. It is not the Duke de Santarem," coldly said Alitea.

"Another, senora? Where, then, is the true duke?"

"In the park," said Juan. "Send your men by the third large tree in the principal alley; you will find him dead there—dead since last evening."

"It is not possible! Run, Pacheco, and find him, if he is there. Who, then, is this one—this one whom my nephew, the duchess and all the world thought the duke?"

"That one," pursued Juan, "is a robber, an impostor—Captain Josef Baptista."

"Josef Baptista!" cried the corregidor, looking at him with astonishment; "he whom the archbishop of Valencia ordered me to arrest!"

"Himself," continued Juan; "he, who coming here on the wedding evening, entered the house only to rob or assassinate."

Josef Baptista saw that all was lost, that the last crime above all others would be unpardonable. But he was not the man to leave, without having a revenge.

"Ah, well—yes," cried he, "since I cannot strangle you all, the cursed corregidor and his men, it is I—Baptista! who am still generous enough to render you a service. He who is dead is the Duke de Santarem; his murderer, who sleeps tranquilly overhead, is Yezid d'Alberique, and this one (pointing to Juan), I will tell you who he is. Learn, stupid corregidor, that it is the Moor Juan Sevilla."

"He!" said Calzado, whose astonishment redoubled each instant.

"He who has just escaped being converted," replied the captain, laughing; "he whom your incomprehensible archbishop wishes to make a Christian, dead or alive."

"It is not true," said Alitea, frightened by the danger which menaced Juan, who had exposed himself for her—"it is not true, señor corregidor; that man deceives you still; he is an impostor, who wishes to compromise you by false words."

"That we shall see," said the corregidor, who knew not what he ought to believe. His trouble increased when his nephew entered, pale and trembling.

"This time it is only too true. I testify to the fact myself. There are two—two Dukes de Santarem,—one dead!"

"That is what I told you, incredulous corregidor. You will believe me at last."

"I will believe now nothing but my own eyes and ears. I will question the young man Yezid. But, before all, I must not leave these two men together. Conduct Captain Josef Baptista into the next room; well. Close and double lock the door, and give me the key. And you, senora,—will you deign to conduct me to the apartment occupied by Señor Yezid d'Alberique?"

"I am at your service, señor," said Alitea, seeking to hide her fears—not for Yezid, for he was in no danger, but for Juan; "I am ready to conduct you, but I hope before you all go you will give this young man his liberty, who is a friend, a protégé of Don Fernand d'Alhaya."

"Senora," said the corregidor, "we must first speak with Don Fernand; then I will write to the Count de Lerma, and send to him the young prisoner."

Alitea trembled; Juan was lost.

"Here," continued the magistrate, "I pray the young man, whom I wish well, to remain. With your permission, we will leave him in your chamber, and by precaution close the door upon him."

Alitea breathed; Juan was saved.

"I have nothing to answer," said the young girl. "Let us go, señor."

Before leaving, she turned her eyes towards Juan; then towards the oaken panel on the right, where was the secret door; then she looked again at her brother, with love and eternal friendship beaming from her bright eyes. It was the only thanks she could give him. The door closed.

Juan was alone. He looked around the room where he had felt so much happiness and sorrow. The happiness lasted one hour—the sorrow all his life. He did not complain of his fate; he blessed Heaven, which had permitted him to save from shame and dishonor his sister—O perhaps dearer still! But he drove the wild idea away, and recalling the last look of Alitea, he glided to the wall, opened the door softly, descended the staircase, and found himself in the park, and with hasty strides had reached the country before the break of day.

We will now return to Alitea and the corregidor. He ascended with Alitea to the guest chambers on the second story, and entered the chamber where slept Señor Yezid. He found him not; the room of Don Fernand was equally deserted, and to the great astonishment of the corregidor, no trace of them could be found anywhere in the chateau. Disappointed, he returned to Alitea's chamber, to at least be sure of one; but that, too, he found deserted. Then in the last degree of rage and perplexity, the magistrate commanded his nephew and men to bring forward Captain Josef Baptista, upon whom fell the whole weight of his fury and justice. At the end of a few minutes the officer returned, and with a face expressive of utter bewilderment and fear, he cried out:

"My uncle, no one!"

The corregidor could not believe his ears, and ran to see for himself. Too true—the room was empty. In spite of his wounded and bleeding arm, the captain had torn the damask curtaining, decorating the room into strips, with his right hand and teeth; he attached them to the iron balcony, and aided by his single arm, had slid to the earth, but before doing so, had stolen every small thing of value he could find—jewels, mantle ornaments, and every article possible for him to carry in his flight. Of the three prisoners he felt so sure of, Señor Josue Calzado had none; and really, the young duke, the new husband over whom he was to watch, was decidedly dead. It was thus that the corregidor-major of Toledo had executed the important mission for which the minister had sent him expressly to the chateau of Santarem.

CHAPTER XXIV.

THE FLIGHT AND THE ASYLUM.

We must pause awhile and go back, that our readers may thoroughly understand all that has transpired. When Juan, on the wedding-day of Alitea, had fled, bearing the loud knocking at the door of her room, which was caused by Don Fernand and the corregidor, who came to announce the death of the duke, he was making his way across the park, when he saw lying in the path before him, his pale face turned to the rays of the moon, a man, bathed in blood.

In the morning, in the church, he had been struck by the likeness of the duke to his hated enemy, the captain, and he knew that before him lay the duke, dead. Without seeking the cause of his death, he comprehended the importance of informing Alitea. In spite of the dangers which menaced him, he retraced his steps. One of the windows of the apartment of the new duchess opened upon the park; he saw the room brilliantly lighted, and the forms of many persons moving about. He did not dare then to make use of the key given him by Alitea. He waited, hiding behind the trees, and from time to time stepping out to look up to the window, and intending as soon as the lights were still and Alitea alone, to go to her.

Suddenly, he saw the window open, and a woman, pale, dishevelled, spring forward to throw herself out. It was Alitea; and behind her he saw Josef Baptista. Juan ascended the staircase, opened the panel, and was just in time to save his sister. The rest is known.

Occupied with sad and despairing thoughts, he continued a good part of the way. He had no fear of meeting any more Captain Baptista, whom he knew was a close prisoner. He, however, prudently threw away his cloak, that none of the corregidor's men might see him and recognize him by it; and, for this reason, he did not go direct to Madrid, but made a circuit. He followed that road all the next day, and late in the afternoon stopped at a little hotel at Perolea, a little wayside town. He was gazing from the window of his room, when he saw three men, whom by their black dress he knew to be alguazils. The window was so low that he heard the conversation which passed between the men. To his dismay, he learned that they were after him, had seen him, and would arrest him. Juan did not stop for his supper, but descending softly the stairs, entered the garden and disappeared behind a clump of trees, gained the country, and after walking steadily for some time, he saw the clock-tower of a large village. It was Alcala de Henares.

He was still five or six leagues from Madrid, but night had set in, he was worn out with fatigue and very hungry. He stopped at the hotel of Saint Pacome, ate a good supper, and ordering a chamber, he was soon asleep. Before falling asleep, he recollected that it was here, in that village, that Gongarelo had settled himself. The barber was his devoted friend; he was saved.

The next morning, he rose and went to the window, but quickly retired, for opposite the hotel was a coffee house, and before it stood a group of men, citizens, and he had seen two eyes fixed upon him. The eyes were those of a soldier, who had his left arm in a sling, and supported himself with his right hand by a cane. Always occupied with thoughts of Captain Josef Baptista, his evil spirit, he thought he saw him. But it seemed to him impossible that Josef Baptista, whom he left a prisoner of the corregidor's, could have escaped, and two days after, he tranquilly established, smoking his pipe, at Alcala de Henares. To re-assure himself, he went again to the window. The group had disappeared. He called his host and asked if he knew Gongarelo the barber.

"All the world knows him," replied the landlord.

"I wish to go to him. Will you please point out his shop?"

"I will send one of my little servants with you."

"Very well."

Juan paid his host, finished dressing himself, and followed the little boy who waited at the door. Juan gave the child a small sum of money, who walked, or rather danced before, while playing upon a pair of castanets. They had walked through several crooked streets, when Juan said:

"They said it was not far. How is it that we have not reached there?"

"Patience," said the boy, with a wicked smile; "it is not much further."

At last they stopped before a dreary-looking house.

"It is here. Mount."

"I see no barber's sign, pole nor shop, which is always painted blue."

"The color is no consequence. Ascend still."

"Gongarelo is not, then, in his shop—he is in his chamber!"

"Now you are right. Go up, then."

At the head of a little staircase, the child stopped, and as if out of respect, made Juan pass in before him. He entered a chamber wholly unfurnished; but he had hardly got in, when he heard the door close and the key turn.

"He is taken," cried the boy, outside, "and he does not suspect that I have led a body of alguazils! Give me, señor soldier, the real you promised me."

"There are two for you, little rascal!" joyously exclaimed a voice which Juan recognized as that of Captain Josef Baptista; and the same voice cried at the head of the staircase: "Señor Garambo della Spada, you who command the post, take four of your bravest men, mount and seize the prisoner, and do not forget to share with me the hundred ducats that the archbishop promised to him who should capture the Moor Juan."

"Here am I," cried Garambo della Spada; "instead of four men, I have eight."

"Very well," said Josef Baptista. "I would join you, if this wound which I received in the lower country were healed. But hasten; I guard the door."

Hearing these words, and the footsteps of the alguazils on the staircase, Juan looked around in despair. The place was destitute of any article of furniture. There was only one door, by which he had entered, and one window opened on a populous market street. All sides were equally guarded, and yet by a sudden impulse, hearing the key turn in the door, he sprang from the window, fifteen feet from the ground, and landed on his feet safely.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

THE RUPICOLA AURANTIA.

RARE AND CURIOUS BIRDS.

We have placed on this and the next page a series of fine engravings, delineating birds curious and interesting in their formation and habits. The first picture represents a pair of Rock Manakins (Rupicola aurantia). The Manakins form an extensive family; Latham enumerates some forty of them. They appear to be a restless and inquisitive class of birds, very mobile and alert. The Rock Manakin is one of the most elegant birds of the family. It is a native of South America, inhabiting the rocky and mountainous districts along the rivers of Surinam, Cayenne and Guiana; and probably it may be found along the whole range of the river Amazon, with its tributary branches. According to Latham, it is nowhere so frequent as in the mountain Luca, near the river Apronack, where it builds in the cavernous hollows and dark recesses. The nest is composed of a few dry sticks, and the eggs are two in number, of the size of those of a pigeon and equally white. The Rock Manakin is a shy and solitary bird, preferring which is of reddish white. The tail is short, graduated, and of a blackish brown, each feather having a deep black spot near the end. The total length of this species is scarcely four inches. The nest of this bird presents a most beautiful example of instinctive skill. It is placed in a tuft of tall grass, and elevated from the ground, as shown in the engraving. With singular neatness a number of the blades of grass are drawn together and interlaced, and sewed with a kind of cotton thread, which the bird manufactures for itself. The blades of grass thus secured, form an exterior case, and support a long, barrel-shaped nest, open at the top, consisting of a cotton-like material, and secured by threads to the blades and stalks which surround it so closely as to afford perfect concealment. The Umbrella Bird (Cephalopterus), depicted in our third engraving, is certainly an ornithological curiosity. It is found in the region bordering on the river Amazon, South America. Its name is derived from the full, outspreading plumes which tower above its head, resembling the horsetail crests of the Grecian helmets. It is about the size of a jay. From the upper part of the chest depends a sort of apron or screen of square-edged feathers, and very graceful. The tail is graduated. The whole of the plumage is black, with rich violet reflections, especially on the chest and crest-plumes. The Chinese Teal (Anas gularis), or Mandarin Duck, a somewhat singularly-shaped bird, is remarkable for the vivid brilliancy of its plumage. It is also peculiar in the circumstance of its never mating a second time. Of this, Mr. Davis gives the following proof:—"From a pair of these birds, in Mr. Beale's aviary at Macao," he says, "the drake happened one night to be stolen. The duck was perfectly inconsolable—like Calypso after the departure of Ulysses, retiring into a corner, neglecting herself and her food, refusing all society, and rejecting with disdain the proffer of a second love. In a short time the purloined drake was recovered. The mutual demonstrations of joy were excessive; and what is more singular, the true husband, as if informed by his partner of what had happened in his absence, pounced upon the would-be lover, tore out his eyes, and injured him so much that he soon after died of his wounds." The subject of our next engraving, the Emeu (Casuarus Emeu), seems not to have been known in Europe until the sixteenth century, when the Dutch, on their return from their first voyage to India, brought one from the island of Java. This bird was given them by the reigning prince. For a considerable time it was exhibited at Amsterdam for money. It was then sold to the Count de Solms, who gave it to the elector of Cologne, and by him it was presented to the emperor of Germany. In the course of the ensuing six years, the Dutch merchants shipped two others from the same place, but they both died on the voyage. In the year 1671, an emeu was sent by the governor of Madagascar to the king of France, which was kept alive four years in the royal menagerie of Versailles. Since that period these birds have frequently been brought to Europe, and have been found to bear the change of climate well. The head of the emeu is surmounted by a bony prominence, covered with a horny substance; the skin of the head and of the upper part of the neck is naked, and tinged with cerulean blue and flame-color. The bird has pendant wattles, like those of the turkey-cock, the wings are furnished with some stiff, featherless quills, and the nail of the internal toe is much the strongest. "It is," says Cuvier, "the largest of birds after the ostrich, from which it differs sufficiently in its anatomy. Its full height, when erect, is about five feet. This species is characterized by Lesson as stupid and massive;" and he says it feeds on seeds and herbage. Bontius considers it ought not to be classed among birds, because the wings it has are calculated to aid in running, not in flight. He states that, when irritated, the bird does not rush forward to the attack, but turns itself obliquely, kicking backwards at the enemy. Cuvier observes that the featherless quills serve the emeu for offensive weapons. Bontius remarks that the eggs are very different from those of the ostrich, by reason of their thinness and color; for their shell is greenish, ornamented with numerous tubercles of a deeper green. The emeu is found in the peninsula of Malacca, and the great chain of islands to the south and east. Bontius notes it from Ceram and the other neighboring Molucca islands. And, according to Lesson, it is very common in the islands of the Asiatic Archipelago, and especially at New Guinea. Cuvier relates that the bird lays a certain number of green eggs, which, like the ostrich, it abandons to the heat of the climate. Our next engraving represents the Tailor Bird (Sylvia Sutoria), and its most ingeni-

THE UMBRELLA BIRD.

THE FANTAIL WARBLER.

silent and secluded glens and rocky ravines to all other spots; and there it seems to pass an undisturbed existence. Waterton states that it is a native of the woody mountains of Macoushia, a tract on the Apoura-poura, a tributary river falling into the Essequibo from the south, inhabited by the Macoushi Indians, so celebrated for their skill in preparing the deadly vegetable poison, wourali, with which they smear the points of their arrows. In the day-time it retires among the darkest rocks, and only comes out to feed a little before sunrise and at sunset. So gloomy is its disposition, that it never associates with the other birds of the forest. The Fantail Warbler (Sylvia cisticola), next delineated, is a peculiarly interesting species of the genus Sylvia, to which the wrens belong, and is found in Spain, Portugal, Italy, Sardinia and Sicily. The plumage of this bird is quite plain and sober; it is of a dead leaf color, or reddish yellow above, each feather being dashed in the middle with blackish brown, so as to present the appearance of a multitude of longitudinal spots, except on the lower portion of the back, which is plain, as is also the whole of the under surface,

THE CHINESE TEAL.

THE EMEU.

ously constructed nest. This minute species of wren, measuring only three inches and a half long, is a native of Hindostan, Ceylon, and other parts of the East. Its general plumage is pale olive; the chin and throat yellow; the under parts dusky white; its weight only about ninety grains. Living in countries where snakes and monkeys are formidable enemies to the feathered tribe, this little bird selects a leaf at the extremity of a pendant twig for its cradle. If this leaf be large enough, it draws the edges together so as to form a pouch, the end of which is so arranged as to assist in supporting the nest within. But if the leaf be too small, the bird adds to it another growing by, and sometimes a dead one, sewing this method. This bird, like the one with which it is naturally associated, is also small; and it is an interesting fact that such inconsiderable members of the feathered race should be gifted with so remarkable an instinct. Not only is the nest so curiously fabricated, all that the young require, but its position is so chosen, that they are secure from the enemies to which they are so peculiarly exposed. Yet, be it observed, this is only one example of the adaptation of the abode to the tenant, which may be observed throughout the region of animated nature. In no part of it do we discover a creature whose instinct leads to the preparation of an uncongenial or insecure abode. The law under which it acts is a perfect law. That which reason would do, were it possessed, is done; and the completeness of the product in every respect may well excite our wonder, and call forth our high admiration. The next engraving delineates the Loxia Bengalensis, a bird of India, and its very curious nest. The bird constructs it of vegetable fibres, which it interlaces in such a manner as to form a sort of purse, of which our engraving gives an exact representation. It suspends its nest on the highest branches of trees overhanging rivers, and the entrance is observable at the lower end. The first year the nest is a simple purse; but in the following one the bird attaches a second to it, and proceeds annually with a similar addition to the singular and ingenious structure. The Puffin, the last bird in our series, is well known in England, where it attracts attention by the oddity of its appearance, the contour of its figure, which is round, thick and ball-like, and its peculiar physiognomy. It makes its appearance at its customary breeding-places about the middle of April, and departs in August, to pass the winter on the southern coasts of Spain, Italy, and other parts of Southern Europe. The length of the bird is thirteen inches. The bill is deeply furrowed, and bluish gray at the base, the middle part orange red, which deepens into bright red at the tip; the legs are orange red. Perched on some bald cliff, the puffin looks down with eager gaze at the sea beneath, and skilfully throws itself into the abyss. Here it dives and swims expertly. Its food consists of small fishes.—The study of ornithology is deeply interesting, and may be easily rendered a favorite one with the young, leading them on to other and all branches of natural history. The birds, attired in all their beauty, or in their humblest guise, unobtrusive in their humility, or assuming the proud bearing of conscious power, are plentifully scattered over the surface of the earth. The friendly swallow delights us with his notes at the very threshold; the partridge flies from the intruder in the forest-path; the coo of the pigeon salutes in the wood, and many a delightful song is heard in the grove. We meet with the feathered tribes among the busy haunts of men; and even on the dismal strand, where the fragments of wrecked ships are bleaching, and over which flow the waters that engulfed their crews, the sight of a penguin, or the scream of a curlew, may recall the mind to animated nature, and supply it with subjects of pleasure or animation. Favorites of man, as many of the feathered tribes have been, from the symmetry of their form, the exquisite softness, beauty, or splendor of their plumage, the thrilling melody of their songs, and the various economical purposes to which they are adapted, there is but little known by people generally respecting them. And yet there is not one among the myriads of birds, whether finding a domicile immediately around our dwellings, covering the branches of forest-trees, wading the morasses—so treacherous and even fatal to man—scouring the sandy and arid desert, sporting on the billows of the ocean, or gaining their subsistence by diving in its water, but is worthy of careful to the other, that it may form a convenient receptacle for its nest. This is composed of down, intermingled with fibres and a few feathers. Thus the young are provided with a snug and secure abode, though it racks to and fro in the breeze. Many have examined this curious product with lively interest, but few can say with Forbes, "Often have I watched the progress of an industrious pair of tailor birds, from their first choice of a plant, until the completion of the nest and the enlargement of the young." It appears, however, that the tailor bird is not the only one that fabricates this kind of nest. Latham states that in Lady Clive's fine collection of drawings, there is a somewhat similar bird called the "Merops Minimus," that adopts the same attention in the light of all the intelligence that can now be obtained as the result of extensive and long continued observation. Among the characteristics of birds, the speed of their flight excites our special wonder. An eagle can go six hundred miles a day, continuing on the wing only ten hours. The story of the falcon of Henry II. is well known—which, pursuing a bustard at Fontainebleau, was taken the following day at Malta, and identified by the ring he bore. A falcon from the Canary Islands, sent to the Duke of Lerma, returned from Andalusia to the isle of Tenerife, in sixteen hours, which is a passage of 750 miles. It was stated by Sir Hans Sloane that, at Barbadoes, the sea-gulls proceed in flocks to a distance of more than two hundred miles, and return again in the same day. The knowledge which birds possess of all the meteoric changes which take place in the atmosphere, of winds, of seasons, and of bad weather, is also remarkable. "The Kite," says the prophet Jeremiah, "knows his time in the sky." In short, the deeper we penetrate into the study of ornithology, the more surprising are the facts which it reveals. The opportunities for this study are also universal. Even to this city the winged visitants come in summer, and build in the few trees which are left here and there to remind us of nature in the midst of art. Many varieties of birds are visitors to Boston Common, and we have seen some rare specimens displaying their plumage and their notes among the elm-trees of that beautiful promenade, often made lively with their carollings. They are welcome callers.

THE TAILOR BIRD.

THE LOXIA BENGALENSIS.

THE PUFFIN.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

ROSA MYSTICA.

BY BLANCHE D'ARNOIS.

When the waves of life are bitter,
And the billows rolling high—
When no stars above us glitter,
Sacre Marie—bear our cry.
By thy Son who reigns in glory—
By the saints who now adore thee—
By the bleeding hearts before thee,
Rosa Mystica—we cry!

When the things of time prove anguish,
And we'd lay us down to die—
When for spirit-food we languish,
Sacre Marie—bear our cry.
By thy Son who reigns in glory—
By the saints who now adore thee—
By the bleeding hearts before thee,
Rosa Mystica—we cry!

When the sands of life are failing,
And death's film o'erspreads the eye—
When our latest prayer is wailing,
Sacre Marie—bear our cry.
By thy Son who reigns in glory—
By the saints who now adore thee—
By the bleeding hearts before thee—
Rosa Mystica—we cry.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE PAWNBROKER'S CHRISTMAS.

BY RICHARD CRANSHAW.

SALEM STREET, Boston. It is usually associated in the minds of most persons with a certain class of the general community whose existences are principally occupied in disbursing from inexhaustible receptacles, large and small amounts of money to the special needs of humanity. Everybody laboring under pecuniary disadvantage holds its precincts in consideration and esteem. Everybody, when fortune once more smiles benignly, turns up its nose at it in scorn and contempt; and Salem Street cares not for the esteem, nor heeds the scorn to the extent of a button.

Could its pavements speak, what unknown histories of sorrows, heart-aches and tears would issue forth from its long silent voice! What notings of the varied footsteps which have echoed and re-echoed over its surface; of the trembling, weary pace of toil's sad daughter; of the pattering step of poverty's barefoot offspring; what times the artisan has hopelessly trudged its pathway, and how its stones are worn with the frequent passing of the friendless widow over its inanimate surface. But Salem Street is silent as to all these.

Darker woes has Salem Street beheld. It has seen the miserable wretch who drags hither one by one his few last home-comforts to obtain the liquid fire that is to consume him, body and soul. His furtive, shambling gait is well known to it. It might point to where shabby gentility—the poverty that eats deep into the soul—had left its footstep's impress; or, perchance, to the self-same spot where the unnoticed tear of fallen virtue had chilled upon its granite face. But Salem Street speaks no word of these.

The decrepid foot of age—the springing step of youth, are alike familiar to it. Sin and sorrow, hand in hand, have wended their pathway over it. God pity those who are led often into the midst of its hard precincts!

Many years ago, within this street stood a low frame building, which, to an observer of an imaginative turn, would bear a close resemblance to a very dirty, little old man, scowling darkly upon inoffensive passers-by, and, in the depths of his malignity, wishing misery, and wretchedness, and discomfort to humanity in general. Or, as you looked again at the row of old-time attire which garnished its exterior, and swayed back and forth as the passing wind bent its breath upon it, you could conceive it a time-worn tree, whose shrivelled limbs, tossing feebly to and fro, lamented the remembrance of its departed pride and glory. Or, perchance, still once again, it became a deserted, fire-blackened vessel, the charred tatters of whose sails fluttered up and down, signals of distress for the sinking hulk beneath. Here dwelt old Martin Grant the money-lender.

Through the small windows, which seemed to have been smeared with the muddy deposit of the receding deluge, and to have been receiving additions of dust and grease and dirt ever since, the figure of the pawnbroker was dimly visible. He was there apparently at all times and seasons, engaged in attending to his unfortunate customers, or striving to peer forth into the street, or else painfully inscribing in a huge book, unknown characters—records, it was whispered, of transactions of immense extent, kept by the old man after a method of bookkeeping entirely original, and in his own opinion vastly superior to that known as the Italian.

To form an idea of his appearance, it was only necessary to glance at the building itself, from the outside, and the association between tenement and tenant was plainly perceptible. Even as the ancient garments hung flabby and loose upon the pegs without, so did his greasy, ill-fitting clothes hang suspended upon his pegs of limbs. As from the midst of its gloomy warms the weather-stained building frowned black and forbidding, so, also, did Martin Grant's ill-favored visage scowl heavily on the whole of animate creation. Take him altogether, the assertion that Martin Grant bore the aspect of a benevolent, placid and cheery old gentleman would be received as an intentional libel on his appearance by the most indifferent observer.

It was late in the afternoon of a rough winter's day. The wind and the sleet, and the rain and fog having entered the town after the fashion of other belligerent armies—by storm—now sent out scouting parties to give chase and overcome any who might yet remain shelterless. Within the abode of the pawnbroker the gathering darkness had entered, and to all appearance made itself at home for the night. Perched on his high stool he sat, with his lean arms folded, and his grised chin resting thoughtfully upon his breast, while now and then he muttered indistinctly to himself: "Twelve ones are twelve, and three—fifteen. A clear profit, therefore, of one hundred and fifty dollars. Not much, not much; but still not so bad—no, no."

He was interrupted in his calculations by a little clear voice proceeding from the room opening into the store, at the end of the long counter. Strange words to be chanted by so sweet a childish voice and in such a place as this.

"Peace on earth, good will towards men!" and though the one soft spot in Martin Grant's heart inclined tenderly towards that little voice, it was evident he was very much disturbed and put out in his mental arithmetic.

The voice was only heard at intervals, as though some occupation absorbed its owner's attention; and it came out musically in very lightness of a happy heart. It slowly warbled, "peace on earth," was silent for a second, then, "good will towards men!" lifted it up, up, in a burst of song half way to the sky, there to be carried by listening angels an offering of purity to the Great Parity himself who gave it utterance.

Martin Grant found it impossible to make any progress with his calculations. Addition twisted itself into subtraction, so that four and four became nothing; and when he would have multiplied, he began to divide in a manner that confounded him. And the darkness gathered round him heavier than ever. The door of the room, through the chinks of which a light was visible, now opened just enough to admit of a small head being thrust through the aperture, and the same voice he had heard before called out:

"I say, gran'pa, where are you? O, I see you, out there in the dark. I can just make you out. O, if you could only look in here and see how we've fixed up the room"—turning her curly head to some one within—"Mrs. Whittle and I—eh, Mrs. Whittle, if he only could!"

"If he only could," assented a fat voice.
"But you mustn't, you know," to the silent old man, "must he, Mrs. Whittle?" to which that hidden personage responded, promptly:

"Certainly not."
"Because you know this is Christmas eve, and your birthday, too, gran'pa. Aint it funny that it should be Christmas eve and gran'pa's birthday too, Mrs. Whittle?"

From the wheezing, difficult manner in which it replied, the fat voice had caught the infection of glee, and found it impossible for some moments to give utterance in answer to the child's question.

The opening of the outer door of the dark warehouse was the signal for the retreat of the flaxen head, and the mysterious preparations went on once more within.

Martin Grant descended and lit a dim, oil lamp, and placing it upon the counter, directed his attention to the person who had just entered—a wretched looking old man. The little energies still left him in his old days, were evidently weakened from battling with the wind and sleet without; and to judge from the lustre of his eyes beneath their white brows, weakened still more from the famine gnawing deep within. For a moment the two old men stood silently regarding one another.

"Well, you're here again?" said the money-lender, at length.
"I am—here again," faltered out the other.

"Did I not tell you to keep away from me—to pester me not with your importunities?"

"You did, Martin, you did," said the old man, with a trembling sob. "I could not help it—as Heaven judges me, I could not. Martin, it is Christmas eve; will not your heart soften to me on this night, of all others in the year?"

The pawnbroker began poring over his ledger on the desk, as though determined to be unaware of the other's presence. He added up a column of figures, one by one, and as he made up the total, murmured, "seven, and nine to carry," then began another column. The other watched him in silence, and with his tattered cuff wiped a tear from his furrowed cheek.

"Martin—brother—listen one moment. Do you remember that we are both of us sixty-five to-night?"

"Are we, really?" said the other, in a tone of placid surprise; "put down one and carry ten," inscribing again in the huge ledger. "On this night, five and sixty years ago," continued the stranger, "we were ushered into this breathing world. Are you listening to me, Martin?"

"I am all attention," said Mr. Grant, politely, concluding with, "twenty-four—ought-seven."

"The remembrance affects you not. Is your heart adamant to every recollection, then?"

Hark! what was that? Once more from that interior room that little childish voice. Once more, in its sweet, pure accents, those golden words:

"Peace on earth, good will towards men!"

Even Martin Grant halted with his finger half way down a column of figures, to listen. The old man on the outside of the counter bent his head to drink in the sounds. His voice was very solemn as he again spoke:

"On this night, eighteen hundred years ago, voices like even unto that, proclaimed those self-same tidings." He reverently uncovered his white head. "Peace on earth, good will towards men!" Martin, Martin, be not deaf to that solemn charge to humanity. You, as well as myself, have a grandchild; but you, unlike me, have bread and to spare to feed its hunger. I have two little ones dependent on me, and here, on this Christmas eve, I come to ask for them what I could not demand for myself alone. Will you send me empty-handed away?"

The pawnbroker looked up angrily from his book, and fixed his eyes upon his brother's face with a glance almost of fierceness.

"Why should you look to me for it? Why do you come here? You chose your path in life—I mine. You preferred to put confidence in knaves and fools, and thus to squander what would have kept you in your old age out of the reach of want. I, on the contrary, was careful—careful. When I lent money, I had more than ample security for it, and for the use of it I demanded good and sufficient interest. Why should I take from my own hard earnings to support you in your ease and idleness? And now you have had your answer once for all. Begone."

With a choking groan the old man obeyed, and as he reached the door he turned once more and regarded his brother. The dim light of the lamp fell upon the figure of the pawnbroker as he pointed in stern silence to the door. One more imploring look, and he went forth, out into the fierce wind and the driving sleet, out into the fog and hail and rain, out into the mud and darkness, the cold and the slimy streets, out from that unnatural brother's threshold!

"Now, gran'pa, isn't it magnificent?" And the little maiden, never relaxing her grasp upon his arm, though he had surrendered without a struggle and been dragged captive into the little back room, stood beside him and waved her little hand triumphantly round.

The walls were decorated with evergreen and holly. Flowers made from various colored papers, by her own ingenious little fingers, bloomed in every direction. Little candles of green, yellow, blue and red wax, twinkled on the window frames, and shed their tiny light from the elevation of the mantel-piece. A merry fire glowed in the grate, and the savor of various tempting viands arose from the white-covered table on which was spread the offering to be sacrificed to the deity of appetite.

Mrs. Whittle, the proprietor of the fat voice aforementioned, and the possessor of a goodly person to match, stood in the act of uncovering a pair of delicate chickens. Mrs. Whittle, be it known, was the tenant of the chambers unoccupied by Martin Grant, and it was to her valuable aid that Miriam Grant had been forced to have recourse in the preparations for the surprise of her grandfather on his birthday.

"No, but isn't it, though? Isn't it more like a fairy's bower than anything else? And you're the fairy, gran'pa, that the bower has been decked out for." And the child laughed and clapped her hands and danced about the room in the extremity of her glee.

To Mrs. Whittle her laughter was always attended with infection; and immediate symptoms of an alarming nature invariably followed. The allusion to the fairy business was the signal for decided apoplectic appearances on that lady's part. If Martin Grant, she thought, bore any resemblance to such mythological personages, it must have been to those of a most malignant and evil-minded disposition. Mrs. Whittle finally coughed it off with difficulty, and they sat down to the table, the old man as before being dragged thither as it might have been to the stake, and immolated on a chair in the twinkling of an eye.

"And now what do you think of all this?" asked his grandchild, as soon as she had seen him secured to the board and had taken her own seat opposite him.

"It must have cost—"

"O, never mind the cost."

She jumped from her seat and took from the mantel a tin money-box, fashioned into the semblance of a small but convenient country habitation, down the chimney of which she was in the habit of pouring any small moneys that her grandfather, at rare intervals, might bestow upon her. She shook the miniature dwelling-place to its very foundations, and expressed by the gesture that it was wholly tenantless.

"That's the way part of the treat was got. Mrs. Whittle's son sent the other goodies home to her, and so she thought she would have her supper here with us, as he won't be home in time from the store."

The pawnbroker shook his head as though he had still some qualms of conscience as to this unheard-of extravagance, but said no more. And so they all fell to with an appetite.

"When Mrs. Whittle's son comes home he's promised to bring something with him—we won't tell him what it is though, will we, Mrs. Whittle?—and then maybe you'll find another treat in store for you. Mrs. Whittle's son promised this morning, didn't he, Mrs. Whittle?"

That lady paused, with her good-natured mouth full, and replied in the affirmative, adding:

"Lord bless you, sir, she's been a havin' of this here upon her mind for this week past; and something very like a good round tear dropped into her upraised tea-cup, and was immediately swallowed with the refreshing draught. "She's the sweetest critter."

This was said in evident confidence to the empty china as she replaced it in her saucer.

"And now, gran'pa, while you're shutting up the store," said Miriam, after they had finished, "we'll clear away and get ready for you to sit down to your pipe."

Martin Grant, with the load half remaining still on his mind as to the guilty excess to which he had been partner, went into the warehouse to follow out the child's bidding. As he stepped forth into the gloom, a faint rattling at the outer door met his ear. He went to it, and opening it, at first could see nothing. Looking down, a little shivering figure met his view. Concealing it at once to be the messenger of some wretched parent's wants, all things pertaining to the little back room became forgotten, and after closing the street door, he went behind the counter and became adamant once more, with a shrewd eye as usual to business. He leaned over, holding out his hand to receive the article he supposed she had brought for his examination. The wretched little object stood wishfully regarding him, but gave no indication of having anything she wished to pawn. In surprise, he asked:

"Well, what is it, child?"

A timid, low voice, replied:

"If you please, sir, I did not bring anything to pawn. We have got nothing left, now."

"You did not bring anything in my way—what do you want of me, then?"

"O, sir!" and she now burst into a passion of tears, "I have been sent by poor old grandfather to tell you—to tell you—that I am Nelly Grant!"

"What, his daughter's child—John Grant's daughter?"

"O, yes, sir," sobbing.

Martin Grant's countenance became suddenly clouded.

"I am not come to beg, sir. He did not bid me speak a word about our poverty, nor in his name to ask assistance from you. But when he got home, he called me to him, and said: 'Nelly, my only hope is now in you;' and he parted my hair softly, and looked earnestly in my face. 'Go you to him, and let your childhood plead. Tell him who you are; and if his heart be untouched by those soft eyes and by that gentle lip—if innocence, childish innocence, do not speak home to him in his inmost soul, if all this be useless to touch his stern and unrelenting nature, then—then God help him and forgive him in his hour of fearful need!'"

And the little creature sobbed as she finished. In the gloom that reigned at the back of the warehouse, the sob seemed echoed by another. Martin Grant started, and looked in its direction. But the door was closed, and the clutter of clearing away was going on within, so that of course it was his fancy. Martin Grant turned towards the trembling child:

"Does he then mean to besiege me in my own house? Am I always to submit to this annoyance? He would do well to cease it, for I may at length be driven to demand assistance of those whose duty it is to rid the community of all such beggars and impostors!"

A demon at the moment certainly held Martin Grant within his thrall, or he could not thus have spoken in the hearing of that appealing child. It possessed him so powerfully and completely that he walked hastily round from behind the counter, as if he would—O, human nature!—have thrust that tearful, pale and shivering form forth into the street. But lo! an angel stood between, and face to face confronted the foul spirit of ill.

"Gran'pa!"

The demon recoiled.

"Miriam, you here?"

"Gran'pa!"

"Only the one word, but O! the terrible significance of that one word!"

"Unloose your arms from that creature, and retire at once into the room!"

"Gran'pa!"

Only the one word.

"Will you do my bidding?"

The demon once again held rampant sway.

"Then begone from my threshold! Begone from beneath the roof which has too long sheltered an ingrate. Before my face to side with such as these, and bite the hand that cherishes! Monstrous ingratitude! But I'll not submit to it another moment. Either unloose that child, and retire as I have bidden you, or else forever quit my house."

With a flashing eye and a quivering lip; with a heart swelling nigh to bursting; with one arm twined closely around the little outcast's neck; with a steady and unflinching footstep; with but one word uttered, the child was gone.

"Gran'pa!"

O, Martin Grant, God in mercy help you in your hour of fearful need!

The pawnbroker sat alone in the back room. The store was closed and locked. Save the embers of the dying fire, there remained no light in the room; and save the howling of the wind in its passage over the chimney-tops and the loud ticking of the old clock in the corner, no sound to break the dead stillness that reigned around. A stillness that might be felt. A quiet that lay on him as he sat bending over the fire, with a heavy, smothering, choking weight, and one which could not be shaken off by the volition of his will. Loud and sonorous was heard the ticking in the corner, and as it beat back and forth, the pendulum became a living tongue, and shouted menacingly in his ear. And the never-ceasing burthen rang clear and sharp in the solemn silence: "Peace on earth, good will towards men!" Never stopping for a moment, never halting to take breath: "Peace on earth, good will towards men!" Louder still, seeming almost to be shrieking it in his terrified ear: "Peace on earth, good will towards men!"

He arose and stopped the clock. Then again seated himself, and bent once more over the decaying fire. And the wind came howling mournfully down the chimney. And this, also, was gifted with speech, and whispered forth for him alone of all the dwellers in the great city around him: "Peace on earth, good will towards men!"

The bells without chimed the hour of midnight. Again the same old words were uttered slowly by the bells. They said them over and over again, as their echoes died away in the distance. Then all the chimes of all the churches, far and near, awoke and gleefully proclaimed the birth of Christmas day. And they, too, said those self-same words over and over again. He put his hands over his ears that these sounds might be shut out from him, and as he did so he felt a chill pass through his body, as though a breath of air from the depths of a death-vault had suddenly swept past him. He looked up with a shiver. Close to his elbow a nameless, shapeless something stood silently regarding him; and as he looked spell-bound upon it, it gradually took the semblance of a form that he full well had known.

"I am thy first remembrance," said the phantom. "I am the recollection of thy nearest earthly tie. I am the shadow of thy mother! I can but stay upon this Christmas morning, ere yet the echoes of the midnight bells are lingering in the air, to whisper forth a warning. Obey the words heard in the ticking of the clock, in the mourning of the wind, and in the voice of the bells!"

And the phantom, with its finger lifted upwards, dissolved and disappeared. Another took its place. He knew this face, too. The form had been present with him on his life-pilgrimage for many, many years.

"I am thy second remembrance. I was the partner of thy sorrows and thy joys, and thou didst greet me with the title of thy wife. Heed well my warning: Obey the words heard in the ticking of the clock, in the mourning of the wind, and in the voice of the bells!" And it was gone.

Another; O, did he not know this one! He stretched out his trembling arms towards the phantom of his daughter! The shadow drew back from his touch.

"Thy third remembrance! Thy last warning! Obey the words heard in the ticking of the clock, in the mourning of the wind, and in the voice of the bells!" And the phantom grew misty and indistinct before him as he held out his hands imploringly towards it.

"My child, thou wilt not leave me yet! Only remembrance of my better nature, tarry yet awhile!"

"The echoes of the midnight bells are silent and dead. I may not stay. Remember!" and the phantom grew still more indistinct.

"Remember!" The voice came seemingly from the far-off distance. The figure was a mere airy wreath. "Remember!" The sound came lingeringly towards him, and darkness fell upon him and upon the fireless room wherein he sat.

There was a terrible bustle, and running up and down stairs, and opening and shutting of doors, and shouts of gleeful, childish laughter in the old house of Martin Grant, the pawnbroker of Salem Street. There was a little witch skipping backward and forward in every direction. Her dazed head peered in upon stout Mrs. Whittle, who, with her face in a full glow, superintended the basting of a huge turkey in the kitchen. Before the small apparition could be challenged, it was off in a twinkling, and had dashed pell-mell into the little back room behind the warehouse, embraced two old men, a little girl of about her own age, a lame boy and an old dog with a shaggy coat, and was gone again before any of them could recover from their surprise. Mrs. Whittle's son Joe, carrying a bucket of water in from the pump, was within an ace of being overset, bucket and all, by the spirit, and was embarrassed still more by its springing suddenly into his stalwart arms, and insisting upon being borne along with the bucket all the way down the kitchen stairs. And Mrs. Whittle's son Joe carried her as if she had been a feather. And the witch at last becoming more composed, drew up a stool to the feet of one of the old men in the little back room, and looking archly up into his face, said:

"Gran'pa, you'll never turn me out of the house again!"

Whereupon this old man, without giving the least indication of such behaviour, began to sob and to grasp the hand of the other old man seated at his side, and to shake it warmly, and this made the other old man begin to sob; and the little girl seated so quietly at the fireside sobbed too, and so did the little lame boy, and even the shaggy old dog seemed to be struggling with a determination of not giving way to his feelings, when the door was thrown wide open, and Mrs. Whittle bore down upon them under a full press of canvass, and heavily laden with the turkey. Mrs. Whittle's son Joe followed with a huge sirloin of beef. Both being relieved of their burthens, disappeared again, only to re-appear with an endless array of other dishes, bearing an endless variety of everything eatable under the sun. Last of all came a Christmas plum-pudding, rivaling the largest-sized school atlas in its gigantic circumference.

And perhaps they didn't eat! Perhaps anybody was forgotten! Perhaps even the shaggy old dog, who had his meal served up on the hearthstone at one and the same moment with the rest of the family, didn't feel a somewhat uncomfortable sensation after dinner in the vicinity of his shaggy waistcoat. Perhaps Joe didn't almost stifle them with laughter by telling them at the third helping to plum-pudding, that he really felt his appetite going—was afraid he was going to be ill—with other like pleasantries. Perhaps they didn't all laugh and eat and drink till they were all as red in the face as so many turkey-cocks—especially Mrs. Whittle.

And when the cloth was cleared away, and two bottles, with glasses for everybody, were placed upon the table, didn't the glee become more overpowering than ever? Didn't they all laugh till the tears rolled down their cheeks—especially Mrs. Whittle's? And wasn't everybody's health drunk over and over again, and everybody toasted until they might have been expected to gradually become of the consistency of a cinder from continued toasting—especially Mrs. Whittle? And didn't grandfather Martin Grant make a speech, and speak in the most enlogistic terms of everything and everybody in general—especially Mrs. Whittle? And finally didn't grandfather John Grant rise, and with a trembling voice and a tear in his eye, in the face of all present, relate how a certain person had followed two other certain persons into a miserable place, where on the bare floor an old man and a lame boy, together with a shaggy dog, lay extended almost perishing of want. And how, when she brought them every one of them back to her own home with the intention of taking them up into her own part of the house, how they were met by another person, who, with the tears streaming down his cheeks, went down upon his knees before them and asked them for forgiveness. And then grandfather John Grant seized Mrs. Whittle's fat hand and shook it hard in his own, and the inference to be drawn from all this was that he could be speaking of none others than himself, his brother, their grandchildren, and Mrs. Whittle—especially Mrs. Whittle.

The disappearance of the witch Miriam and Mrs. Whittle's son Joe gave rise to some speculation. They speedily re-appeared, bearing between them—of course Joe let her carry the heaviest share—something covered with a green cloth and shaped like a picture. The cloth was removed, and it stood revealed a beautifully worked legend in colored silks, and surmounted by a handsome gilt frame; and as his eye read on, something for a moment blurred the sight of old Martin Grant.

"PEACE ON EARTH, GOOD-WILL TOWARDS MEN!"

Miriam's offering to her grandfather on the anniversary of his birth, and on the eve of Christmas Day."

Not to make any further mystery of it, this had been worked by Miriam Grant's own fingers at school; the frame had been purchased with her own little savings, collected for a long time past in the convenient country habitation which stood upon the mantelpiece, and the whole thing arranged with the joint contrivance of Mrs. Whittle and Mrs. Whittle's son Joe, for the special intent of giving an overwhelming surprise to that unconscious victim, Martin Grant, in the handiwork of his grandchild. And as the pawnbroker lay his head upon the pillow that night, he made a resolution from thenceforth to try his best to follow out those words which would be ever present to him till his dying day. And they shaped themselves into the form of holy prayer, and went up from his softened heart in solemn accents: "Peace on earth, good will towards men!"

HOW MURAT DIED.

The sentence of the military commission was read to him with due solemnity. He listened to it as he would have listened to the cannon of another battle during his military life, without emotion or bravado. He neither asked for pardon, for delay, nor for appeal. He had advanced, of his own accord, toward the door, as if to accelerate the catastrophe. The door opened on a narrow esplanade lying between the towers of the castle and the outer walls. Twelve soldiers, with loaded muskets, awaited him there. The narrow space did not permit him to stand at a sufficient distance to deprive his death of a part of its horror. Murat, in stepping over the threshold of the chamber, found himself face to face with them. He refused to have his eyes bandaged, and, looking at the soldiers with a firm and benevolent smile, said, "My friends, do not make me suffer by taking bad aim. The narrow space compels you almost to rest the muzzles of your muskets on my breast; do not tremble; do not strike me in the face; aim at my heart—here it is." As he spoke thus, he placed his right hand upon his coat, to indicate the position of his heart. In his left hand he held a small medallion, which contained, in one focus of love, the image of his wife and four children, as if he wished thus to make them witnesses of his last look. He fixed his eyes on this portrait, and received the death-blow in the contemplation of all he loved on earth. His body, pierced at so short a distance with twelve balls, fell, with his arms open and his face towards the earth, as if still embracing the kingdom he once possessed, and which he had come to re-conquer for his tomb. They threw his cloak upon his body, which was buried in the Cathedral of Pizzo.—De Berrien.

THE OSTRICH.

The cry of the ostrich so greatly resembles that of a lion as occasionally to deceive even the natives. It is usually heard early in the morning, and at times, also, at night. The strength of the ostrich is enormous. A single blow from its gigantic foot (it always strikes forward) is sufficient to prostrate, nay, to kill, many beasts of prey, such as the hyena, the panther, the wild dog, the jackal, and others. The ostrich is exceeding swift of foot, under ordinary circumstances outrunning a fleet horse. "What time she lifteth up herself on high, she scorneth the horse and his rider." On special occasions, and for a short distance, its speed is truly marvellous—perhaps not much less than a mile in half a minute. Its feet appear hardly to touch the ground, and the length between each stride is not infrequently twelve to fourteen feet. Indeed, if we are to credit the testimony of Mr. Adamson, who says he witnessed the fact in Senegal, such is the rapidity and muscular power of the ostrich, that, even with two men mounted on his back, he will outstrip an English horse in speed. The food of the ostrich, in its wild state, consists of seeds, tops, and buds of various shrubs and other plants; but it is difficult to conceive how it can manage to live at all; for one not infrequently meets with it in regions apparently destitute of vegetation of any kind.—Anderson's Africa.

ONE DOLLAR!

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of BalloU's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original, humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has been for sixteen years connected with the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 68,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

FALLS NEAR OTTAWA CITY, CANADA WEST.

CANADIAN SCENES.

We present, on this and the following page, a series of landscape views in Canada, drawn expressly for us, by Mr. Kummer, a German artist, and admirably engraved by John Andrew. We invite particular attention to this set, as they were got up at great cost, and quite in a felicitous manner fidelity, effect and exquisite finish. Of the first quality our Canadian friends will be the best judges; the second commends itself to every eye, and of the third cultivated connoisseurs will pronounce a favorable judgment. The landscapes themselves are very striking, that of the first being little inferior to Niagara. The falls here represented are but a short distance from Ottawa City, late Bytown, Canada West—a place fast rising in importance. The Ottawa River here pours over huge rocks, as delineated in the first engraving, into a basin, forming a cascade more than 80 feet in height. The rocks over which the vast volume of water roars and tumbles, are massive and peculiar in form, presenting such outlines as the eye of the artist loves to dwell upon. The surrounding scenery is of a nature to enhance the effects of the falls—jagged rocks, points clothed with verdure, and a thousand undulations and inequalities of surface. The Ottawa is a river of great importance. It divides Upper from Lower Canada, and enters the Lake of the Mountains, formed by the St. Lawrence, about forty miles west of Montreal, after a total course of at least eight hundred miles. It traverses Lake Temiscaminy, Grand Lake, several other small lakes, and is connected with Lake Ontario by the Rideau canal. In its course through the table land, the banks are generally high, but below the Chaudiere, they are much less elevated and often inundated. An immense quantity of timber is cut on its banks, and on those of its tributaries. The Falls of the Chaudiere, delineated in the next engraving of the scenes, are yet wilder in character and perhaps more picturesque. They are about four miles westward from Quebec. The river Chaudiere rushes over lofty rocks and plunges headlong with a terrific roar into a deep and narrow basin. The rocks that shoulder and compress this river on either side and form the bases on which it dashes itself in fury, are singularly bold. Our artist has enlivened the romantic scene by introducing a group of Canadians, camping under a ledge, with a cheerful fire, while an adventurous fisherman is purveying for the little party. This cataract is one of the most picturesque to be found in Canada, as well as the highest, the latest measurement making its total altitude 272 feet. We hope the next season will find many of our tourists and artists wending their way to this spot. The pencil of Champney or Casilear would find glorious material in this locality. The Chaudiere is a river of Canada East, and joins the St. Lawrence about seven miles above Quebec, after a N. N. W. course of ninety miles. The river is not navigable.—The next engraving delineates Murray Bay, on the St. Lawrence River, a very picturesque spot. The town in the distance is inhabited by fishermen, and a number of their peculiar fishing-boats are shown in the foreground. The bay itself is chiefly noted for its liveliness—but the adjacent mountains give the whole picture a character of grandeur. Cape Trinity, on the Saguenay River, depicted in our last engraving, is a striking scene from the bold and romantic character of its rocky formation. There are no settlements in this part of the country, owing to the sterility of the soil. In the foreground, our artist has sketched a picnic party who have landed to have a good time. The Saguenay River is one of the principal tributaries of the St. Lawrence, the estuary of which it enters 120 miles from Quebec, and into which it brings the surplus waters of Lake St. John. Its whole course is 100 miles in length. It is noted, even among American rivers, for its wild and picturesque scenery. It flows between precipitous heights, and its course is varied by numerous falls and cascades. In its wider part it varies from two to three miles across, but in the lower part it becomes quite narrow and deep. Vessels ascend it for more than sixty miles. Canada affords an infinity of views for the artist and lover of nature. The physical features of Canada East are particularly varied and striking—vast forests, bold mountains, broad lakes, rushing rivers and cataracts, fertile plains and smiling villages attract the eye in every direction. It is a region of romance.

THE NEWFOUNDLAND FISHERY.

The banks of Newfoundland may be regarded as one of the wonders of the world; in fact, they are caves, or vast alluvial tracts on the breast of the ocean, which allow man to reap without the trouble of sowing; and most amazing are the finny harvests they yield. The fish caught on these banks finds its way to the most distant parts of the earth—thanks to the valuable condiment salt, and the humane policy that rendered it almost as cheap as water, and applicable even as seasoning in the food of cattle. In the year 1830, nearly a million quintals of dried codfish were exported from Newfoundland, and in 1833, about half the number of casks were filled with seal skins. In addition to these articles, there were considerable exports of cod and seal oil, staves, salted salmon, herrings, mackerel, tongues, sounds and caplins, the last a fish so multitudinous that it actually colors the waters when it arrives on the coast. The annual value of the Newfoundland trade may be estimated in round numbers at £2,000,000 sterling. But this is merely the British portion of the traffic, for the French and Americans also cure to an immense extent, and have not been backward in profiting by the advantages so impolitically granted to them in 1814. During the night, the former fish inshore, contrary to the rules of honor and good faith, while the latter do much injury by throwing the offal of all the fish they take back into the sea from whence it came. The Newfoundland cod is the finest in the world. The head is smaller and the fish firmer than the species that frequent our own shores, not excepting the rock-kind, and when eaten in the fresh state nothing can be more delicate.—Dunfries Courier:

FALLS OF THE CHAUDIERE, NEAR QUEBEC, CANADA EAST.

MURRAY BAY, ON THE ST. LAWRENCE.

THE VALLEYS OF THE SIERRA NEVADA.

Imbosomed amid this mighty range are thousands of valleys, some already partially occupied by settlers, but most of them still vacant; while many, no doubt, have never yet been discovered by the white man; yet year by year they are becoming more known, and it will be but a short time till the prospecting miner, in his searching after gold, will have explored every dark ravine that ploughs these mountainous regions, and ascertained its value for agricultural, grazing, and mining purposes. Already have great numbers been discovered in localities where there was not even a suspicion of their existence. They vary in extent from a few acres up to many hundred, and are mostly covered with a luxuriant growth of indigenous grasses and clover. During the drouth of summer, it is becoming the practice of the herdsmen on the plains to drive their cattle to the mountain retreats, where the climate is cool, the water and grass abundant, and to remain there until the snows begin to fall, when they return to the country of the great valleys below. In this manner the stock are kept on green feed for a good portion of the year. These upper valleys have nearly all either streams or lakes of pure water, with plenty of fine timber, which, with their variety of game and advantages of climate, are drawing many fond of adventure and hunter life to locate in their bosoms. Fruit trees have been planted, and invariably do well. All kinds of vegetables thrive with but little care. Owing to the rank growth of grass, great facilities for making hay are afforded, a commodity for which there is always a good market at the mines, further down among the hills. An ice trade is also growing, which promises to be lucrative. Such are some of the products of this new, and until recently, unknown portion of our State. Here we have a wild and romantic country, like a Switzerland of mountains and valleys, which will open for quiet homes and sheepfolds, with orchards and vineyards, one of the most hounteous realms in the world.—Placerville (Cal.) American.

THE RAILROAD ENGINEER.

The engineer, he who guides the train by guiding the iron horse, and almost holds the lives of passengers in his hands—his is a life of danger and pleasure. In a little seven-by-nine apartment, with square holes on each side for windows, open behind, and with machinery to look through ahead, you find him; he is the "Pathfinder"—he leads the way in all times of danger, checks the iron horse, or causes it to speed ahead with the velocity of the wind, at will. Have you ever stood by the track, of a dark night, and watched the coming and passing of a train? Away off in the darkness you discover a light, and you hear a noise, and the earth trembles beneath your feet. The light comes nearer—you can compare it to nothing but the demon himself, with its terrible whistle—the sparks you imagine come from Beelzebub's nostrils, the fire underneath, that shines close to the ground, causing you to believe the demon walks on live coals. It comes to you—you hack away and shudder—you look up, and almost on the demon's back rides the engineer—perhaps the "machine" shrieks, and you imagine the engineer is applying spurs to the demon's sides. A daring fellow, that engineer—you can't help saying so, and you wonder wherein lies the pleasure of being an engineer. But so he does, day after day, night after night. Moonlight evenings he sweeps over the country—through cities and villages—through fairy scenes in forest and clearings—he looks through the square holes at his side, and enjoys the moonlight, but he cannot stop to enjoy the beauty of the scenery. Cold, rainy, muddy, dark nights, it is the same; perhaps the tracks are undermined, or overflowed with water; perhaps scoundrels have placed obstruction in the way, or trees been overturned across the track, and in either case it is almost instant death to him, at least—but he stops not. Right on, is the word with him, and on he goes regardless of danger, weather and everything, save the well-doing of his duty in an intrepid and fearless manner.—Schenectady Star.

ADVENTURES OF AN ALCHEMIST.

Bragadino, whose real name was Mamugna, was born in the island of Cyprus. He pretended that he was the son of Marco Bragadino, governor of Venice, killed by the Turks in 1551. After a voyage to the East, where he became initiated into the secrets of the alchemists, he went to Italy in 1578, under the title of Count Mamugnaro, and there became very famous, making public exhibitions of his power of transmuting metals, which power he gave out as the origin his own wealth,—the fact being that he derived his money from dupes, to whom he sold his secret at a high price. For no one seems to have been surprised at the fact that all these gold-makers demanded large sums of money for their secret, when it would have been so easy for them to keep their secret, and make all the gold they desired; and the Emperor Ferdinand promised many thousand thalers to one whom he employed to discover the philosopher's stone, never reflecting that, if found, the stone would render such a promise needless. So Bragadino sold his secret. If the purchasers did not succeed, it was because they had not properly followed his instructions. He succeeded—as witness his public exhibitions. Did he not, in the palace of Catrean, astonish the assembly by changing mercury into gold? His secret was simply to employ an amalgam of mercury and gold. Nevertheless, the Doge of Venice purchased his secret at an enormous sum, and Bragadino quitted Venice after his cheat was discovered. In 1588 he travelled over Germany, under the name of Count de Bragadino. He declared that he had Satan himself as his slave—an assertion well calculated to inspire respect in Germany, where the presence of two large black dogs, ferocious and satanic in aspect, always by his side when he was performing his mysteries, was undeniable evidence of his having demons for slaves. After astonishing Vienna, he went to Munich, and in 1590 was summoned to exhibit his skill before the court. Unhappily for him, his cheat was detected, and he was hanged.—Records of the Past.

CAPE TRINITY, ON THE SAGUENAY RIVER, CANADA EAST.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

YOUNG NORA.

BY ELIZA F. MORIARTY.

Young Nora sat gazing alone on the sea,
Far over the waves from her cot on the shore;
Her thoughts winged away to the "land of the free,"
And she wept as she sighed, "O, my Dermot ashore!
Think you now of poor Nora in sorrow and pain,
As she waits for thy coming, but watches in vain,
Though the winds are homeward blowing!"

"This hapless day three years, my heart nearly broke,
I stood here and saw you sail off to the west;
Your blessings at parting, the fond words you spoke,
Were light to my soul and a balm to my breast.
For your coming I pray, love, through all the long day,
When my labor is over and I watch and pray,
While the winds are freshly blowing."

A voice softly answered, "My darling, I'm here
To cheer thee, to bless thee, to guard and to love."
He eloped to his true heart's Nora so dear—
The moon sweetly glanced from the cloud-laden above.
"Heaven smiles on our meeting!" she said, with a sigh;
As his lips pressed the maiden's cheek heard his reply,
For the young night winds were blowing.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

THE BRIDE AND THE BOTTLE:

—OR—

THE WELL OF ST. KEYNE.

BY EMILY R. PAGE.

Do not think, because a bottle figures in one of the titles of my story, that I am going to relate a temperance tale, or panegyricize a pump. I shall attempt nothing of the sort. It is of the spirit of women, rather than of wine, that I am about to speak—and I can assure you that the former is many more degrees "above proof," than the latter.

"Years and years ago, when I was in my teens, it so happened that I lost my heart to a youth who afterwards became your father. I was then, as my looking-glass very often informed me, a pretty young creature—with no knowledge of the world—and a firm believer in the pleasant fiction that love, a cottage and a crust, were amply sufficient for happiness in this life. As to that same love's flying out of the window when poverty came in at the door, and such like unpleasant proverbs, I ignored them entirely; nor would I for one moment suppose that after marriage, I should not still have my own way, just as I had in the delicious days of courtship, when, if I half breathed a wish for even an impossible thing, poor Fred would attempt to procure it, though, like the famous chevalier we read of, who gave a name to the flower now called the forget-me-not—he perished in the undertaking.

"But I soon found out, my dear," (it was my mother who thus spoke to me, just before my marriage), "that fine mornings do not always turn out glorious days. Fred and I got along very smoothly at first, and I really believe that for a whole month, I was the most despotical little wife that ever ruled her husband! Ah, how charmingly our first weeks of matrimonial life passed away! To me, courtship, on looking back to it, seemed only the chrysalis state, out of which I emerged, one happy evening about eight o'clock, in my mother's parlor, a brilliant butterfly, henceforward only to roam from flower to flower—meaning from room to room of my charming new dwelling—and kissing all things that were pretty and sweet; and what could be prettier or sweeter than Fred, the dear fellow himself? At least so I thought—but found rather too soon that my husband was of the same opinion; for before a year had passed, I discovered that in Fred's eyes I was no longer a deity, and that instead of having a will of my own, as I once had, five words which may be found in the sixteenth verse of the third chapter of Genesis, especially, and by no means agreeably, applied to myself—"He shall rule over thee"—and rule he did, without any regulations whatever, except the impulses of his own, as he used to call it, manly will.

"I could not, in those days of young wifehood, but acknowledge his sovereignty; nevertheless, I must confess I did not half like the sudden change from ruling to being ruled; but I bore on, and wept on, too, sometimes, when alone—for I always kept my sorrows to myself—and in time it came to be a strange luxury—the only enjoyment my poor, fond, fluttering little heart ever indulged in. But the worst of it was, that Fred, though he could not share in it, became jealous of my sweet sorrow—a grief that I had kept from him, who had no other trouble unparticipated in. I thought it strange that he had cares, too, which he did not like I should even suspect. At first I tried when he came home late of evenings to soothe him into confidence, but repeated failures at length discouraged me, and in course of time, my dear Chylena, when you were all in all to me in my loneliness, I ceased to receive the domestic kiss of delight as he bounded into the room, though alas, alas! my poor yearning heart never ceased to miss it.

"And yet, Fred was not what the world would call an unkind husband. He was careless, impulsive, too easily persuaded; had, in short, no will of his own. With fatal facility he said 'yes,'—an easy amiability of disposition too often prevented him from the decisive 'no.' That was where he split; and my dear child, as you are yourself about to take, for better or for worse, one who I know you love dearly, I think it is my duty to warn you against the rock on which I split. Heaven is not only my witness that I would not have you think unkindly of your dear, dead, vacillating father (and want of purpose was almost his only failing), but it is my justification also, in giving you a word in season. Had I influenced him, as I now see I might, and should have done, you would not have been, perhaps, a portionless bride."

"Never mind, dear mother," I said, soothingly, "Harry has a will of his own, or I am much mistaken, for I refused him twenty times, but—"

"You also must be decided," she observed, with a quiet smile; "I by no means wish that you should foolishly try to rule your own spirit and that of your husband also. What I desire is that you may, by foresight, gentleness and tact, acquire that influence over him which any good and true man would be only too happy to recognize. But as an example is worth a great deal in this matter of foresight in a wife, suppose I tell you a story."

So I pricked up my ears for the tale, for I was then (and indeed am now) just as fond of fanciful histories as I used to be in the days when "Jack the Giant Killer," "Little Red Riding Hood," and the "Children of the Wood," were more reliable histories than many a more ambitious account of the sayings and doings of "kings and queens unstable" are to me now.

"The story! the story!" and I clapped my hands with glee.

"Once upon a time," continued my mother—

"That's the dear old way," I cried out, interrupting. "All the old child-stories began so! Dear—dear 'Once upon a time!'"

The very phrase made me a child again, for almost unconsciously I drew a cushion close to my mother's feet, and sat upon it, with my hands on her lap and my eyes upturned to that dear, loving face of hers, which at the moment appeared more beautiful than ever to me. She checked my eagerness with a tap of the knitting-needle upon my knuckles, and proceeded:

"Once upon a time, there was, in the neighborhood of an old German city, a famous well, to which belonged a curious legend. The way to it led through the deep, tangled woods which then skirted all the banks of the lower Rhine. This well was so picturesque and beautiful that the fairies might have—and it is said did—use it at once for a looking-glass and a bath; a very convenient arrangement, when it is remembered that diamonds, already strung in the shape of dew-drops threaded on blades of emerald grass—pearls arranged lily-of-the-valley fashion, and sapphires, and rubies, in the guise of blue-bells and wild roses—besides countless other floral gems, were always at hand, to twine into garlands and arrange in airy tresses. Many and many a love-troth used to be plighted beside this crystal well, which seemed to young, fond hearts emblematic of affection in its purity and perpetual flow—but alas! though few young couples suspected as much—resembling its delicate sensitiveness, also, in the surface, which a thing so light as a falling rose-leaf would disturb."

"But the legend—the legend, dearest mama."

"I am not forgetting it, child—" (how impressively that word "child" sounded to me then, just as I was about to become a wife!) "you shall hear it in a moment—" and here my mother took from the drawer of her work-table a miniature which I knew to be that of my father in his early days, kissed it, and, with a sigh, returned it to its accustomed place.

"The story attached to the well was this:—Saint Keyne, from whom it derived its name, was a lady of rare virtues, who had early retired from the world in consequence of having married unhappily. The nunnery in which she half-buried herself, was in the vicinity of this spring, and often as she sat by its brink, watching the water bubbling from unseen depths, her thoughts wandered from them to scenes which had been the very paradise of her young heart. She, it seems, had been a victim to wifely submission—for the bold baron, her husband, knowing that she feared to assert her own dignity, had so perseveringly ridden the high horse, as, in the long run, to crush her spirit, break her heart, and drive her into a cloister.

"Well, the poor unfortunate lady used, as I said, to repair to the well, where she bewailed her sorrow, and at length became convinced that had she, in the beginning of her wedded life, declared her own rights, the bold baron would never have dared to deprive her of them. But it was too late now to find a remedy for the misfortune in her own case, so that she took to considering how she might prevent a similar affliction befalling other poor trusting maidens in future.

"One evening while pondering the matter, she observed an unusually large bubble on the surface of the water. Bigger and bigger it grew, its sphere gleaming like a huge opal. Presently it burst, and from it emerged a fairy of exquisite form, and a face on which was a smile that would have fascinated the extremest anchorite, if he had been there to see it.

"O," quoth the fairy, "I have heard your complainings so often, that I feel constrained, if possible, to alleviate your woes; now I will grant you any boon you request, if made before I can count seven."

"One," said the fairy. St. Keyne was so surprised that she could not utter a word.

"Two!" St. Keyne rubbed her eyes as if doubting whether she had not fallen asleep and was dreaming.

"Three—four—five—six—" and there was a pause.

"St. Keyne, as if by a sudden impulse, screamed out, in tones rather too shrill for such a holy woman:

"I desire that either the man or wife who drinks first of the water of this well immediately after being joined in wedlock, shall have his or her own way ever after."

"Seven!" said the fairy; "your wish is granted," and St. Keyne saw an opaline bubble once more receive the fairy, and sink slowly into the depths of the translucent well. * * *

"You may be sure that as soon the wonderful virtues of a first post-nuptial draught from the well of St. Keyne came to be sounded abroad, it became a place of great resort for both husband and wife, as soon as possible after the marriage vows had been pronounced. In some cases the husband would forget to pay the priest his fee, in his haste to reach the miraculous fountain; and as of course, the man had a much better chance of first receiving the despotism-bestowing draught, in but very few instances was a bride benefited thereby. In fact, a more domineering set of Benedicts had never before been known in that neighborhood than existed for many scores of years after poor St. Keyne had been laid in that place where husbands ceased from troubling, and their poor unfortunate wives rested for the first time since they plunged into the perilous sea of matrimony.

"But all tyrannies sooner or later have their downfall. Martin Luther humbled the Pope, and Oliver Cromwell beheaded Charles the First. Poor St. Keyne, when she uttered the wish so hastily, thought perhaps in her simplicity, dear good soul! that the wife would manage by hook or by crook to get to the well and take the first draught; but she did not reckon on the fact that in such a case, as well as in many others, might of muscle would make right of rule! She was, however, not altogether wrong, for a conjugal Charlotte Corday arose, and when, almost as in the case of Marat, her victim the least suspected it, she smote him, not with a dagger, but with a bottle, and inflicted a blow from which during his whole married life he never recovered. She did it in the way and manner following.

"Merrily rang the bells of the little chapel of St. Medard, one fine morning in May, in the year of grace 173—, as a gay procession wound its way through olive grove and vineyard, towards its altar. Peter Swilbach was leading thereto his lovely bride, Pipette, who, surrounded by gay and laughing girls, looked as though she had not a wish in the world ungratified. Flutes streamed, flutes sounded, drums beat, and merry peals of laughter gladdened the air, and all the old folks of the village predicted for Peter and Pipette a blithe wedding and a merry honeymoon.

"But although Master Peter appeared so gay and unconcerned, he was in truth extremely anxious—for he was, as too many of his sex are, fond of being in authority—and as he drew near the chapel, he bethought him of the best mode of slinking away to the well of St. Keyne without being observed, and take the draught there which would make him the perpetual master of the charming little creature who tripped beside him, looking as sweetly submissive as though St. Keyne had never lived, or her well possessed the least power in the world over the fortune of married folk, as had been foolishly asserted.

"The priest soon made the young couple one—and while the elder wedding guests were kissing Pipette, and wishing her all sorts of happiness, and inviting themselves to the first christening, and the young ones were envying her her bappy lot—Peter, her husband, was missed.

"Where could he be?" was the question from a dozen lips; but a sly smile on Pipette's rosy face betokened anything but anxiety.

"Perhaps he has retired with the holy Father Anselmo, to implore a blessing on our union," she remarked, after she had herself retreated to the sacristy for a few moments. Sly little Pipette!

"All at once, while they were still wondering, in rushed Peter, a cunning smile playing on his countenance.

"Where have you been, my dear husband?" exclaimed Pipette, throwing herself into his arms.

"To the well of St. Keyne, my love," answered Peter.

"Ah, Peter, Peter! don't you think it was rather ungenerous to take such an advantage of my simple little self, who could not run quite so fast as my loving lord!"

"All's fair in love, as well as war," said Peter.

"I agree with you," smilingly retorted Pipette; "and," she added, "are you quite sure, Peter dear, that whoever drinks that first draught of water from St. Keyne's well, after marriage, has his or her own way, ever after?"

"I'm sure of it—and I'll swear to it—and I appeal to all present whether such is the case or not?"

"No one ever doubted it," murmured the crowd.

"Nor do I," said Pipette, quietly.

"And as I drank it first," cried Peter, delightedly, "why it follows that you must never after the present time, do as I please, and not as you choose!"

"Wait a bit, love," remarked Pipette; "you see, my dear, woman's wit has been too much for you this time. You did not drink the first goblet from St. Keyne's fountain!"

"Peter stared in utter wonderment. His wife continued:

"My dear husband, I by no means intend to abuse the privilege I have obtained—for I indeed was the first after the marriage vows were exchanged, to moisten my lips with the mystic element."

"But I was first at the well," replied Peter, in amazement, "and there I drank a full goblet!"

"But after all," said Pipette, "I beat you, for I brought a bottle filled with the water to church!"

* * * * *

"There, my dear," simply remarked my mother, "you see how by a little discretion and foresight a great deal of inconvenience in married life may be prevented. I don't recommend you to be your husband's master, by always having your own will; you will rule best by yielding. What I desire you to do, is, always to avoid provoking domination on his part, by prudent foresight on yours."

LOVE THE NEAREST.

To embrace the whole creation with love sounds beautiful; but we must begin with the individual—with the nearest. And he who cannot love that deeply, intensely, entirely, how should he be able to love that which is remote, and which throws but feeble rays upon him from a foreign star? How should he be able to love it with any feeling which deserves the name of love? The greatest cosmopolites are generally the neediest beggars; and they who embrace the entire universe with love, for the most part, love nothing but their narrow self.—Herder.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

O, I WILL HIDE THE TEAR-DROP.

BY DEATH'S RICHARDS.

O, I will hide the tear-drop
That glistens in my eye—
Though pass there fleeting cloudlets,
There beams the azure sky;
But the sun loves not the banners
That float the ether high—
And man brooks not the tear-drop
That gleams in woman's eye.

Although I hide the tear-drop,
Emotion's pulse bounds high;
But clouds are not all tempests,
That float the azure sky!
Apollo is egotistical—
Like man—he brooks no sigh;
(And—like man—is sore confounded
By a tear in woman's eye.)

O, beauty gathers dew-drops
 Ofttimes within the eye;
Affection forces tear-drops—
For very joy, we sigh:
And, Alguon—you're kind to me,
My woman's heart beats high,
And when I strive to thank you,
The tear-drop dims my eye.

But I will hide the tear-drop
That glistens in my eye:
How strange that woman's love should speak
Both in a smile and sigh!
But man loves not as woman!
His nature—proud and high,
Brooks not the trembling tear-drop
That gleams in woman's eye!

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

THE ELECTION RUSE.

AN ILLUSTRATION OF POLITICAL MORALITY.

BY WILLIAM O. EATON.

THE adaptation of bad means to good ends is a course which is both commended and condemned by moralists. Portia, in the "Merchant of Venice," is asked "to do a great right, do a little wrong," and many reputedly high-minded politicians of the present day are more than suspected of improving upon the hint, or rather enlarging upon it so far as, to attain an imagined right, to do a great deal of wrong,—their plea, that the end justifies the means. Without discussing the question, let us recur to what was done in a little town in New Hampshire, lately,—we will call it Grassford, in order to carry the vote of that public-spirited community.

Three days before the presidential election took place, among the arrivals by cars from distant parts of the country, were no less than fifteen legal voters of the democratic persuasion. They had come home to Grassford for the express purpose of voting on the all-absorbing question of the day. Some had come upwards of a thousand miles, some four or five hundred, and others at very respectably longer or shorter distances; and they did not hesitate, on their way, to declare their opinions freely upon the subject paramount in their minds.

New Hampshire, their old Granite State, so long good for the democracy, was to be redeemed, they had heard it threatened, by the partisans of Fremont, and they had felt it their duty, as old members of the democratic party, to put in their mite to the box to prevent such a catastrophe. They felt that their side was destined to triumph, and yet they admitted they felt queerish, too.

The opposition had made so much noise, and they had heard so much about "free men, free speech, free press, free soil, Free-mont and victory!" that they thought, in spite of the tried staunchness of the Granite democracy, for once there was a bare chance for the shadow of a ghost of a possibility that they might fail, and therefore they were determined to be up and doing.

With great hilarity, stepped from the ears this Spartan fifteen upon the beloved soil of Grassford once more.

"Hurrah!" shouted Mr. Kniggs (that wasn't his name); "here's one more vote for Buchanan, come home on two legs!"

"And here's another," bellowed Mr. Biggs (that wasn't his name), "come seven hundred and fifty miles to save the country from destruction!"

"Hoorah for me!" roared Mr. Dabble (that wasn't his name, either; we don't mean to be personal, gentlemen); "I've come a thousand miles to vote in Grassford once more; for if I couldn't get my vote in, I shouldn't have a wink of sleep for the next four years!"

"Confusion to our enemies!" howled Gabbie, another of the fifteen.

"Three cheers for our side, and Buchanan in the chair!" vociferated another to the assembled crowd at the depot.

"Good!" chimed in another; "set down two and carry one. Hooray!"

"Nine cheers for Grassford!" proposed still another, "and may she ever be true to her principles—one!"

And the excited travellers rent the peaceful air with their cheers, and shook the cinders from their clothes; after which, they shouldered their baggage, and marched up to the tavern to reward themselves with a drink of something.

Mr. John de Cantor (descended from the French) was the popular host of the Grassford Hotel, and he was ready behind the bar to wait upon the new-comers with cheerfulness and grace. They were all good fellows, well known, and some of them well to do.

"Glad to get home agin, I s'pose!" said he, attending to their thirsty calls.

"We are that, De Cantor. Come home to vote for Old Buck. Haven't we, boys?"

"So say you, Mr. Foreman,—so say we all!" was the general response; and loud laughter and the clattering of glasses made them seem a much larger party than they were.

"How's the town going, old boys?"

"Hard to tell—very," replied the landlord, a shade coming over his jolly countenance for the first time that evening. "Everybody appears to be pretty sure of winning; but I keep still and say nothing."

"Still now sucks all the milk—you're right, old demijohn," said one. "This here 'citement makes bar business good, nat'rally."

"Don't dew far yew tew hev any politics," said another. "What in thunder's the constietuwshun tew yew! Yew hev tew tend bar."

"In course," said De Cantor. "Much as ever I kin do to mind my own bizness, and let the country take care of itself."

"Get more custom by it?"

"Sartin!" exclaimed several, warming up. "The free sifers and no-nothings must take an ekkashunel drink as well as we dimmocrats, and they must drink likker that's got no politics in it—"

"If it aint on their side," suggested somebody. "That's so. New Hampshire will of course go for old Buck—yes, of course she will. Why, I'd no idee, considerin' the great fuss the Fremonters hev made, there was so many Buchanannites about. I ornmost wish I heidn't come hum to vote, I cum so far. Wasting powder, by jingo!"

At this remark, the host suddenly scratched his ear as if a bee had bit him, and then brightened up and suffered a sly smile to rest for an instant in one corner of his mouth. The truth was, he was a full-blown Fremont, and anxious after an office at the hands of that party in Grassford, and had in secret given them much material aid, and devoted much of his time to the cause. The town had been thoroughly canvassed, and it had been ascertained to a surety that the Fremonters had just three votes ahead of all others, not making allowance for new arrivals. The presence of the fifteen democrats put them in the minority.

"Catch a weasel asleep!" thought De Cantor. "If we kin only put these fellows on the wrong track, somehow, we may do something arter all. No doubt," said he, loudly, that all might hear, "there will be a large democratic majority in Grassford, gentlemen. Glad to see you hum, but your votes wa'n't needed so orful bad;" and he winked significantly to his Fremont friends who were listening around, and who had begun to think he was two-faced.

They took the hint and followed it up briskly.

"Democrats are three to one here," insisted they. "Fremonters and Fillmore men hardly dare to show their heads."

"Grassford will vindicate her integrity and put Maine to the blush."

"Grassford stands where she always did, old boys. The whole country may depend upon her. Hope you haven't all come from great distances, and put yourselves to great trouble and expense for nothing. Try another round? What do you take?"

The democrats now began to look a little sheepish, most of them feeling as if they had done a very foolish thing, in the ardor of political excitement. The proffered libations were the more readily accepted, as they now wished to drown the thought that they had "brought coals to Newcastle."

"Confound my luck!" exclaimed one. "There was no more need, then, of my vote than of two handles to a hammer."

"Bah!" grumbled another, "I feel jest like selling out at half price."

"Cuss politics!" muttered another. "My vote will cost me nigh onto five hundred dollars."

This growing feeling of dissatisfaction became general among them, and they drank the more, much to the pleasure and profit of the disinterested De Cantor, who had not the slightest objection to supplying them freely.

"Fill up!" cried he; "that's right, fill up! I know you're glad to see Grassford once more."

They all said yes, with wry faces—whether at the liquor or from inward regret, De Cantor could not exactly determine. But as soon as they were gone, a political council was held among the chief wire-pullers of the Fremont party in De Cantor's back room.

"If these men vote they will carry the town," said De Cantor, in dismay. "They're full enough to upset our kettle of fish."

"What's to be done, then? We can't scare up any more votes."

"I said if they voted," said De Cantor.

"There's no if about it. If they're legal voters, of course they will vote."

"No danger of their missing it, as they've come so far, on purpose."

"We might think of some plan to prevent it," said De Cantor, anxiously. "We might intrigue a little, as they call it. Hasn't anybody got headpiece enough to think of sumthin'?"

The question was one of importance, and the council thought, and thought, and thought. Finally they agreed upon a plan, and worked persistently at it; and meanwhile election day arrived.

During the interim, the fifteen democrats were marked men, and the free soilers, who were initiated, concealed their own political faith, and lost no opportunity of rallying them upon their useless journey home, and told them, in pretended confidence, that they had better conceal their political opinions, and the real reason why they had come home, if they didn't wish to be made the laughing-stock of the whole town.

"The idea," said they, "of coming so far to add a drop to the ocean—of attaching so much importance to a vote, where the votes will of course be nearly all one way! It is too ridiculous."

"The Dutch will be said to take Holland, this time!"

"S'pose you wouldn't miss your great one vote to save your life, would you?"

Continued bantering of this sort made them particularly sensitive; and to escape it they avoided all political discussion, or declared they were to vote for Fremont—an evasion which none but the Fremonters understood; so that other democrats, believing them of an opposite stripe, held little political conversation with them, and they remained undelivered as to the relative strength of parties in Grassford, and though desiring to wait till election was over, were eager to get back to their business and make up for lost time. Their uneasy leisure was accordingly spent in what they called "making the best of it," and never before had they indulged in drink so freely as they did during the three days at the hotel of the insidious De Cantor. None were such inveterate applicants for strong potations as the disconcerted fifteen, and never before, they declared, had they been so hospitably treated as by him.

On the night preceding the election, his liberality went so far as to treat them to a great supper, at which it was contrived that conviviality should reach such a height that most of them were put to bed at an early hour—about four in the morning. The natural consequence was, that they rose with swelled heads on election day, long after the voting had commenced.

"Come, gentlemen," cried De Cantor, as each one sauntered into the bar-room, with lagging gait, "the hair of the dog that bit you will cure you, you know. Come up and take an eye-opener. You won't want to vote these three hours yet; we're carrying it all our own way. There, that will make you feel better, after last night's set-down. Nothing like an eye-opener!"

Instead of being eye-openers, they were much more like eye-clovers, for the blue rum which the crafty landlord offered them that day was a special mixture—so prepared as to be palatable, but of a very besetting quality.

Within an hour after they had partaken of De Cantor's morning draught—his "presidential bitters" he called it—fifteen more intoxicated individuals could hardly have been found in all New England. Swaggering or staggering about, and again inflamed with a thirst for more of the pernicious stuff, they remained with De Cantor during the entire day, and when the last moment arrived, some were too far gone to move, some to tell what vote to put in, while others were sufficiently recovered to be ashamed to go to the polls in that condition of mind, body and attire. They had all labored under the idea that they were to go to the polls with De Cantor, trusting to him to give the word, and to vote in a body; but the polls closed without them, and they did not find out their mistake till next day. "Mortification immediately set in," when they inquired how much was the democratic majority in the State, and how much particularly in Grassford.

"Fremont four ahead," said De Cantor, chuckling. "We were three ahead before you came, but a cripple, that we didn't count, hobbled up and voted, and that made us just four. It was very kind of him; but it was much kinder of you fifteen, not to vote at all, after having come so far!"

The "kindness" of the parties was just then evinced by their hurling several decenterers after De Cantor, as he escaped into his back room. But the lost fifteen votes will prove equal to fifteen temperance lectures.

THE WORTH OF A VALET.

Lord Nelson's well-known valet, Tom Allen, lived some time close to me, he being then retained in the service of Sir William Bolton. I met Tom almost every day in my walks, and often got into chat with him about his brave and noble master, Lord Nelson. Among other things, I spoke of his wearing his decorations at Trafalgar. Now Tom, who had been with him in so many other engagements, was by mere accident prevented from arriving in time on that last memorable occasion, having left London after his lordship, and not arriving till the battle was over, and his master's career of glory brought to a brilliant close. But it may be amusing to record Tom's opinion and observations. He said, "I never told anybody that if I had been there Lord Nelson would not have been killed; but this I have said, and say again, that if I had been there he should not have put on that coat. He would mind me like a child; and when I found him bent on wearing his finery before a battle, I always prevented him. 'Tom,' he would say, 'I'll fight the battle in my best coat.' 'No, my lord, you shan't.' 'Why not, Tom?' 'Why, my lord, you fight the battle first, and then I'll dress you up in all your stars and garters, and you'll look something like.'"

Thus poor old faithful Tom Allen gave himself credit for having saved his master's life by his rigid discipline in attire on former occasions; and it was evident that he was of opinion that he should have saved it once more at Trafalgar. Tom's accounts of other memorable events of Nelson's life were given with equal naïveté. His old age was rendered comfortable in Greenwich Hospital, where he held the office of pewterer till his death.—F. C. H., in Notes and Queries.

THE EDUCATION OF THE EYE.

We may not be called upon to hunt white foxes in the snow; or, like William Tell, to save our own life and our child's by splitting with an arrow an apple on his head, or to identify a stolen sheep by looking in its face and swearing to its portrait; but we must do many things essential to our welfare, which we would do a great deal better if we had an eye as trained as we readily might have. For example, it is not every man that can hit a nail upon the head, or drive it straight in with a hammer. Few persons can draw a straight line, or cut a piece of cloth or paper even; still fewer can use a pencil as draughtsmen; and fewer still can paint with colors. Yet there is not a calling in which an educated eye, nice in distinguishing form, color, size, distance, and the like, will not be of great service. For, though it is not to be denied that some eyes can be educated to a greater extent than others, that can be no excuse for any one neglecting to educate his eye. The worse it is, the more it needs education; the better it is, the more it will repay it.—The Five Gateways of Knowledge, by Professor G. Wilson.

SIGISMUND THALBERG, THE PIANIST.

The portrait on this page is from the pencil of Hill, drawn expressly for the Pictorial, and a most faithful likeness of the amiable and accomplished original. Sigismund Thalberg was born in the city of Genoa, Italy, January 7, 1812, and is therefore at present forty-five years of age, though no one, judging from his appearance alone, would pronounce him more than thirty-five. He is a mild and gentlemanly looking person, whose refinement is evidenced by the utter absence of pretension in dress and bearing. He belongs to one of the noblest families of Germany, and one of his nearest relatives is a grand duke. He himself, however, acknowledges no nobility but that of character and talent, and no career worthier than that of art. When he first resolved to make music his profession, some of his noble connections were disposed to drop his acquaintance, but they have since been glad to claim a share of the lustre he has shed on the family name. His early musical education was commenced at Vienna, where, following diligently the course marked out for him, and devoting indefatigable labor to surmounting the difficulties of his favorite instrument, as a mere youth his proficiency became the theme of eulogy in the capital of Germany. At the age of sixteen, he published his first works, "Mélange sur les thèmes d'Euryanthe," a fantasia on a Scotch air, and an "impromptu on 'Motives from the Siege of Coriuth.'" At the age of eighteen, he made his first visit to England. By the introduction of a new method for bringing the whole key-board into action, accomplished by making the thumb a prominent member, he acquired a great reputation in England, and the journals were full of the musical wonder. In 1830, he made a musical tour through Germany, and was everywhere received with honor. In Munich, he was absolutely feted by the principal nobility. At Berlin, he was summoned to Potsdam, where he played before the king and queen of Prussia at a private soirée in the palace. A similar warmth marked his reception at Dresden in the court of Saxony. After this tour, M. Thalberg returned to Vienna, where he was made pianist to the imperial chamber. In 1834, he accompanied the emperor to Toplitz, on the occasion of the meeting of Ferdinand with the king of Prussia and the czar of Russia. He afterwards achieved triumphs in Paris, and visited England again in 1836, where he was received with signal honor, and the queen honored him by arranging a private soirée. While Thalberg played, the queen was so moved that she accompanied him with her voice. He has now nearly completed thirty years of public life. During the past twenty years, he has divided his time between England and the continent, everywhere successful, everywhere popular. Our engraving is very like him. He has a fine, muscular, well-developed figure, with a fresh, ruddy, Saxon complexion, a clear blue eye, a pleasant smile, a good front at development. He is married to the daughter of Lablache, the great basso. His visit to this country has thus far proved a series of triumphs. In New York and this city, he won the applause of the critics and the people. His manner took every one here by surprise. Nothing more unlike that of Leopold de Meyer, the lion pianist, can possibly be conceived. There is no clap-trap about him, no fierce theatrical glances at the audience, no diabolical grins, no rending of kid gloves to pieces, no fierce assaults on the piano. He wins music from the instrument as he wins applause from the audience. He does all that can be done with the piano, without effort, without grimace, without spasmodic action. Nothing can be truer than what the accomplished musical critic of the Atlas says of him:—"This same simplicity of manner is the most marked feature in his playing. He does not thunder through the octaves, like a smart salesman wishing to show the capacity of the instrument. He rarely attempts tours de force. He gives, generally, simple harmonies, in place of the stunning combinations we have often heard. The modulations are gracefully managed; the door swings on golden hinges, and discovers new pleasures, not 'with impetuous recoil and jarring sound.' The melodies he chooses to illustrate are of a simple character; 'Deh vieni alla finestra,' and the serenade from 'Don Pasquale,' are examples in point. The music comes to the ear like the rippling of waves on the beach, of a summer evening, when the moonbeams sleep on a placid sea. Conscious strength gives repose to the possessor; it is a lower order of ability that is manifest in uneasy effort." In his variations on a given theme, the air is kept pure and distinct throughout all the masses of brilliant embroidery his subtle fingers weave about it. We are satisfied, after listening to him, that under his hand the piano forte is made to do all that the instrument can. If it does not produce the perfection of music, the fault is in the instrument and not the artist. All its power, sweetness and harmony are brought out. The ear is fully satisfied; we can conceive of no better playing. In most efforts of art, this feeling of complete satisfaction is wanting. The imagination will suggest something beyond what the most skilful has accomplished. We do not mean to say by this that because M. Thalberg has reached the perfection of piano forte playing, he has produced the perfection of music, for the instrument is incapable of supplying the material. For a perfect blending of notes, like the blending of colors in a fine painting, we must seek some other instrument. M. Thalberg is said to be as amiable as he is gifted. His free concert to the public school scholars was a graceful and generous act of kindness, displaying unostentatiously the goodness of his heart. He has left a most agreeable impression behind him.

S. THALBERG, THE GREAT PIANIST.

SKATING ON JAMAICA POND, NEAR BOSTON.

Our artist, Mr. Champney, has here given us a very spirited sketch of the scene which every fine winter afternoon, when the snow is absent, presented on that favorite resort of the amateurs of out-door sports, Jamaica Pond, beautiful in its summer aspect, and attractive when made the arena of the skaters. The wooded point which occupies a conspicuous position in the picture is Pine Bank, and serves to mark the locality. In the foreground, the ice is covered by skaters of both sexes, while there are lookers-on who admire the dexterity they dare not imitate. The proficiency of the ladies in this exhilarating sport is a pleasant thing to chronicle; we rejoice at anything which leads them to take out-door exercise. If such amusements were followed up sedulously, we should no longer hear the complaint that American beauty is a fragile and evanescent flower. Skating is a most graceful exercise. The Dutch women, whose rotundity and stolidity even the pencil of Rembrandt could not idealize, still appear graceful when gliding on their skates over the frozen canals of Holland. How great is the added grace of this exercise to the winning carriage of our peerless belles! Beauty never appears so attractive as when clad in a fur-trimmed polka jacket and mounted on flashing steel. The skating on Jamaica Pond has become quite as noted as the racing on the Neck in the winter season, and is worthier of commendation.

ABBOTSFORD.

As what constitutes the great man is more commonly some extraordinary combination and balance of qualities, than the highest development of any one, so you cannot but here be struck anew by the singular combination in Scott's mind of love for the picturesque and romantic, with the plainest common sense—a delight in heroic excess with the prudent habit of order. Here the most pleasing order pervades, emblems of what men commonly esteem disorder and excess.—Madame Ossoli.

SKATERS ON JAMAICA POND, NEAR BOSTON.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATHEW M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. M.—In France, a man is not allowed to exercise the elective franchise till he is twenty-five years of age.

E. F. R.—Robert Fulton was born in America, of Irish parentage. His first experiment with a steamboat was not on the river Hudson, but on the Rhone, in France.

H. H.—Thomas Hooker was the first colonist of Cambridge, Mass. He was one of the founders of the Connecticut colony.

STUBBEN.—The Spanish "Alaydo" is derived from the Arabic word "Adil," signifying a judge.

M. V.—The Valkyrie were the Scandinavian Færes—the "choosers of the slain," who endeavored heroes killed in battle to Valhalla, the Northernmost palace of immortality.

R. H., Jr.—Utopia was a term invented by Sir Thomas More, from a Greek word signifying "no place," and applied to an imaginary island, whose condition and perfection he describes.

MOUSAZ.—The form of the funeral urn was derived by the Romans from the Greeks; but the latter never used them for containing the ashes of the dead—that was a Roman custom.

EPHRA.—The large tendon which passes from the muscles of the calf of the leg to the heel, is called the Tendon Achillis. In reference to the fable of the dipping of Achilles in the Styx—his mother, Thetis, having, it is said, held him by that part.

CYRUS.—The quotient will be 7,889,624 without any fraction, according to Arago's calculations.

MOSES.—The Te Deum (We praise thee, O God!) has been ascribed to Ambrose and Augustine, to Ambrose alone, to Hilary, and other distinguished persons.

INVENTOR.—The steam gun is an invention of Mr. James Perkins, an American mechanician. We do not think it has ever been tried in war, though working models of it are common.

Q.—The order of Knights of St. John, or Knights Hospitaliers, was instituted as a military brotherhood, by Raymond de Pay, its principal, early in the 12th century.

W. W.—Washington Irving resides on his estate at Sunnyside, near Tarrytown, on the Hudson River, New York; William C. Bryant at Roslyn, Long Island, New York; and William H. Prescott in this city.

CHINESE.—We would not advise you to commence the study of the Chinese language, unless you expect to live a century. It is probably the most difficult of all the living languages.

J. S.—Suicide is ranked by the English law as a peculiar species of felony; and, like other felonies, cannot be committed by persons under the age of discretion, or insane.

HYPOT.—Soulouque, the negro chief magistrate of Hayti, took the title of Faustin I., when he assumed the imperial purple.

CHARLES II.—Those to whom wedding cards have not been sent, should not call on a newly married pair.

A. C.—Yes.

W. W.—Thank you, but it is too long for our paper, and would interfere with the variety which we aim to give.

THE "VOTAQUE DE LA MER."—We have received many compliments for our representation of this magnificent vessel built for the Pacha of Egypt, and throughout a triumph of American naval architecture and workmanship. The propeller wheel is a wonder in itself; it is 15 feet and 4 inches in diameter, and weighs 19,533 pounds! It was cast by Messrs. Reaney, Neafie & Co., at their famous "Penn Steam Engine and Boiler Works," located at the foot of Palmer Street, Kensington, Philadelphia, and is one of their patents.

MISS LAURA KEENE.—It is said that Miss Laura Keene is still Miss Laura Keene, and not Mrs. Laura Lutze, or Leets, or Leutze, and is wedded to her art only. We thought it was an "affair of the cart," as a cockney would say.

SPLINTERS.

.... Among the excellent hotels near town, is the "Sagamore House," at Lynn, kept by mine host Rand.

.... A Mr. Hall proposes to keep the Hudson River and Erie Canal open in winter by hot water pipes.

.... During the year 1856, 362 persons died of scarlet fever in this city—187 males, and 175 females.

.... A gentleman lately paid his bill at the St. Nicholas, New York, by a forged check. He is probably "morally insane."

.... An exchange thinks, that in selecting men for public stations, we should choose fat men—men of weight.

.... Col. Benton, who objects to the use of the word "lady," speaks of Mrs. Madison as the "ex-presidentess."

.... Thirty-five persons only have been imprisoned for debt in the Suffolk county jail during the past year.

.... "L'Avvenir (The Future)," a Montreal paper, places the American arms at the head of its columns.

.... At a large party in New York, the novel feature of two policemen in the supper room was introduced.

.... Mdlle. Robert, of the Ravel troupe, is one of the most accomplished dancers we ever saw.

.... Mr. Arthur Gilman has been very successful with his new lecture on New England humor.

.... Mr. Wm. B. Wood, a Philadelphia actor, lately received $985 as a present from his friends.

.... Rev. Henry Giles's lectures on Shakspeare evinced a thorough appreciation of the great poet.

.... The British brig Maryn, Capt. Thompson, arrived at Savannah, is 53 years old, and sound throughout.

.... There are fifteen hundred students in the medical colleges and schools of the city of Philadelphia.

.... In Wisconsin, the papers are rejoicing over extensive beds of peat, and the prospect of cheap fires.

.... The almshouse establishment of New Haven has more than supported itself—a proof of extraordinary management.

.... The New Haven Railroad passenger depot, in New York city, is to be located on the corner of 4th Avenue and 27th Street.

.... Wm. N. Haldeman, of the Louisville Courier, had a New Year's gift of a service of silver plate.

.... The New York Hospital, a noble charity, is loaded with debt. It should be immediately extinguished.

.... Davidgo, the comedian, lately drew a large prize in the Maryland lottery—he took the joke, of course.

.... The Don Quixotte of Cervantes sprang perfect from his mind, like Minerva from the head of Ju, iter.

THE BOSTON ART CLUB.

The greatest results have sprung from small beginnings, and the progress of the above-named association is an illustration of the fact. The Boston Art Club was formed about two years since, for the purpose of bringing the artists of our city into more social relations with each other, and with the lovers of art in this community. Its effective operation suggested higher views and a wider sphere of action, promotive of æsthetic culture and the true interests of art. The purposes of the gentlemen composing the association have been liberally encouraged by the Boston Athenæum, and the management of the last exhibition of that institution was committed principally to its charge. The experiment proved highly successful. By the exertion of the Art Club, a large number of the works of living American artists was added to the five specimens of different schools and ages belonging to the Athenæum, and the receipts of the exhibition were large, a fair portion of which was paid over to the club, and has enabled them to continue their movement. The association was therefore enabled to open a free exhibition of pictures, the work of Boston artists, in Bedford Street, and we trust that this may prove a permanent gallery. The rooms are sufficiently central, and must prove attractive to residents and to strangers visiting our city. In addition to this, a series of lectures has been delivered before the association, the highest talent in the country having been enlisted for the purpose. When all exerted themselves successfully, it is almost invidious to single out individuals; but we were particularly struck with the addresses of the Rev. F. H. Hedge, D. D., of Brookline, and the Rev. Henry Giles. The former particularly was a most brilliant production.

We regard this movement as an all-important one. We have ample material for the highest culture of art among us,—young and enthusiastic artists, ardent amateurs, wealth to foster and taste to appreciate; and all that is necessary is to combine and to give practical effect to these various elements. If we would retain for our city the proud appellation of the "Athens of America," we must look well to our laurels. Of late, New York and Philadelphia have been great art centres, and the Queen City of the West has distinguished itself in the liberal patronage of art. We must not permit the spirit of old fogyness to drive artists to other cities, nor have it go abroad that, with all its refinement, wealth and intellectual culture, only music can find a congenial home among us.

EFFECTS OF HABIT.

"Practice makes perfect" is an old maxim, but one that is not so often acted upon with good habits as with bad. There are some striking examples on record of the effects of perseverance. One of the best artists we know gave no promise of his present excellence, but he was resolved to succeed, and by dint of patience, practice accomplished his end. Lord Chesterfield, with no "native graces," and with an unprepossessing appearance, came to be regarded as the most polished man of his day. "I had a strong desire," he says, "to please, and was sensible that I had nothing but the desire. I therefore resolved, if possible, to acquire the means, too. I studied attentively and minutely the dress, the air, the manner, the address and the turn of conversation of all those whom I found to be the people in fashion, and most generally allowed to please. I imitated them as well as I could: if I heard that one man was reckoned remarkably genteel, I carefully watched his dress, motions and attitudes, and formed my own upon them. When I heard of another whose conversation was agreeable and engaging, I listened and attended to the turn of it. I addressed myself, though de tres mauvaise grace, to all the most fashionable fine ladies; confessed and laughed with them at my own awkwardness and rawness, recommending myself as an object for them to try their skill in forming."

SETS OF OUR PICTORIAL.—We have now only a few complete sets left of our illustrated work, from the commencement to the present time, uniformly bound in full gilt, strong and serviceable. Probably in one year from this time a set cannot be had for any sum, as they are getting so rare, and cannot ever be republished, on account of the great expense of reprinting. We sell the eleven volumes complete for $32, containing over ten thousand elegant engravings, and forming an invaluable addition to any private or public library.

FRENCH'S STANDARD MINOR DRAMA.—The last issues of these fine series are the Opera of Cinderella, "I dine with my mother," a pretty comedieta, now playing by Laura Keene, and Walcott's burlesque, "Ulla-wa-tha," in which Mrs. John Wood made such a hit in New York as Minniehada.

FALSE IMPRESSIONS.—Sir Isaac Newton, Goldsmith, Swift, Chaucer and Dryden were regarded as stupid in their early days. Trees that bear the choicest fruits are always longest in coming to maturity.

PLAGIARISM.—The Boston Journal says truly that the utmost care cannot always guard the columns of a newspaper against the impositions of those who are ambitious to shine in borrowed plumes.

HOUSEWIFERY.—No merchant, politician or president has a longer list of daily duties than a good housewife, yet her services are rarely appreciated.

There has been added to "Ballou's Pictorial" a gossip column, which is alone worth the price of the paper, saying nothing of the brilliant illustrations.—Eastern Daily Post.

A COSTLY SET.—General Washington wore a set of artificial teeth which cost five hundred dollars, and were poor at that.

THE ISLAND OF RHODES.

Who has not heard of the island of Rhodes, the gem of the Grecian archipelago—sacred to the sun in ancient times, celebrated for its serene sky, its soft climate, its great fertility, and its luscious fruits? Its ancient maritime power was prodigious, and it sent forth its adventurous colonists to Sicily, Italy and Spain. Its works of art attracted visitors from all parts of the civilized world. Here the brazen Colossus, the prodigious statue of Apollo, a world wonder, basked the entrance of the harbor. The island bowed beneath the eagles of Vespasian, received the cross with the Knights of St. John, and again yielded to the crescent when the horse-tails of Soliman II. waved beneath its citadel. For ages it has been a marvel, and now it is utterly ruined. A terrible earthquake occurring in October toppled down its finest buildings, as the great brass Colossus was overthrown centuries ago, after standing only sixty years. But this was not all. Two days afterwards a more serious calamity occurred. A correspondent of the Boston Traveller, speaking of these occurrences, says:—"The first came from beneath, the second was from above, and both equally beyond the control of human power. A large powder magazine was situated near the church of St. John's, which was also the Turkish quarter. A thunder storm burst forth; the lightning flashed; a stream penetrated the magazine; an explosion followed, which demolished many of the remaining houses and St. John's to its foundation stones; while, worse than all, it is reported that seven hundred Turks perished! Travellers inform me who stopped a few days in the harbor as they came down in the last steamer, that little is now to be seen of this famous and beautiful city but frightful heaps of ruins. Rhodes fuit!"

EXPLODED MACHINE.—A paragraph has been going the rounds of the papers, stating that somebody somewhere had invented a machine that would destroy armies, navies and cities in a twinkling. It was said to resemble a griststone, and one man at a crank would discharge three hundred balls a minute. It turns out a complete hoax.

THE LAST AND WORST.—When the seven wise men of Greece met the sage of Hindostan what did they do? They all ate sausages. (They all eight saw sausages).

A SERIOUS QUESTION.—Why is a man never hungry on the border of a lake? Because there is a banquet at his feet. (A bank, wet, at his feet).

NEW CAN.—They have got one of those queer concerns, a "Hansom" Cab, in New York. That's nothing; we have had ood running for months in Boston.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Robinson, Mr. Martin Johnson to Miss Della B. Carroll; by Rev. Mr. Winkley, Mr. Henry F. Nowell to Miss Sarah E. Clark; by Rev. Mr. Studley, Mr. George B. Hadley to Miss Hattie E. Pingree, of Denmark, Me.; by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. James Burnside to Miss Georgiana Durney; by Rev. Mr. Ellis, Mr. Krastus H. Briggs to Miss Sarah F. Loring; by Rev. Mr. Dutton, Mr. O. H. Pierce to Miss Angelina Smith;—At South Boston, by Rev. Mr. Porter, Mr. William S. Morse to Miss Eliza A. Stone; by Rev. Mr. Dawes, Mr. Charles C. Southard to Miss Josephine W. East;—At Cambridge, by Rev. Mr. Harrington, Mr. William H. Morse, of Boston, to Miss Josephine Sweetser;—At Auburndale, by Rev. Mr. Clark, Mr. William E. Plummer, of Newburyport, to Miss Ann H. Johnson;—At Quincy, by Rev. Mr. Rice, Mr. Henry E. Flint, of Boston, to Miss Anna M. Hardwick;—At Salem, by Rev. Mr. Winn, Mr. John L. Hatfield to Miss Mary E. Brice;—At Beverly, by Rev. Mr. Rice, Mr. James A. Lefavour to Miss Lucy Cressy;—At Lowell, by Rev. Mr. Dutton, Mr. Alden Clifford to Miss Agnes Leslie;—At Worcester, by Rev. Mr. Cutler, Mr. Marshall S. Ballard to Miss Elvira C. Hubbard;—At Fall River, by Rev. Mr. Duman, Mr. Stillman O. Keith, of Boston, to Miss Clara W. Eaton, of Middleboro';—At Springfield, by Rev. Mr. Tiffany, Mr. William L. Smith to Miss Caroline L. Edwards.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mr. Stephen Tilton, 66; Mr. Freeman Dyer, 21; Mrs. Betsey O. Tenney, of Ashby, 52; Mr. Antonio Yeazie, 68; William H., only son of William W. Kendrick, 11;—At Charlestown, Mrs. Susie S. Etheridge, 19;—At Roxbury, Miss Hannah Meriam, 73;—At Cambridgeport, Miss Melvina W. Palmer, 22;—At Chelsea, Mrs. Susan H. Hersey, 34;—At Cambridge, Mr. Jacob Wyeth, 94;—At Newtonville, Miss Abigail Perkins, daughter of Mr. Isaac Perry, 25;—At Canton, Mr. Emmeline M. Everett, 48;—At Watertown, Mrs. Abigail Richardson, 73;—At South Natick, Mr. Henry P. Bartlett, 61;—At Lynn, Mrs. Mary Jeffry, 74;—At Salem, Mrs. Maria L. Abbott, 22;—At Gloucester, Mr. Joseph Herrick, 88;—At Newburyport, Mr. Andrew Raymond, 56;—At Worcester, Mr. Eben Small, 84;—At West Brookfield, Oliver S. Cooke, 88;—At Springfield, Mrs. Anna, widow of Deacon Jerre Brocke, 68;—At New Salem, Mr. Bradley Smith, 32;—At Cohasset, Mrs. Hepzibah Whittington, 86;—At North Fairhaven, Mr. Charles G. Wrightington, 59;—At New Bedford, Captain Thomas D. Lucas, 50;—At Sandwich, Mr. John Vaughn, 33;—At Portsmouth, N. H., Mr. Thomas Moses, 83;—At Dover, N. H., Mr. Wm. B. Douglass, of Newport, Mass., 27;—At Francetown, N. H., Mr. George Newman, son of the late Henry Newman, of Boston, 61;—At Waukegan, Lake county, Ill., Mrs. Susan Goss, 97.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

This paper presents in the most elegant and available form, a weekly literary mélange of notable events of the day. Its columns are devoted to original tales, sketches and poems, by the best AMERICAN authors, and the cream of the domestic and foreign news; the whole well spiced with wit and humor. Each paper is beautifully illustrated with numerous accurate engravings, by eminent artists, of notable objects, current events in all parts of the world, and of men and manners, altogether making a paper entirely original in this country. Its pages contain views of every populous city in the known world, of all buildings of note in the eastern or western hemisphere, of all the principal ships and steamers of the navy and merchant service, with fine and accurate portraits of every noted character in the world, both male and female.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, $3 00
4 subscribers, " " 10 00
10 " " " 20 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis.

* One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by

M. M. BALLOU,

No. 22 WATER STREET, BOSTON.

WHOLESALE AGENTS.—Franch, 121 Nassau Street, New York; A. Winch, 112 Chestnut Street, Philadelphia; Henry Taylor, 111 Baltimore Street, Baltimore; K. A. Duncan, 102 Vine Street, between 4th and 5th, Cincinnati; J. A. Roy, 43 Woodward Avenue, Detroit; E. K. Woodward, corner of 4th and Chestnut Streets, St. Louis; Samuel Ringgold, Louisville, Kentucky; Trubner & Co., 12 Paternoster Row, London. General agents for Europe.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

YOUTH'S CALL TO WORSHIP.

BY IRVING MONTAGUE.

Come when the heart in bosom bounds the lightest:
Come when the pearls are wreathing on thy brow;
Come when the roses on thy cheek bloom brightest:
Come when thy heart is pure as love's young vow.

Come when thy tresses on the breeze are dancing—
Come when thy dewy lip is wreathed in smiles;
Come when thine eye its sapphire lustre glancing,
Enchains the heart by beauty's potent wiles.

Come when the matin mist is round thee wreathing:
Come when the vesper dew uplifts at even;
Come when the words of truth thy lips are breathing—
The young in heart are worthiest guests of heaven.

THE SAVIOUR.

The tidings which that Infant brings
Are not for conquerors or for kings:
Not for the sceptre or the brand,
For crowned head, or red right hand.
But to the contrite and the meek;
The sinful, sorrowful and weak:
Or those who, with a hope sublime,
Are waiting for the Lord's good time.
Only for those the angels sing,
"All glory to our new-born King,
And peace and good-will unto men,
Hosanna to our God! Amen!"—MISS LONDON.

BEAUTY.

Beauty! thou art a fair but fading flower,
The tender prey of every coming hour:
In youth, thou, comet-like, art gazed upon,
But art portentous to thyself alone;
Unpunished thou to few wert ever given,
Nor art a blessing, but a mark from heaven.—SEDLBY.

A PLEASANT NIGHT.

All was so still, so soft in earth and air,
You scarce would start to meet a spirit there;
Secure that nought of evil could befall,
To walk in such a scene, on such a night!—BYRON.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

We met "Father Streeter," of this city, to-day. The old gentleman enjoys a good degree of health, and informs us that he has performed the marriage ceremony for one hundred and ninety couples during the past year! How fast people do get married at the "North End"! How pithy are some of the sayings of the French writers! Take this one as a sample:—"Indigestion is the remorse of a guilty stomach." It is a Hygienic treatise in a line. Swift held the doctrine that there were three places where a man should be allowed to speak without contradiction, viz., "the bench, the pulpit, and the gallops." Gen. Washington gave the following toast when the American Revolutionary army was disbanded at the close of the war:—"The American soldier of freedom—may he at all times secure a good and plentiful ration; and when he has finished his tour of duty on earth, may he pitch his tent in the Elysian Fields, and there receive his reward from the right hand of the God of battles!" A south-western editor curiously announced his plans and purposes for New Year's Day as follows:—"We shall luxuriate over our dinner until about four o'clock, when we shall go out and slide on a smooth plank for half an hour, 'teter' for another half hour, and then pitch cents till dark. In the evening we shall go to a courtship." We hope that, after such a miscellaneous programme, our contemporary had a good time. Good humor and sprightliness are attractive to the end of life. Lively, good-humored old women are what raisins are to fresh grapes. They are withered, but they are also preserved, and appear to advantage in the freshest company. As we were passing Franklin's statue, in Court Square, the other day, we were reminded of one of his sayings—"I never knew a man in the country who was too poor to take a newspaper." We sometimes read English bulls that are quite as amusing as any attributed to the Hibernians. An English clergyman having lately stated that the services would be morning and evening, and morning and afternoon, alternately, the parish clerk gave out that the services would be to "all eternity." One of our exchanges thus refines a well known proverbial saying:—"Elevate a mendicant to equestrian dignity, and he will travel to the presence of the parent of evil." A few years ago the ladies wore a very handy sort of hood, which were called "Kiss-me-if-you-dare" hoods. The present style of bonnet has a "Kiss-me-if-you-want-to" look. A culprit named Bliss, lately escaped from the custody of an Illinois sheriff. As his whereabouts is not known, we presume he may be styled "unheard-of Bliss." A sub-editor lately announced the illness of his principal, and piously added, "All good paying subscribers are requested to make mention of him in their prayers; the other class need not do so, as 'the prayer of the wicked availeth nothing,' according to good authority." The wit of poor Finn the actor (lost in the Lexington) was inexhaustible. One tempestuous night he happened to say, in a coffee-room, "I never did see such a wind and such a storm." "And pray, sir," inquired a bystander, "since you saw the wind and storm, what might their color be?" "The wind blew, and the storm rose," replied the happy punster. In a quaint old book we glanced into the other day, in Williams's bookstore, we found the following recipe for "Hardening iron. Take a miser's heart, dry it well in ye sunne, and pounde fyne in a mortar; sprinkle a few graynes on any quantity of iron, and yt will render yt harder than adamant." There is an affected class of persons who imagine they show their refinement by using the word "lady" instead of "woman." Take Scott's world-wide tribute to the sex, and see what namby-pamby this substitute would make of the apostrophe, "O, ladies! in our hours of ease, etc." Take the church burial service, and for "man that is born of woman," read "gentleman that is born of lady." Pshaw! Like Mercutio, we have no patience with these mincing phrases! Hazlitt tells a good story of a painter of the name of Astley, who, when walking with some English students near Rome, was compelled by the heat like them to take off his coat. On this occasion he displayed a waistcoat with a huge waterfall running down the back of it—a piece of one of his own canvases he had converted to that purpose. Sheridan was once so "hard up," as we say, that it was only by great exertions that he provided for his household. One day, to cut short a debate with the butcher's apprentice about leaving a leg of mutton without the money, the cook clapped it into the pot; the butcher's boy, probably used to such encounters, with equal coolness took it out again, and marched out with it in his tray in triumph. The anniversary of the Battle of New Orleans was celebrated with great spirit in many localities. The news of that great battle did not reach Boston till about a month after it occurred, and then created the wildest excitement. Merriam, the great weather-seer of Brooklyn, N. Y., confesses, we believe, there are no reliable prognostics of the weather. The burning of the State Capitol at Montpelier, Vt., was a sad loss. It had been standing about 20 years, and the architect was Ammi B. Young, of this city, who also built the Boston Custom-House. Mr. Joshua Howard, of Maryland, denies the fact that the rings in the sections of trees indicate their age, each ring being supposed to show a year's growth. He has known trees to make five rings in a year. The grape-vines of Europe are recovering from the strange disorder which for several years blighted the hopes of the vintagers. The poet Lamartine made an immense quantity of wine this year. Congelation as an anesthetic and curative agent is fast coming into favor with the faculty. Rachel's house and furniture in Paris were not sold at the time advertised. They were not worth the puffing they received, and the sale was indefinitely postponed. Why did a charming young girl of sixteen jump from a chamber window at Waterbury, Vermont, on Christmas Day, to marry a divorced man? Because it was leap year. Dr. Rufini, author of "Dr. Antonio," "Lorenzo Benoni," and the "Paragones in Paris," is a singular example of a foreigner—an exiled Italian, writing English with perfect purity and ease. Willis never wrote anything better, in prose, than his "Letters from under a Bridge." We often read a few pages in those letters with the fresh feeling of delight they first inspired us with. A subscriber writes us:—"Highly as I always thought of your illustrated Journal, I never fully realized its great value till I carefully went through the last two bound volumes, and saw what an amount of illustration, of reading matter, of valuable intelligence, you had brought together in a year. If the same matters interested me in the detail, they surprised me in the aggregate." A writer in Putnam's Magazine says:—"A Cape Cod man has to fight his way through existence, as a gladiator his way out of the ring." Samuel Warren, author of "Diary of a Physician," and "Ten Thousand a Year," an eminent lawyer and member of parliament, looks up at us from the surface of a fine photograph, an intellectual, but rather severe-looking man. He was a successful contributor to periodical literature in his sixteenth, and a political pamphleteer in his 19th year. He looks as if he had worked hard. It is expected and hoped that the Pope will grant an amnesty to political offenders. It would be for his interest to do so. Very comfortable is it to be waked up at half past six on one of these bitter mornings, and told that your shower-bath is ready—iced, of course. In Mr. Holmes's dry goods store, in New Orleans, is the largest mirror that could be bought in Paris—eleven feet five inches, by seven feet nine. It cost $2000. Among the events of the season are calico balls. The ladies dress in calico for one evening only, and then give the dresses to the poor. We notice that a late traveller in the East says the natives of Egypt carry hives of bees up and down the Nile in boats, stopping wherever flowers abound to give the insects a chance to feed. A Dutch prince has fallen in love with Queen Victoria's daughter Alice. They will do so, even royal girls and boys. There is a work advertised, called "Every Man a Lawyer." What a state of society! It appears that the coal extracted from the mines of Pennsylvania the last year has been equal to the sum of forty millions of dollars, which is well up to the yield of the gold mines of California. There's a fine moral herein, that our readers may deduce for themselves. It requires undoubted courage to march up to an enemy's battery in search of the "hubble, reputation," but a still greater amount of courage to get out of bed when the thermometer is four or five degrees below zero. There undoubtedly will be another expedition sent out from England to the place where the relics of Sir John Franklin were found; then will come an expedition for the relief of that expedition, and so on, till scores more of valuable lives are sacrificed in the frozen regions of the north. For our part, we think that enough has been done in that direction. The United States storeship Supply encountered very heavy weather in bringing over the last lot of camels. The animals, however, created no confusion during the gale, and for an excellent reason—straps were buckled round their knees so that they could not rise. Daniel N. Haskell, Esq., of the Boston Transcript, has made a deep impression by his valuable and fascinating lecture on the "Curiosities of Book-Making." While the ladies of Belgium have formed a society for reducing the extravagances of fashion, the leaders of the ton in Paris, aiming at the same end, have voted to adopt hoop-petticoats fifteen feet in circumference, so that their very absurdity will compel their abandonment. An old gentleman in Newburyport, eighty years old, but in excellent health, ordered his coffin made the other day, after agreeing on terms, so as to be all ready when he required it. He may live to be a hundred yet. The Rev. Mr. Giles says:—"The manner in which the comic mingles with the tragic is an impressive peculiarity in Shakespeare's pathos. The comic is with the tragic in Shakespeare's drama in obedience to the truth of life—inherently and functionally; not for contrast, but for completeness. The comic is everywhere near the tragic, because everywhere ease is near to agony, mirth is near to grief, laughter sounding in the same air with weeping—laughter which will itself in turn be changed to tears. One gentleman recently asked another to define the word "nothing" for him. "You can do that best yourself," was the razor-like response. "Sound the fifth letter in the alphabet and you have it; and mind, capitalize." That was an inimitable unconscious bull of the famous Mr. Amner, who, going through a street in Windsor, two boys looked out of a one pair of stairs window, and cried, "There goes Mr. Amner, that makes so many balls." He hearing them, looked up, saying:—"You rascals, I know you well enough; but if I had you here, I'd kick you down stairs!" The English have certainly brought the art of water-color painting to an extraordinary degree of perfection. There are some fine specimens at Clapp & Co.'s, next door to us. We see, by the way, that one of Turner's water-color sketches lately brought 255 guineas in London. The Chinese are sharp satirists. Of a great blusterer pretending to bravery, they say, "He is cutting off a hen's head with a battle-axe," and call him also a "paper tiger." Mr. Solly, the eminent writer on the formation and action of the brain, warns students against excesses in the use of tobacco and smoking as leading to organic disease of the brain. M. Queletec, a famous French physician, gives it as his opinion, that communities seem to be under the influence of unchangeable laws as much as individuals. In communities, man commits the same number of murders each year, and does it with the same weapons. We might enumerate, beforehand, how many individuals will imbue their hands in the blood of their kind, how many will forge, how many poison; very nearly as we enumerate, beforehand, how many births and deaths will take place."

ADVANTAGES OF POLITENESS.

An elderly lady passing down a busy street in New Haven, was overtaken by a sudden shower. She was some distance from any acquaintance, and had no umbrella. She was deliberating what to do, when a pleasant voice beside her said:—"Will you take my umbrella, madam?" The speaker was a boy perhaps ten years old. "Thank you," said the lady, "I'm afraid you will get wet." "Never mind me, ma'am; I am but a boy, and you are a lady." "But perhaps you will accompany me to a friend's, and then I shall not find it necessary to rob you." The boy did so, and received the thanks of the lady, and departed. Two years rolled away. The lady often related the circumstance, and often wondered what had become of her friend, but little thinking ever to see him again. In the dull season of the year this boy was thrown out of employment, and the circumstance coming to the knowledge of this lady, she gave him a good home till March, when she introduced him to a good situation. Verily, kindness seldom goes unrequited, even in this world.—New Haven Palladium.

Choice Miscellany.

A FATHER SAVED.

An intelligent, wealthy man, who did not drink in society, nor habitually at home, had a room in his mansion, in which, as often as three or four times a year, he would gorge himself with liquor. When he found his craving for rum coming on, he would lock himself in that room until "the scale" was finished. The appearance of this room at the close of one of these spree was disgustingly filthy. A friend, who knew his habits, remonstrated with him, but was told reform was impossible, so irresistible was his craving for rum at certain times. His friend begged him to try. His two sons (fifteen and seventeen years of age) earnestly pressed the appeal. At last the man consented to try, and drawing from his pocket a key, said to his elder son: "Here is the key to the liquor-closet; will you take it, and promise me, on no condition, and for no violence with which I may threaten you, to give it up when I demand it?" The boy, knowing how furious his father was on these occasions, declined the trust. The father then asked the younger son (a boy of uncommon nerve) the same question, and he promptly replied, "I will." For a few weeks things went on smoothly; but one day the father came home at an unusual hour. His manner betokened that his appetite was gnawing and craving. He called his younger son, and demanded the key to the liquor-closet, but was firmly refused. The refusal maddened him, and, seizing some weapon, he sprang at his son. For a moment he stood over him with glaring eyes, and insane with rage, but the young hero never quailed. Fixing his firm but tearful eyes on his father, he said:—"Father, I promised you that I would not give you that key, no matter what violence you might threaten; and now you may kill me, but I will never give you that key!" Instantly the weapon dropped from the man's hand, and as he himself expressed it, "The appetite for liquor seemed to abandon me, before the noble firmness of my son." He was reclaimed, and never fell; his cure was radical and thorough.—Watchman and Reflector.

ZOUAVE BRAVERY.

The following incident occurred in an Algerian campaign. In the attack on a village, the enemy held a small redoubt, to take which became of vital importance to the French. The enclosure was a loop-holed wall about seven feet high, from inside of which some forty or fifty Arabs shot down the French as fast as they could load and fire. A hundred men of the Zouaves were ordered to assault the place. They attempted three times to do so, but failed each time. Their captain was killed, and both their officers wounded, while nearly a third of their number were placed hors du combat. Every man who attempted to get over the wall was killed on the spot, and the remainder of the party began to show symptoms of hesitation. Perceiving this, a young sergeant turned round to his comrades and said, "Take me on your shoulders and throw me over the wall. I shall be killed, but the rest of the men will scramble after me somehow, in spite of the bullets." This, after some remonstrance, was done. The man was thrown over; and, in less time than it takes to write these lines, his companions followed him in, and held possession of the place. Strange to say, the sergeant, though severely wounded, was not killed. Some six months after this event, I hear he has been promoted, and has also had the cross of the legion of honor conferred upon him. I wonder what would have become of such a sergeant in England!—Household Words.

THE BIG AND LITTLE QUEUES.

A very keen observer, then and long afterwards a Senator of the United States, once told me that at this period all the barbers in Washington were Federalists, and he imputed it to the fact that the leaders of that party in Congress wore powder and long queues, and of course had them dressed every day by the barber. The Democrats, on the contrary, wore short hair, or at least small queues, tied up carelessly with a ribbon, and therefore gave little encouragement to the tonsorial art. One day the narrator told me, while he was being shaved by the leading barber of the city—who was, of course, a Federalist—the latter suddenly and vehemently burst out against the nomination of Madison for the presidency by the Democratic party, which had that morning been announced:

"Dear me!" said the barber, "surely this country is doomed to disgrace and shame! What presidents we might have, sir! Just look at Daggett, of Connecticut, and Stockton, of New Jersey! What queues they have got, sir!—as big as your wrist, and powdered every day, sir, like real gentlemen as they are! Such men, sir, would confer dignity upon the chief magistracy; but this little Jim Madison, with a queue no bigger than a pipe-stem—sir, it is enough to make a man forswear his country!"—Goodrich's Recollections.

A PRISON INCIDENT.

The recent tragedy in the Massachusetts State Prison brings to mind an anecdote we have heard related of Col. Austin, when he was warden of the prison. One of the convicts who was employed in the barber's shop, had threatened he would murder the warden on the first opportunity. The threat came to the ears of Mr. Austin, who immediately proceeded to the barber's shop, placed himself in the chair, and ordered the convict to shave him. The fellow immediately proceeded to his work, and shaved the colonel very handsomely. After the process was over, the warden addressed the convict, told him he had heard of the threat, made by him that he would take the warden's life on the first opportunity that offered, and he had given him a chance to do it, but he was afraid to. "Now," said the colonel, "don't let me hear any more threats from you about taking the life of any one; for you know you dare not do it, and you know also that I am not to be frightened at any threat you may make." The convict was completely cowed, and never afterwards was a threat heard from him.—Portland Advertiser.

A GOOD SHOT.

Among the most active and daring of Marion's men were Robert Simons and William Withers. They had been sent together on some confidential expedition, and while resting at noon for refreshment, Withers, a practised shot, was examining his pistols to see if they were in good order, while Simons sat near him, either reading or in a reverie. "Boh," said Withers, "if you had not that bump on the bridge of your nose, you would be a likely young fellow."—"Do you think so?" said Simons, listlessly. "Yes," said Withers, "I think I can shoot off that ugly bump on your nose. Shall I shoot?"—"Shoot!" said Simons; and crack went the pistol. The ball could not have been better aimed; it struck the projecting bridge, demolished it forever, and henceforth Simons was the ugliest man in the army.—Mobile Herald.

Editorial Melange.

Mrs. C. T. Smith (formerly Miss Maria Barton) took a benefit at the Troy Adelphi, lately, when somebody threw upon the stage a sealed envelope containing $200. — It is amusing to hear a man who made his first ten thousand by a mere accident in speculation, now win over the want of business tact in the young men of the present day. — The New York Mirror says it is estimated that one of the rich men of that city has now a regular income of $3000 a day, or about $1,100,000 per year. — Washington Irving relates that Abdallah, the father of Mahomet, the prophet, was so beautiful that no less than two hundred Arab maidens died of broken hearts the night he was married to Amina. How fortunate for young ladies that we have no such beauties at the present day! — The editor of the Athens (Ga.) Banner, Mr. James A. Sledge, had the good luck to get married, a short time since, whereupon his democratic friends about Athens presented to him a beautiful tea service. — Oak is stronger than iron—both pieces being equal in weight! — The Springfield (Illinois) Register records that there are but twelve marriageable females now in that city, eleven of whom are engaged, and advertises for "more female help." — The attention of a beautiful little girl being called to a rose bush, on whose topmost stem the eldest rose was fading, but below and around which three beautiful crimson buds were just unfolding their charms, she artlessly exclaimed to her brother: "See, Willie, these little buds have just awakened to kiss their mother before she dies!" — A law in Kentucky allows any widow who has a child between six and eighteen years of age to vote in school district meetings. — At Rochester, N. Y., lately, a harmless crazy woman seized the contribution box as it was passed in church, and emptied the contents into her bosom. The collector was nonplussed, but several ladies came to his aid, and the specie was mostly recovered. — With a trade between the United States, the West Indies and South America, amounting to about ninety millions of dollars annually, we have not a single steamer employed in that direction. An effort is now making to supply this deficiency. — In a capital article on stammering, we find that one man out of every two thousand five hundred stammers, while only one woman in twenty thousand has the same fault. — Ex-Sheriff Crocker, of Utica, N. Y., had his pocket picked of $50 in the cars, a few days ago. The next week he received a letter enclosing the money and the papers stolen, with the following note:—"Mr. Crocker, they say you are a clever fellow, and if so, I wish to return you your package that you lost last week; but keep your eye skinned." — A theatre was established in Charleston, S. C., 1736, the location Queen Street, then known as Dock Street. — A mercantile house at St. Louis lately received a letter enclosing $1000, without date or signature, with the simple remark, "This belongs to you." — Conscience. — A company with $500,000 capital is organizing at Vienna, for the purpose of promoting mutual commerce between Austria and the United States. — The ship Columbia arrived from Liverpool at New York, a few days since, with 221 Mormon emigrants, about one-half of whom are women and children. Most of them are from Bristol. Twenty-three are from Wales, and some from London, Yorkshire, and other parts of Great Britain. — At the present day, American entury is extensively imitated in Germany, even to the marks and names of our manufacturers. — Sir George Gore, an English amateur hunter, was supposed to have fallen into the hands of the Blackfeet Indians, and been murdered. His friends both here and in England will be glad to hear of his safety, of which assurances are given by an officer of the United States army, writing from Sioux City. — The Richmond (Va.) papers state that the flour dealers of that vicinity are paying from fifty to sixty cents each for flour barrels, and even at that price the demand exceeds the supply. — The English Registrar-General for 1851 says that one hundred and forty-six thousand three hundred and thirteen widowers married spinsters, whereas only six thousand six hundred and twenty-five widows married bachelors. — Accounts from the Sandwich Islands give favorable reports of the whaling fleet. Many whalers had arrived there, having been, generally, successful. — Gold and silver are the only perfect metals known; they are called perfect, because they lose nothing from the heat of fire. Imperfect metals are those which decrease by the heat of fire, and are easily corroded by acids, as quicksilver, lead, copper, etc.

DYING BY DEPUTY.—From time immemorial, kings and princes have been married by proxy, but it remained for the king of Siam to discover a method of dying by deputy. He heard that a certain ruffian had determined to kill him, and disguised a poor fellow in his royal robes, who was blown up with gunpowder in a jiffy. We wonder if he has patented his process.

A PROPHET DEPARTED.—John Sayres Orr, better known as the "Angel Gabriel," died lately at Demarara, while serving out his sentence of imprisonment for exciting the blacks to insurrection. Who does not remember him with his wild look, glazed hat, and horn, tooting from the tops of omnibuses or anywhere he could secure a perch?

LIFE AT THE MINES.—"The Mysterious Miner: or, the Gold Diggers of California," now publishing in the Flag of our Union, is creating quite a sensation. Mrs. L. S. Goodwin has established herself, by this remarkable story, as a brilliant and vivid writer.

MILITARY DISPLAY.—Several fine military companies from different cities, intend to be present at the capital on the occasion of the inauguration of the new president.

AS IT SHOULD BE.—The plea of insanity in cases of murder and swindling has ceased to be reliable.

Upside Gatherings.

Not a single death has occurred in the village of Paris, Maine, during the last fifteen months.

Near Chatham and at Farmville, N. C., excellent bituminous coal has been found in large quantities.

"Civilization of Indians, $10,000." This is one of the items in the Congressional appropriations.

At a recent book sale in New York city, a copy of Benjamin Franklin's "Poor Richard" sold for $62.50.

A European agent has invented a machine by which he can measure accurately the size or extent of an earthquake.

"Kris Kringle" is a late and more corrupt change of "Krist Kinkel," the latter being a corruption of "Christ Kindlein," the infant Christ.

Colonel William Emmons, the renowned Boston orator, was lately married in Washington, to Mrs. Mary A. Weems of Virginia, recently of Baltimore.

Dr. Read, the clairvoyant, who recovered a man's watch and chain for him, at Hartford, by the exercise of clairvoyance, has been convicted of stealing them, and punished by fine.

Epitaph on a gravestone over a boy one year old, in Plymouth burying ground—"God knows what a man he would have made, but we know he was a rare boy."

During the year 1856, as we learn from the Portland Advertiser, the quantity of molasses arrived at that port, was 5,610,465 gallons. Of sugar, 9,384,406 pounds.

A mud dog belonging to Mr. James McCoy in Illinois, bit a large number of horses, cows, hogs and dogs, but no men. Many of the bitten animals have already gone mad.

The Irishburg (Vt.) Standard chronicles the third trial in a case of trespass; verdict, $10 and costs. The case has been in court more than three years, and the costs of the suit will be not less than $1200!

President Pierce, with Mrs. Pierce and Mr. Webster, his secretary, will visit the West Indies immediately upon the expiration of his official term of office, for the benefit of Mrs. Pierce's health, which is very feeble.

A correspondent of the Bridgeport Standard complains that the Gas Company, by pouring their refuse coal tar in the harbor, have killed or driven away all the eels, oysters and scallops, by the catching of which many poor families were supported.

Four young men who recently went to Kansas, have commenced making shingles for their winter's work. They have a simple machine, costing perhaps $50. With this they turn out 3000 good shingles per day. Nothing like enterprise.

There is a class of thieves who frequent railway stations, and, while passengers are seeking for refreshments, these fellows enter and carry off any shawls or other articles which their owners may have left to secure their seats while they were absent.

Eight years ago Charles C. Van located 500 acres of land south of Fort Des Moines, Iowa. It cost, at $1.25 an acre, $625. He has recently been offered $220 an acre, or $110,000 for the tract. The census of Fort Des Moines is 3561, an increase of over 1500 in nine months last past.

Com. Stewart, whose term of command of the navy yard in Philadelphia was about to expire, wrote to the Secretary of the Navy to name his successor. The latter, in reply, said the commodore should hold his present command as long as it was acceptable to him.

Sweet potatoes have been successfully cultivated in Massachusetts. Celeb Bates of Kingston, Mass., raised several thousand bushels last season. He generally procures seed from the South, because it keeps better there, and plants it in hot beds and draws the slips.

A Philadelphia painter has introduced a new and unique style of sign painting, which is described as a valuable improvement upon that art. The lettering and figures are done with pearl upon glass, and they are as richly ornamented as the fancy of the operator and the combination of colors can make them.

In Memphis, the young ladies take public spirit into their own hands. A petition was lately presented to the authorities there for the cleaning out and paving of a certain street, signed by ninety-six marriageable females. It was granted instantly, without a murmur.

Several gentlemen have recently acquainted the patent office with the fact of the success of the liquorice plant, which is hardly as far north as Connecticut. It is employed not only for medicinal purposes, but, they say, is an important element in preparing some of the best ale and porter in Great Britain.

The king of Prussia made a brilliant present to the queen on her late birthday, namely, a necklace of six large topazes, which the late Prince Waldemar of Prussia, who fought with the English against Runjeet Singh, brought from the East Indies. Each topaz is surrounded with twelve small diamonds. The value of the necklace is about 20,000 thalers.

John Bickel, postmaster of Jamestown, Lebanon county, Penn., has held the trust of postmaster of that town for fifty years. He was appointed by Gideon Granger, postmaster-general under Thomas Jefferson, on the 22d of September, 1802. Mr. Bickel has advanced far into his 82d year, but continues personally to superintend his office and perform all its duties himself.

Etna and Vesuvius are not the most dangerous volcanoes in Italy. The whole country is a latent volcano, and will one day find vent in an eruption, which will send the hierarchies, the dynasties, the remaining lumber and trammels of the dark ages, further, higher and wider than the crater of the burning mountain ever scattered its hot ashes and melted lava.

A clerk in New York has got himself in a nice fix by having too many strings to his bow. On the evening of his marriage to a charming heiress of that city he was arrested and taken to the toms, on a suit for breach of promise to a lady at Newark, N. J., and his bridal tour is indefinitely postponed. The injured lady lays her damages at $10,000.

A German girl has been arrested at Enfield, Conn., for stealing dresses, etc., in and about that part of Hartford county. She says she was in love with a young man, and thought he would marry her if she appeared to him in a handsome dress, but, unfortunately, the sheriff had a stronger attachment for her than the "other fellow."

Blessings on Capt. Davids of Janesville, Wisconsin. During the severe winter of 1842-43 he bought of those who trapped them, and kept them alive in his barn, about one hundred quails, and let them loose in the spring. That region has abounded with them ever since, and the kind hearted old captain has been repaid a thousand times for his thoughtful generosity, in the sport he has enjoyed, the delicious suppers he has relished and digested, and in the remembrance of a good deed.

Foreign Items.

The tax on dogs in England, yielded about one million dollars.

A monument is to be erected to the ex-king Louis of Bavaria in Munich, and to be placed in the square of the Obolen.

A clergyman of the English Established Church, over sixty years of age, has been tried, convicted, and sentenced to three months in the house of correction, for immoral conduct in the streets of London at night.

The Russian "Czas" says that "While England, with much noise and ostentation, prepares an expedition against Persia, Russia, in silence and noiselessly, is getting ready to come to the succor of the Shah."

Pauperism in Ireland is greatly on the decline. There can be no doubt of it, for you may see the workhouses in many parts almost tenantless. It is one of the best signs in the history of that fine but unfortunate country.

In Sweden they have so far improved the cumbersome knapsacks of soldiers, as to make of them gutta serena. They are water-proof, and much lighter than those hitherto in use. This improvement in the knapsack should be introduced into the Federal army.

At a recent sale in London, of the late Mr. Yarrell's specimens of natural history, the most remarkable purchase was that of an egg for £21—the egg of the Great Auk, a bird of the diver tribe included in the British Fauna, but long since extinct.

The wife of a respectable tradesman in Glasgow, who had been married about a year, being anxious to present her husband with a pledge of affection, purchased, during his absence from town, a child from a gipsy woman, and passed it off upon him as her own when he returned. The deception was discovered by the woman calling back for payment of the balance of the price.

Sands of Gold.

Life is an outward occupation, an actual work, in all ranks, and all situations.—Humboldt.

It is common to men to err; but it is only a fool that perseveres in his error; a wise man, therefore, alters his opinion, a fool never.—Latin Proverb.

There is a vigilance and judgment about trifles which men only get by living in a crowd; and those are the trifles of detail, on which the success of execution depends.—Homer.

As long as mankind shall continue to bestow more liberal applause on their destroyers than on their benefactors, the thirst for a military glory will ever be the vice of the most exalted characters.—Gibbon.

I will believe in the right of one man to govern a nation despotically, when I find a man born into the world with boots and spurs, and a nation born with saddles on their backs.—Algernon Sidney.

Place signifies nothing; virtue and philosophy will thrive everywhere, provided you mind your business. Never run into a hole and sham company. Let the world have the benefit of a good example, and look upon an honest man.—Antoninus.

There are dreadful punishments enacted against thieves; but it were much better to make such provisions, by which every man might be put in a method how to live, and so to be preserved from the necessity of stealing and dying for it.—Sir T. Moore.

Every virtue gives a man a degree of felicity in some kind. Honesty gives a man a good report; justice, estimation; prudence, respect; courtesy and liberality, affection; temperance gives health; fortitude, a quiet mind not to be moved by any adversity.—Washington.

Joker's Budget.

A man having published another as a scoundrel, a liar, and a poltroon, the latter complains that he does not spell "poltroon" correctly.

There is one advantage in being a blockhead—you are never attacked with low spirits or apoplexy. The moment a man can "worry," he ceases to be a fool.

"I say, John, where did you get that loafer's hat?" "Please yer honor," said John, "it's an old one of yours that Missis gave me yesterday, when you were to town."

"You look rather flat," said the tea-kettle to the pancake. "I would take that as an insult," said the pancake, "but I am aware that you have been steaming it."

If Poverty, that policeman of fortune, who is always arresting the wrong person, grasps you by the collar, throw him off with a joke, and our word for it, you'll be out on bail, a regular Croesus, before you die.

A gentleman bragging of having killed a young panther whose tail was "three feet long," Brown observed that the animal died seasonably, as the tail was long enough not "to be continued." Brown is a sly joker.—Post.

There is a man out West so forgetful of faces that his wife is compelled to keep a wafer stuck on the end of her nose, that he may distinguish her from other ladies, but this does not prevent him from making occasional mistakes.

"Ah," said an Englishman the other day, "I belong to a country upon which the sun never sets." "And I," said a Yankee, "belong to a country of which there can be no correct toap—it grows so fast that surveyors can't keep up with it."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

An elegant, moral and refined Miscellaneous Family Journal, devoted to polite literature, wit and humor, prose and poetic gems, and original tales, written expressly for the paper. In politics, and on all sectarian questions, it is strictly neutral; thereby making it especially a PAPER FOR THE MILLION, and a welcome visitor to the home circle.

It contains the foreign and domestic news of the day, so condensed as to present the greatest possible amount of intelligence. No advertisements are admitted to the paper, thus offering the entire sheet, which is of the MAMMOTH size, for the instruction and amusement of the general reader. An unrivalled corps of contributors are regularly engaged, and every department is under the most finished and perfect system that experience can suggest, forming an original paper, the present circulation of which far exceeds that of any other weekly paper in the Union, with the exception of "BALLOU'S PICTORIAL."

Sample copies sent when desired.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the Illustrated copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, $4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU, No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

STATUE OF NICHOLAS POUSSIN.

The accompanying engraving is an accurate representation of the statue of Nicholas Poussin, from the chisel of Brian, recently erected in the square of Andelys, his birthplace, in Normandy, France. It has been much admired for its severe simplicity, and the bold and masterly style of its execution. Nicholas Poussin was born in 1594, and was descended of a noble but poor family. Although his early masters, both in his native place and in Paris, were men of little merit, still his own genius and industry enabled him to make rapid progress as an historical and landscape painter. In 1624 he went to Italy, and had the good fortune at Rome to receive the friendship of the poet Marini, who inspired him with a taste for the Italian poets, from whose works he derived inspiration and subjects. The death of Marini left him without a patron, and he was forced to sell his pictures for inconsiderable prices. Without giving way to discouragement, however, he pursued, with indefatigable industry, the study of geometry, perspective, architecture, anatomy, and other sciences necessary to success in the highest walks of art. His conversation, his walks and his reading were all biased by the grand object of his life. In his figures he copied the antique, and he modelled statues and reliefs with such skill that, had he chosen, he might certainly have risen to eminence as a sculptor. In his landscapes he copied nature. All his works show much study, and every object introduced has a purpose. After severe struggles with poverty, he finally found liberal patrons in Cardinal Barberini and the cavalier Cassiano del Pozzo, for whom he painted the celebrated "Seven Sacraments." These works gave him a reputation in France, and procured from Cardinal Richelieu an invitation to paint the great gallery of the Louvre. Louis XIII. appointed him his first painter, with a pension of 3000 livres. Poussin reached Paris in 1640, and executed numerous works, particularly Scripture pieces, but he was much harassed by his enemies. The painter Jacques Fouquier had been employed to decorate the Louvre gallery with views of the principal cities of France, and the architect, Menciaer, had heaped it with meretricious ornaments. Poussin found himself under the necessity of beginning his labors by the removal of theirs. He also had to contend against the whole school of Simon Vouet, who was protected by the queen, and against the false taste of his countrymen, who preferred a theatrical and showy style to the classical beauties which Poussin had learned in Italy to admire and imitate. Weary with the struggle against bad taste and unrelenting enmity, Poussin returned to Rome in 1642, and died there in 1665, at the age of seventy-one, after a life conscientiously devoted to his art. Although Louis XIV. allowed him to retain his post and pension, yet he never became rich; his disinterestedness made him neglect the opportunity of becoming wealthy, and he labored more for fame than money. Full of veneration for the ancients, he aspired to the lofty ideal which he observed in them. His drawing is remarkably correct, his composition judicious, dignified and noble. His invention was rich; his style grand and heroic. His expression approaches that of Raphael, and he has been styled, not inaptly, the French Raphael. His merits were due to his own efforts. Poussin had studied the works of Titian, but his later productions are inferior to his earlier in color, because in the later part of his career, he gave his principal attention to the design. He has been censured for a too studied arrangement and a too great propensity to episodes; too much uniformity in the air, attitudes and expression of his figures; an excessive fullness in his drapery, and too small proportions in his figures, faults which may have been owing to his close imitations of his favorite antiques. But notwithstanding these faults, Poussin ranks as high as many of the celebrated Italian masters. Among his most celebrated works are the Seven Sacraments, the Deluge, Germanicus, the Captive of Jerusalem, the Plague of the Philistines, Rebecca, the Adulteress, the Infant Moses, Moses bringing Water from the Rock, the Worship of the Golden Calf, John Baptizing in the Wilderness, and many beautiful landscapes. Poussin not only studied every vestige of antiquity at Rome and its environs, with the greatest assiduity while young, but he followed the practice through life. It was his delight to spend every hour he could spare at the different villas in the neighborhood of Rome, where he enjoyed the unrivalled landscape surrounding that city—so much dignified by the noble works of ancient days that every hill is classical and the very trees have a poetic air, which those who have not felt can scarcely understand.

STATUE OF NICHOLAS POUSSIN, THE FRENCH ARTIST.

EASTERN DOMESTIC SERVICE.

The accompanying picture will serve to show both the style of costume worn by the princes of the East and the manner in which they are approached by their vassals. The potentate herein sketched is a Rajah of Benares, and the young lady is his daughter. The old potentate blazes with gems, and the princess also wears a magnificent head-gear, glittering with diamonds. An attendant, reverently kneeling, is proffering a basket of flowers—"sweets to the sweet!"—while another is seated on the floor beside her, with clasped hands, like the worshipper in the presence of his idol. The servility of the lower classes in the East to their rulers is a striking characteristic. "To hear is to obey." It is almost inconceivable to us with whom the chief magistrate is only the servant of the people, accessible to all, and treated to severer criticism and to harsher judgment than if he had never risen from the ranks to eminence and station.

MODE OF DOMESTIC SERVICE TO AN EASTERN RAJAH AND PRINCESS.

$3 00 PER ANNUM | VOL. XII., No. 8.—WHOLE No. 296.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

CORNER OF SCHOOL AND WASHINGTON STREETS.

how many fine old mansions razed ! how many glorious old gardens grubbed up ! how many home sanctuaries profaned ! It is very consoling, however, to reflect that this is all right, and that we are accomplishing our "manifest destiny," etc.; and it is really refreshing to know that if Washington Street, from Cornhill to School Street, has undergone many changes, it has not fallen into the hands of Goths and Vandals. On the contrary, it has become a Paternoster Row ; it numbers its busy presses by hundreds, and sends forth its books by millions, to gladden hounds and hearts throughout our wide continent. But to return to the prominent feature in our picture. The old store is a very ancient edifice—its erection not being chronicled by the memory of that mysterious personage, the "oldest inhabitant." We will not venture to say that it was built by the Rev. Mr. Blackstone, when he used to farm it in Boston ; and as for the story that Roman coins and arms once belonging to the Vikings having been dug up in the cellar, we utterly repudiate the tale as fiction. Probably it always stood there. But to be serious, there are those living who remember the old store as a hospitable mansion, where plenty crowned the board, where merry meetings were held, where stately dames and stately cavaliers trod the mazes of the minuet de la cour, and scattered smiles and hair-powder all around them. Years afterwards, when stately dame and cavalier were resting in the old King's Chapel burying-ground, it was occupied as a bookstore by several well-known firms, among them, Messrs. Benjamin Perkins & Co., and Carter Hurdock & Co. There came Allen H. Ticknor, and subsequently, the present occupants, whose publications are so widely disseminated. The works of De Quincey, Longfellow, Hawthorne, Whittier, Holmes, Kingsley, Reade, Browning, and many other celebrities, are published at this corner. Here congregate, especially on Saturdays, a score of authors worth peeping at any time. A friend of ours, strolling about the premises, one winter day, saw, in the space of a couple of hours, the authors of "Pendennis," "Hyperion," the "Biglow Papers," "Six Months in Italy," "Views on Foot," "Ferdinand and Isabella," and "Pencillings by the Way." Among the large sales of Ticknor & Fields's publications, we may instance 40,000 of "Hiawatha," 20,000 of Mrs. Mowatt's "Autobiography," and perhaps 60,000 volumes of De Quincey's writings. Among the new projects now on the tapis at the old corner, we notice a splendid "Household Edition" of the Waverley novels. Among what we may call the gem-books recently issued from this establishment, we may mention the beautiful pocket editions of Longfellow's and Tennyson's Poems complete, the former in two volumes and the latter in a single volume. We learn from inquiry that it is the intention of the publishers to follow up these editions with similar ones of the most popular poets. The success of Messrs. Ticknor & Fields is a gratifying fact, for all their books are of a sterling character. They never descend to clap-trap, and never sacrifice their own judgment to pander to a false taste. Those who have doubted that a correct literary taste existed in this country, will be silenced by the success of this house, with its prodigious sales.

ANTIQUE BUILDING, CORNER OF SCHOOL AND WASHINGTON STREETS, BOSTON.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—ON—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCRIBE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XXIV.—[CONTINUED.]

Juan was already flying away from the dreary place, when Senor Garambo della Spada cried from the window: "Stop him! stop him!"

At this cry, all the merchants left their shops, and those who stood at their doors pointed their fingers at Juan, who sped along, hearing the cry: "Stop him! stop him!"

But Juan turned suddenly down a little street on the right, then into another on the left, and had already a long start of the citizens and alguazils who pursued him. Young, active, and urged on by fear, which gives wings, he would have perhaps escaped them, but he unfortunately did not know the city, and after a few minutes' rapid run, he turned towards a wide street, the finest in the city of Alcala, pursued then only by the citizens, and was thinking himself saved, when, at the foot of the street, he met a body of alguazils, who, better acquainted with the localities, had headed him off. Then, like a stag at bay when the pitiless hunters and dogs surround him, poor Juan looked despairingly around him. No side street by which he could escape; only face to face with him a vast court, whose iron gate was open; at the end of the court a magnificent building, resembling a palace. On the front was written in letters of gold on black marble, these words: "Convent of the reverend fathers of the faith."

Without reflecting, without asking if he was not escaping his enemies to fall into the power of Charybdis or Scylla, Juan ran into the court of the convent, closed the grating behind him, and cried to some monks who were going from the refectory:

"An asylum—an asylum! Save me!"

"Fear nothing," said one of them, who, under an air of good nature, hid a cunning eye and wicked smile; "this convent is an asylum, and the brother Escobar will not permit its privileges to be violated."

At that moment, the citizens and alguazils arrived, out of breath, and stopped on the outside of the grating.

"Deliver us the prisoner!"

"What has he done, my brothers?" said Escobar to the citizens.

They looked at each other and answered:

"We know nothing, but he is either a thief or a murderer."

"No—he is more than that, my brothers," said the chief of the alguazils; "he is a heretic—he is a Moor!"

"Who demands the right of an asylum," said Escobar.

"But he is reclaimed by the archbishop Ribeira, patriarch of Valencia, who has promised a hundred ducats to any one who will capture him, dead or alive."

"What does the archbishop wish to do with him?"

"Convert him to the Catholic faith."

"And we also," answered Escobar, with proud humility; "we can, thanks to Heaven, we can boast of some conversions, and this last is not above our powers."

"No," quickly replied the alguazil, like a man who feared he was losing some of his property; "the latter belongs to my lord; he must be converted by him. He commenced it."

"In that case, my brother, the commencement is nothing, the finishing is all, and senior has not come to that."

"But he is a heretic, a miscreant, who fled from him."

"To escape the tortures and bad treatment they made me suffer," cried Juan.

"You hear him, my brothers," said Escobar, in a paternal tone of voice. "I am no longer astonished at the number of conversions they register at Valencia, if to obtain them they use such means. It is not by violence that we force the sheep to enter the fold. The youth came to us himself, and we open our arms and gates to him, but we do not pretend to keep him in spite of himself. We leave him free to return to Valencia, or stay with us. Brother," said Escobar to a brother monk, "open the gates and let the captive choose."

Juan, during this discussion, had been a prey to mortal anguish, for he had heard the story circulated that the archbishop of Valencia had fallen from the rocks at Aigador and cut himself badly, but he alone knew that Pedralvi had bound the prelate, and that Acalpuco, faithful to orders, had beaten with the iron-pointed leather scourge the archbishop himself, and too well Juan knew that once in the hands of the bawdy prelate, he could expect no mercy. So when Escobar told him to choose, he cried:

"I remain, my fathers—I remain!"

A murmur of astonishment ran through the crowd.

"You hear him," cried the triumphant monk. "We did not force him; we never force any one to come to us. Lead him in, my brothers," said he to the other monks, and pointing to Juan.

"One moment," said Garambo della Spada; "you will give me the writing of possession for my prisoner, for whom you are responsible, and who must not leave the convent unless delivered up to the archbishop of Valencia, or the Inquisition."

"That is right," answered Escobar; and the alguazils entered the parlor of the convent, and the merchants retired to their shops; and Juan was conducted to a cell, henceforth to be his own.

The cell was pleasant and well furnished, almost luxuriously so; but Juan felt that he was a prisoner. Here he was to remain forever, or till he was converted and baptized, for that he knew to be the sole object of the good fathers who gave him an asylum. And in his secret heart he felt that the mere fact of his having resisted the eloquence of Ribeira and the bitter torments of Aigador, would make the good fathers of Alcala de Henares more zealous and eager to convert him.

The account was written, and the alguazils departed. Escobar had retailed all to Father Jerome, the superior of the convent. From the few words Escobar had spoken with Juan, whom he supposed a young, ignorant, inexperienced Moor, he was astonished by the depth and variety of his knowledge, and felt that he was not a common man. If he could convert him, what a defeat for the haughty Ribeira, what an honor for the good fathers and glory for the convent! Juan, placed under his watchful eyes, occupied a cell which communicated with his own.

CHAPTER XXV.

JUAN AND GONGARELLO THE BARBER.

JUAN could not remain in the convent with his citizen's dress, and he was told he must adopt, while he staid there, the habit of a novice, and have his hair cut. Juan acceded to the first proposition, but refused the second. It was not insisted upon; they did not contradict him. On the contrary, all attention, all care was profusely lavished upon him. The books of the convent were at his disposal; he passed whole hours in the library of the good fathers, a rich and curious library. It was the calmest and most agreeable of prisons for the young man, but it was a prison. That word alone rendered him insensible to all the cares of Escobar, and deaf to his entreaties. When the monk ventured to speak to him, Juan smiled and remained perfectly silent. They told him he was not forced to believe, but simply to listen to them and to discuss them.

"I wish you to examine for yourself, and accept the precepts if it seems best. To judge without seeing is idiotic, to condemn after having seen is wise. I ask nothing more," said Escobar to him, one day.

Juan was obliged to yield to what was so reasonable. That was the first step.

The works of Escobar showed a profound knowledge, and immense erudition, and above all, prodigious mental resources. These resources were displayed only to enlighten Juan; but the young Moor, who joined to a sense of right a rare and quick intelligence, struggled vainly with the subtle theologian, and above all, against the cause he advocated. Then Escobar, finding that all was useless, tried to frighten him by telling him that unless he joined them and was baptized, the archbishop could at any moment summon him forth and deliver him up to the Inquisition.

"Never—never!" cried Juan.

And Escobar, seeing him saddened by the idea, sought by flattery and raising his ambition, to make him consent. But Juan had no vanity, and remained perfectly unmoved. Love, hate, jealousy, ambition, pride, were all in turn used by the wily Escobar, but Juan remained unmoved. Escobar was astonished; so young and not a single passion—not a single bad fault!

Conquered, but not persuaded, Juan returned to the good father his writings. As he had no duties to fulfil, he had leisure enough to dream and study in. He dreamed of liberty and Alitea, and built castles in the air. One day, after walking in the court, he returned to his room. A book lent him by Escobar laid before him. Mechanically he opened it, when a piece of paper fell in his lap, upon which was written, in a trembling hand, these words, nearly illegible:

"Mistrust the good fathers, and, above all, Escobar."

Who could have conveyed to him this mysterious and salutary counsel? Who could have entered the cell during his absence? But no one could enter it without going through Escobar's cell also. It must be some one connected with the convent. He thought all day of the incident, and his suspicions rested upon one Father Ambrosio, a kind of servant who attended to the cell. It was not impossible that Pedralvi, warned by Alitea or by Juniata, had followed his track and discovered his retreat. Juan knew the courage, perseverance and activity of the young Moor. Perhaps he had bribed Escobar. Juan thought to himself that whoever placed the paper there, would perhaps come again; so he wrote on a piece of paper, placing the book in the same spot, these words:

"Whoever you are, give me news of Yezid and Alitea."

He went out into the library and remained some time. At the end of an hour, he glided back to his cell, his heart filled with hope and fear. Nothing in his cell had been disarranged but the book, which had been moved. He opened it and read these words:

"Yezid is arrested and condemned; Alitea is in the prisons of the Inquisition. Think only of yourself; be silent and wait."

This note was written in a firmer hand than the other. He saw that the one who wrote it had either less fear or more time.

"Await!" said Juan, with rage,—"await! remain between the walls of the prison, when those I love are in danger! It is not possible. I will escape at any price."

He then descended into the court, where many monks were walking, and among them Father Ambrosio, to whom he spoke and walked by his side.

"Tell Pedralvi that the wall is the only practicable way. Bid him remember the walls of the Golden Sun," said Juan to Father Ambrosio, who raised his head and looked at him with a face of blank astonishment. Juan felt that he was mistaken, and the thought filled him with sadness and dread.

At that moment a man entered the court and walked across it. A little vest of green velvet, ornamented with a profusion of silver buttons, covered his shoulders, and out of each pocket stuck the corner of a white handkerchief; his pants, of the same stuff as his vest, were also ornamented with silver buttons, down to the knees. His hair was enveloped with a colored handkerchief; he carried in his hand a barber's tray, in which were razors, brushes, combs and some soap.

"It is Gongarello!" exclaimed Juan to himself; and scarcely knowing what he was doing, he ran towards him.

The barber, just opening the gate, looked up and made him a gesture which seemed to say, "Silence, or you are lost!" He inquired in a careless manner, pointing to Gongarello, who he was and what he had to do there. And he learned that Gongarello, formerly so persecuted by the Dominicans and by the Inquisition, had now the practice of the convent; for the Dominicans, to be distinguished from other religious orders, had the head closely shaved, and each brother conformed to this rule, except the superior and priest. Thus every two days Gongarello presented himself either before or after vespers at the cell of Escobar or Father Jerome, there to shave all who needed it. All was explained to Juan. He had never seen Gongarello, for that was the hour he spent in the library; but the barber had seen him, or heard of his adventure in the city of Alcala de Henares. The barber had made use of the time, when left alone, to write the few hasty words.

The next day, Juan did not go to the library, but saw the barber enter the cell of Escobar, who, almost as if in defiance, got up and closed the door leading into his cell. He did not hear Escobar tell the barber that the young brother staid to work. The next day he dared not absent himself from the library, for fear of exciting suspicions. He made up his mind.

"My father," said he, to Escobar, "I have refused for many days to allow my beard to be cut. I think I was wrong, and have altered my mind."

"A marvel!" cried Escobar, with joy. "The good grain commences to sprout. You have some good thought for us. Tomorrow your wish shall be executed."

Juan did not sleep all that night. At last the hour arrived, and Escobar left his cell, and Juan found himself alone in his own. He waited impatiently there for the entrance of the barber. Steps sounded in the corridor. He heard Escobar's chamber door open; and in his impatience, he ran to open his own, and his joyous face grew sad when he saw Escobar, who said:

"The reverend father Jerome expects you at half past two in his oratory. He desires to speak with you."

"Upon what subject, my father?"

"We have got half an hour, and for your interest I will forestall the confidence."

Juan trembled with impatience and rage. The father quietly seated himself upon a couch, and was preparing to talk to him, when Gongarello entered. At the sight of the priest, Gongarello seemed as disconcerted as Juan.

"Ah!" exclaimed Escobar; "I had forgotten him. But I will not disturb you; do just as if I was not here."

He seated himself with his back to Juan, and took up a book, in which he was soon deeply interested, looking up only from time to time to see how the barber progressed.

Gongarello had soon enveloped Juan in the cloth, and turning his back to the priest, looked at Juan with eyes that expressed his despair at finding the priest there; and Juan shook his head sadly, as if to say, "He will not go."

The barber, sad and disappointed, still with his back to the monk, showed Juan a little letter he carried, and Juan, enveloped in the handkerchief, could not take it, for his hands were not free. Escobar began to grow uneasy.

"Let us hasten. The reverend father Jerome awaits us."

"The work is not finished," replied the barber.

The curls fell under the scissors of the barber; they rolled upon Juan's shoulders and on to the floor; but the letter still remained in the hands of Gongarello, who, placed behind Juan, was face to face with Escobar. He grew desperate. He left Juan, and ran to a little table placed in the corner of the room to get his brush which he had left there. On this table was a writing-desk, some papers and a large dial. Pretending to upset the papers to find what he wanted, with one hand he raised the dial, and with the other pushed the note under it.

Juan, who followed him with his eyes, lost not a single movement. Escobar, leaning back in the couch, read diligently. The barber, delighted, returned to his work. He had found his brush, and holding it in his hand, began to work busily. At the end of a few minutes of silence, the barber cried: "It is finished!"

"I am glad, for Father Jerome expects us. The half hour is ended; you can see by this dial," and he extended his hand towards the marble plate.

"You are right," cried Juan, with affright, in seeing the priest about to place his hand upon the dial which hid the note, and rising quickly, he said: "I am ready to follow you."

The priest and novice left first; the barber followed behind him. All three traversed the court—Juan and his guide to meet the superior, Gongarello to return to his shop; but before he left the gate, he turned upon his young friend one more look counselling him to prudence.

Father Jerome, shut up in his oratory, made Juan wait so long that his impatience was almost beyond bounds, when at last he gave him permission to enter. Father Jerome was a small, grave man. He looked for some seconds with great satisfaction at the dress of Juan, and, above all, his newly-cut hair.

"You have done well, my brother," said he, slowly; "but I must to that praise add some reproach. Yesterday you tried to turn from his duty one of our brothers, who, thanks be to God, is incorruptible. I have thought that on your part it was some project for escape; I hope that I am mistaken. But if such is your idea, I must tell you some of the dangers to which you expose yourself."

"I hear you, my father," said Juan, almost wild at the tone of aucton and the slowness with which he spoke.

The latter continued:

"We have given our promise to keep you, but the Dominicans and Inquisitors are so afraid that you may escape, that this convent is constantly surrounded with their spies. Behold!" And he opened a window and pointed to troops of alguazils. "These men constantly march round the walls during the day, and their place is supplied by double the number during the night."

Juan shuddered, for he knew the father spoke true.

"I hope the brother Escobar has followed my directions," continued the reverend man; "and I say to you, do not try to bribe any of your brothers. If the regular studious ways of our convent seem worse to you than the tortures of the Inquisition, you are free; you have only to say one word, and the gates shall be open to you."

"My father," said Juan, who hastened to terminate the conversation, "I do not, nor ever have hesitated between you and my persecutors, between those who would give me death and those who would give me an asylum. I should perhaps have thought it more worthy of you, if this hospitality were not purchased with the price of my liberty and faith."

"That is not so," quickly answered the father. "We have sought to attach you to us. Two months of torture the archbishop of Valencia need; we only ask as much time to use gentle means. You can remain here as our guest, our friend, as long as your safety makes this asylum necessary."

Saying these words, he extended his hand to the young man, and dismissed him.

CHAPTER XXVI.

THE TWO LETTERS.

AFTER leaving Father Jerome, Juan returned to his cell, and to his joy, Escobar was not there. Closing the door, he raised the dial and took from thence the letter Gongarello had hid there. With a trembling hand, and hardly breathing, he read as follows:

"MY SON,—This is the first time I have written to you, and it is to acquaint you with my griefs. Everything comes at once. I learned from Gongarello, who will give you this letter, of your captivity in the convent of Alcala. For having killed in a duel, for having defended his sister, Yezid, your brother, is condemned; and Alitea, plunged in the dungeons of the prison of the Inquisition for being an accomplice in the death of the Duke de Santarem, will soon follow her brother to the funeral pile. I do not speak of myself, for the fate of my children will be that of mine; but while I wept over them, a Christian priest came to me, who is called the archbishop of Valencia, whom you have mortally offended. 'I am a member of the Inquisition,' said he to me; 'I will save your two children, if in expiation you will deliver me the third; he can redeem all. And listen to the conditions: not only must he receive the baptism which he has refused, but consecrate himself to the Lord by eternal vows.' That is what he dared say to me, my son; and I thought I would not dare tell you at first, but I have thought that perhaps you would hear it later, and perhaps excuse me for having hid it from you. They ask more than your days; they ask for your faith; they wish you to be guilty and perjured. Faithful to the laws of his ancestors, your father says nothing. He weeps and waits. But in his despair, he asks the God of his fathers, if that he whose crime is to save all his loved ones, cannot be blessed on earth and pardoned in heaven."

"DELASCAR D'ALBERIQUE."

Pale and almost fainting, Juan, after reading the letter, fell upon his chair, without power to reflect, seeing nothing. For a long time he remained in this almost insensible state; then he revived, and with aching heart re-read the letter. He, who was willing to die for Yezid and Alitea, had their safety in his hands. He had only one word to say, but that word which saved them lost him forever. He was willing to give his life for them, but his soul and his conscience—to become a minister of the God of the Christians! But it was to save Yezid his brother and Alitea his sister.

Covering his face with his hands, he wept. Growing calmer, he thought of all the shame, misery and wickedness that would have been his lot but for his brother, his father and sister. He trembled. A fatality seemed to pursue him, and he cried out in his agony: "I am mocked—mocked and abandoned by God!"

Hardly had he pronounced these words, when he seemed to hear a voice which murmured, "Ingrate!"

He thought he saw his cell fill with light. He heard the crackling of wood, the hissing of flames; he felt his breast oppressed by smoke; he saw the fire encircling and burning an immense oak, and upon the oak, upon that funeral pile a child, raising his arms and eyes to heaven, prayed, and these words resounded in his ears:

"O my God, if you will permit me to escape the danger which threatens me, if you will stop the flames which have almost reached me, I will believe in you, my God, and serve you! I will become an honest man. I will employ my days for all men; my arms shall be ready to serve and save them. I swear it, O my God,—I swear it! Receive my oath."

"Yes—yes!" cried Juan; "these words, I said them; that oath, I made it, and God, who heard me then, will show me my duty to-day. My life is nothing; it does not belong to me; it belongs to those who need it. Yezid and Alitea, you shall live!"

This violent agitation was succeeded by a calm, and Juan could look more coolly upon the fate that awaited him and the sacrifice that was demanded of him. Through his means Alitea would live; through him Yezid would be the glory and consolation of his father, the old man who opened his arms and heart to him, who had adopted him. Calmed and quieted by the idea that he was doing his duty, Juan slept, and in his dreams he saw the old man blessing him, with tears, and heard Alitea and Yezid say: "You have purchased our lives and happiness at the price of your happiness; that happiness our care and affection shall return to you."

The next day, pale and weak, but with his heart filled with courage, and firm for the sacrifice, he went to see Father Jerome, where he found Escobar, and with a firm voice he said to them:

"I wish to be a Christian."

The two priests trembled with joy.

"I wish more," he continued; "I wish to consecrate myself to the service at the altar."

Escobar uttered a cry of joy, and came beside him, saying:

"My son—my son, you do well, and God, who inspires you, will recompense you! The way which opens before you is a brilliant one. Your intelligence and wit will make you revered and respected. Kings will bow before you and consult you. I predict it, and you will see that Escobar is not mistaken."

Juan hardly heard him, and continued, very coldly:

"I wish to pronounce the vows on one condition, and that is, that this very day, before me, you send an announcement of my resolution to Ribeira, archbishop of Valencia."

"This instant it shall be done," cried Father Jerome, who saw in this a realization of his most ardent dreams, the elevation of his order, and the humiliation of the proud and overbearing archbishop.

At that moment, the Duke d'Uzede was announced, and entered. He looked at Juan with an indignant glance, and murmured: "Still him!" Juan returned the look with one of indifference and forgetfulness, and re-entered his cell. The Duke d'Uzede, seeing him go, turned to the two priests with an air of importance and disdain.

"Ah, well, my fathers, have we finished yet?"

"All is finished, senior," said the superior to him, clapping his hands with a triumphant air. "We promised it to you. It is done. The pretended son will never trouble you again, nor cause you any scandal. He shall never leave the convent when he pronounces his vows."

"It is wonderful, incredulous!" cried the duke. "He who resisted the tortures and eloquence of the famous archbishop of Valencia, has here in this convent yielded up his faith! Who has been able to produce this conversion?"

Father Jerome pointed to Escobar.

"You, my father!" cried the duke, with astonishment and respect.

Escobar bowed with humility, though his dark, subtle eyes flushed with pride.

At the time when Escobar was almost despairing of success, chance, the father of success, came to his aid. One day, Gongarello, passing through the court, saw a young novice whom he believed to be Juan. He carried the news to Junitta, who instantly told Pedralvi, who, in his turn, informed Don Delascar d'Alberique. Knowing what they thought, Gongarello sought to warn Juan.

One morning he came to shave Escobar. The latter absented himself, and returned; but upon re-entering, he thought the hand of the barber trembled, and he also remarked that the door of Juan's cell, open when he left, was closed upon his return. The barber had entered then the cell of the novice.

Gongarello, finding himself alone, could not resist going into the cell of his young friend. He hoped to find him there, but the room was empty. But he thought at least he could warn him against the wily Father Escobar. The latter, after Gongarello left, entered himself the cell of the novice, and examined every article in hopes of finding something, and he was almost despairing, when he saw the hook, and opening it, discovered the little scrap of paper on which Gongarello had traced in a trembling hand:

"Mistrust the good fathers, and, above all, Escobar."

The first movement of the good father had been to tear up this scrap. Then he thought rightly that Juan would answer this message, and he would perhaps learn something important. He reasoned rightly. Juan, full of confidence, had answered these words, to be taken by the same messenger:

"Whoever you are, give me news of Yezid and Alitea."

Escobar received the message. Who were Yezid and Alitea, in whom Juan was so much interested, of whom he thought more than his liberty! He had questioned the Duke d'Uzede on the subject. The latter, instructed by his father, had told what our readers already know—that Yezid was condemned for having killed the Duke de Santarem, and Alitea in the prisons of the Inquisition for being his accomplice. From the Countess Altamira, whose confessor he was, Escobar learned of Juan's devotion to Alitea. That was all he knew, but what matter! he would frighten his poor captive, and make him tremble for those he loved. Thus it was that he had given Gongarello a chance to betray himself, if he was a messenger.

The day when the worthy barber came to cut the hair of the young novice, Escobar obstinately remained to witness the ceremony. His eyes, apparently fixed upon his book, followed every motion of the barber; he had seen him show the letter quickly, then a little while afterwards place it under the dial. When he led Juan to Father Jerome, he returned quickly, raised the dial, and this was the letter he found there:

"MY SON,—This is the first time I have ever written to you, and it is, thanks to Heaven, to give you good news, to give you hope and consolation. Gongarello, who will give you this letter, told us of your captivity in the convent of Alcala, and the trials that surround you. Resist and fear nothing. Your brother Yezid is pursued and sought after, it is true, but he is in a secure place of concealment, and they cannot discover him, and I dare hope that through powerful protectors he will be pardoned. Alitea, your sister, widowed and free, has returned to Madrid. She is no longer the daughter of a Moor, nor adopted child of Don Juan d'Aguilar; it is the Duchess de Santarem who employs her friends and her credit for your deliverance. You have, she has told me, very formidable adversaries: the archbishop of Valencia, whom you have mortally offended. But she does not despair of success; real and gold shall not be wanting. Keep up your courage; your new family will never abandon you. Resist the snares with which they will surround you; remain faithful to your faith, to the God of your ancestors, and think of your father, who loves and blesses you."

"DELASCAR D'ALBERIQUE."

This letter, which would have upset everything, and rendered Juan more courageous and firm than ever, Escobar read. It showed him how perfectly useless all his efforts would have been had Juan received the letter; but it also showed the cunning monk a way to gain his ends. He learned that poor Juan, disowned and persecuted by his real father, the Duke d'Uzede, had formed in stranger hearts a warm love and a happy home. This letter was the first his adopted father had ever written to him. He did not know the handwriting, then, of d'Alberique; that was a great point. Placing all the circumstances together, and, above all, the hatred Ribeira bore for the young novice, Escobar hastened to write another letter, the one Juan read. For one who knew, like Escobar, the heart of the young man, his ardent and generous soul, his self-abnegation and his devotion to duty, this letter was a masterpiece; it was the most cunning, the most infernal of combinations, a combination doubtful elsewhere, which here was sure. The plot was based upon honor and virtue. Juan became the dupe.

All was ready for the ceremony, but for reasons we well know, instead of giving great eclat and pomp to the ceremony to display their triumph to the world, to publish the defeat of the archbishop of Valencia, the good fathers, with an affectation of humility and modesty, wished to celebrate this grand triumph without noise among themselves, in the interior of the convent.

Juan saw no one. He wept and prayed. On Saint Lonic's day he pronounced his vows, he consummated the sacrifice, believing in his faithful heart that he saved his family from misery and death.

CHAPTER XXVII.

DON FERNAND AND HIS MISSION.

THE grand inquisitor and the archbishop of Valencia were before the king. They came at just the right moment, for the king had heard of the death of the Duke de Santarem, and he knew Alitea was free, and what was more, she was now not a nameless girl, the adopted daughter of Don Juan d'Aguilar, but a peeress of the realm; she was the Duchess de Santarem. The two men came with an act of the Inquisition, which they wished signed.

"Give me, my fathers," said the king, interrupting them in their long developments,—“give me a pen, and let me sign them forthwith; that is all I require of you, senior archbishop."

He sought for a pen on his desk.

"It is always the same, the holy Catholic king," said Ribeira.

"The shield and sword of the church," added the Inquisitor Sandoval.

These words they said aloud, while their eyes expressed to one another this: "Always the same weak and feeble-minded king, who decides without seeing, signs without reading, and who always does what we wish without knowing what he does."

The king, who signed rarely and wrote never, had to search for a long time for the pen, and while doing so, his eye ran over the paper before him, and he saw that the name of this fugitive whom he was dooming to the dungeons and tortures of the Inquisition was Juan Sevilla.

"Juan—Sevilla!" he repeated to himself, and that name, which was not unknown to him, recalled to him sweet remembrances. Ah, yes! it was as the Senor Don Augustin de Villa-Flor that he had promised Alitea to discover and aid.

"We have discovered that he is in the convent of Alcala," said Ribeira.

"He is there, whom we wish to seize," said Sandoval.

"Whom we wish to chastize," added the archbishop, with intense rage, for he recollected the praying desk at Alcazar.

"And I—I do not wish it!" cried the king, warmly.

"My God! Sir," cried the two prelates, astonished, "what does that signify?"

"That I do not wish it," replied the king, with determination.

"But your majesty does not reflect."

"I reflect so well that he shall not enter the prisons of the Inquisition; I have promised it. And wherever he may be, he shall be freed instantly; I have promised it."

"To whom, then, sire?"

The king hesitated, then said:

"To myself, and it seems to me that a promise made to a king is as sacred as any other."

"Without doubt, sire. But your majesty knows, then, this Juan Sevilla?"

"Not at all. I have never even seen him."

"Then why protect him against us?"

"Because I wish it!"

These words were pronounced in a firm, determined voice, which resounded in the cabinet. The two prelates, frightened, looked at each other this time with expressions which seemed to say: "I don't understand. What is to be done? We thought him without energy and strength of will; we find he has too much."

The king, during this conversation with eyes, wrote an order himself, and without showing it to the two prelates, without consulting them, he said:

"Not only shall he not go to prison, but he shall leave, this instant, the convent of Alcala de Hencares, where, I am told, he is a prisoner."

He rang the bell and summoned Don Fernand d'Albayda, and sent him to the convent of Alcala to bring from thence Juan Sevilla, in virtue of an act signed by himself.

"Juan!" said Fernand, astonished.

"Yes. Do you know him?"

"Yes, sire. He is a young man of courage, merit and splendid talents, and worthy of the protection of your majesty," answered the young man, warmly.

"You hear that, my fathers. Go, senor. Ah—stay," said he, writing, and he handed a note to Fernand to deliver. "The king is determined to fulfil the promise Don Augustin de Villa-Flor made to the beautiful Alitea. This evening, Juan Sevilla shall be free."

Then turning his eyes upon Sandoval and Ribeira, who had remained motionless before him, he said:

"I will keep you no longer in waiting, my fathers."

The two great dignitaries of the kingdom, humiliated and enraged, descended side by side the palace staircase; they descended and the Count de Lerma mounted.

Fernand, faithful to the orders of the king, galloped upon the road to Alcala, delighted with the mission of delivering Juan. He arrived in the middle of the day at Alcala, and without stopping, without resting, he went to the convent. He gave his horse in charge of his valet, and demanded to see the reverend father Jerome.

"Impossible to see him this moment."

"Tell him, or the priest, that I wish to speak to him on the part of the king, I, Don Fernand d'Albayda."

The porter returned an instant afterwards, and gave him an unsealed note. It was from Escobar.

"Father Jerome charges me to present his respects and excuses to Senor Don Fernand d'Albayda, and prays him to wait a few minutes. An important ceremony demands the presence of the superior and his brother in this chapel."

"The priest, Brother Escobar."

"Is there, then, a great feast, a grand ceremony?" said Fernand.

"An ordination. Listen!"

And at that moment, the bells of the convent sent forth a great peal; the organs filled the building with glorious music, as well as the chanting of the monks. Fernand entered the parlor and waited. After the first burst of the bells and organ, all was silent—all was quiet, but the quiet of a tomb. You would have thought the courts abandoned, if from time to time a distant chant did not come to the ears.

Fernand was dreaming of the joy of Alitea at beholding Juan free, when he saw through the grating long files of monks, their heads lowered and hands crossed upon their breasts, enter from the chapel and go to their cells. Fernand was then conducted to the apartment of the superior.

Father Jerome was there, with Escobar and a young monk, who, kneeling in a corner, seemed absorbed in either holy ecstasy or profound grief, for he heard nothing that was passing around him.

"My reverend father," said the young soldier to the superior, "I come to you on the part of the king—"

At this voice of a friend, at this voice which he had heard for the first time at the hotel of d'Aguilar beside Alitea and Carmina, the monk quickly raised his head.

"Juan!" cried Fernand.

The monk threw himself into his arms, and the tears, repressed so bravely for a long time, burst forth, and he wept, while in broken words he asked for news of Alitea and Yezid.

"Calm yourself," said Fernand, smiling. "You will see them yourself soon; I will lead you to them. My father," he said, to the superior, "deign to read that order from the king, which orders the release of your prisoner, Juan Sevilla."

"Juan exists no more," coldly answered the superior; "this is Brother Louis Sevilla."

"What do you say?" cried Fernand, recoiling a step.

"To-day, the day of Saint Louis, that young brother pronounced his vows."

"It is not possible! There is some treason here, and I protest against it, in the name of the king, who sent me. Is this true, Juan?" asked Fernand, turning to his friend Juan.

"Yes, yes; it was necessary," replied the latter, turning deadly pale and lowering his eyes. "Tell me at least—it is my only consolation—that my sacrifice is not in vain, that Yezid is saved from the executioner."

"Yezid has never been in danger," said Fernand, with astonishment. "Saved by me, and placed beyond all search, he seeks to obtain his pardon."

"Alitea then alone was menaced," cried Sevilla. "Tell me that she has left her dungeon,—that she is at liberty."

"The Duchess de Santarem has always been free and respected. She is maid of honor to the queen—"

The young monk turned paler still, and with a convulsive movement, drew a paper from his bosom and handed it to him, saying:

"That letter—still that letter—take it! it is from Don Delascar d'Alberique, an old man—from my father! He has not deceived me; that—read—read!"

Fernand, brought up with Yezid, knew too well the writing of the old man to be mistaken, and at the first glance, cried out:

"That is not the handwriting of d'Alberique!"

"Are you very sure?" said Juan, while the palor of death spread over his face.

"Very sure," continued Fernand, comparing with it a little note he had received. "It is not impossible to know the other, either. Hold! see yourself if it is not the handwriting of Escobar; both notes were written by him."

At the sight of the two notes both exactly alike, one known to be the writing of Escobar, the other said to be written by Don Delascar, the young monk uttered a terrible cry—a cry of malediction and vengeance, and fell upon the floor senseless. Fernand thought he was dead, and ran to him. Escobar wished to help him.

"Leave him—leave him!" said Fernand, pushing him aside. "It is you who have killed him, and I knew well, my fathers, that there was some treason, for which you shall answer before God and men. But Juan is free, and by the king's orders. I will lead him away as soon as he is able to be moved."

"He shall not go from here!" cried Father Jerome, placing himself between Fernand and his friend. "The king had power over Juan, but he has none over Brother Louis Sevilla, monk of this convent, and who depends only on me, his superior." Then, addressing several monks who had run to the spot upon hearing the noise: "Raise him and carry him to his cell."

"I will not allow it!" cried Fernand.

"Violence will be useless," replied the superior, "and will only harm yourself, senor cavalier."

Fernand understood only too well that the monk was right, and he said:

"I protest, at least, against the deception and treason, of which he is the victim; I protest against the vows, which are null and void."

"Which are regular," said Escobar, while they bore away Sevilla; "these vows were not forced upon him; they were solicited by him. He was here a month and a half."

"He was here as a prisoner; he was here hardly two months, and a year is required for a novice."

"A year at the most; three months at the least."

"Well," cried Fernand, with rage, "you contradict yourself; you yourself have acknowledged that he was here only a month and a half—"

"And two months in the 'Work of the Redemption,' as is attested by the archbishop of Valencia. That makes, if I am not mistaken, three months and a half of noviciate; that is, then, fifteen days too much."

Fernand, beside himself, seized the monk to strangle him.

"Do so, my brother," cried Escobar, with angelic resignation; "for I see that it will be more easy for you to strangle me than to answer me."

Fernand, suffocated with rage, rushed to the gate, sprang on his horse, and sped on wildly to Madrid.

CHAPTER XXVIII.

THE SUPPER.

JUAN SEVILLA remained for a long time without any consciousness. When he recovered his senses,—when he saw the walls of his cell, the cross, the praying desk, and, above all, Father Jerome beside his bed, he cried out with terror:

"Fernand—Fernand! where are you? Fernand, do not abandon me!"

"He is not here," said the monk.

"It is not possible! He would not leave me in the midst of my enemies."

"Of your brothers," said the superior, piously.

"You my brothers—you whom I renounce and whom I detest! Vows!—you, more cunning and more cruel than Ribeira himself; for he only employed violence, and you have used treason. I could by courage resist my executioners, but how could I defend myself against deceptions and snares with which you and Escobar have surrounded me?"

"My son, calm yourself and listen to me; it is necessary to make known to you the eternal truth."

"And you have commenced by falsehood!"

"The end sanctifies all, and we have wished to make you reach heaven."

"By the road to hell!"

"The brim of the cup is bitter, but it contains a salutary drink."

"A poison which kills!"

"Even if that were true, we give you eternal life in exchange. But this anger will cease."

"Never!"

"And when you have been some time among us—"

"But I will not remain. I am free; I wish my liberty."

"You have engaged yourself before God."

"Before God, who reads our hearts and who knows upon what condition I engaged; and if, as you pretend, your God is a just God—"

"Without doubt."

"He knows that I am not with him; he knows that my vows are null; he orders me to break them, and if you keep me here by force and in spite of myself, you will outrage that God of whom you speak."

"Permit me, my brother," said the Jesuit, with sang froid.

"There are laws of God, but there are laws of the convent also, which are the laws of God upon earth. We are on earth now. It is the laws of the convent which it is necessary to obey. No monk goes without permission of the superior, then—"

"If you use force to keep me, I shall employ force to escape from your hands. I will proclaim in all places how you fill your convents. I will tell Ribeira what means you use to conquer souls—"

"And I, my brother," said the superior, with impatience,—“I have but one other word to say to you. You affect to exalt the archbishop above us—to humiliate us, without doubt; but we, also,—we have means of conviction not to be disdained, and for certain occasions we have a system which we have perfected. And I declare to you here that we have certain model dungeons where we place those with care who remain obstinately deaf to the voice of Heaven, and who seek to calumniate our order."

"Calumniate it!" cried Sevilla, furiously,—“calumniate it! is that possible! Does not your falsehood and cunning exceed everything that any one can invent? And you have hoped to keep me among your ranks—to call me brother! Listen to me, for I do not resemble you; I do not wish to deceive any one—not even an enemy. To you and to Escobar, and to all your order, I declare this day an eternal hatred. That oath which I make for myself I will keep. And now that you know me, call your jailors and order them to open your dungeons—"

"Slower," coldly said Father Jerome; "I do not say no—it is possible; but this moment you have a fever. I will send the physician to you and pray him to do his best to hasten your recovery."

He left, and a few minutes afterward, arrived Father Pacome, the convent physician. He found truly that Juan had a burning fever, which nothing could calm, and would last many days, and which was greatly aggravated by the appearance of any of the monks.

One evening, a prey to burning, wild delirium, to mingled rage and grief, preserving reason enough to recollect all the treachery of which he had been the victim, he raised himself. He was completely dressed in cassock and cowl. Enveloped in his robe, his face hid by his hood, he entered the cell of Escobar. The latter was absent, happily for him, for no doubt, in his rage and delirium, Sevilla, whose strength was doubled by the fever, would with his own hands have strangled the good father. He descended the staircase with a firm step, and traversed the court. Night had set in. The angelus and evening prayers were chanted; but, instead of following the other monks to the chapel, he continued his walk to the cell of the superior. A monk closed the door quickly. It was Paolo, the brother or rather the valet de chambre of Father Jerome. He made a gesture of surprise at seeing a monk advance so resolutely to the apartment, a monk whose face he could not see. He wished to speak. Sevilla seized him firmly by the hand, and said to him in a low voice:

"Silence!"

"Ah, you are one of those he expects."

"Yes—whom God sends."

He saw the closed door, and looking at Paolo, who held the key, he added:

"Open!"

Juan entered the cell, and the door closed behind him. He found himself in obscurity; and after having made the tour of the apartment, he said:

"He gone, also? Yes—I heard the angelus sound. He is there; I will wait for him. He hopes to disarm my vengeance; but he will not escape me. God will lead me. I wait—I wait!"

He threw himself upon a couch. Looking around him, he saw a feeble light under a panel in the wall. He approached what he thought must be a door, and found it was a tablet on which was painted a portrait of Saint Jerome, which ornamented the cell of the superior. This portrait concealed a secret door, and which generally was so nicely closed that no one could suppose an opening there. Paolo had not wholly closed it, so that it showed a little light streaming through, and feeble as this light was, it served to guide Sevilla. He opened the door very easily, and the poor young man was blinded by the light which strayed in.

He saw before him a small saloon, beautifully ornamented, in the middle of which stood a table covered with snowy linen, and loaded with rich fruits, meats, and wine sparkling in crystal glasses. There were plates laid for four. The room was furnished with luxurious couches and chairs, and at the end of the apartment stood a large heavily-curtained bed.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

SCENES IN THE GREAT SNOW STORM.

The terrific snow storm of the 19th and 20th of last month will long be remembered and looked back to as a memorable event, comparing in magnitude with the great snow storms of the past century. On this occasion, the storm covered a vast space, sweeping along the Atlantic seaboard and far into the interior of the continent. It surpassed in severity any within our recollection. In the country, enormous drifts, ten, twelve and fourteen feet high, extended across the roads and fields like huge billows suddenly arrested while in motion, and packed by the sledge-hammer force of the hurricane into a solidity capable of supporting man and horse. Our Atlantic cities presented an extraordinary spectacle after the storm had cleared away. Many of the narrow streets were rendered impassable for days, while the great thoroughfares were heaped up. On the next page we present a couple of engravings illustrating the effects of the "great snow storm." The first view shows us the city prison—the "Tombs," in Centre Street, New York. The rail-track in front is partially cleared, and a long string of horses, only a part of which are visible, is just able to start the railroad passenger-car. The depth of the snow through which the pedestrians are floundering, is by no means exaggerated. The next engraving represents the Place d'Armes in Quebec, where, to be sure, snow is no novelty, and where, during the late fall, there was for a wonder a much less quantity than might have been anticipated from the latitude of the city. The large building in the background is the court house. The quantity of sleighs introduced will surprise no one who has visited Quebec during the sleighing carnival. Every variety of costume is displayed, our Canadian neighbors wisely preferring comfort in preference to show. They have many splendid turnouts and fast horses, and the city in the winter is one of the gayest places on the continent. The severity of the past winter has completely disconcerted those weather-wise persons who, at the commencement, enlarged upon the prospect of a moderate season. The usual signs were enumerated: geese flying north instead of south, thin husks to the Indian corn, etc.,—the opinions of the oldest inhabitants, and of several highly respectable Indian chiefs; but notwithstanding the opinions of the weatherwise, the winter has proved otherwise.

SCENE IN CENTRE STREET, NEW YORK CITY, DURING THE LATE SNOW STORM.

SLEIGHING IN QUEBEC.—SCENE IN THE PLACE D'ARMES.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

DARK HOURS.

BY EDWARD HENRY.

Ah, who can know the yearning
Of the sorrow-stricken heart,
As it finds at every turning
Fresh cause for deeper smart.
The hopes long years have cherished,
And nurtured many a day,
By one fell stroke have perished,
Though seeming bright and gay.

When prompted by ambition
To gain some promised end,
Just at the full fruition
Some ruder blast may send
The idol of our being
From out our tightened grasp,
And in the distance seeing,
Have compassed seas to elasp:

Like one in silent slumbers,
Who finds a mansion bright,
Where music's flowing numbers,
And heaven's purest light,
And flowers of beauty rarest,
In spring's eternal green—
From this, of visions fairest,
He wakes to know the dream.

But hope in winning measures
Would point to realms above,
Where ever-during pleasures
And God's abiding love
For him of life so weary
Are kept in precious store:
And though this life is dreary,
There's rest forever more.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

KATE THORNTON.

BY MARY MORRISON.

"Love gives itself, and if not given,
No pride, no beauty, state nor wit,
Nor gold of earth, no gem of heaven,
Can ever hope to purchase it."

"PRAY, miss, what are your objections to him?" inquired Mrs. Graham of her niece, Kate Thornton, as they sat together in the little parlor one warm afternoon, engaged in no very amicable conversation.

"My objections are these, aunt," was the reply: "first, he is old enough to be my grandfather; second, he is cross and disagreeable; and last and best of all, is that I hate him, and will never marry him."

Mrs. Graham's dark eyes flashed, and her brows bent together in an ominous scowl at these words. Kate sat very unconsciously, rocking backwards and forwards, nothing daunted at the signs of anger, while her aunt proceeded:

"You speak like a foolish girl, as you are; you have not sense enough to appreciate Mr. Coverdale, and the offer which he makes you. He has talent, a high position in society, and great wealth, and what more could a sensible woman desire with a husband?"

"Love," replied Kate, rather shortly.

"But you would soon learn to love him, child. A woman easily learns to love a man who is kind to her, and anticipates all her wishes, as Mr. Coverdale would do, were you to become his wife."

Kate looked at her aunt rather incredulously.

"Do you suppose that I should love a man just because he fed me well, and clothed me in purple, and fine linen? Besides," added she, a little maliciously, "I am not sure even of that. I have heard that he neglected his first wife, and that she died of a broken heart."

"Nonsense, Kate! I should think you would know better than to give credence to an idle village rumor."

"Very likely it is not true," replied Kate, nonchalantly. "I should not think there was a woman on earth who would break her heart for such a man as Mr. Coverdale."

"Kate," retorted Mrs. Graham, "you provoke me beyond all bounds. Here you are, a portionless girl, with hardly a shilling to call her own, refusing a man like Mr. Coverdale. What is left for you, but teaching or some other drudgery, or marriage? What have you to give Mr. Coverdale, in comparison to that which he offers you?"

"Youth, some little beauty, and a heart," said Kate, rising as she spoke. "There he comes, now, aunt; and mind what you tell him, for when he asks me I shall say—No, never!" And Kate Thornton left the room as Mr. Coverdale stepped upon the piazza.

The fire died away from Mrs. Graham's eyes, the frown disappeared from her brow, as she rose with the sweetest of smiles to welcome Mr. Coverdale. The conversation between the two was long. Far from acquainting him with the true state of Kate's feelings towards him, she insinuated, though she did not really say, that her niece would in time accede to his wishes—that her seeming coldness and reluctance proceeded from the aversion which some young girls have to marriage, particularly with one a little older than themselves (Kate was seventeen, Mr. Coverdale sixty), and with that faculty which some women possess, she talked till she deceived herself and Mr. Coverdale into believing, what both wished to be true. Mr. Coverdale left her, feeling convinced that only time and a little attention on his part were necessary to win the hand of Kate Thornton.

When Kate left her aunt at Mr. Coverdale's approach, she sauntered down the garden walk till she came to a grassy bank, where she seated herself at the foot of an apple-tree. The air was sweet with the perfume of the lilac and the flowering currant. The warm south wind just stirred the curls on her neck, and showered the falling apple-blossoms like snow, upon her. It was spring with the world and the young girl. Kate leaned her head against the tree and looked at the long shadows which the afternoon sun cast upon the emerald grass. She thought of her aunt and Mr. Coverdale. She remembered in all her battles with her aunt (and they had not been few), that however bold and brave she had been at first, she had been finally conquered—that her generous, outspoken indignation had been no match for her aunt's wily craft and perseverance; and as a shadow creeps over a sunny lake, a look of careful thought stole over her bright face. So absorbed was she in her own thoughts, that she heard not the steps on the soft grass behind her, and was first aware of the approach of a tall, manly figure by a kiss upon her upturned cheek. The new comer was rewarded for his pains (or his pleasure) by a smart box on his ear.

"Not quite so hard next time, Kate," said he, rubbing his face, as he seated himself beside her.

"You richly deserve it, Ralph," was the reply. "A thief, caught in the very act, must expect a blow."

"The blame is wholly yours, Kate; your cheek must not look so like a damask rose. I could not help it."

The rose on the girl's cheek deepened, and for an instant a light gleamed in her eyes, which showed that she had a fourth reason for not marrying Mr. Coverdale, a little stronger, possibly, than any which she had given.

"Pshaw!" said she, pettishly, as she felt the rising color.

"I saw Mr. Coverdale and your aunt in the parlor, as I came by the window," said Ralph. "I would not venture in, lest I should disturb a tete-a-tete—they looked so like a pair of lovers."

"Mr. Coverdale is not my aunt's lover—he is mine."

"Your lover?" said Ralph, with an incredulous laugh. "What does Mr. Coverdale want of such a girl as you are?"

"To be his wife," replied Kate.

Ralph's merriment forsook him at once.

"But you will not, Kate?" inquired he, a little anxiously.

"I do not know," replied she, for she was in a most provoking humor; "Mr. Coverdale has many desirable things—money, talent, position—"

"Everything that I lack," interrupted Ralph, in a tone of bitterness.

Kate looked at him; an expression of pain on his face made her repent her teasing words.

"But nothing that I wish," continued she, with a voice and look which set Ralph's mind completely at rest.

Peace being restored, the two lovers (for such they were) sat together beneath the old apple-tree, while the sun went slowly down. The flood of golden glory which he poured over hill and dale, was not brighter or more beautiful than the light which warm and passionate love shed over their young hearts. Their words were few. Their very happiness made them silent. At last Kate rose.

"It is time to go in, Ralph."

"Stay a moment," said he taking her hand. "Kate," continued he, gravely, "if a man has committed a great wrong, and is conscious of it, what ought he to do?"

Kate looked at him in surprise, but answered, without hesitation: "He should repent, and if possible make restitution."

"That is my own thought, fair confessor," said he. "Allow me to return what I have unjustly stolen," and he bent down his head to kiss her; but when his lips had almost touched her cheek, both parties were startled by a loud laugh near them. Kate drew back, and Ralph looked around in confusion.

"Don't let me interrupt the proceeding," said a tall stripling, stepping forward into sight. "I should think it might be a most agreeable occupation."

Kate blushed, and Ralph bit his lip with vexation, but both knew the intruder too well to show any anger at his unwelcome appearance.

"Why, Will," said Kate, recovering herself, "how came you home so soon? We did not expect you till to-morrow."

"No, I suppose not; but I did not wish to waste another day at Cambridge, and besides, I did wish to surprise you—surprises are always so agreeable," added he, with a slight twinkle in his eyes. "But don't let us stand here; supper is waiting, and I am more than ready for it. Aunt was wondering where you were, Kate, and I volunteered to look for you, and considering all the circumstances, you and Ralph ought to congratulate yourselves on having a discreet person like me for a messenger."

And to prove his discreetness, Will Thornton strode down the garden walks, leaving the lovers to follow slowly, and before Ralph had parted from Kate at the hedge, he had managed to ease his conscience, and perform the penance prescribed, by restoring four-fold that which he had unjustly taken.

Perhaps it would now be well to acquaint the reader with the personages in our story. Kate Thornton and her brother Will, left orphans at an early age, were entrusted to the care of their aunt, Mrs. Graham. She was their guardian, and had the sole charge of their education. Their fortune was small, barely sufficient to clothe and educate them. Mrs. Graham was a shrewd, worldly woman. She early determined on her course. Will was to receive a good education, and then make his own way in the world. He was accordingly sent to the best schools, and now had just entered college, with the understanding that when he left it his little fortune would be expended, and that he must for the future depend upon himself.

With Kate her course was different. She was to make her fortune by marriage. With this view, she was sent to fashionable boarding schools, and taught nothing but showy accomplishments, and those outside graces of manner which are supposed to be the most attractive to the other sex, and most conducive to the one great and desirable object of a woman's life—a good marriage. A good marriage, in Mrs. Graham's point of view, meant a marriage which had money and respectability as a solid basis. If any love could be had with these desirable things, why, well; if not, it was no great matter, one could get along very well without it. To give Kate a good useful education, to make her as independent as her brother, by opening a way for her to support herself by her own industry, would have seemed a very despicable thing to Mrs. Graham. If she proceeded in that way, it was very probable Kate might be an old maid—girls brought up in that way often are—and Mrs. Graham hated old maids.

So Kate Thornton's naturally fine mind and talents were left uncultivated; she had no real education excepting that which none of us can escape, and which comes from our daily life. The soil was rich, but it brought forth great weeds as well as lovely flowers.

At sixteen, Kate's pretended education was finished—she knew no useful thing, but she was pretty, graceful, and had a warm and affectionate heart. She dearly loved her brother Will, between whom and herself there was a striking resemblance, such as is sometimes seen between twins of one sex, but rarely between brother and sister. She loved still better Ralph Howard, a young man in the village, and it was the deep passionate love which she felt for him which had hitherto kept her heart pure and unstained by the worldly and contaminating maxims of her aunt.

Mr. Coverdale, an elderly gentleman in the neighborhood, had lately appeared as a suitor for Kate's hand. Mrs. Graham had described him well in her conversation with her niece. He had all that she claimed for him, but nothing more. He was mean, hard-hearted and unscrupulous. His old age was disagreeable and unlovely, and youth shuddered at the thought of being united to it.

Mrs. Graham was well aware of the love existing between Kate and Ralph Howard, but she knew that the young man was soon to leave the village, and she trusted to time and absence, to her own craft, and Mr. Coverdale's perseverance, to accomplish her desired purpose. Was she, a woman of fifty, to be fooled by a girl of seventeen?

Ralph Howard went away, and Kate sadly missed the sunshine with which a beloved face gilds the commonest daily life. She felt, too, as if, in despite of all her efforts, an invisible web was being woven around her. She could not take a quiet stroll in the fields or woods but Mr. Coverdale was sure to join her. At the church door, at the post-office, at the store, she saw ever his unwelcome face. No matter how cross or ungracious she was, how fast or slow she walked, he would not be shaken off. She might as well have thought of escaping from her own shadow. Then, too, the reports in the village. People congratulated her on her approaching marriage, and talked of the whole affair as a settled thing. When she indignantly denied it, they would only shake their heads and smile, as if they knew better about it than she did. Kate's patience was sorely tried, and at last she listened to their remarks in sullen silence.

Will Thornton passed his vacation like most young college students, idly lounging about, tormenting the servants, teasing his aunt and sister when no better amusement offered. One morning he came into Kate's room with a letter in his hand, which he tossed carelessly into her lap, saying:

"Just read that, Kate, and see what you think of it."

The letter was from one of Will's fellow-students; the latter part of it, however, particularly interested Kate.

"Is it possible," so the letter ran, "that your pretty sister is going to marry that old Coverdale? I heard the report some time ago, but did not believe it. Yesterday I saw him in the street, and taxed him with it—just for fun, you know, to see what the old fellow would say. To my surprise he did not deny it, but grinned and looked as sheepish as a young beau. What a pity, Will! Is it too late to help it? I know he is as rich as a Jew, but ought money to buy everything?"

Kate's eyes flashed. She crumpled the letter in her hand, and muttered:

"What a confounded old fool!"

"Then you don't mean to marry him?" inquired Will, with mock gravity.

He would have proceeded further, but a glance at Kate's face showed him that she was not to be teased now. He changed his tone, and spoke to her with so much sympathy and love, that Kate found herself doing what she would never dream of, making him her confidant, and pouring out to him all her troubles and perplexities. The counsels of a youth of fifteen are not likely to be very wise or prudent, but in this case whatever they were, they smoothed Kate's angry brow, and she was soon laughing merrily at some conceit of the boy.

When Will left his sister he went to his own room, and in despite of his often expressed opinion that letter-writing was a horrid bore, he wrote a long epistle to Ralph Howard. When he had finished, he looked at it with some satisfaction. "It is the first step that costs," muttered he. "Kate would never do it herself; and part of the proposition must come from him."

A few weeks passed away. A strange change had come over Kate Thornton. Whether some unaccountable whim or caprice, so often attributed to women, had taken possession of her, whether her aunt's wiles, or Mr. Coverdale's perseverance were gradually accomplishing their ends, was not known, but Kate no longer showed any aversion to his society. She never left the room when he entered, or shunned him in the street. When he presumed upon her indifference, and sought to stand upon a more friendly footing with her, she did not repulse him, and only when he offered her costly presents did she refuse them.

As hunters encircle a large tract of country and drive their game towards the centre, and to its own destruction, so did Mrs. Graham surround Kate with her toils and snares; but no hunter ever approached his victim with more caution and circumspection than she did the subject of marriage. When she received no flat refusal to her insinuations, and, innocuous, she grew bolder, and presuming upon the marriage as a fixed affair, wished to know how soon it was to take place. To her astonishment, Kate answered, "If she was going to marry Mr. Coverdale she did not care when."

Constructing this answer in accordance with her own wishes, Mrs. Graham set about preparing for the bridal trousseau in good earnest. She met with no opposition from Kate, who seemed at last to have given herself up to her destiny. But her temper, never any of the best, was fitful and capricious, and Coverdale felt the full force of it. She treated him like a slave, but the slave consoled himself in his servitude, by the thought of the rights he should soon enjoy as a master.

The wedding drew near. The dressmaker stood before Kate, scissors and satin in hand.

"But, Miss Thornton, I should not like to make it in that way," said she, in an expostulating tone. "I never saw one made so, and I do not think it would look well."

"Make it as I tell you," said Kate.

The dressmaker hesitated. Mrs. Graham entered the room; she appealed to her.

"Miss Kate wishes her wedding dress cut in a very queer way. I do not like to do it. It will be spoiled—such beautiful satin, too."

"How does she wish it made?"

"Why, marm, very large and long, trailing four inches, open in front, high in the throat, and sleeves long enough to hide her hands. It will look more like a night-gown than a wedding dress."

"Why Kate, my love," said her aunt.

Kate turned towards Mrs. Graham with no very pleasant expression on her face.

"As long as you have made the marriage to please you," said she, bitterly, "I will have the dress made to please me. If I marry a grandfather, I will dress like a grandmother."

Mrs. Graham was a little afraid of her niece sometimes; though she thought she had her under her control, she was never quite sure of it.

"O, have the dress made after your own fashion," said she. "I have nothing to say about it," and the dress was cut according to Kate's orders, much to the dressmaker's chagrin and mortification, which was not at all diminished when she saw the bridal veil, which Kate had purchased, and which she declared was thick enough for a pocket handkerchief, and she wondered how any girl, as pretty as Kate Thornton, could wish to make herself look so like a fright on her wedding night.

To-morrow was the bridal day. Kate's restlessness increased, but now her chief anxiety seemed to be lest her brother should not arrive in season for the wedding. Late in the afternoon she stood on the piazza watching for him, and the fading autumn leaves fell silently at her feet. At last she saw him walking slowly down the hill with Ralph Howard by his side. A faint color came on Kate's pale cheek as Ralph approached and took her by the hand.

"You see, Kate," said he, in a tone in which no emotion was perceptible, "though not an invited guest, I have come to your wedding."

"You are right, Ralph," was the reply. "I could not be married without you."

There was nothing in the words or tone which could have alarmed the most jealous lover, much less one so obtuse and self-satisfied as Mr. Coverdale. What had become of the passionate love which had flowered in their hearts in the glad spring time? Had it faded away and been forgotten, like the falling apple blossoms?

The morning was bright and beautiful. A light haze shrouded the distant hills, and every tree and shrub was beautiful with the melancholy beauty of autumn. Kate had desired to be left alone for the day. She wished to see no one, and especially refused to be visible to Mr. Coverdale. She wished no assistance at her toilet, and when urged by her aunt, she peremptorily declined, saying that she could arrange her own dress, and should not leave her room till the minister arrived.

Mrs. Graham passed a most uneasy day. This freak of Kate's filled her with anxiety. Kate would have no bridesmaids, but allowed her aunt to invite what guests she pleased. Mrs. Graham would have delighted in crowding her rooms with people, but she had a lurking fear that Kate might do or say something contrary to all established rules of propriety or decorum; she therefore contented herself with only asking forty or fifty dear friends who must come. Several times during the day she passed by Kate's room and listened at the door. All was quiet within. Once she ventured to knock and inquire if she wished anything. But she received so quick and ungracious a reply that she did not venture to repeat the experiment. Towards evening, as she was sitting in the parlor, heartily wishing the ceremony was over, Will Thornton passed by the door, but seeing her, turned back and said:

"Aunt, I do not like this wedding. It should not go on, if Kate had not assured me with her own lips that she loves the man she is about to marry. I can't and won't see her married though." And in spite of Mrs. Graham's expostulations, he strode out of the garden, and took his way toward the wood.

Mr. Coverdale came at last, in no very good humor, which disposition was not materially improved by being obliged to wait outside of Kate's door till the guests had assembled, and the minister had arrived. Then Mrs. Graham knocked again:

"Kate, the minister has come," said she. "We are waiting for you."

The bolt of the door was withdrawn; the door opened quickly, and Kate appeared clothed in her bridal attire, with the veil hanging about, and almost concealing her face. Without a word, she took Mr. Coverdale's proffered arm, and the ill-assorted pair walked slowly down the stairs, and through the assembled guests.

Mrs. Graham breathed a little more freely, as she saw them standing together. The victory was almost won. The bride, too, looked better than she feared; the dress was not so unbecoming and hideous after all. It fell in long, graceful folds to the floor, concealing her feet, but had the effect of making her look much taller than usual, and probably impeded her movements, for she thought she had never seen Kate look so awkward. The tips of her white-gloved fingers alone were visible through the long sleeves of her dress. The bride appeared greatly moved. The folds of her veil trembled with her agitation, which visibly increased—an agitation which showed itself not in tears, but in low, half-smothered laughter. The minister hesitated, and Mrs. Graham stepped forward towards her niece.

"My dear Kate," said she, "pray control—"

She drew back in astonishment and indignation, for on a nearer inspection, she discovered beneath the folds of the veil, not the features of her niece, but those of her nephew, Will Thornton!

Words cannot express the rage of Mrs. Graham and Mr. Coverdale at finding themselves such dupes—a rage which seemed to afford fresh delight to the anguished Will. The wedding guests soon dispersed, some sharing the feelings of the enraged bridegroom and aunt, others more disposed to join in the merriment of the boy bride.

When Will Thornton had pretended to leave the house to avoid the wedding, he had only walked a few paces toward the wood, then turned back and cautiously approached the house, climbed up the elm tree by Kate's window, and by the aid of its friendly branches swung himself lightly into her chamber.

"I am so glad you have come," said Kate. "I don't half like it, however. I wish you had let me manage my own way, and have gone off quietly."

"O, nonsense," rejoined Will. "They want a wedding—do let them have one. Besides, they both deserve to have some trick played off upon them for persecuting you."

He went to the glass and began to shave very slowly from his upper lip the soft down, which he called a mustache. He evidently considered it a great sacrifice, for turning to his sister, he said:

"Kate, there is not another woman on earth that I would do it for but you."

"I am much obliged, truly," said she, laughing; "but make haste, Will. It is almost time for Ralph to come, and I must dress you first."

"Well, then, begin to deck the lamb for the sacrifice," said Will. "I hope I shall not be obliged to sit here long, it will be most confounded stupid work."

The toilet was no easy matter. Will objected to so much flummery, but Kate assured him not a single article could be dispensed with, if he wished to make his disguise perfect. Most of all, he rebelled against the wig, the veil and the flowers; he was sure the whole concern would tumble off his head before he reached the bottom of the stairs, and he walked across the room twice, wagging his head to prove his assertion.

"Do pray be still, Will," said Kate; "somebody will hear you. And mind how you hold your fan."

"I won't hold it at all," said he. "I should let it drop, and then with my usual gallantry, try to pick it up, and some of these confounded stitches would give way—just hear them now." And he maliciously brought his arms forward to the imminent danger of the back of the satin dress.

"Don't bother me, Will. Don't you see in what a hurry I am. There, I hear Ralph's whistle!" and Kate put the last touches to her own dress, which was an exact imitation of Betsey's, a servant girl who lived in the village, and was the intimate friend of Mrs. Graham's cook.

A bright pink calico dress, black shoes and white stockings, a gay, green shawl, and a dark blue bonnet effectually disguised Kate. She listened a moment to be sure no one was near, then stealing softly down stairs met Ralph at the garden gate, where he was standing in a blue woolen frock, with a large basket on his arm. Mrs. Graham saw them both as they walked slowly down the road, and wondered why Betsey had not staid to the wedding. The pair went to Mrs. Howard's where they changed their attire for more suitable travelling clothes. They then proceeded to New York, where in a few hours the real wedding took place.

Will Thornton found it rather tedious waiting in full dress. He dared not move after Kate had left him, lest he should disarrange his attire. And it was only the thought of his aunt's disfigurement and Mr. Coverdale's anger that reconciled him to his situation. His aunt's rage, after her guests had departed, exceeded even his expectations. She gave loose to her indignation in words of bitter reproach, and forbade her graceless nephew ever to show his face in her house again. Will told her very coolly, "that he had no intention of doing so—that in future he should probably spend his vacations with Ralph and Kate on the banks of the Hudson."

When Mrs. Graham retired to her room she found there a note from Kate. It ran thus:

"I have no excuses to make to you, aunt, for the step which I have taken. You, knowing that I loved another, endeavored to force me into a marriage with a man whom I neither loved nor respected. Such a fate, thank Heaven, I have escaped! And Mr. Coverdale, too, a man who would knowingly marry a woman who does not love him, and against her will, deserves a greater punishment than the mortification he has experienced to night. I have no pity for him. I have chosen for myself, and while you are reading this I am no longer Kate Thornton but Kate Howard."

It was many years before Mrs. Graham forgave her niece. By one of fortune's strange freaks, she afterwards became the wife of Mr. Coverdale, and possibly her own experience in that unenviable situation may have made her look upon Kate's conduct in a different light. She led a wretched life with him, and found that neither his talents nor his money brought either honor, happiness, or even outward respect.

Kate and Ralph were as happy together as two people who truly love each other can be. Their life was not altogether sunshine. They had their griefs and cares, as well as their joys and pleasures, but they had the satisfaction of sharing them with each other. A true and pure love elevated and refined Kate's character, and made her a good and noble woman.

Will Thornton always looked back upon the trick which he played upon his aunt with regretful satisfaction, and when Kate, in after years, expressed regret for her part in it, he declared it was all out of pure covet at the extraordinary sensation which he created as a bride.

MUSICAL ANIMALS.

The fabled fests of Orpheus are not, perhaps, so wonderful as they at first appear. Certain notes, for example, sounded on a flute or other wind instrument, will cause a dog to set up a lamentable howl, evidently from the pain it produces, either in the ear itself, or the nerves connected with it. The war-horse seems to derive new life and vigor from the sound of the drum and trumpet; and at the circus, two horses will not pace regularly without music. Outrageous bulls have likewise, in several instances, been calmed into gentleness by music. Of this musical feeling in oxen, Mr. Southey gives a singular instance in his letters from Spain. The carts of Corunna make so loud and disagreeable a creaking with their wheels, from the want of oil, that the governor once issued an order to have them greased; but it was speedily revoked, on the petition of the carters, who stated that the oxen liked the sound, and would not draw without its music. Even fish, upon good authority, independent of the amphion and the dolphin, and of the old harper, who, as the ballad has it, "harped a fish out of the salt water," are said to have shown signs of being affected by music; and seals crowded to hear a violin, as we are told by Mr. Laing, in his voyage to Spitzbergen. Scoresby, junior, also tells us that music, particularly a person whistling, draws them to the surface, and induces them to stretch their necks to the utmost extent so as to prove a snare, by bringing them within reach of the shooter. "Gaulebant carmine phocæ," says Valerius Flaccus; which Sir Walter Scott translates:

"Bale-Holker's seals through surges dark,
Will long pursue the whistler's bark."

N. Y. Atlas.

GOLD IN ANCIENT TIMES.

Whatever may have been the source whence the ancients obtained their gold, there is abundant evidence that this metal was admired and valued by them much as it is at the present day. Many of the accounts given in early writers dazzle us into the supposition that the stores of gold in those days were much larger than can be commanded at present. Thus Semiramis is said to have erected statues of Jupiter, Juno and Rhea, forty feet in height, and made of beaten gold. Drinking-vessels made of gold, and weighing twelve hundred talents, are also spoken of. The sumptuous displays of precious metals in the palaces of the great were frequently alluded to; but it has been aptly observed that the quantity diffused among the bulk of the English population at the present day would make a sum total far outbalancing the golden wealth of those earlier days; though less obvious and glittering from being so much more diffused.—Art Gallery.

EASTERN SWORDS.

There have been some curious fancies connected with the sword manufacture in early times. The Damascus blades, and the Toledo blades, have each in its own particular sphere acquired great fame for their excellence; the keenness of the edge and the extensive and perfect elasticity having been carried in them to the utmost point. We have all read of Orientals wearing their swords twisted round their waists, or even coiled up in their turbans, so great was their elasticity; and swords have been made so keen as to cut a silk shawl in two, while resting lightly on the edge. Such, at least, have been the reported wonders; but the Easterns may probably in this, as in many other matters, embellish their stories a little.—Gallery of Art.

Such is the condition of life, that something is always wanting to happiness. In youth we have warm hopes, which are soon blasted by rashness and negligence; and great designs, which are defeated by inexperience. In age, we have knowledge and prudence, without spirit to exert, or motives to prompt them. We are able to plan schemes and regulate measures, but have not time remaining to bring them to completion.—Martyr.

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over three hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

It is all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 1,000 copies.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us a list of subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

WESTERN PENITENTIARY, ALLEGHANY CITY, NEAR PITTSBURG, PENN.

VIEWS IN PITTSBURG, PA.

We present on this and the next page a fine series of views, taken on the spot expressly for our Pictorial, by Mr. Kilburn, illustrating several points of interest in and near the flourishing city of Pittsburgh. The first view delineates the famous Western Penitentiary of the State of Pennsylvania, a strong castellated building, situated in Alleghany City, which communicates with Pittsburgh by means of three substantial bridges, built on piers. It is an immense structure, in the Roman style of architecture, and is located on the western border of the city. It was completed in 1827, at a cost of $183,000. In the rear of our view, on the left, is seen the building of the 2d ward public school. The second view delineates the noble bridge which crosses the Monongahela River, connecting Birmingham with Pittsburgh. It is 1500 feet long, is a noble structure, and highly creditable to the city. One of the famous river steamboats is accurately delineated in the foreground. The spectator will not fail to notice the long columns of smoke which are so characteristic of this busy place. The total consumption of coal for the city in 1854, was 22,305,000 bushels—enough to account for a cloudy canopy. The next engraving represents the Pittsburgh Court House, on Grant's Hill. It is a splendid edifice, and stands in a commanding situation, and is one of the many beautiful buildings for which the city is celebrated. It is a massive stone structure, of the Grecian Ionic order, 165 feet long and 100 feet deep, with a very handsome portico in front. The dome is 37 feet in diameter at the base, and elevated 148 feet from the ground, so that from the top a magnificent view of the city and its environs is obtained. Its architectural proportions are particularly fine, and its elevated position adds much to its general effect. A portion of the jail appears, directly in the rear of this building. Our next view depicts the custom house and post-office, another fine, substantial building, in the design of which utility has very properly been kept in view. It is located at the corner of Smithfield and Fifth Streets, is built of freestone, and cost some $115,000. There are many beautiful church edifices in the city. We have selected for illustration a very fine specimen—the First Presbyterian church, a beautiful structure, with two graceful towers. Another church of which we present a view, is the German Catho-

BRIDGE OVER THE MONONGAHELA RIVER, PITTSBURG, PENN.

lie on Liberty Street, Alleghany City, which presents a very unique appearance, and forms a pleasing contrast with the usual style of church building. The towers remind us of some of the Greek churches in Moscow, Russia. Pittsburgh, as our readers are aware, is situated at the confluence of the Alleghany and Monongahela built of brick, and the only drawback to a residence here arises from the fumes of the bituminous coal, of which, as we have seen, vast quantities are consumed. Our engravings have given the reader some idea of the architectural beauty of the public edifices, but a delineation of all of them would occupy an entire number of our publication. The principal benevolent institutions of the city are the Mercy Hospital, the Western Pennsylvania Hospital, the United States Marine Hospital, the House of Refuge, and the poor houses of Allegheny and Pittsburgh. Among the literary and educational institutions may be mentioned the theological seminary of the Associate Reformed Church, in Pittsburgh, and the Western Theological Seminary in Allegheny City. The Mercantile Library, and other literary associations of Pittsburgh are quite noted. There are upwards of fifty schools in the city, with 12,000 pupils. There are some twenty-five newspaper and periodical publishing offices in Pittsburgh, and the city supports, we believe, twelve dailies. There are two or three newspapers in Allegheny

COURT HOUSE, ON GRANT'S HILL, PITTSBURG, PENN.

CUSTOM HOUSE, PITTSBURG, PENN.

City. A Chamber of Commerce was established in Pittsburgh in 1850. It is dangerous, however, to attempt the statistics of a place that grows so rapidly, and has such elements of prosperity within it. There is no limit to the manufacturing capability of Pittsburgh. Wood, coal, and ores abound in the vicinity, and may be obtained with little expenditure of labor and capital. In this respect there is no place in the world so favored. According to the latest published statistical account to which we have access, the manufactures of the city and

Lake Superior. One copper-smelting establishment, consuming 1000 tons of Lake Superior ore annually, is in operation here. There are forty salt wells in the vicinity of Pittsburgh, producing from 6000 to 30,000 bushels of salt annually. We have not space to enumerate the various manufactures, such as glass, cotton, cloth, chairs, oil cloths, surveying instruments, Venetian blinds, etc., carried on here. According to the census of 1850, there vicinity employ 400 steam engines. One of the largest establishments is the Fort Pitt works, which, in 1853, consumed 3225 tons of pig and wrought iron, producing, among other things, 10 blast cylinders, 10 first class steam engines, and 150 freight cars. Several iron steamers have been built at these works; and from 1842 to 1847 there were cast, bored and mounted here 633 cannon, weighing in all, 1787 tons, and 22,189 shot and shell. The total amount of pig iron, blooms and scrap, consumed in Pittsburgh, in 1853, was estimated as follows: For steam engine foundries, 9230 tons; other foundries, 19,275 tons; and rolling mills, 93,830 tons; total, 127,375 tons. The people of Pittsburgh are largely interested in the copper mines of were 819 manufacturing establishments in Pittsburgh, and 120 in Allegheny City, employing 10,253 hands, and producing goods to the value of $11,883,427. In 1854 the manufactures amounted to $20,990,338. The commerce of the port is very extensive. By means of navigable waters, railways and canals, it stretches its arms to the east, west, north and south. When the various railways now in progress are completed, Pittsburgh will be the terminus of nine distinct and independent routes, of which five will be trunk lines. In steam tonnage it is the third city in the Union, being surpassed only by New York and New Orleans. January 1st, 1854, the steam tonnage of the port was put down at 75,505 tons. The limits of our article have only permitted us to take a passing glance at the immense business of this thriving city. Volumes might be occupied with its statistics and details. No traveller, American or foreign, should fail to visit it, and personally examine it. It affords a most interesting field of study, and unite, a great variety of attractions, in the city proper, its suburbs, the adjoining landscape, the mines, etc.

FIRST PRESBYTERIAN CHURCH, PITTSBURG, PENN.

GERMAN CATHOLIC CHURCH, ALLEGHENY CITY.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]
THE POET'S GRAVE.

BY JOHN CARTER.

Lay him beside the murmuring rill,
While the bright waters as they play
Make sweetest harmony, and fill
The air with music night and day.

But raise no stone above his grave
To tell his fortune or his woe;
There let the vine in silence wave,
The summer breezes gently blow.

But up the harp, whose song of love
No more shall ease his aching breast:
He's joined the angel-band above—
And passed to his eternal rest.

And when the summer wind shall blow
Among the vines that round him wave,
O, may it whisper soft and low,
A requiem o'er the songster's grave.

[Translated from the German for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE FORTUNES OF THE GREAT.

BY E. S. SMITH.

THE bells of Ghent were ringing a merry peal, flags and banners hung from steeple and tower, and the streets were overflowing with citizens dressed in their holiday attire. It was the birthday of the mighty emperor who had first seen the light within its walls, and though to-day was not even the hundredth time of its celebration, yet it could not pass without extraordinary festivity.

Our attention, however, is not to be called to a scene of mirth or rejoicing, nor have we to chronicle the fate of one whose name threw a lustre over the place of her birth. But whatever were her failings, and they were not few nor light, who will say that they were not atoned for by the severity of her destiny? Whilst, then, the sounds of rejoicing were at their height, we must notice a heavy travelling carriage drawn by four horses, which came slowly lumbering along as it entered the gates of Ghent. It was an equipage that evidently belonged to some one of rank, for the mouldings were richly gilded, and the windows were of Venetian glass—in those days a great luxury. But it had seen its best days. The coat-of-arms, which nearly covered its panels, were scarcely any longer legible; the gildings were tarnished, and the horses, by their want of condition, showed that they were not fed by a pampering hand. Two ladies occupied the inside, one of whom, despite of her fifty years, might still have been called handsome. Her face and complexion betrayed her southerly extraction, and though her features were clouded with grief, there flashed forth every now and then from her eyes a glance of pride and self-consciousness. Her companion was a younger person, and altogether more feminine in appearance, but still the expression of her face was of high spirit struggling with dreadful exhaustion. Eight days only before the time we write of, her fair head had fallen in effigy by the hand of the headsman. Outside the carriage sat two female attendants, with a young page, and one who seemed to show to the full the wretchedness which was depicted upon the faces of his mistresses. It was an old man, whose hair was already white, whilst the velvet-laced coat which he wore accorded well by its threadbare look with the faded splendor of the equipage. The time had been when the travellers might have expected similar sounds of rejoicings to greet their cars, a concourse of people and the ringing of bells, and all in honor of themselves. Alas! those days were past. Just once the elder lady had allowed the noise to attract her attention to the street, but her look was speedily withdrawn. The carriage at length stopped, and the page descended to the window to ask the direction the carriage was to take.

"To a hotel, Paulo—it matters not which."

Soon after, however, as the carriage was again rumbling on, a sign caught the eye of the elder lady, and the checkstring was hastily pulled. It was of a second-rate inn, and her companion asked, with surprise:

"What, here?"

"And why not?" said the lady, slowly. "It is the sign of the Helpful Mother of God. We are deserted by all; perchance the blessed virgin will shield me from the eyes of the world, and offer me a retreat where I may close my eyes in peace."

We resume the history after the lapse of seven months. In the window of a small house in the street de la Cruse, a light might have been noticed burning deep into the night; within the small, scantily-furnished apartment whence it issued, were four people standing mournfully around a bed, on which lay some one sick unto death. The elderly lady whom we have seen before, and an old attendant whom we recognize by his faded velvet coat and white hair, were two of these; the others were a sister of a religious order and a celebrated physician of Ghent. The patient we have also seen before. She was a lady whose features still showed signs of beauty, though worn down low with bodily and mental suffering.

"Doctor," said the elder lady, her eyes swollen with weeping, "you say then that there is really no hope?"

"It is a light about to be quenched," he answered. "Human skill is of no avail here."

"There is then no hope?"

"A miracle alone could save her, and," he added in a low tone, "this is not the age of miracles."

"And I do not hope," the lady answered, after a pause. "You told me she would die. These eighteen years you have told me truly all that was to come to pass—all my misfortunes. Just Heaven, when will my cup of sorrow be full! How soon will thy wrath change to compassion!"

There was a long silence. The doctor was the first to speak.

"Heavy indeed must have been the blow which brought one so young as she is into this situation."

"You are right. 'Tis no light matter to have to leave country, children, friends, to escape the scaffold; yet so it has been; she had spoken against the king and parliament. The tiger in human shape, not satisfied with having driven me forth into exile, must also kill my dearest, my only friend. Poor, unfortunate Isabella! death is the penalty you must pay for your devotion to one deserted by all beside."

The invalid opened her eyes; her half-glazed look dwelt for a moment upon the speaker; a placid smile played along her pallid lips; she sighed; it was a gentle sigh, but with it her spirit departed. All was hushed; no sob or expression of grief broke the silence. The mourner had sunk upon her knees, and her face was buried in her hands. It was a spasm of woe. At length she rose: and after gazing a moment on the face of the departed, her hands firmly clasped together, she stooped and imprinted a kiss on the forehead of the corpse. Then turning round, and drawing her figure to its full height, whilst her eyes sparkled, and her whole form seemed dilated:

"Triumph, vile priest!" she half screamed; "add another to your list of victims. Treacherous villain! cowardly assassin! take a woman's bitter curse—a curse," she articulated slowly, "heard by those blessed spirits who are even now wafting the soul of his victim to the courts of heaven. With her it is well," she added, after a pause, "but I remain here deserted by all."

The old domestic threw himself at her feet.

"By all; but no, not by me."

"My faithful Mascali," she said, motioning him to rise; and her grief at length found vent in tears.

The day was breaking, and with a low obeisance, the doctor and the servant had left the room. The old lady had sank into an arm-chair, whilst the Beguine, kneeling at the side of the bed, was offering up prayers for the soul of the departed.

It was high noon, when a gentle knock came to the door, and Mascali silently entered.

"Your grace," he said, "his majesty, the king, is below, and would wait upon you."

"Is his accursed favorite with him?"

"She is in attendance."

"I will see the king; but understand, alone."

A moment afterwards, Mascali opened the door for a young man, richly dressed, who sank upon his knee, as he became aware of the lady's presence.

"Mascali, a seat for his majesty, and leave us."

Mascali retired.

"Veramente, I was not prepared for this visit," said the lady, bitterly. "I thought you had yet delicacy enough remaining to have spared me this."

"I have been calumniated."

"With words! It were idle when deeds speak for themselves. Your latest deed has proved sufficient; comfort yourself with the thought that you need do no more."

"Did you but know—"

"I know enough, quite enough, too much. I know that whilst your friends were shedding their blood for you, you were a base coward, and ran away. I know that you have entered into a treaty with your most implacable enemy, the principal stipulation in which is that I am to be given up. I know, too, that I am your mother, or naught could make me even suppose that you were the son of the bravest of monarchs, whose blood is already tainted by your infamous cowardice."

"This is too much," cried the king, springing up.

"You can get into a passion then yet! Is there, then, a single spark of courage still left?"

"O, I know the countess hates me, and never ceases to calumniate me; but, by —, she shall answer it."

"Yes, I know you have courage to face a woman."

"As I hope for salvation, I will be revenged upon her."

The lady rose, drew back the curtains of the bed, and, with a contemptuous smile, she said, slowly:

"There, then, revenge yourself upon her corpse."

The color left the king's face; he staggered a pace or two backward, and laid a hand upon the speaker as if for support. She drew back, as if from the touch of pollution.

"What, I serve as a prop for you! Away with you instantly. Rid me of your presence."

The monarch reeled towards the door, and the lady's glance followed him till he was gone.

"The miserable creature!" she exclaimed. "And yet he can call me mother!"

The next morning a chapel in the church of St. Baron was hung with black. In the middle stood a catafalque ornamented with a count's coronet; beside it stood the lady in prayer, and behind her Mascali, a page, and two female attendants in deep mourning. On it was written: "Pray for the soul of the most noble Isabella, Countess of Fargio, ambassadress to the court of the king of Spain and emperor of all the Indies."

Twenty years ago an old house was still standing in Cologne which showed to the street a frontage of five small windows. It was the house in which the first painter of the Flemish school, the immortal Rubens, was born, A. D., 1577. Sixty years later than this date, the ground floor was occupied by two old people, a shoemaker and his wife. The upper story, which was usually let to lodgers, was empty at the time we write of. Two, however, occupied the garret. The evening was cold and wet, and the shoemaker and his wife were sitting together in the room below.

"You had better go up stairs again," said the man to his wife, "and see how the poor lady is. The old gentleman went out early and has not been in since. Has she not taken anything?"

"It is only half an hour since I was up stairs, and he had not come in. I took her up some broth at noon, but she hardly touched it, and I was up again at three; she was asleep then, and at five she said she should not want anything more."

"Poor lady! This time of the year, and neither fire nor warm clothes, and not even a decent bed to lie on; and yet, I am sure she is somebody or other. Have you noticed the respect with which the old gentleman treats her?"

"If she wants for anything, it is her own fault. That ring she wears on her finger would get her the best of everything."

There came a knock at the door, and the woman admitted the old man they had just spoken of, whose grizzled beard fell upon the same tarnished velvet coat which we have seen before. The hostess wanted sadly to have a little gossip with him, but he passed by, and hiding them a short "good-night," groped his way up the steep and crooked staircase. On entering the chamber above, a feeble voice inquired the cause of his long absence.

"I could not help it," he said. "I have been copying manuscript, and as I was on my way here, a servant met me, who was to fetch me to raise the horoscope of two ladies who were passing through town; they were ladies whom I have known before. I thought I could get a little money to pay for some simples which will be of service to you."

"I am cold."

"It is very cold. I will make you something which you must take directly."

The flame of a small tin lamp sufficed to heat some water, and the patient having taken what the old man had provided, was diligently covered up by him with all the clothes and articles of dress he could find. He stood by her motionless till he perceived she was fast asleep, and indeed long after; he then retired into a small closet, and sought repose on the hard floor.

The next morning the lady was so much better that her attendant proposed she should endeavor to leave the house for a moment or two, and he succeeded in getting her out as far as the Place St. Cecilia. It was seldom that she left the house, for, notwithstanding the meanness of her dress, there was that about her carriage which rendered it difficult to avoid unpleasant observation.

"Do you see that person yonder?" she said suddenly. "If I am not much mistaken, it is certainly the Duke of Guise."

The stranger's attention had also been attracted, and he now approached them.

"Parbleu!" said he, "why that is Mascali. What are you married?"

"He does not know me," sighed the lady. "I must indeed be altered."

Mascali had, however, whispered a single word in the duke's ear, and he started as if struck by a thunderbolt; but instantly recovering himself, he hastily uncovered, and bowed nearly to the ground.

"I beg your forgiveness," he said; "but my eyes are grown so weak, and I could so little expect to have the honor of meeting you—"

"For the love of God," interrupted the lady, hastily, "name me not here. A title would too strangely contrast with my present circumstances. Have you been long in Cologne?"

"Three days. I am on my way from Italy. I took refuge there when our common enemy drove me forth, and confiscated all my earthly goods. I am going to Brussels. Permit me to attend your majesty to—"

A slight color tinged the lady's features as she answered, with a gently commanding tone:

"Leave us, my lord duke, it is our pleasure."

Guise bowed low, and, taking the lady's hand, he pressed it reverentially to his lips. At the corner of the street he met some one to whom he pointed out the lady, and then hastened away.

The next morning a knock at the door announced a person inquiring for Monsieur Mascali; she had a small basket for him, and also a billet. Inside this was written:

"Two hundred louis d'ors constitute the whole of my present fortune; one hundred I send for your use.—Guise."

And the packet contained a hundred louis d'ors.

The sum thus obtained sufficed to supply the wants of the pair for two long years. But the last louis had been changed, and the lady and her companion were still without friendly succor. The shoemaker and his wife had undertaken a journey to Aix la Chapelle, to obtain a small legacy. It was the thirteenth of February, 1642. A low sound of moaning might have been heard issuing from the garret; a withered female form, more like a skeleton than a thing of flesh and blood, was lying on a wretched bed of straw, in the agonies of death. The moans grew more and more indistinct; a slight rattling in the throat was at length the only audible sound, and this also ceased. An hour later, an old man, dressed in rags and tatters, entered the chamber. Only one word had escaped his lips as he stumbled up the falling staircase—"Nothing! Nothing!" He drew near the bed, listlessly, but in a moment he seized an arm of the corpse, which lay before him, with an almost convulsive motion, and, letting it as suddenly fall, he cried:

"Dead, dead, of hunger, cold and starvation!"

And this lady was Mary Medicis, wife of Henry IV., queen regent of France, mother of Louis XIII., of Isabella, queen of Spain, of Henrietta, queen of England, of Christiana, duchess of Savoy, of Gaston, duke of Orleans, dead of hunger, cold and misery; and yet Louis XIII., the cowardly tool of Richelieu, his mother's murderer, is still called "the just."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

WENONA.

BY ELLEN ALICE MONTAGUE.

On the life of young Wenona
Eighteen summer suns had smiled,
Fairest of all maidens was she,
Dwelling in the forest wild;
Well the hearts of all her people
Loved and blessed Wandessa's child.

Very fair was young Wenona,
In her dark and dreamy eyes
Lay the melting glance of loving,
Lay the flash of quick surprise,
Better loved the braves their lustre
Than the glory of the skies.

Care will enter dusky bosoms,
Care the lot of human kind,
In the heart of young Wenona
Strange it dwelling-place should find—
Strange wherever love finds entrance,
That that shadow walks behind.

Once the gentle maiden wandered,
In the evening's crimson light,
In the skies and in the river
Saw the twin stars floating bright,
Heard the spirit of the water
Welcoming the coming night.

Still without the maiden lingered,
Heedless that the hours sped on,
Heedless that the pale moon's glory
Down behind the hills was gone,
Mindful only of the fancies
Maidens love to think upon.

Hark! was that the night wind sighing
Through the leafy solitude!
Steadily a form was gliding
In the shadow of the wood,
And before the startled maiden
Proud a stranger warrior stood.

"Daughter of Wandessa," spoke he,
"Comes a lover from afar,
Tales have reached him of thy beauty,
Vain to speak its power they are,
To the heart of Mangarraro
Be a never-setting star.

"Moons have seen him dwelling near thee,
To thy people all unknown,
Gazing on thy face, O maiden,
Till its spell was o'er him thrown—
Daughter of Wandessa, give him
Love for love that's all thy own.

"He would of thy father ask thee,
But the deadly scarping-knife
Lies unburied with our people,
And the troubled stream of strife
Flows forevermore between them,
Never to be crossed in life."

Like a startled fawn she fled him,
Yet the chief did not pursue,
Never pausing till the wigwam
Of Wandessa stood in view,
While within her fluttering bosom
Beat a feeling sweet and new.

Never told she to her people
The event that marked that night,
Yet her memory oft recalled it,
And in dreams before her sight
Stood the stately Mangarraro,
And she saw him with delight.

Manto came to woo Wenona,
Often told his love before,
Kindly did her father greet him,
Bade him welcome evermore,
Smoked their pipes of peace together,
Sitting at Wandessa's door.

Did Wenona love the chieftain,
Manto, bravest in the fight,
By whose door the sculps of fifty
Withered in admiring sight?
No—between her and her suitor
Rose the memory of that night.

Through the wood one night she wandered,
Wishing Mangarraro near;
"Ah," she sighed, "my heart would greet him,
If the stranger should appear!"
When a rustling in the bushes
Fell like music on her ear.

Lo! a sudden splendor flashes
In Wenona's dreamy eyes,
On her cheeks the speaking blushes
In a bright succession rise,
In her heart a sweet emotion
Flutters with a glad surprise.

Morning came unto her people,
But Wenona came no more,
Bowing low their heads, they murmured,
"She has only gone before
To the land of the Great Spirit,
With the beauteous life she wore."

But in Mangarraro's wigwam
Bloomed a lovely southern flower,
Never o'er her gentle spirit
Stormy care again might hover—
Love, true love, where'er thou reignest,
Thine is everlasting power!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE PAINTER'S APPRENTICE.

BY MRS. J. D. BALDWIN.

In the goodly town of Bologna, noted as the birthplace of Guido, Dominichino, Guerino, Carravaggio, Albani, and a host of others, only less eminent, dwelt a painter, by the name of Bondi. That he by no means ranked among the foremost in his profession, the fact that the name of Pierre Bondi is only twice alluded to, where the great masters are named, sufficiently proves. Nevertheless, at the time our story begins, he kept two apprentices, and drove a brisk trade in manufacturing oil paintings.

Our worthy artist, moreover, in addition to a snug fortune, possessed one fair daughter, Bianca, who had grown up fresh and blooming, by his side, like a tender sapling from a gnarled and knotty trunk. And for her, it was the painter's highest ambition, as she was to inherit his gains, to procure a wealthy, and if possible, a noble husband.

Born to love, as well as create the sentiment, she stood late one evening by her window, gazing vacantly on the spires of the old cathedral—as the chiming of the vesper bell came in their sweet melody to her ear—but her thoughts were away, wondering what had detained the elder of her father's apprentices—for Salvador usually passed her window at that hour.

Long had the painter Bondi marvelled at the resemblance young Salvador's Magdalens, Cecilias, and Madonnas bore to his daughter—for love-blinded as the youth was, still he contrived that the colors on his palette, when transferred to the canvases, should arrange themselves into a striking counterfeit of the bright star of his boyish idolatry.

It was the eve of her birthday, and Salvador stood before his easel, spreading his colors with a skill and rapidity almost magical, as, like a flower unfolding its petals to the sun, the embodiment of his genius grew into life and being under his marvellous touch. A youth, habited in the blouse of a painter drew by the hand a young girl of a wilder beauty, who seemed willing, yet afraid to go with him.

"Ha! and you mean that for my daughter, and that dull resemblance for your own silly self!" thundered the old painter, approaching the easel. "Nay, not a word. Silence, mad fool, and quit my studio forever."

On a dark, tempestuous day, just one month later than the scene that occurred in Bondi's studio, beneath a tall tree whose tempest-tost branches gave him flickering glimpses of the lightning-flashing sky, and foam-capped waves of the "storied river," now swollen and terrible, sat a handsome, though melancholy youth, with knapsack strapped, and portfolio spread, sketching the darkening scene, as the storm king swept by in his might.

While intent upon his sketch, the sound of loud and angry tones arrested his ear, followed by the clash of swords. Starting to his feet, he sprang to the high, bluff mountain-bank of the river, where sloping downward, it was skirted by a narrow road, bordered on the opposite side by a dense, sombre forest. Hastening down to the path, he saw a tall, muscular man defending himself against the attack of two ruffians, whom rightly conjecturing to be bandits, our hero of the storm sketch assaulted.

"I thank thee, friend, for thy timely assistance," continued the travel-soiled pedestrian, as one of the robbers fell beneath the young artist's weapon, while the other decamped with all speed into the forest; "but excuse me." And he drew forth materials from his portfolio, and began to sketch in the most masterly manner the contorted features of the dying robber. "One must not lose a chance like this! what agony! what terrible expression! that rolling eye, and stiffening jaw! that rigid brow, paling with the death dews, to which the damp locks are clinging! O, it is superb!"

"What are you doing?" asked our hero, in amazement.

"Now I have done! Look at it, my friend. One don't get a chance at a dying brigand every day." Then handing the drawing to Salvador, he pointed with his ready pencil to the ferocious face of the robber, scowling savagely, terrible even in death, transferred to his tablets.

Just as our apprentice was about to question the great unknown, the clattering of hoofs startled them, and the next moment a beautiful woman superbly mounted, emerged from the thicket, and clearing the intervening underwood at a bound, plunged at headlong speed into the path, followed by a score of bandits, all armed to the teeth. On they rushed, and before our sketchers had time to fire a shot or turn to flee, were upon them.

"Yield, or expect no mercy!" was her order, and the next moment they were firmly bound, and under a strong guard conducted through the forest to the portals of an ancient tower.

On searching our worthies for plunder, nothing was found on either save their tablets. No sooner, however, did the robber-wife see the sketch of the expiring brigand, so long her hated tyrant, than she exclaimed:

"Beautiful! exceedingly well executed! persevere, friend, and some day thou wilt be a great painter. Trust me, there's no nobler ambition."

Brilliantly beautiful was that bandit chieftainess. A jacket of crimson, slashed with gold, fitting her superb form to admiration; her slender waist, defined in its symmetrical perfection by a leathern girdle, into which were stuck a couple of pistols, and a silver-sheathed yataghan, the handle of exquisite workmanship, set with jewels; and gems of purest ray, too, looped up the golden tassels of her cap, from beneath which masses of dark curls escaped in tangled confusion down her sloping shoulders.

"But what is this?" she asked, looking approvingly on our apprentice's misfortune-conferring sketch; "this youth—yes, it is thyself—and the maiden, she too, I suppose, is a portrait! Command me to an artist for the selection of a subject! Harkce, sir painter, can you paint me?"

Joyfully did our hero transfer to his tablets the beautiful form and features of the forest beauty.

"There is skill, fire, imagination, poetry in this sketch, my friend. Courage! you will one day make a great painter, but still not of faces—the grand and the terrible is your forte. This storm scene, so wild, so fearful, is a very master-piece. Stick to the sublime in nature, in her angry moods, and you will yet reach the very summit height of art."

"Would that I had never seen easel, palette, or pencil!" exclaimed our apprentice, bitterly, as he thought on Bianca, old Bondi, and Bologna.

A year from that time, all Italy flocked to see two superb paintings, then on exhibition at the ducal palace in Florence. "A Dying Bandit" attracted all eyes to its great painter, Hans Holbein, who generously disclaimed the prize, awarding it to an unknown artist, whose mighty pencil, dipped in darkness "that equalled light," had transferred a mountain storm to canvass with a might and truth never before approached.

"Ah, had that idle, dreamy fellow, Salvador, but painted like this, I had not turned him away, nor seen my poor Bianca pining to death ever since. The man who painted this, is indeed one whose name will live when the nobles of the land will be forgotten."

"Ha! anyest thou so? art willing to give thy daughter, old man, to the young painter who achieved this?" asked Holbein, remembering the night in the robbers' cave, when the young artist who had so opportunely come to his assistance (overcome by his own generous, sympathizing manner), confided to him the account of the scornful rejection of his suit by old Pierre Bondi. On the eve of departure for the field of his future glory, in England, Holbein joyously embraced the opportunity afforded of serving his preserver. "What was the name of the idle apprentice of whom you spake, friend Bondi?"

"O, a poor dabbler, by name Hans Salvador."

A bright gleam of intelligence lit up the great painter's face; he remembered the name, traced under the pencil sketch of the bandit chieftainess.

"Here he is!" said he, beckoning to the storm painter, who approached, when the respectful greeting of the crowd told how true genius is ever honored. The old man bent forward to read the name pencilled there—SALVADOR ROSA. The next day he gave his daughter Bianca to the late disowned painter apprentice.

THE CEDARS OF LEBANON.

The cedars, which still bear their ancient name, stand mostly upon four small contiguous knolls, within a compass of less than forty rods in diameter. They form a thick forest, without under-bush. The older trees have several trunks, and thus spread themselves widely around; but most of the others are cone-like in form, and do not throw out their boughs laterally to any great extent. Some few trees stand alone on the outskirts of the grove; and one especially, on the south, is large and very beautiful. With this exception, none of the trees came up to my ideal of the graceful beauty of the cedar of Lebanon, such as I had formerly seen in the Jardin des Plantes. Some of the older trees are already much broken; and will soon be wholly destroyed. The fashion is now coming into vogue to have articles made of this wood for sale to travellers; and it is also burned as fuel by the few people that here pass the summer. These causes of destruction, though gradual in their operation, are nevertheless sure. Add to this the circumstance that travellers in former years (to say nothing of the present time) have been shameless enough to raise large spots to be hewn smooth on the trunks of some of the noblest trees, in order to inscribe their names. The two earliest which I saw were Frenchmen; one was dated in 1791. The wood of the Lebanon cedar is white, with a pleasant but not strong odor; and bears no comparison, in beauty or fragrance, with the common red cedar of America.—Robinson.

SIMPLICITY OF ENGLISH DRESS.

In the families of many of the nobility and gentry of England, there is greater economy of dress and more simplicity in the furnishing of the dwelling, than there is in many of the houses of our citizens, who are barely able to supply the daily wants of their families by the closest attention to their business. A friend of ours, who sojourned not long since several months in the vicinity of some of the wealthy landed aristocracy of England, was surprised at the simplicity of manner practised. Servants were more numerous than with us, but the ladies made more account of one silk dress than would be thought here of a dozen. They were generally clothed in good substantial stuffs, and a display of fine clothing and jewelry was reserved for great occasions. The furniture of the mansions, instead of being turned out of doors every few years for more fashionable styles, was the same which the ancestors of the families for several generations had possessed, substantial, plain, and without any pretension to elegance. Even the carpets on many suites of parlors had been on the floors for fifty years. With us how different is the state of things; we are wasting an amount of wealth in this country on show and fashion, which rigidly applied would Christianize, civilize and educate all mankind.—Boston Transcript.

A HEROIC WOMAN.

It is related that in the year 1786, the Grand Master of the Knights of Malta sent as a present, a costly bracelet of rubies to Madame du Frenoy, a French lady of great beauty, in token of her extraordinary and gallant conduct, when an Algerine corsair attacked the vessel in which she was a passenger. This lady was in a polacre, bound to Genoa, and the Algerine coming alongside poured in a broadside, and then grappling with her, a number of the Algerines boarded her, sword in hand. The crew were about to submit to the enemy, when Madame du Frenoy snatched a sabre from a wounded sailor, and wielded it with astonishing courage and effect. The crew, animated and inspired by such an unexpected example of female valor, fought with enthusiasm, killed several of the pirates, and drove the remainder back to their own vessel. When this lady reached the shore, she was everywhere greeted with acclamations by the populace. The Marquis de Chateaux waited upon her, and with his own hands placed a crown of laurel on her head—and a portrait of her was taken for the queen of France.—Christian Freeman.

MARSH'S JUVENILE COMEDIANS.

The group on this page, drawn and engraved expressly for our Pictorial, represents the extraordinary company of youthful histrionic prodigies, now performing with brilliant success at the Howard Athenaeum, in this city, as they appear at home. Those who are familiar with their intelligent countenances, will readily recognize the likenesses. Next week we shall present a full page picture of the famous little George Marsh in a series of his most prominent characters. Juvenile companies of comedians have long been a principal attraction in the city of Paris; but nothing of the kind, on this extensive scale, was ever attempted in this country until the present troupe was organized by Mr. R. G. Marsh, the father of little George Washington Marsh and Mary Marsh, who, together with Miss Louise and little Carrie, are the stars of the company. They were organized some twenty months since, a few miles from the city of Rochester, in the State of New York, and, until that time, but three of the troupe had ever seen the interior of a theatre or museum. The principal performers are, Miss Louise, aged 12 years and 8 months, for leading male and female characters; Mary Marsh, 8 years and 10 months, leading lady and comedienne; Master Waldo, 11 years and 9 months, leading old man; Miss Carrie, 9 years, walking gentleman and light comedian; Miss Helena, 10 years, old women and soabrettes; Master George W. Marsh, 7 years and 2 months, comedian; Little Sallie, 8 years, second comedienne; Little Julia, danseuse, and Miss Melville, heavy business. The size and ability of this troupe, which numbers some thirty or forty performers, enable them to run through the whole range of the drama. They have astonished and delighted the most refined audiences, having been for months an attraction in the theatrical city of New York, and meeting with no less brilliant success here in Boston. Master George W. Marsh reached his seventh birthday last Christmas, while his sister Mary will be nine on the fourth of March next; and it is a curious coincidence that the birthday of father and daughter occur on the fourth of March, and that of mother and son on Christmas Day. George W. Marsh is one of the most extraordinary juvenile performers it was ever our good fortune to witness. He has the true vis comica, and impersonates a wide range of characters with unvarying spirit and success. He has all the self-possession and adroitness of a veteran actor, seizes upon striking points with rare intelligence, and makes them tell upon the audience with the happiest effect. Miss Mary, his little sister, surprises you by her womanly airs. It is a perfect marvel to us how a child like Miss Louise can personate characters like William, in "Black-Eyed Susan," and Maguire, in "The Serious Family." In the performances of these children, you would look for something automatic; and might fancy beforehand, if you saw them once, you would exhaust their capabilities. Such, however, is by no means the case. Though they certainly evince careful training, still there is a great deal of spontaneity in their performances. If they possessed a purely imitative faculty, without any creative genius, they could not by any possibility he taught to play the many pieces which make up their repertory. It is because they have intelligent minds, and intuitively grasp the lights and shades of character, that they are enabled to present as great a variety of pieces as are usually brought forth by elder comedians in the same space of time. They have been generously applauded by the press, but their merits have not been exaggerated. One of the happy hits of George W. Marsh occurred when he was called before the curtain at a time when Edwin Forrest was playing at the Boston Theatre. The little fellow advanced confidently to the footlights, gracefully acknowledged the applause after the manner of the veterans of the stage, and then delivered himself of the following brief and pithy address, to the infinite amusement of the audience:—"Ladies and gentlemen—there has been a rumor currently circulated through this city, that I have come here to crush Mr. Forrest; but this is not the case. I'm one of his strongest supporters (assuming a fighting attitude). I consider Mr. Forrest as good an actor in his line as I am in mine. Ladies and gentlemen, I bid you a good night." The idea of such a David championing such a Goliath was excessively ludicrous. We are pleased to learn that all the children belonging to this troupe are healthy and happy. Their acting is like other children's play; they think it excellent good fun, and regard it as an amusement—not a task. They have been brilliantly successful at the Howard, notwithstanding the great counter attractions of the Boston Theatre and Boston Museum.

JOHN A. KING, GOVERNOR OF NEW YORK.

HON. JOHN A. KING,

GOVERNOR OF THE STATE OF NEW YORK.

The accompanying portrait of the present governor of New York was drawn expressly for us by Barry, from an ambrotype by Brady, of New York, and is pronounced an accurate likeness. John A. King is the eldest son of Hon. Rufus King, so extensively known from a long political career, and was born in the city of New York, in the year 1788. He received a classical education at Harrow, England, in consequence of his father's residing abroad as minister to that country. At an early age he entered into public life, and was for a series of years a member of the New York Assembly and of the Senate. He was secretary of the English legation in 1825. Subsequently, as a member of the national House of Representatives, he distinguished himself by his oratorical ability and steadiness of purpose. He was also said to be an excellent party tactician. Mr. King, having acquired the confidence of the Republican party, was a delegate to the National Republican Convention at Philadelphia. At the New York State Republican Convention held at Syracuse, he was selected as the gubernatorial candidate of the party. Mr. King's residence is at Albany, in the old Van Rensselaer mansion, which he has fitted up in suitable style. He is a very hospitable man, and has ample means, we believe, at the disposal of his generosity. Like many other eminent men, whose example he has followed, Mr. King is an ardent devotee to agricultural pursuits. He has brought to it zeal and learning, and the results he has accomplished show what may be done by the union of science, capital and common sense. He has always been ready to give his brother farmers the result of his experience, and his various agricultural addresses are all sound and able. Although quite an old man, Gov. King is hale and hearty—the consequence of his agricultural pursuits. The governorship of such a State as New York is a position of immense responsibility. That State is an empire in itself—fertile, wealthy, of vast territorial extent, and embracing within its limits a complication of interests, demanding the supervision of a head, vigorous and sagacious, and experienced in public affairs.

THE MARSH CHILDREN.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

W. W.—It is no means impossible, for an extraordinary rate of speed is occasionally attained by English skaters. In 1823, instances occurred of a mile being accomplished in very little more than two minutes. One celebrated skater could skate a mile in a minute and four seconds; another skated two miles in three minutes and eight seconds. In the winter of 1838, two skaters went from Ely to Cambridge and back, in all forty miles, in two hours and thirty-five minutes.

A. H. C.—Russia is the great country for bells. The "Tear-Kolokol," or the "Bibbel," are the largest bells in the world. The "Tear-Kolokol," or king of bells, contains metal enough to make thirty-six bells as large as the great bell of St. Paul's, of which you speak—the weight being 40,000 pounds. The bell has long been lying in a cavity beneath the tower of the cathedral at Moscow.

J. E. C.—Hobart.—The Edinburgh Review was established in 1802, and the Quarterly in 1803.

MAINE.—The motion of a shot in ratchet firing, where the guns are slightly loaded and elevated at a small angle, is the same as that of a stone skipped on the surface of the water. Ratchet shots do terrible execution.

G. P. J.—Count Platoff was a famous helman of Cossacks, and distinguished himself greatly against the French during Napoleon's invasion of Russia, in 1812.

B. C.—James Bruce, the celebrated African traveler, was a Scotchman, and died April 27, 1794. His most startling statements—which caused his veracity to be called in question at the time—have been fully confirmed by recent travelers.

F. L.—Belmont, P. O.—Lamarline's "History of the French Revolution of 1848" was translated by Messrs. P. A. Durivage and William S. Chase, of this city, and was published by Phillips, Sampson & Co.

PICTORIAL.—Rembrandt, the painter, acquired great wealth, but his habits were low, and his avarice insatiable. His coloring and chiaro-scuro have rendered him immortal.

REARER.—The Redan is a kind of rampart placed in advance of the principal works to defend the least protected parts. It is usually made of earth, and is the simplest kind of fortification.

W. W.—We do not know of any original picture by Van Dyke in this country. There is certainly none in the Athenaeum collection.

M. M.—The motto of Suvarov, the famous Russian marshal, Catherine's favorite, was "Forward and Strike!" He said, "Nothing is to be thought of but the offensive—quick marches—every in attack—the naked sword."

MINERAL.—The steppes of Asia are, in some respects, similar to the prairies of the West. They are partly susceptible of cultivation, and afford pasturage to numerous herds of nomadic tribes.

HISTORIANS.—The union of the crowns of England and Scotland took place on the accession of James I. to the former.

SELFAIDOR, TORONTO.—The best called unicorn in our version of Scripture, is now commonly understood to be the rhinoceros.

SEVERAL.—Alvan Clark, a miniature painter, of this city, whose rooms are in Tremont Row, manufactures lenses and telescopes. Some of the latter have been ordered in England, and have been highly commended there.

ANTIQUARY.—The "Kit-Chat Club" was instituted in London about 1638, by some young men of wit and pleasure. It afterwards became a political club—whig, in principle. Addison, Steele, Marlborough and Walpole were distinguished members of it.

SLEIGH-HOMES.—We have all heard of the wolf in sheep's clothing, who "went about like a raging lion, seeking whom he might devour somebody;" but a pleasanter spectacle is a smiling damsel, as innocent as a lamb, blushing forth from the folds of a wolfskin sleigh-robe.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.—It is now established beyond controversy that, as a work of the fine arts, in the fine finish and naturalness of its engravings, and elevated and pure tone of its literature, "Ballou's Pictorial" has no equal in this or the old country—and on this account we are glad to learn of its immense circulation.—Musical Harp, Cleveland, Ohio.

SPLINTERS.

.... A jam weighing 178 English pounds was lately exhibited in Paris. Three such would dine a regiment.

.... Spiders' bites have proved fatal in several cases. Wm. Haughton, of Cincinnati, died of this cause.

.... The Hardware Board of Trade of New York lately had their first official dinner. There are five hundred dealers.

.... There was a fall of snow at Havana this winter. The people thought it salt, and were surprised at its melting.

.... New York, Philadelphia and Baltimore harbors have suffered from ice this season—Boston harbor has remained open.

.... In one day five tons of eels were shipped from one town in Massachusetts to the city of New York.

.... The New York Day Book says there were 2705 failures in the United States during the year 1856.

.... There are a thousand medical students at Paris. Long may it be before they graduate!

.... The late Samuel Garney, brother of Elizabeth Fry, who died in London, lately, gave away $100,000 a year.

.... Captain John F. Bowers, of the harque Mary Broughton, has followed the sea thirty years without a single disaster.

.... Josiah Bradlee, of this city, has given ten thousand dollars in all to the Home for Indigent Females.

.... The cholera in India appears everywhere to have spared the women—from their temperance, it is thought.

.... The Chinese in San Francisco, California, have a hospital and a theatre of their own.

.... Mr. Albert G. Tenney, a most excellent and accomplished editor, has retired from the Bath Tribune.

.... The Board of Councilmen of New York has appropriated $2000 for the celebration of Washington's birthday.

.... Dr. G. W. F. Mellen is about resuming business in this city as a chemist, and should meet with kindness and aid.

.... The queen of Spain has abandoned all self-respect; and the king, who hates her, is plotting treason to the throne.

.... It has been decided, in the Kentucky Court of Appeals, that a man may marry his mother-in-law.

.... Mr. Barham is in London once more with Tom Thumb, and little Cordelia Howard, the child-actress.

.... Col. Benton remarked that the greatest trouble he met with in Boston was from the pressure of hospitalities.

.... The Liverpool Times says that murder increased in the United Kingdom in spite of capital punishment.

.... In India everything has languished for means of transit—railroads will now supply the great want.

.... Tipper coined a fine simile when he spoke of Niagara as "the ocean-bride of time."

SNOW DRIFTS.

We make no apology for talking about the snow, or acknowledging it is the drift of our present article. Though we are on the eve of what the almanacs facetiously term spring, we haven't got rid of sleigh-bells and runners yet, and may have more to do with snow flakes than is quite agreeable. Well, some three weeks ago we did flatter ourselves that we had a specimen of an old-fashioned snow storm. Banked up in a country-house for a day, looking out on great white ridges ten and twelve feet deep, marveling on the disappearance of wall and pump and shrub, and the general transmigration of all things about us, the air still filled with dazzling particles driven before a perfect hurricane, we made up our mind that we were enjoying a picture of the good old times. As such we proclaimed our experience, when, the next day, we were whizzing over the rails behind a trio of powerful locomotives. But it seems we reckoned without our host.

There sat beside us a well-preserved old gentleman, with a blooming cheek, whose birthday dated back into the past century, and whose locks, white as the snow our sharp plough was furrowing, entitled him to be regarded as the "oldest inhabitant."

"Bless your souls, gentlemen," said he, "this ain't nothing—this ain't—compared to what we used to have. Why, I remember in the year '90 (we think he said) a snow storm that lasted nine days. I lived down east then. The snow was up to the eaves of two-story houses. Nothing but the steeple could be seen of the village meeting-house. We had to go up the chimney when we wanted to get out of doors. That snow lasted a month. Well, we all got used to it, and went a visiting just the same as usual. Every man was a Santa Claus then, and as they were a hospitable set of folks, all of them kept open chimneys. Recollect dropping in on a neighbor to take pot-luck," added the old gentleman; "slipt down the kitchen flue, and, as luck would have it, stepped into the soup-pot. Walked out of that mighty quick, I tell you, gentlemen; shin soup, and hot at that. Well, we set down to dinner, and had a right good jolly time. I kep' my own counsel—as I allers do in similar circumstances. Only one of the boys snuffed at his soup, like that 'ere Brooker in Nickleas Nickleby, and said it had a unpleasant flavor of leather, for which he was rapped over the knuckles with the carving-knife, deprived of dumplin's, and sent out to finish his dinner in the kitchen. That 'ere snow lasted, as I sed, a month—way inter spring; and when it went off, you'd better believe, gentlemen, there was a fresh."

The old gentleman was silent, and not a word of comment was made by any of the passengers—the impression being too profound. No one knew the name of the narrator. He got out at Hill's crossing, and we haven't seen him from that day to this.

KEEP YOUR MOUTH SHUT.

Many a man has prospered in life, simply from knowing when to keep his mouth shut. Many a home has been rendered happy, from an exercise of this faculty on the part of husband or wife. Many a legislator has won the favor of his constituents, by attending to business instead of making long speeches. It appears that health is also dependent in some degree upon keeping the mouth shut. Dr. Hall advises persons who go from a warm apartment into the open air, in cold weather, to close the lips resolutely for a space of at least ten minutes, walking rapidly meanwhile; thus the air can only reach the lungs by a circuit of the nose and head, causing no derangement. By "not so doing," says the doctor, "many a heart once happy and young now lies in the churchyard, that might have been young and happy still." It is almost appalling to think on how many apparently trifling circumstances the health of man depends. We are told that multitudes die yearly from a failure to follow such simple advice as the preceding.

PHOTOGRAPHY.—This art is really working wonders. At a late meeting of the English Photographic Society, some pictures were exhibited as minute as the head of a pin, which, on being subjected to the medium of a powerful microscope, disclosed well-executed groups of half a dozen persons.

AFRICA.—Before long, Africa in its whole expanse will be an open volume to science, and commerce will create in its interior invaluable markets. The recent researches of Dr. Livingstone have given a new impulse to the spirit of engineering and enterprise in that direction.

THE MAN IN THE IRON MASK.—It is said that somebody somewhere has in his possession a manuscript unravelling the web of mystery woven about this French state prisoner, supposed by so many to have been an elder brother of Louis XIV.

PATENT SAFE.—After a fire in Cincinnati, lately, which lasted thirty-six hours, a patent safe was taken out, and a Shanghai rooster, which one of the clerks had put in there for safe keeping, was found frozen to death. What a puff for the inventor!

TO MARRIED LADIES.—A newspaper poetess, in an "advice to a young wife," says:

"Be sure you ne'er for power contend,
Nor try by tears to gain your end."

U. S. AGRICULTURAL SOCIETY.—Our friend Major Ben: Perley Poore, who has been elected to the office of secretary of this national society, will make a most excellent officer.

AN AMERICAN MATRON.—A lady of sixty lately put up at the Madison House, with her husband and thirty-two children. A child for every star in the Union and one to spare!

HORACE VERNET.

We little thought when we published lately a portrait of this great battle-painter, that he would ever visit this country, but it seems he is actually coming hither in the spring, being invited to fill one of the vacant pannels at the Capulet with one of his stirring representations of a "healy fight." This selection of a foreign artist to paint a picture for our national capital has, of course, produced a good deal of dissatisfaction—but we do not propose to discuss its policy just now. Two things, however, must be noted in this connection, that Horace Vernet's reputation is not French, but universal—that he is the greatest living battle-painter, perhaps the greatest painter of warlike scenes that ever lived. There is not a nation in Europe that has not been eager to secure one of his master-pieces, regardless of his birth-place. Then, again, he is well known for his ardent sympathies with freedom, his adopted motto being, "where liberty is, there is my country." As a proof of his independence, it is on record that when Louis Napoleon desired him to alter a picture of a military review, leaving out a certain general who was obnoxious to the French emperor, Vernet refused to do it. "I am a painter of history, sire," was his noble reply, "and I will not violate the truth." Moreover, there is no living American artist who has made battle his study and ruling passion as Vernet has. Since Trumbull, we have had no American painter of battle-pieces. We think, however, that it is questionable whether, if Vernet attempts an American subject, as he must, he will be able to hit off the Anglo-Saxon type of character and countenance. It is very difficult for an artist to avoid being national in his faces and figures. Gavarni's Londoners are not genuine John Bulls, but Frenchmen masquerading as cockneys. The genius of Vernet, however, is universal, and he may rise above every difficulty in the execution of his task. He is now advanced in life, but paints with all the vigor of his youthful days.

WHAT'S IN A NAME?—A good deal more than most people imagine. A poor title often prevents the sale of a good book or the reading of a good story. A dramatist lately wrote a spirited comedy called, "Closed on account of Death," which was rejected, because if people read it on the theatre bills they would think the house was shut up.

OLD AGE OF ACTORS.—Talma, in the latter part of his life, was asked his age, and avoided the question by saying, with a smile, "Actors and women should never be dated. We are old or young, according to the characters we represent."

WHAT NEXT.—An American actress has lately been presented with a carriage. The lady will now enjoy the luxury of purchasing horses and harness, paying for horse feed and hiring a coachman.

SPINDLEDOM.—The Lowell factory operatives have more than a million of dollars deposited in the Saving Banks of that city, the fruits of their honorable labor.

CLERGYMEN AND SCHOOL TEACHERS.—Ballou's Pictorial is sent to clergymen and school teachers for $2 a year.

BINDING.—All styles of binding done at this office, at the lowest rates, and in the best manner.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Streeter, Mr. Elbridge G. Keith to Miss Anne C. Dyer, by Rev. Mr. Minor, Mr. Charles R. McCalley to Miss Annie M. Randall; by Rev. Mr. Gaylord, Mr. Lewis A. Smith to Miss Rebecca M. Turner; by Rev. Mr. Smithett, Mr. William Carlisle to Miss Mary R. Sullivan, of Chelsea; by Rev. Mr. Stowe, Mr. Zachariah F. Cator to Miss Leonora A. Davis; by Rev. Dr. Randall, Mr. Daniel Long to Miss Jane C. Symons, formerly of Hallowell, N. S.; by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. William H. Thomas to Miss Frances M. Allen;—At Chelsea, by Rev. Mr. Field, Mr. Joseph C. Brown, of Freeton, to Miss Sarah A. Ryder;—At Southerville, by Rev. Mr. Emerson, Mr. Jacob A. B. Brooks, of Chelsea, to Miss Elizabeth Barrett;—At Winchester, by Rev. Mr. Robinson, Mr. William H. Colburn, of Boston, to Miss Mary Fiske;—At Middleton, by Rev. Mr. Braman, of Danvers, Mr. Benjamin Howe to Miss Anna J. Richardson;—At Natick, by Rev. Mr. Bowles, Mr. Charles P. Cox to Mrs. Marietta E. Leavitt;—At Salem, by Rev. Mr. Ellis, Mr. Edward B. Arnold to Mrs. Charlotte E. Lander;—At Clinton, by Rev. Mr. Livermore, Mr. John C. Knight, of California, to Miss Elizabeth S. Sawyer;—At Lowell, by Rev. Mr. Dabnum, Mr. William Andrews, of St. Johnsbury, Vt., to Miss Henrietta Clapp;—At New Bedford, by Rev. Mr. Chapman, Mr. Jonathan Barret to Miss Mary J. Reynolds.

DEATHS.

In this city, Miss Catherine Adams, 20; Mr. J. A. Adams, 32; Mrs. Susan J. Sylvester, 41; Mrs. Mary Wait, 53; Mr. Benjamin Baker, of Dorchester, 71; Mr. John S. B. Irving, 47; Mrs. Susan A. Rogers, 37; Miss Mary E. Wyman, 23; Mrs. Sarah A. Foye, 40; Miss Martha Ann Philbrick, 29;—At Chelsea, Mr. John Little, 53;—At Medford, Mr. Roxanna F. Rutland, 32;—At Cliffdale (Saugus), Mrs. Isabel S. Herrick, 26;—At Malden, Mrs. Hannah Holden, 32;—At Milton, Mrs. Sarah Bent, 39;—At Oxford, Mrs. Hannah Collier, 61;—At Danversport, Mrs. Sarah E. Pittman, 42;—At Salem, Mrs. Elizabeth Upton, 39;—At Groton, Mr. Josiah Bigelow, 61;—At Windsor, Mrs. Naomi Denhamville, 74;—At Beverly, Mr. Josiah B. Elliot, 64;—At Gloucester, Miss Adeline Peas, 22;—At Newburyport, Mr. Ebenezer Huse, 61;—At Taunton, Mrs. Martha Bilson, in her 73d year, a native of England;—At Ballardvale (Andover), Mrs. Beulah F. Poor, 35;—At Auburn, Mr. Jonas Bancroft, 86;—At Worcester, Mr. John Stacy, 32;—At Fitchburg, Mr. Eliza A. Piper, 25;—At Ware, Mr. John S. Atwood, 88;—At Ipswich, Mr. Samuel Hodge, 81;—At Westfield, Widow Electa Norton, 82;—At Templeton, Col. Leonard Stone, 72;—At Plymouth, Mrs. Magdalen Buerki, 37;—At New Bedford, Mrs. Anne Polra, 23;—At Long Plain (Fairhaven), Mrs. Hannah White, 69;—At Providence, R. I., Miss Catherine Wier, formerly of Boston, 65.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL
DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

|                        |       |        |
|------------------------|-------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year | ..... | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers " "      | ..... | 10 00  |
| 10 " " " "             | ..... | 20 00  |

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteen copy gratis.

* One copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, and one copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by

M. M. BALLOU,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TRANSIENT IS OUR STAY.

BY MRS. M. W. CURTIS.

We are only travellers here:
Fleeting is our life;
Hastening to another sphere,
Every moment rife—
Rife with hopes of endless bliss
In a glorious region:
In a fairer world than this,
Far from cares a legion.

Transient is our stay on earth,
Fleeting is our day;
Heaven hath joys of endless worth
O'er life's thorny way.
May we seek to gain that shore
Decked with gems immortal,
When this journeying is o'er,
And we've crossed death's portal.

THE WORLD'S TIME.

Time, as he passes us, has a dove's wing,
Unsoiled and swift, and of silken sound;
But the world's Time is Time in masquerade!
Their's, should I paint him, has his pinions fledged
With motley plumes; and where the peacock shows
His azure eyes, is tintured black and red.
With spots quadrangular of diamond form,
Ensnarling hearts, elude typical strife,
And spades, the emblems of untimely graves.—COWPER.

POWER OF SONG.

Wherewith bestirs he human spirits?
Wherewith makes he the elements obey?
Is 't not the stream of song that out his bosom springs,
And to his heart the world back coiling brings?—GOETHE.

A KISS.

I felt the while a pleasing kind of smart:
The kiss went tingling to my very heart.
When it was gone, the sense of it did stay—
The sweetness clung upon my lips all day,
Like drops of honey loth to fall away.—DAYDEN.

A SISTER'S LOVE.

More constant than the evening star,
Which mildly beams above—
That diadem—O, dearer far
A sister's gentle love.—ANON.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

How vividly does the psalmist describe a thunder storm—"The clouds poured out water; the skies sent out a sound; thine arrows went also abroad." Ps. 77: 17. The English editors were never noted for a knowledge of the geography of this country. The London Illustrated News presents its readers with a view of "Baton Rouge, Nebraska!".....Those of our readers who love flowers, should not forget to refer to the Florist's Department of "The Flag of our Union.".....The Aurora Borealis must, it is thought, be composed of a vast mass of electric matter resembling in every respect that generated by the electro-galvanic battery. The currents from it charge the wires, and then disappear as the mass of the aurora rolls from the horizon to the zenith. The people of Sacramento, California, are roofing their houses and laying their streets with asphaltum. Asphaltum has been used on the streets of Paris for many years. Timber soaked in corrosive sublimate will keep sound under ground for many years. The house given to Mayor Hall, of Brooklyn, Long Island, New York, for his services during the yellow fever season, is situated on Livingston Street, and valued at the sum of $11,000. The St. Louis Herald is complaining that Illinois criminals, after serving out their time in the prisons of that State, are furnished with money and aided to emigrate to St. Louis. How is this?.....Think of splendid land in Kansas selling at $2 25 an acre!.....The "Royal Hawaiian Theatre," Sandwich Islands, has been doing a brilliant business, inaugurating a new era of social life in the Pacific......Madam McAllister, the widow of the celebrated "magician," intends to pursue her late husband's profession, and having the public sympathy, will, we predict, be everywhere very successful. We read a heart-rending sketch in that very clever paper, the New Yorker, the other day, in which the hardships of a poor woman were described, who had herself and child to support, and who had received only a dollar and a half a week for needlework, making six coats for that wretched pittance. No wonder that vice exists where industry is so ill remunerated. The Upas Tree in Java, which carried death to all who breathed the air wafted through its branches, was a fable. But there is really a valley of poison in Java, the atmosphere being rendered deadly by carbonic acid gas exhaled from crevices in the ground. Among its many offices, the fan is used as a death-signal in Japan. It is presented on a peculiar kind of salver to a high born criminal—and the moment he stretches out his hand to receive it, his head is struck off. Rather a fanciful way of announcing his doom, we should say. Mrs. Partington talks about "a rupture of Mount Vesuvius, with the burning lather running all over the contagious territory." What can the old lady mean?.....Something may be learned even of an exhibition of tight-rope dancers. The performer keeps his eye fixed on one point. So in life—if your eye is fixed on some great guiding principle, you can tread the narrow and dangerous path without fear of falling. It is computed that two millions of dollars are spent annually for flowers in the city of Paris. As bouquets are very cheap there, the production of these "alphabets of angels" must be prodigious. The Italians have a pithy saying—"The man who lives by hope will die of hunger.".....Be kind to your horses while the snow lasts. What is sleighing to you, may be killing to them. The "Central Presbyterian" thinks the felt hat is the only sensible one worn. We think so, too—it is so easy to the head, that the pressure is not felt. From 1821 to 1851, the increase of real property in France was more than one hundred per cent.; and that of personal property about forty per cent. The prevalent fashions in New York among gentlemen, are the wearing of high glazed top-boots outside the pantaloons, and drinking lager beer out of silver mugs. A notorious ruffian, sentenced for ten years at Sing Sing for a heinous crime, and pardoned by the governor of New York after two years' service, killed a man with a stung shot within a week after his liberation—a sad commentary on the effect of official leniency. What ever you do, do with all your might. If we wanted to make sure of killing a mosquito, we would use a Puxhian gun. The city of Philadelphia possesses real estate assessed at $150,000,000. Quakerdom is wealthy. Scientific men think some kinds of seaweed will prove nutritious food. "One plate of kelp!" may yet be the cry in our eating-houses. A friend of Col.

Greene, of the Post, says that his most painful fear in respect to death is, the apprehension that his tombstone will be inscribed with a pompous eulogy, in "badly spelled, ill-rhymed and ill-punctuated verses.".....The child of the emperor of France is regularly enrolled in the Grenadiers of the Imperial Guard. He is seen "in arms" every day. The courage shown by the king of Naples at the recent attempt to assassinate him, has helped him amazingly. To say nothing of the morality of the thing, it is the worst possible policy to try to kill a despot. One thing is very certain—Prussia can never conquer Switzerland. The cantons swarm with rifles, and the mountaineers are dead shots. The French papers are advocating a government transatlantic line of steamers. It will never do. All the attempts of the French at transatlantic steam navigation have been failures. England and the United States have a passenger monopoly. Theatricals, at the last advices, were quite dull in San Francisco. The new play of "Fascination," written by Messrs. S. L. Ward and Dick Tinto Goodrich (S. O. G.'s son), and produced at Burton's, New York, in splendid style, was a complete success. But the heroine is a female Giovanni, and the catastrophe sanguinary and Frenchy. Two girls in New York, the other day, had a charcoal fire in their room, and then went to sleep—never to wake again. Too much care cannot be used when charcoal is the fuel. A Dr. Jackson has promulgated a novel idea, viz., that the intellectual disparity between the sexes is chiefly owing to the difference between their costume. So that, if a lady only had the courage to don the historical "brass coat and blue buttons" of Charles James Fox, she would be fitted to shine in the Senate—or if Rufus Choate should don the crimoline, his intellectual gifts would cease to astonish the world. This is truly an age of discovery. A delegation of Kaw Indians has lately visited Washington. Are these Kaws connected with the Crow tribe?.....They are very gay at New Orleans this winter, with parties, dinners, suppers, dances, serenades and theatres. Their pleasure season is so brief, that they pile it up while it lasts. Charles Cook, of Havana, New York, has given $25,000 to the contemplated People's College, in that State. Would there were more such men in the world, in spite of the old proverb, "too many cooks spoil the broth." Gen. Concha lately reviewed a thousand horse in Cuba. But the parade made little show, on account of the diminutive size of the animals. A squadron of Uncle Sam's cavalry would trample all the Cuban ponies under foot. An Edinburgh stone-cutter depicted a figure of an angel wearing a wig on a tomb. "The ever saw an angel with a wig?" asked a critic. "Did ye ever see one without a wig?" was the triumphant retort of the artist. Two young ladies, the other day, were discussing the important question whether a certain gentleman were any beard. One of them exclaimed, "I know he has, for it tickled my cheek!" What an indiscreet admission!.....Daniel Webster knew beans. In 1848, we find him sending an order from Washington for half a bushel of his favorite vegetable. The editor of the Buffalo Express, after hearing the Calliope, promised never to say anything against barrel organs again. A physician told a lady patient, that if women were admitted to paradise, their tongues would make it a purgatory. Her retort was admirable. "If some physicians were allowed to practise there, they would make it a desert." A party of real Simon Pure gipsies lately visited St. Louis. We hope our friends there kept a sharp lookout on their clothes-lines, poultry yards and silver spoons. Gipsies are very agreeable in operas and pictures; but in private life, they "don't pay," as Mr. Unit says. A gentleman in New Orleans lately attended a masquerade ball, and made violent love to a charming mask in a polka jacket. It turned out to be his own wife! Of course he "knew it all along." Downing, the colored oysterman of New York, who retired from business with at least a hundred thousand dollars, intimates that after the 4th of March he shall go to Washington—an appointment having been tendered him by the president elect. We guess so. H-yah! He would make a good secretary of the treasury, because he is used to skulking out!.....Punch says, speaking of the stealing and swindling manias of the day, that if he was Saturn, he should count his rings every night to see that none of them were missing!.....The winter in Italy has been very cold, and some of the American boys at Florence have been astonishing the natives by skating on the Arno. One of our greatest theatre-goers has not yet recovered from the exertion of seeing Rachel at the Boston last year. He had to hold his opera-glass in his right hand, and a book of the play in his left; to keep one eye on the French text, and the other on the translation; his ears on the actress, and his feet stamping applause—to say nothing of the care of his hat, gloves and bouquet, and delicate attentions to his fair companion. Poor man!.....All Longfellow's readers will recall with pleasure his specimens of Jasmin, the provincial poet of France. We see that Jasmin has received a testimonial from his native town, consisting of a crown formed by two laurel branches in gold, intermixed with silver fruit. Little Master Marsh, one of the boys-actors at the Howard, lately publicly disavowed his intention of "crushing" Forrest. Ludwig Tieck, in one of his graceful novelettes, remarks on the great amount of character there often is in a laugh. "You know no man," he says, "till you have heard him laugh—till you know when and how he will laugh. Some men laugh like a hyena.".....There are some 80,000 men in the Russian guards, and full 40,000 of them have turned-up noses. Snub noses are the rule in Russia. Ben. D'Iseroli, the statesman and novelist, has lately made a great sensation in Paris. British North America is about one quarter larger than all Europe. There are continued rumors about the removal of General Concha from the governor-generalship of Cuba. The principal business of a governor-general is to take care of number one—and Concha is not the man to neglect that respectable unit. The Lancet states, on the authority of Dr. Livingstone, that there is a singular immunity in the native African tribes from such diseases as consumption, cancer, hydrophobia and cholera. The Newfoundland codfishery has been below an average this season; but enhanced prices of the commodity have more than compensated the fishermen for any falling off in the catch. A correspondent of the London Times gives an account of the efficient and economical working of the steam-plough, in Gloucestershire, and elsewhere. Our Yankee inventors must hurry up their steam-ploughs. Ole Bull, the Norwegian violinist, is said to be in pecuniary difficulties. He is said to have had too many strings to his bow. Gibson, the great English sculptor, has resided so many years at Rome, that he is said to have almost forgotten his native language. He still defends his practice of coloring his statues. He has a Venus Victrix of marble of a delicate flesh-color, with pale golden hair. The French grin," says Lady Mary Wortley Montague, "is equally remote from the cheerful serenity of a smile, and the cordial mirth of an English horse-laugh." Haydn, the great musician, had a fancy that he could not compose successfully, unless he wore a certain diamond ring given him by the emperor of Russia. Poets, as well as musicians, have had these erratic fancies. In speaking of the universality of the gift of music, the New York Musical World says:—"Every boy in the street can whistle a tune, but every boy cannot paint a picture." Whistling seems to be spontaneous, or, as the school-boy said, when he was called up by the master for the performance of Yankee Doodle, "I didn't whistle, sir; it whistled itself." It has been suggested, that every railroad corporation should employ a surgeon. Considering the frequency of railroad accidents, we should think such an attache indispensable. Perhaps there had better be one to every train.

A DAUGHTER TO HER FATHER.—Julia Webster Appleton, the daughter of Daniel Webster, in a letter addressed to her father sixteen years ago, thus appealed to him on an occasion of his sickness to return to private life:—"What is the whole country to your family when weighed in the balance with one hour of sickness or anxiety which it causes you? I am no great patriot. I do not love Rome better than Caesar; the advancement of party better than my own dear father."

Choice Miscellany.

RUBIES IN CALIFORNIA.

The San Francisco Herald says that a young man by the name of Haverhill, while prospecting a few days since for gold among the hills of the coast range, near the San Antonio mines, washed out four good sized beautiful rubies from one pan of earth. He obtained from the same pan a very respectable prospect of gold. Rubies have been found in Gold Run, near Nevada. Garnets of a very superior quality have also been found in the vicinity of the Sugar-Loaf Hill, near Nevada. Both the rubies and garnets, however, that have been found in this vicinity, are not of sufficient size or fitness to give them much value. We presume that such is the case with the rubies recently found near San Antonio. Apropos of rubies, we append the following paragraph, taken from the Calcutta Citizen, which, in speaking of a late reception of the English embassy by the Burmese king, says:—"The only thing remarkable at the interview was an inanimate object, and that was a ruby in the centre of the pagoda crown of his majesty. It was as large, if not larger, than a hen's egg, and far more valuable than the great Koh-i-noor. It was beautifully cut, and almost as round as marble. It was torn off the ear of the Karen queen, by Alompra. It was a pendant, being suspended by a wire casing through her right ear. It is of the purest water, and more than two thousand years old, if the traditions concerning it are to be believed. It came originally from Assam, and belonged to the Great-Garrow king, Moung Sa, who ruled the whole of China India. This ruby will, I prophesy, in ten years be worn by Queen Victoria."—Life on the Wing.

SKETCH IN MOSCOW.

In Moscow, with its glorious undulating site; its long, irregular streets of handsome villas, interspersed with greenery, its handsome magazines, and its constant rattle of equipages, you feel as if surrounded by human interest, and cease to wonder why neither despotic power, nor long neglect, nor systematic preference for a rival, can wean the true Russian from his love for the ancient cradle of his race. And now it looks brighter and grayer than ever. Paint, and lime, and varnish have done wonders, making even the old Chinese town look sprightly and modern; while the gilder has given to the thousand domes, minarets and spires of Moscow a splendor and refugence which can only be appreciated by being seen. Stand on the esplanade of the Kremlin, and having first curiously examined its battlemented walls, its ancient treasury, its grotesque church—the Assumption; watch for a moment the people, high and low, military and civil, as they reverentially doff their hats while passing under the sacred gate; and then turn suddenly towards the vast city that spreads itself out beneath your feet, count its innumerable church spires of delicate green, bright golden, or royal red; look down its long streets, alive with human units; learn to distinguish its fortress-like convents, its regal palaces, its great public institutes, and you must admit that you are gazing on a panorama to which the civilized world offers but few parallels.—The London Journal.

OUR TEETH.

It is often asserted that the teeth of the present generation are much inferior to those of the generations who have passed us. We wish that some of our many dentists would prove literary enough to give us a dental history. We should be astonished, probably, at the dental evils of other days. Evidences of the use of false teeth by the Romans two thousand years ago, were found among the ruins of Pompeii. Three hundred years ago, Martin Luther complained of the toothache; and a German ambassador at the court of Queen Elizabeth spoke of the weakness and imperfection of the English people's teeth, which he attributed to their custom of eating a great deal of sugar. Shakespeare makes one of his characters speak of being kept away by a "raging fang." Roger Williams was struck by the imperfect teeth of the Narragansett Indians, whom toothache and decayed teeth troubled exceedingly. George Washington had a set of artificial teeth, for which he paid five hundred dollars. Such are a very few facts which come up in our poor memory concerning a somewhat interesting matter. We would like to have many more of them.—Boston Medical Journal.

ALPINE FLOWERS.

The Alpine flowers have a remarkably deep and vivid coloring. The most brilliant blues and reds, with a rich brown shading to black, are observable amidst the white and yellow flowers of the low countries, and these tints likewise seem to assume a purer and more dazzling hue in these high regions. A similar richness of coloring is met with in the vegetation of polar districts, where the hues not only become more fiery, but undergo a complete alteration under the influence of the constant summer light and rays of the midnight sun, white and violet being often deepened into a glowing purple. The Alpine plants often grow in dense masses, and their extraordinary splendor of coloring lends that magic charm to the fresh green turf which renders the pasture lands of the High Alps so famous.—Sketches of Nature in the Alps.

New Publications.

IRONS. By the author of "Amy Herbert." In 2 vols., 12mo. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1857.

The authoress of "Amy Herbert" is sure to secure readers by the talismanic property of her name alone. The story before us is a dramatic one, wrought out with great skill, and producing effect by the legitimacy of its portraiture of real men and women. For sale by Redding & Co.

MEMOIRS OF WASHINGTON. By Mrs. C. M. KIRKLAND. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 616.

The life of Washington cannot be too often written and read. Mrs. Kirkland has told his story in her own happy way, and produced a most acceptable volume, particularly to the young. The book is beautifully printed and illustrated. For sale by Redding & Co.

NEW MUSIC.—We have received from Russell & Richardson, 13 Tremont Row, and 282 Washington Street, Thalberg's Andante, for the piano, opera 32, "Silver Bells," an idyll, and "Rosdite," for the piano forte. From Oliver Ditson we have received "Shakespeare's Loadstars," by Shields, a vocal quartette; "Brooklyn Schottisch," and "La Chanson des Lagunes," a variation on a Venetian air for the piano.

MEMOIRS, JOURNALS AND CORRESPONDENCE OF THOMAS MOORE. Edited by Lord JOHN RUSSELL. New York: D. Appleton & Co. 1857. 2 vols., 8vo. pp. 1079.

There are few books which, like Boswell's Johnson, satisfy all tastes—but this is one of the very few. Covering a wide period of time, the life of Moore embraces an intimacy with all the literary illustrations of the 18th century, and with its most brilliant social representatives. His familiar letters, anecdotes and diary give these distinguished people before us. The book is gay, gossipy and readable, and must become an immense favorite. It is embellished by a fine portrait of the author, and a beautiful view of his charming residence, Sioperton Cottage. For sale by Redding & Co.

Foreign Items.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

|                                 |       |
|---------------------------------|-------|
| 1 subscriber, one year.....     | $ 00 |
| 5 subscribers, " " " " " "..... | 5 00  |
| 10 " " " " " ".....             | 10 00 |

Any person sending us new subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirtieth copy gratis.

One copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, and one copy of BULLOCK'S Pictorial, $4 per annum. Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BULLOCK, Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

FORT PLAIN, N. Y.

We present below a finely executed view of the picturesque and thriving village of Fort Plain, N. Y., drawn expressly for our Pictorial by Mr. W. B. Lindsay of that place, and we are assured that the representation is reliable and accurate. Fort Plain is a post-village of Minden township, Montgomery county, N. Y., situated on the right bank of the Mohawk River, about 60 miles W. N. W. of Albany. The ground upon which it is built is agreeably undulating, as will be seen by our engraving, which embraces many pretty landscape features, a flowing river, a well-built bridge, neat houses, smooth lawns and clumps of foliage crowning the eminences and dotting their sides. The village is on the line of the Central Railroad and Erie Canal, a train of the former being depicted in the right hand corner. It is a place of considerable importance and increasing business. It is said by the directors of the Central road that more business is done at this point than at any other on the line between Albany and Utica. It is the market for all the southern counties of Otsego, Schoharie, Delaware and parts of Herkimer. They have a freight depot at this place 300 feet long. The large building on the left is the new passenger depot, and the Mohawk River is seen immediately back of it, crossed by a covered bridge 400 feet long. The large building in the background is the Fort Plain Seminary and Female Collegiate Institute, a large brick building, 150 feet long and four stories high, capable of accommodating 500 students. The village contains four churches, viz., one Presbyterian, one Methodist, one Universalist, and one German Lutheran. There are also several steam mills, a printing office, and about 2000 inhabitants.

MEETING OF GATES AND BURGOYNE.

In Irving's Life of Washington we find this interesting chapter: Wilkinson, in his memoirs, describes the first meeting of Gates and Burgoyne, which took place at the American camp. They were attended by their staffs, and other general officers. Burgoyne was in rich royal uniform; Gates in a plain blue frock. When they approached nearly within sword's length, they reined up and halted. "The fortune of war, General Gates, has made me your prisoner," said Burgoyne; to which the other, returning his salute, replied: "I shall always be ready to testify that it has not been through any fault of your excellency." "We passed through the American camp," writes the already cited Hessian officer, "in which all the regiments were drawn out beside the artillery, and stood under arms. Not one of them was uniformly clad; each had on the clothes which he wore in the field, the church and the tavern. They stood, however, like soldiers, well arranged and with a military air, in which there was but little to find fault with. All the muskets had bayonets, and the sharpshooters had rifles. The men all stood so still that we were all filled with wonder. Not one of them made a single motion as if he would speak to his neighbor. Nay, more, all the lads that stood there in rank and file, kind nature had formed so trim, so slender, so nervous that it was a pleasure to look at them, and we were surprised at such a handsome, well formed race. In all earnestness," he adds, "English America surpasses the most of Europe in the growth and looks of its male population. The whole nation has a natural turn for war and a soldier's life. He made himself somewhat merry, however, with the equipments of the

A LEAF IN THE LIFE OF GEN. MORGAN.

Morgan bore a prominent part in the assault on Quebec, and narrowly escaped with his life. In the midst of the battle, an important error was committed by the storming party under Arnold, and while he was attempting to restore order, he received a ball in the leg, which brought him to the ground. The momentary confusion caused by these events brought Morgan to the front just as Arnold was struck down. It was at this crisis in the conflict that Morgan, at the instance and in compliance with the express wishes of all the field officers of the division who were present, assumed the direction of the assault. "They would not take the command," he observes, in a short sketch, written by himself, of his early military career, "alleging that I had seen service and they had not, which reflected credit on their judgment." Morgan now raised his voice, always terrible in the hour of battle, and which was heard over the din of arms, ordering his riflemen to the front. They obeyed the summons with a cheer, and without a moment's hesitation or delay, rushed over the barrier, driving before them like chaff the enemy posted there. A short distance beyond the barrier, was a battery extending across the road, and flanked by the houses on either side, on which was mounted two twelve-pounders. As the riflemen advanced against this battery, the guns, charged with grape and cannister, opened on them. The first gun was elevated too high and did no injury; the other flashed without discharging, when the riflemen reached the walls and planted their ladders. Morgan ordered a man standing near him to ascend one of the ladders. Perceiving that the soldier reluctantly obeyed, Morgan pulled him down, and stepping on the

FORT PLAIN, NEW YORK STATE.

THE FERRET.

The ferret is a native of Africa; whence it was imported into Spain for the purpose of destroying the rabbit, with which at one period that country was injuriously overrun. From Spain it has spread over the rest of Europe as a domesticated animal. From the earliest times it was used in the capture of rabbits, by being turned, muzzled, into their burrows. It is now used, not only by the warren, but also extensively by the rat catchers. Some ten years since there was living near Huron, Ohio, a professed rat catcher, an Englishman, who with a cage of ten or fifteen ferrets, and accompanied by several Scotch terriers, visited the farms and villages through Huron county, ready, for a fee of five dollars, to carry death and dismay into the colony of rats and mice inhabiting the premises. I was witness to one of these professional operations. The terriers, keen for the sport, were posted about the buildings; then the ferrets, lean, lank, and hungry, were let slip into the holes and runways of the rats. Now commenced such scampering, squeaking, racing, hustle and confusion, as was truly exciting. If the rats remained in their holes, death was certain, for the ferrets could with ease follow through any opening a rat could pass; and if they attempted to escape by flight, their fate was equally sure, for the little active dogs, willing allies of the ferrets, were ready to seize them the moment they made their appearance. Thus a war of extermination was carried on with bloody success. Ferrets are very sensitive of cold, and require to be kept snug and warm, especially during the winter, as they perish if they are particularly exposed to the severity of the season.—Prairie Farmer.

officers, a few more regimentals, and those fashioned to their own notion as to cut and color, being provided by themselves. Brown coats with pea green facings, white linings, with silver trimming, and gray coats in abundance, with buff facings and cuffs, and gilt buttons, in short, every variety of pattern. The brigadiers and generals wore uniforms and belts which designated their rank; but most of the colonels and other officers were in their ordinary clothes, a musket with a bayonet in hand, and a cartridge box and powder horn over his shoulder. But what more especially amused him was the variety of uncouth wigs worn by the officers, lingerings of ancient fashion. Most of the troops thus noticed were hastily raised militia—the yeomanry of the country. "There were regular regiments, also," he said "which for want of time and cloth were not yet equipped in uniforms. They had standards with various emblems and mottoes, some of which had for us a very satirical signification. But I must say to the credit of the enemy's regiments," continues he, "that no man was to be found therein who, as we marched by, made even a sign of taunting, insulting, exultation, hatred, or any other evil feeling; on the contrary, they seemed as though they would rather honor us. As we marched by the great tent of General Gates, he invited in the brigadiers and commanders of regiments, and various refreshments were set before us. General Gates is between fifty and sixty years of age, wears his own thin gray hair, is active and friendly, and, on account of the weakness of his eyes, constantly wears spectacles. At headquarters we met many officers, who treated us with all possible politeness." Such is the manner in which these two generals met after Burgoyne's surrender.

ladder himself, shouted: "Now, boys, follow me!" The ladders were instantly manned. As soon as Morgan's head appeared above the wall, a platoon of musketry was fired at him from within. So close was the discharge, that the fire scorched his hair, and grains of powder were imbedded in his face. But this was the only injury he sustained, although one ball passed through the top of his cap, and another grazed the left side of his face, cutting off a lock of his hair. The concussion was so great, however, as to knock him from the top of the ladder. He was instantly on his feet again, and commenced ascending the ladder. Another cheer rose from his men as they followed. Keeping his head down until he reached near the top of the ladder, he made a spring and bounded over the wall among the enemy. He was instantly followed by his men. In his descent, he alighted on one of the cannon, under the muzzle of which he fell, severely hurt by a concussion on the knee. A dozen bayonets were instantly levelled at him; but the situation in which he fell created a delay sufficiently long to enable his men, who now came pouring over the wall, to rescue him and attack his assailants. They made a feeble resistance, and at length fled into a building flanking the battery, from the windows of which they renewed the conflict. They were speedily dislodged by the riflemen. The enemy were driven through the building, and out at the rear into a neighboring street. Morgan ran through a sallopport at one end of the battery and thence round the corner of a building, and meeting the retreating British, as he anticipated, ordered them, in a menacing tone, to surrender, if they expected quarter. Capt. McCloud and about thirty of his men were thus made prisoners.—Revolutionary Incidents.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, FEBRUARY 28, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM { VOL. XII., No. 9.—WHOLE No. 297.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

WINTER SCENE.—BOSTON HARBOR.

If, last summer, a young gentleman had made an appointment with a young lady of his acquaintance for a sleigh-ride this winter in Boston harbor, he would have stood a fair chance of becoming an inmate of that excellent institution whose substantial brick buildings crown the heights of Somerville. Yet we have seen within a few weeks the practicability of crossing the bay in a cutter on runners thoroughly demonstrated. Our artist, Mr. Hill, during the existence of this strange state of things, took a walk on the bay, and brought us back, as a trophy of the excursion, the spirited drawing which ornaments this page. The sketch represents the Royal mail steamship America coming in through the channel-way. In the distance is seen the steamer Enoch Train, which did yeoman's service in keeping the channel open until Jack Frost redoubled his energies, and for a brief space put a stop to navigation. In the background are seen the gray bastions of the fort. Beyond the channel-way, a crowd of persons are desecrated upon the granite ice; while in the foreground are seen pedestrians un-concernedly strolling about, and fishermen at holes cut through the surface, busily pursuing their pleasure or avocation. Our citizens certainly had, during the cold term, a very fair representation of the polar regions, "got up," as the theatrical managers say, "with a total disregard of expense." It was a curious thing to stand above the tide perfectly secure, and look around upon a vast field of ice, forming a solid plain, where our eyes are accustomed to see dashing waves, steamers cutting their way through the water, sail-boats and ferry boats plying in all directions, and stately ships, with piles of snowy canvass, returning from distant lands, or departing on adventurous voyages. Frost and snow wrought a most magical transformation; the most familiar objects figured in a strange masquerade. Even the city looked weird and phantom-like, for the heavy masses of snow had completely changed the style of architecture. Scarcely did we recognize the graceful spire of Christ Church, with its musical bells; Bunker Hill Monument looked out of place—only the dome of the State-House appeared natural. Many ladies were tempted to make excursions on the ice, and boldly ventured forth for a stroll among the islands. The old tug-boat, "East Boston," changed for the nonce into a hotel, attracted many visitors among the men. Booths were improvised here and there, where cigars and potables were dispensed. Governor's Island was easily reached by pedestrians. From Governor's Island, you strolled over to Spectacle Island—it was a spectacle!—paid a visit to the light-house keeper on Long Island, and passed over to Apple Island before coming home. As the cold increased, and the ice thickened, horses and sleighs made their appearance. But the ice-embargo did not last long. The city government, and the Board of Trade, and the merchants, all pulled together in their noble efforts to raise the siege. The cutting out of a ship-channel eight miles in length by its windings, was a great achievement, successfully accomplished, and reflected the highest credit on all concerned—the heads that planned, the hands that contributed the means, and the sturdy arms thus set in motion. There is nothing that Boston capital and Boston energy cannot accomplish, when they choose.

BRITISH MAIL STEAMER COMING UP BOSTON HARBOR THROUGH THE ICE.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—OR—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCHINE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XXVIII.—[CONTINUED.]

Juan stood stupefied by the sight which met his eyes. He placed his hand to his forehead. He had left his cell with the determination to kill Escobar and Father Jerome, but fortunately he was saved from crime by their absence. The fever left him, and he turned to seek his cell unseen, but the door of Father Jerome's cell was closed and locked on the outside. He feared to be found there, and seeing no way of escape, he sprang into a cabinet on one side of the hall. He had scarcely ensconced himself in his hiding-place, when two persons entered, talking. One voice was Escobar's, and the other, to his great surprise, was that of a woman,—that of the Countess Altamira. Fearing to be deceived, the young monk pushed aside the curtain, closing a small round window of the cabinet, and distinctly saw the faces of both Escobar and the countess.

Escobar and the countess conversed gaily, and soon Father Jerome entered. He smiled at seeing the countess, but frowned as he said:

"The Duke d'Uzede is not here?"

"No; he was unable to accompany me. He was obliged to attend a reception at court."

"I thought he had arrived, for Paolo said some one awaited me."

"It was me," said Escobar.

"Then," said Father Jerome, "we will begin our supper, if senora the countess is willing."

"In security, at least?" the latter answered, laughing.

"Yes," replied the superior; "all sleep in the convent, and all the gates are closed."

"I hope they will open for me this night; I cannot pass a night in this holy place without danger."

"Fear nothing," said Escobar. "I will re-conduct you by the way you came—by the little subterranean passage which conducts to the little door of the cloister."

Juan listened attentively, and lost not one word.

They wished to accomplish the fall of the Count de Lerma, and disclosed that the king was in love with Alitea, and the countess wished him to be so with Carmina, and was doing all she could to bring it about. She had determined upon one thing, and that was to entirely break off the marriage of Carmina and Fernand; and the attentive listener in the cabinet raised his eyes to God, vowing to frustrate her schemes if possible.

Of many things they talked. Fernand had told at court the scandalous proceedings against Juan. Alitea had sworn to avenge him, and the two worthy fathers trembled when they heard that Juan was the brother of Alitea, who was so loved and had so much influence over the king. The only way to gain power and defeat Alitea was to throw her into a dungeon and execute her. It could be easily done, for she was a heretic—a Moor.

Juan trembled with rage.

The countess stood ready to help in all cases, for Alitea was the rival of her niece and her own. Escobar had a deadly poison which he would give the countess. The victim would show no signs of violence, merely droop and die. If the countess was not afraid to use it, it should be hers. Eagerly the countess demanded the phial. Escobar rose to get it, and went towards the cabinet where Juan was concealed.

The latter trembled, and a cold sweat stood on his face.

"No, no!" cried Father Jerome. "Where are you going? Not in that; in the other."

Escobar bowed, and entered the opposite cabinet. He soon returned with a crystal flask, containing a rose-colored liquid.

"Hold!" said the superior, taking it in his hands. "Listen, senora. Put a few drops of this liquid in a glass of water, in any drink whatever; no taste will be perceived, for it has none. Weeks and months perhaps will pass; but little by little, day by day, hour by hour, a sure, slow decomposition will take place, will be felt in every organ. Without pain, at the end of three or four months, perhaps less, following the dose, they will die, without the most anxious eye detecting or suspecting the cause."

"Are you sure?" cried the countess, seizing with delight the phial.

"Philip II. knew the secret. Don Juan of Austria, too ambitious, died of consumption, in the midst of his projects of glory. The cause I knew; it is in your hands."

"I understand, and thank you, my father. And now I must go, that none may suspect my visit to the convent."

"I will lead you back, and then seek my couch," said Escobar.

An instant after and the orgies were finished. The apartment was veiled in obscurity. Juan heard the picture of Saint Jerome glide into its place, and the opening in the cell of the superior was tightly closed.

CHAPTER XXIX.

THE ESCAPE.

FINDING himself alone, Juan ventured to leave his hiding-place, and fearing to knock against some piece of furniture, he waited patiently till he heard the good father snoring loudly, which testified to the soundness of his sleep. All his fears for the safety of his loved ones had returned. Alitea was surrounded by enemies, and he better than any one knew the deadly cunning and hatred of the countess and her confidants.

He knew not how to leave this chamber where he was shut up. He had thanked Heaven for disclosing to him the infernal designs of his persecutors; but now he trembled with the fear that he could not help them; for should he be discovered—and there was every prospect that he would be,—he would be thrown into a dungeon of the convent and could do nothing—not even warn those he loved. He resigned himself to his fate, to wait till morning, when Father Jerome should go to prayers and vacate his cell; he could, perhaps, then make his way out. He had just come to that decision, when he heard a great noise in the adjoining cell. Juan placed his ear against the picture of Saint Jerome, and listened.

"Who is it?" cried the superior.

"Me, my father," replied Escobar, "who came to announce to you an extraordinary and terrible event. Returning from conducting the countess, I thought I would see how our sick brother Sevilla was. I opened the door softly and found him gone."

"Misericordia!" cried the superior, rising from his sleep. "Can it be that the vengeance of the sister and persecutors is commencing? Can it be that, by the order of the king, they have dared to violate the rights of the convent and penetrate by force in our walls?"

"That is what I fear. I fear scandal will fall upon us. Let us take comfort. The porter says no one has entered, but some one went out."

"But perhaps we are mistaken. Our walls are too high, our gates and grating too well closed. Perhaps he is hid in some corner of the cloister."

At this moment the clock in the cloister sounded the hour for prayers, and the two fathers left.

The anxieties of Juan became greater still. If he remained here, he would be discovered and thrown into prison; if he attempted to escape, and was discovered, the same fate awaited him. But there was a possibility of success. He tried to move the picture of Saint Jerome, but it resisted, for it was bolted on the other side. Thus, then, every chance of safety or escape was gone. He was almost famished and very sleepy. Seeing the debris of the feast still remained, he ate a little, and then, in spite of the dangers which menaced him, he threw himself upon the curtained bed, and, worn out with illness and anxiety, he fell sound asleep.

When he awoke, some hours had elapsed. The fever had quit- ted him, and all his faculties had returned. He did not know, unfortunately, how long he had slept, or what time of the day it was. The room he occupied was still in obscurity. There was one window, but it was closed by a thick curtain of Persian silk, and he dared not open it, neither did he know which side of the convent it was on. He could just distinguish the articles in the room, and ran now no risk of stumbling against anything. He saw shining on the table a sharp knife; this he seized; it was an arm. One moment he thought of using it against himself; it was to escape an eternal prison, and, perhaps, greater suffering still. But who would save Alitea? who would watch over her? No—he would not shorten the life God had given him.

He saw before him the ceremonial dress of the superior. What did he risk? He clothed himself in the dress of the Jesuit, passing around his neck the large blue ribbons of the abbey of Alcala de Henares, at the end of which dangled a cross of wood. The feeble light which brightened the room wholly disappeared; it was night, and the angelus, which Sevilla heard sound, warned him that Brother Paolo would soon come.

He heard the door of the cell open, and placing himself by the side of the picture, he awaited, hardly daring to breathe. The pannel glided without noise, and Brother Paolo appeared, carrying in one hand an empty basket, and in the other a lantern, which allowed him to see those things before him, but not on either side.

Hardly had he gone a few steps, when Juan stepped behind him and entered the cell, closing the pannel and drawing the bolt. The monk, in the midst of moving dishes, heard not the slight noise. Juan stopped for nothing now. He descended the staircase and traversed the court, hoping that the angelus, which was still chanted, would keep all the brothers in the chapel.

Juan went to the porter's cell, bearing himself outwardly with pride, though his heart beat violently. The porter was reading by a small lamp. At the sight of the superior, he raised himself quickly, and murmured between his teeth:

"It is singular! I have not seen him return—"

An imperious gesture prevented him from finishing his sentence. Without looking at him, without speaking one word, Sevilla made him a sign to open the gate, which the other obeyed.

When Juan saw open before him this gate—the last barrier which held him captive,—his bosom heaved, and he felt like falling on his knees and thanking God. He was still within the convent walls, when he saw before him a monk bearing the blue ribbon of the order of Alcala de Henares. It was Father Jerome.

At the sight of a second abbot so like himself, Father Jerome remained stupefied with open mouth. Juan at once understood the danger of his position. The gate of the convent was not closed; the real abbot could call; they would come at his voice. Already he cried:

"Who are you?"

"Silence!" said Juan, pulling his hood over his face.

"From whence come you?"

"On the part of the Countess Altamira," he whispered in the ear of the superior.

"Speak," said the superior, trembling with fear. And he tried to make him enter the convent.

"Not here!" cried the false abbot, with a terror which was not feigned, and which redoubled that of Father Jerome.

Without giving him time to reply, he seized the arm of the reverend man, and led him rapidly some steps from the convent. The superior followed him for some time in silence, persuaded that the message he bore was of great importance. But when he was fifty steps or more from the convent, and almost entering the city, he cried out:

"Speak now!"

Juan made a sign with his hand, to imply that there was still danger. Some minutes afterwards, the superior cried:

"But speak then! Why come at this hour? Why leave the convent clothed in my costume?"

Juan renewed the gesture which seemed to say: "Not yet. Await."

At last, at the end of a few more minutes, the superior stopped. The two monks were on a square where many streets met; the city of Alcala was not lighted at this time, and the superior cried:

"Here, senor, no one can see or hear us. Tell me now the message with which the countess has charged you."

Sevilla, finding himself so far from the convent that it was impossible for the superior to call his brothers, seized with great force, the hand of the monk, and placing his lips near his ear, exclaimed:

"The countess told me to tell you, my father, that you are an infamous man!"

And leaving the superior stupefied, bewildered and thunder-struck, Sevilla entered the first street he came to, knowing that even if the superior pursued him, the legs of a man sixty years old could not keep pace with those of a young man. Sevilla ran to the end of the street, then took another on his right, and then only dared to pause to listen. No cry, no step could he hear; he was not pursued. He reflected upon what he would do; go to Madrid as quickly as possible to warn and protect Alitea. But he could not reach there this night, and on foot: he was ill, and the emotions he had experienced, now that the greatest danger was passed, made him feel weak. He felt he must rest, but where? He thought of Gongarello, but whereabouts in Alcala his shop was, he knew not. The streets were nearly deserted, but traversing them, he came across a man in a black mantle.

"Can you tell me where is the shop of Gongarello the barber?"

"Nothing more easy. The second street on the left; the last house on the right."

Juan thanked him and set off. He found the shop easily. The door was closed. He knocked; no one answered. He knocked louder; a little window opened.

"Who is there?"

"A friend."

Gongarello hesitated, for he saw the dress of a monk.

"Gongarello!" cried the young man again, as he saw the barber leave the window, "Gongarello, I am a friend who wishes an asylum."

"For yourself?"

"For myself. Do you not recognize me—me—Juan?"

At these words, the barber closed the window, but only to open the door quickly.

"Enter! enter!"

The moment Juan entered the shop, he thought he heard distinctly the tramp of feet in the street. He cared little now; he was in a place of safety. Gongarello overwhelmed him with caresses and questions. Juan told him all. The poor faithful barber was in despair, for he laid all Juan's misfortunes upon his clumsiness in placing the letter under the dial. He wept, for he believed he always brought misfortune upon the young man, whom he loved like a child.

Juan told him he must rest, and then set forth for Madrid. Gongarello gave him his own bed, and watched over his slumbers. When Juan awoke, feeling refreshed by his rest, a nice supper was prepared for him, and Gongarello's mule ready harnessed at the door. Before leaving, Gongarello raised a glass to his lips.

"To your health, to your happiness and success. Monk in dress, but not in heart. You are always a Moor—one of our brothers."

"You have said truly!" cried Juan.

They got into the carriage, and Gongarello took the reins.

"Will you conduct me safely to Madrid?"

"I swear it to you!" cried the barber.

But, by misfortune, he could not keep his oath. The unpromising carriage had hardly gone through one street, before three or four men on horseback surrounded it and stopped it. The barber was ordered to alight, and one of the men sprang into the carriage by the side of Juan, and made the mule set off at a round trot, while the others followed behind, leaving poor Gongarello stunned with the mishap. He said only to himself, as he saw his friend carried off: "Ah, the poor young man! it is certainly I who bring him misfortune!"

"I am lost!" said Juan, to himself. "I should have thought that Father Jerome and Escobar, knowing my friendship with Gongarello, would surround his shop with spies and guards. The house of a friend was the last place where I should have gone. It is no longer a dungeon—a prison in the Inquisition that awaits me; it is death. I would not care, if I could save Alitea."

The carriage, meanwhile, was moving on, and Sevilla began to be astonished that they did not reach the convent of Alcala. His companion said not a word, but holding the reins, made the poor mule go faster than he had ever been made to go in his life before. Day began to break, and Juan perceived that they were on the outskirts of Madrid. Six o'clock sounded, and the carriage stopped before a dark, sombre-looking building. It was the palace of the Inquisition.

CHAPTER XXX.

THE HALLS OF THE INQUISITION, AND PALACE GARDENS.

Juan was led into the judgment hall. The grand judge Escovedo began a preliminary questioning.

"You are Juan Sevilla?"

"Yes, my father."

"And I am to imprison you for having refused the baptism?"

"I have been baptized."

"Ah!" said the judge, astonished; "that is singular. Then I am to imprison you—you only a layman—for having worn the dress of a monk, in which you were taken."

"But I have pronounced my vows; I am a monk," said Sevilla.

"Ah! that is still more singular," said the judge. "Then I am to imprison you for having escaped from the convent of Jesuits, to which you belonged."

"But I am not a Jesuit, and do not wish to belong to their order."

"By Saint Inigo!" said the judge, impatiently, "it is necessary to imprison you for something, and I will. I imprison you for not being one of our order."

"On the contrary," cried Juan, "I, too, ask to be one. I will, if you wish, belong to the order of Dominicans."

"Is it possible?"

"The one or the other, little matter, provided I am set at liberty the same moment."

"I will inscribe your demand," said Escovedo, "and you shall be a Dominican; but free—I cannot tell that. You were brought here to be imprisoned; more than that, I must write to say that you are. I must refer it to the authority of the superior."

"And for me—it is necessary for me to be free!" cried Juan, in despair.

"The affair must be placed before the superior court of the Inquisition, who will submit it to the grand inquisitor. A month at the most you will have to wait."

"A month!" cried Juan,—"a month! And during that time," he said to himself, "the countess—and Alitea! It will be too late. I cannot then save them. My brother," he added, aloud, "it is necessary that I go this moment; it is an affair of the greatest importance—the life of some one."

"The Inquisition does not meddle in that."

"Ah, well," replied Sevilla, struck with a sudden thought, "tell the grand inquisitor that I ask to see the Count de Lerma. I have a revelation to make to him—to him—to himself, a disclosure which interests the safety of the state and the fate of the minister."

"Ah, bah!" said the judge; "tell it to me, then."

"I have told you I will confide it only to himself. You know now how necessary it is for me to leave, or, at least, to be conducted to him in the palace; and if you will not do it, it is you, senior judge, who will be responsible for all the misfortunes which will arise."

"That is different!" exclaimed Manuêl Escovedo. "You announce a thing which demands consideration. Lend the prisoner," said he, to the familiars of the Inquisition, "to prison, merely for form's sake. I go to lay the subject before the good fathers. Adieu, my brother, for a little while."

But a whole week passed before the judge spoke to his companions, and Juan waited despairingly within the walls of the Inquisition, and the life of Alitea was menaced.

Alitea, a widow, free, and as Duchess de Santarem, offered Carmina a home with herself, where she might be free from the machinations of the countess. Carmina remained with her sister and friend until her marriage, which Alitea did all in her power to bring about, and the countess used all her efforts to break off. Alitea, placed between the king, who loved her, and the queen, who was her benefactress, now stood a good chance of having all her wishes granted. Already she had gained the release and pardon of Yezid her brother, and thinking nothing of herself, she used her power solely for the benefit of her friends. The heart of Alitea was sad, and filled with great anxiety for Juan. She knew there was no power so high or great in Spain as to be able to break religious vows, no matter by what means the vows had been obtained. The bright hopes with which her heart had been filled upon becoming a widow, and free, were now dashed to the ground. Juan was a monk; no power on earth could free him from the bonds, and she wept bitterly when she thought that through devotion and love for herself and brother he had been led to pronounce these vows. Dearer than ever he grew to her heart, and knowing that she had nothing more to hope on earth, she applied all her energies to making others happy. With anger and fear, the Countess Altamira beheld the great influence Alitea was gaining over all. The king refused her nothing; the queen loved her like a child.

One day, after having passed a restless night, Alitea entered a little pavilion communicating with the apartments of the queen, and opening also upon the garden. The day was warm, and a soft lulling wind came through the open garden door, and Alitea, overcome with fatigue, threw herself upon a couch, and was soon sound asleep. Junnata, who was with her, placed by her side a little table, on which she left a glass of iced lemonade, that her young mistress might partake of it upon her awakening. Then she softly left her. Alitea slept; a dream showed her Juan, holding out to her his arms to protect and defend her.

Light steps were heard upon the gravel walk; a dress flittered among the trees. Alitea did not awake. A woman appeared at the door which opened upon the garden. It was the Countess Altamira. She stopped when she saw Alitea, and looked fixedly at her for some minutes. Then she grew pale and trembled. No one had seen the countess enter the garden. Alitea slept; she was alone,—and that glass so near her!

The countess looked about her attentively; no one. She listened; no noise, not a step; all was silent, except her heart, whose beatings she could almost hear. She hastened; she seized a crystal flask she always carried about her, opened it, and her hand trembled. But she looked at Alitea; she was so exquisitely lovely in her sleep, that the sight brought back all the rage of the countess, all her courage. She put into the glass a drop, and then more, more still. She then ran to the other side of the park, walked for a few minutes, meeting and conversing with some ladies of honor.

Alitea slept on calmly, and the full glass remained near her, untouched.

"She will not wake!" said the countess, with anger. And she was tempted to make some noise to disturb her, but prudence held her silent; and fearing to be seen looking at her enemy, she left her again, and ascended to the apartments of the palace, sustained with the Count de Lerma a conversation which seemed eternal, and was astonished on looking at the clock to find that five minutes had scarcely passed. She summoned all her resolution to keep up this punishment fifteen minutes; but being able to stand it no longer, she descended again to the park, and her heart beat with great violence as she approached the pavilion and cast into it a hasty glance. Alitea was no longer there, and the glass was empty!

Some days after this scene, the judge Manuêl Escovedo received an order from the grand inquisitor to bring Juan Sevilla to the palace of the Count de Lerma. Sevilla, upon the arrival of this letter, saw at last the doors open before him. All the torments he had suffered in his life, and they had not been few, were nothing to be compared to the agonies of the last eight days.

He was near Alitea, and could not aid her. Death was hanging over her, and he could not avert it. But at last he was free; he would watch over her. He signed all that was presented to him, and the new brother of the Dominicans was led to the palace of the king, for it was there that the Count de Lerma dwelt, not from pride, but from prudence, to keep under his hand always his royal slave. Juan waited a long time, for the count gave an audience to-day.

At last the gates opened. Juan saw a man richly dressed, of a noble form and bearing. Juan was astonished at his youth, and made a remark to that effect to his companion.

"You do not know the count, then? Ah, well; that is not he, but another, who transacts much of his business,—his political major-domo. It is his private secretary, Don Rodrigo de Calderon, count of Alvarez. When the minister cannot give audience, it is Don Rodrigo who is charged with it."

The under favorite advanced slowly. Many awaited him, and Juan saw with affright the large number who could only apply in order. The Count de Bivar was the tenth on the list, and next to him stood Juan. Wholly occupied with his thoughts, Sevilla had left without perceiving it the audience hall. In his agitation, he had walked on, and found himself, without intending it, in the palace gardens. He suddenly came upon a tall man of distinguished air, who was calling a bouquet of flowers. Seeing Juan, he exclaimed:

"Who are you? What do you wish?"

And noticing the dress of a monk of Saint Dominica, he stopped and bowed profoundly.

"Pardon, senior cavalier," said Sevilla; "I have lost myself in this park, and if you are, as I think, from the palace—"

"Yes, yes—I am," said the unknown, smiling.

"Deign, then, to point out to me the way to the audience hall."

"You have an audience, then, to-day?"

"That is to say, I would obtain one at the price of my blood, but I cannot. It is the most difficult thing in the world."

"Perhaps I might aid you," replied the unknown.

"Thanks—a thousand thanks! Ah, well; can you aid me to speak a few moments to the Count de Lerma—to the count himself?"

"At this moment it is difficult; but I can, if you wish, let you speak to the king."

"That is not the same thing," said Juan.

The unknown blushed and said:

"Pardon, my father; it is all I can do for you."

"It is the same," quickly cried Juan. "I accept; and even now I think it is better. I have something to tell which the king ought to know."

"Come, then," said the unknown; "follow me."

As they walked side by side through the shaded alley, the unknown asked his name.

"Juan Sevilla, or rather now, Brother Louis Sevilla."

"You?"

And the unknown stopped and looked so attentively at Juan that the young man was disconcerted. He never knew that his name, so obscure, could produce such an effect.

"Is it you whom the reverend fathers of Jesus made a monk in spite of himself, as I was told by Don Fernand d'Albayda?"

"Yes, senior; but I do not remember having seen you before."

"Never; this is the first time; but Fernand d'Albayda is your friend, and then you know the Duchess de Santarem?"

"It is of her I wish to speak to the king."

"Is it possible! Speak—speak!" quickly said the unknown. "What do you wish for her?"

"To protect her—to defend her. Her life is threatened."

"By whom?" cried the unknown, while his face grew purple with rage.

Juan was about to tell him, when his companion bade him be silent. He saw before him in one of the by-paths a group of young officers and young lords, who bowed respectfully.

"Fernand d'Albayda," said the unknown to one of them, and making a sign with his hand, "come here."

At this name, Sevilla trembled with joyful surprise, and Fernand was equally moved at seeing the friend he believed lost in the palace grounds.

"Juan!" cried he; "Juan near your majesty?"

"The king!" said Sevilla, stupefied.

"Himself," replied Philip, re-entering a shaded path, where none could hear them. "I have promised you should speak to the king, and I will keep my word. Speak, then, but do not repeat them to any one, not even the Count de Lerma. It is you and Fernand d'Albayda who alone shall execute my orders. Wherever may be the enemies of the Duchess de Santarem, in whatever rank, name them, and I will give an instant order for their arrest."

"And I will execute your orders, sire," said Fernand, with great warmth and eagerness.

Juan was silent. Hearing Fernand speak so, a crowd of ideas which he had not thought of before rushed to his mind. The guilty ones he was about to name were not only Father Jerome and Escobar, but the Countess Altamira and the Duke d'Uzede. The countess was the aunt of Fernand d'Albayda and of Carmina; she was the sister of Don Juan. To accuse her was to bring shame and dishonor on the family.

"Sire," said he, "and you, Fernand, listen to me. I hope you will not doubt the truth of my words. I swear to them, as a man—as a priest; I swear to them before God and before you, that I know all who are engaged in the vile plot, and that I cannot name them."

"Why conceal their names?" cried Fernand, in wrath.

Sevilla looked at his friend with his dark, mournful eyes, in which there was the shadow of an unutterable sorrow and sadness, and replied to him:

"My duty—for sacred reasons."

"You heard it in the confessional, my father," said the king; "but if you do not tell us, how can we protect the duchess?"

"I alone can do that, sire," said Juan, "and I swear to save her, or to die. The place of queen's confessor is vacant; nominate me to the place. I can then be near the duchess, to watch over her always and warn her."

"You shall have it," said the king, joyfully. Then he added, with a discouraged air: "But I have promised that the Count de Lerma shall dispose of it,—appoint whom he sees fit."

"That is nothing," replied Juan, modestly; "if your majesty is willing, and wishes it, I think that I shall be able to gain the consent of the Count de Lerma."

"You have my permission and good wishes. The count approaches; we leave you to him to plead your own cause, but we will help you if you need aid."

CHAPTER XXXI.

THE COUNT AND MONK.

THE count approached slowly, seeking to divine who was the second person with the king. He had from afar recognized Don Fernand, but the face of the young monk he had never seen.

"My dear count," said the king, advancing towards him, "here is a young monk who has a demand to make of you, a demand which we approve of."

He saluted the count, bowed graciously to Juan, and continued his walk with Fernand. The count, left alone with Juan, looked at him with a stern eye, which would have disconcerted any other solicitor. Juan was occupied with other thoughts.

"Well," said the count, seeing Juan did not speak.

"Well, senior, as his majesty has told you, I have something to ask of your excellency."

"Can't have it," grumbled the count, who had not listened.

"You do not know what I ask yet, senior."

"Is it a situation?"

"Yes, senior."

"All are given away."

"Then, senior, I will ask permission to do you a service."

"A service to me?"

"Yes, senior."

"Who are you?"

"Brother Louis Sevilla."

"Juan Sevilla!" exclaimed the count, looking at him from head to foot.

"Again that name produces an effect," thought Juan.

"It was you, then, who asked to have an audience with me, to make an important revelation?"

"On which depends your safety, senior."

"Ah, well; you saw Calderon. That was sufficient."

"No; I can tell only your excellency yourself. I waited two hours in the ante-chamber, then left, and unconsciously found my way here."

"And what you wish to reveal to me," said the count, with scorn, "you told to the king."

"To no one, senior; it interests only you."

The count slackened his pace. A benevolent smile spread over his face. He made Juan a sign to walk by his side.

"Speak, my brother; I will listen to you."

In a low voice, Juan recounted his knowledge of a plot against him, and the name of the leader made it more astonishing, more inexplicable.

"What is his name? Who is the leader?" asked the count.

Juan's voice grew almost inaudible, and he said:

"Your son, the Duke d'Uzede!"

The unhappy father uttered a cry, and covered his face with his hands.

"I have told you, señor, what must appear to you impossible."

"All is possible—here!" murmured the count, in a deep voice. Juan had uttered the first cry—a cry of grief; but it was the minister who turned to him an eye filled with rage, and seizing his hand firmly, said:

"I am doubtful. Finish, my father."

In as few words as possible, Juan related all of the plot he had learned while in the supper-room of the convent of Alcala de Henares, and the consciousness and straightforwardness of the recital carried conviction with it. The count felt that every word was true.

"I thank you always. Adieu. Ah! what place did you wish?"

"None now; you have said there was none vacant," said Juan quietly.

"Perhaps some may become vacant."

"No matter now to me. I wished but one; no other."

"Which?"

"That of confessor to the queen."

The count, seeking to hide his embarrassment, replied with hesitation:

"That does not depend upon me; it depends upon the grant inquisitor. You belong to his order; the order of Saint Dominic. But for such a little time—since but a few days, I think—"

"This morning only."

"And you ask for one of the first places at court. It is necessary for that to have rendered services—"

"I have not done any, señor."

"How? That which you appreciated me of—"

"Was of little importance," coldly said Juan, "and was nothing extraordinary. It was only a minister to be overthrown by an ungrateful son. That which remains to be made known to you is just as important, for it has to do with the safety of Spain."

"What do you say?"

"That Spain is lost if you do not hasten, and perhaps it is already too late."

Juan then detailed to the count the designs of Henry IV.,—designs which the count did not suspect. Not a vessel was ready, not an army on foot, not even a body of troops to protect the frontier; and Henry IV. commenced already to execute his designs.

The minister, pale and hardly breathing, tried vainly to hide his anxiety from Juan. Never had greater providence and incapacity been revealed. The minister understood well that he had led Spain to the edge of an abyss, and saw no means of drawing back. Eagerly he demanded where Juan had obtained his knowledge. But that the latter firmly but respectfully refused to tell. Had he spoken to the king?

"Not a word, señor; I have told you so. His majesty troubles himself little with affairs of state."

"Preserve the same silence with all; you promise me?"

"I swear it!"

"You shall be queen's confessor, whatever to the contrary. This morning I will sign the brevet; I have it here."

He was about drawing it from his pocket, when he turned pale and trembled.

"What is it?" inquired Juan, quickly.

"Nothing," replied the count. "Do you not see? It is he who advances."

Juan saw coming towards him the Duke d'Uzede. Juan trembled, for he supposed a terrible scene was about to take place. To his great surprise, the count received his faithless son with a smile upon his lips.

"You come, my dear duke, for that brevet of confessor to the queen, and I am filled with grief; I cannot grant it."

"You promised it to me, my father," said d'Uzede, changing color.

"That is true, but one cannot always keep his promises," coldly answered the count.

"Break your word, señor, to me—your son?"

"Yes, truly. I have good cause. You wish to give the place to Escobar?"

"A man of talent—my confessor."

"I know that well; he who directs your conscience," said the Count de Lerma, with an accent which Juan could alone understand. "But the king prefers a young monk, and obliges me to name the Brother Louis Sevilla."

Juan, who till then had kept his head lowered, raised it, and looked at the Duke d'Uzede with a proud, menacing eye, who, in his turn, remained dumb with surprise and rage. The minister bowed, and proceeded to his apartments.

Seeing the king and Ferdinand walking in the grounds, the Duke d'Uzede, who knew he was in favor with his royal master, ran to him, complaining bitterly of his father's injustice and the insult he had received.

"What!—your father has broken his word, and gives the place he promised you the disposal of to some one himself?" said the king, gaily. "Ah, that will never do! We will see who it is."

Thus talking, they had reached the spot where Juan stood. In a low voice, d'Uzede had told the king it was the monk who stood before them to whom the situation had been given.

"Ah!" Then placing his hand upon the young monk's shoulder, the king said: "We wish all to know that we approve of the choice made by my prime minister; that we hold in high esteem Brother Louis Sevilla, and that we name him to-day first chaplain to the queen, if approved of by my wife," he added, gravely. The king, leaning upon Ferdinand's arm, entered his room.

The Duke d'Uzede, confounded by all he heard, remained alone with Juan, who stepped towards him, and stood face to face with him.

"You wished me to be made a monk, señor; accuse only yourself of my nomination, and remember all the wrong you have done me. Remember my first visit to your hotel. You have need of a little more than care."

Meanwhile, the Count de Lerma, pale and affrighted by what he learned, went to his brother Sandoval. He found him idly dreaming. For many months he had been planning, together with Ribeira, a favorite scheme, a project so useful, so glorious for Spain and the Inquisition,—the expulsion of the Moors. Forced for a time to lay aside this idea, he had never abandoned it. The firm will of the queen, the evident protection she accorded to the Moors, the fear to be at open war with her, had kept him from making any stir in the affair. But the torrents long bound break all barriers at last, and rush forth.

PERSIAN INFANTRY.

The two prelates had not renounced their prey. They awaited some occasion to seize it, and Sandoval thought the time had come. According to him, the love of the queen for Alitea had made the influence of the queen real. To these fine plans the Count de Lerma put a stop. A persecution against the Moors was impossible, for the love of the king, the Duchess de Santarem, was a Moor, the daughter of Don Delascor d'Alberque. That did not deter the inquisitor, for he thought he could frighten the king into signing the edict by threatening him with the thunders of the pope, the cardinals and excommunication.

The prime minister listened to him impatiently, then interrupted him by disclosing the facts that Juan had revealed to him. The grand inquisitor was confounded. Long they conversed together, and in that moment the count would agree to everything, and swore if the war with Henry IV. did not take place, to accomplish the expulsion of the Moors.

Juan now was left free, powerful and protected in the palace where he had entered a prisoner. Confessor to the queen, protected by the king, he would be near Alitea to protect her. Again he had power over the all-powerful Count de Lerma,—he, the adventurer, the Bohemian, the obscure Juan, had arrived, and without his will, as you might say, at one of the highest places in the kingdom, next to the king. His thoughts were not occupied with any ambitious designs; he thought only of Alitea, and how to save her; even now it might be too late. So, before going to the hotel of Santarem to see Alitea, he left the palace, and directed his steps to the abode of the Countess Altamira. The countess was ill, and did not receive any one.

"She must receive me," replied the monk, in a menacing voice. "Tell her that I am Louis Sevilla."

That name produced the accustomed effect. The countess, frightened and astonished by such a visit, ordered the young man to enter.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

PERSIAN IRREGULAR TROOPS.

The engraving on this page delineates a group of Persian infantry, and serves to give us an idea of the Eastern warriors who are called upon to play a conspicuous part in the struggle now waging in the East. Their costume is peculiar. The tall cap is a distinguishing feature. The tunics, so different from the close-fitting coats worn by European troops, allow the limbs free and easy play. The principal weapon of these troops is a musket with an exceedingly long and slender barrel, like those in use among the Arabs. The Orientals generally affect these long barrels, though the experience of Europeans has long ago decided that there is no advantage in this great length. The Persian infantry are very fair soldiers, but their cavalry is particularly renowned, especially the horsemen of the tribes of Bakhtiari and Mamacein. The men of these two tribes, who inhabit the west of Farsistan and the limits of the ancient Susiana, bear, in their bronzed faces, the unquestionable proof of their ancient origin. Tall, slender and vigorous, they have high foreheads, straight noses, and black and sparkling eyes. Their jet black shining hair falls on their shoulders in two carefully curled tresses. A cap of yellow felt, a tunic girt about the waist, gaiters, and often a long cloak called aba, form their costume. A formidable belt, ornamented with silver, holds a pair of enormous pistols, a gama or poignard, a knife, a whole arsenal, in fact, of murderous weapons. All their care is lavished on the number and luxury of their arms. As horsemen, they merit the praises which Xenophon lavished on their ancestors. Though their style of riding is very different from that of English or American horsemen, they are quite as graceful and firm in the saddle. Nothing is more curious than a tournament by a party of these semi-barbarian troops. They push their small and nervous horses to the top of their speed, and in the midst of a furious mêlée, let fly a cloud of arrows, which they pick up under the bellies of their horses without being dismounted, and which they discharge Parthian-like in full career. In this respect, they remind us of the equestrian feats of our Camanches. From the skill of the horsemen and the vigor of the horses, accidents rarely occur in these warlike sports, which give us an image of the Scythian and Parthian combats ages ago. These wild horsemen often sleep and smoke in the saddle, even when climbing the perilous passes of their native mountains. In his irregular infantry and cavalry, the shah will find a formidable resource for his military operations.

AMERICAN WILD FLOWERS.

It is a fashionable, but false remark, that in America we have neither singing birds nor fragrant flowers. We have already shown, as we believe, that we are well supplied with singing birds; and it is equally true that we have an abundance of fragrant flowers. What can be more delightful than the Mayflower, or trailing Arbutus,—an exclusive American, that refuses to be transplanted? The Bulbus Arethusa, which comes a few weeks later, is exceedingly rich and aromatic in its capricious fits of odor. The Pagonia, a few weeks later, has a more constant and sweeter scent, though not so spicy. As June wears away, our white pond lily comes into blossom. Who was ever satiated with smelling it? What flower could be more popular and more thoroughly enjoyed than this by American people? There is not one flower in Europe, not even the violet, whose scent gives, in the course of the season, so much pleasure to so many people. On the 4th of July, we may gather, in the rich swamp, the Magnolia Glauca, one single flower of which will fill the house with delicious perfume. By this time, also, our native grapes are in blossom, and a ride through the woods, where these are growing, will make violet and mignonette seem poor forever. The white Azalea also load the air of July with its riches. In August, the Clethra throws on its long white spikes, which fill the air with sweet perfume; and the Apies, while concealing its purple clusters under the green leaves, reveals their presence to every passing traveller, by the fragrance that floats to him in the wind: almost precisely like the grape blossom six weeks before. Need we enumerate further? We have in our land a thousand treasures which have been too much neglected,—treasures of fragrance, melody and beauty, which are worth as much to us, if we would enjoy them, as our mines of gold, or granaries loaded with corn.—Waltham Sentinel

Proper secrecy is the only mystery of able men; mystery is the only secrecy of weak and cunning ones.

A SHOP AT CAIRO.

EASTERN DOMESTIC ARCHITECTURE.

We present on this page a series of neatly executed engravings illustrating the style of domestic architecture in the East, the specimens being taken principally from the city of Cairo. In the private houses of Cairo the foundation walls, to the height of the first floor, are eased with a yellowish kind of stone, the alternate courses of the front being sometimes colored red and white, particularly on large houses. The superstructure, the front of which generally projects about two feet, and is supported by corbels and piers, is of brick, and often plastered. The bricks so employed are burned, and of a dull red color; the mortar is a mixture of mud, lime and ashes. The roof is flat and is covered with plaster. Terraces are often made on the house-tops, and there the inmates spend many hours in the cool of the day, and frequently sleep there at night. The entrance door is frequently ornamented in some such way as the one sketched in our second engraving, being fancifully colored with red, white and blue paint, and inscribed with some Mohammedan verse or moral maxim in the Arabic character. The poorer classes of houses, however, have unpainted doors, much less elegant in their appearance. An iron knocker, a wooden lock, and a stone doorstep, generally constitute part of the arrangements. The windows of these houses are very differently placed from those to which we are accustomed. The windows of the ground floor are a kind of small wooden grating, placed far above the heads of persons walking through the streets; those of the upper apartments project a good deal, and are formed of wooden lattice-work, so close as to render it impossible for persons on the outside to see what is going on within; they are generally unpainted, but are sometimes enlivened by a variety of colors. Some projecting windows are wholly constructed of boards, but a few have frames of glass; as a general rule, however, the windows are unprovided with this material. Most of the houses are either two or three stories in height; and almost every house of moderate size has an open central court, called a kho'ah, which is entered by a winding passage from the street, the windings being intended to prevent overlooking from the street. In the passage, within the door, is a long stone seat. In the open court is a well of water, which filters through the soil from the Nile; and on its shaded side are water-jars for containing fresh water. The principal apartments look into this court, the walls of which are plastered and whitewashed; and there are also many doors opening from it into the various apartments of the house. In our last engraving we see the general appearance which the courtyard of such a house presents. On the ground floor there is generally an apartment appropriated to the reception of male visitors; this has a wide, wooden, grated window next the court. The general floor of this apartment is called the beew'an, while a smaller portion, having often a fountain in the centre, is called the doorba' ah. The beew'an, or general floor, is usually paved with common stone, covered with a mat in summer, and a carpet over the mat in winter; the walls are plastered and whitewashed; and there are, generally, in the walls two or three shallow cupboards or recesses. Such an apartment, accurately delineated in our third engraving, is usually provided with cushioned seats. In those streets of Cairo where shops occupy the lower floor of the building, the upper floors are let out in distinct apartments. One of these shops with its curious cushioned recess for the proprietor, where he is seen smoking his pipe, is shown in our first engraving. These lodgings are separate from each other, as well as from the shop below. Each lodging comprises one or two sitting or sleeping rooms, and generally a kitchen; it seldom has a separate entrance from the street, one entrance and one staircase usually admitting to a range of several lodgings. The humbler classes of dwellings in Cairo are of rather a mean description, being usually built of unbaked bricks cemented together with mud. They mostly comprise two or three apartments, but have seldom two stories in height. In Lower Egypt the peasants' houses have generally, in one of the rooms, an oven, at the end farthest from the entrance, and occupying the whole width of the room; it resembles a wide bench or seat, and is about breast high; it is constructed of brick and sand, the roof arched within and flat on the top. The inhabitants, who seldom have any night covering, sleep during the winter on the top of the oven, having previously lighted a fire within it. The chambers have small apertures, high upon the walls, for the admission of light and air, sometimes furnished with a grating of wood. Cairo, where our sketches were taken, is a highly interesting city. It is called by the Arabs El Kahireh (the victorious). It is the capital city of Egypt, the vice-royal residence, and is situated near the right bank of the Nile, and five miles from the commencement of the Delta. The architecture of the city is, as our engravings show, peculiar. The city covers a space about three miles broad and three miles long. It is surrounded by antique battlements and stone walls, with several gateways and lofty towers. Cairo is divided into several distinct quarters, according to the religion and race of its inhabitants, as the Coptic quarter, the Jews' quarter and the Frank quarter, which are separated by gates. The streets are narrow and ill-conditioned, but many of the houses are lofty and elegant. The most remarkable edifices are splendid remains of the Arabs and the ancient sultans of Egypt. Among these are from 300 to 400 mosques, many of which, like those of the Sultan Hassan, have very graceful minarets. Several of the ancient gates are curious and rich. The palace and well of Joseph, and an extensive aqueduct are quite remarkable. At Old Cairo are the seven towers, still called the "Granary of Joseph," and serving their ancient purpose. The site of Cairo is said to be that of the Babylon of Cambrases, built on the ruined site of the pre-existing Latopolis of the Egyptians. The present city was founded by the Arabs about A. D. 970; its citadel was built by Saladin in 1176; it was the capital of the sultan of Egypt till the time of the Turkish conquest in 1507. Since that time it has been the residence of the pashas, governors of the province. The French captured it during Bonaparte's famous Egyptian campaign in 1798. The population, including the suburbs, is about a quarter of a million. A painter and architect of eminence who passed six months in Cairo, informed us that he thought no city of the East better repaid a residence for the purpose of artistic study.

DISCOVERIES IN AFRICA.

The discoveries of Dr. Livingstone in Africa are considered of great commercial value. He lived with a tribe of Bechuanas for eight years, and, in co-operation with Mr. Oswald, discovered Lake Ngami. He traced by himself the course of the great river Zambezi, in Eastern Africa, and extending two thousand miles. This immense stream, whose discovery is the great fruit of the journey, is in itself an enigma without parallel. But a small portion of its waters reach the seacoast. Like the Abyssinian Nile, it falls through a basaltic cleft, near the middle of its course, which reduces its breadth from 1000 to 20 yards. Above these falls it spreads out periodically in a great sea, filling hundreds of lateral channels; below it is a tranquil stream of a totally different character. Its months seem to be closing. The southernmost was navigable when the Portuguese first arrived in the country, 300 years ago, but it has long since ceased to be practicable. The Quillimane mouth has of late years been impassable, even for a canoe, from July to February, and for 200 or 300 miles up the river navigation is never attempted in the dry season. And in this very month of July, when the lower portion of the river, after its April freshet, has sunk to a mere drizzle, above the falls the river spreads out like a sea over hundreds of square miles. This, with frequent cataracts, and the hostility of the natives, would seem to be an effectual bar to the high hopes of fat trade and filibustering in which English merchants and journals are now indulging. During this unprecedented march, alone and among savages, to whom a white face was a miracle, Dr. Livingstone was compelled to struggle through indescribable hardships. The hostility of the natives he conquered by his intimate knowledge of their character and the Bechuanas tongue, to which theirs is related. He waded rivers, and slept in the sponge and ooze of marshes, being often so drenched as to be compelled to turn his armpit into a watch-pocket. His cattle were destroyed by the terrible tsetse fly, and he was too poor to purchase a canoe. Lions were numerous, being worshipped by many of the tribes as the receptacles of the departed souls of their chiefs; dangerous, too, as his crushed arm testifies. However, he thinks the fear of African wild beasts greater in England than in Africa. Many of his documents were lost while crossing a river, in which he came near losing his life also, but he has memoranda of the latitudes and longitudes of a multitude of cities, towns, rivers and mountains, which will go far to fill up the "unknown region" in our atlases. Toward the interior he found the country more fertile and more populous. The natives worshipped idols, believed in transmigrated existence after death, and performed religious ceremonies in groves and woods. They were less ferocious and suspicious than the sea-board tribes, and had a tradition of the deluge and more settled governments. Some of them practised inoculation, and used quinine, and all were eager for trade, being entirely dependent on English calico for clothing, a small piece of which would purchase a slave. Their language was sweet and expressive. Although their women, on the whole, were not well treated, a man having as many wives as he chose, they were complete mistresses of their own houses and gardens, which the husband dared not enter in his wife's absence. They were fond of show and glitter, and as much as $150 had been given for an English rifle. On the arid platens of the interior, water melons supplied the place of water for some months of the year, as they do on the plains of Hungary in summer. A quaker tribe, on the river Zambesi, never fight, never have consumption, scrofula, hydrophobia, cholera, small pox, or measles. These advantages, however, are counterbalanced by the necessity of assiduous devotion to trade and raising children to make good their loss from the frequent inroads of their fighting neighbors. The discoveries of Dr. Livingstone will doubtless prepare the way for still further researches in this before almost unknown quarter of the world, and thus open the interior of a continent hitherto regarded as excluded from human occupancy.—Live.

ENTRANCE TO A PRIVATE HOUSE, CAIRO.

OPEN APARTMENT, CAIRO.

COURT OF A PRIVATE HOUSE, CAIRO.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

"KEEP THY HEART YOUNG."

BY FRANK FREELOVE.

There are moments that cause the young heart to wax old—
Moments that turn the locks gray;
There are shadows that float o'er the stern and the bold,
Chasing life's sunlight away.
Then keep thy heart young while ye may, ye may;
Keep thy heart young while ye may;
Youth is a gala-boat—life is a stream:
The pinace glides fair to-day!

There are moments that make the old heart again young—
Moments that make us smile gay;
But the visions, like light on a crumbling tomb,
Glint wildly, fitfully gay.
We'll keep our hearts young while we may, we may;
Keep our hearts young while we may;
Love is a phantom—hope but a gleam,
Deceiving on our way!

There are moments that make us grow happy, and feel
That happy we'll be alway;
And these visions celestial around us that steal,
Though floating so swiftly away,
Say, "Keep thy heart young while ye may, ye may;
Keep thy heart young while ye may;
Visions of heaven are renewing your youth—
In heaven are they young alway!"

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE YOUNG CARPENTER'S FIRST CRIME.

BY EMMA CARRA.

"I AM very hungry, mother," said a flaxen-haired boy, with a pale, sunken cheek. "O, I am so hungry," he continued, "that if you will only give me a piece of bread I will get right into my trundle-bed and say nothing more to you to-night!"

The young mother unlaced his thin arms from her neck, and looking into his face with an expression of woe, whispered:

"I'll look again, darling; perhaps I may have overlooked a piece." And rising, she stepped quickly across the uncarpeted floor, and opened a closet door.

In a moment she returned, with her cheek a trifle paler, for her search was unsuccessful. Embracing her child, she said, gently: "Go to bed now, Freddy, and don't tell father you are hungry, and then I will go over to Mrs. Potter's and ask her to lend me some change to buy you some bread."

"O, I can't, mother," replied the boy, returning her kiss; "I can't go to bed. I will sit here and wait till you come back, but I won't tell father I am hungry!"

The mother again embraced her child, and then taking from a table her shawl and bonnet, she was about going into the street. Near the half-warm stove sat a dark-complexioned, muscular man; his garments were coarse but neat, and they fitted well on his finely-developed form. A half hour had passed since he first took that seat, and yet he had not spoken to his wife or child; but now, as she was wrapping her shawl about her, he sprang from his seat like one awakening from a dream.

"Stop, Lucy!" he said; "you must not go out in such a storm as this. If you want anything from without I will get it for you."

"I won't be gone but a minute, Frederick," replied the wife.

"No, no, Lucy, you must not go," he continued, gently taking the shawl from her and leading her back.

"But sonny is hungry, Frederick," remonstrated the wife, scarcely knowing what remark she made in her anxiety to procure food for her child.

"Then I am the one to supply him. Or it were better for us all to die here by starvation than for you to perish alone without." And snatching his warm overcoat and cap from a nail in the corner of the room, he hastily opened the outer door and went into the street.

"O, don't cry, mother," said Freddy, again encircling her neck, as he saw her lift the white curtain and peer through the frosty window into the street and then turn away and burst into tears. "I will go to bed, and maybe when I am asleep I shall dream about having nice cakes and pies, and then I shan't feel hungry."

"That's a good boy, darling," replied the mother; and reaching him his night dress, she bade him not touch the light while she was gone out, and then hastily seizing her shawl and bonnet she too went into the street.

There was a large brick mansion opposite the low wooden house where Frederick Baldwin's family lived, and on the evening with which our tale commences the wide blinds to the windows were thrown back, and through the richly embroidered muslin curtains streamed forth dazzling rays of gas-light, causing the cold surface of the pure snow in the streets to sparkle and glitter like many of the tiaras worn by the wealthy throng within. This was a festive night at Mr. Holloman's mansion, for it was the bridal evening of the wealthy tradesman's daughter, and a large number of invited guests had assembled. Light hearts sent forth merry echoes that grated harshly on the ear of the penniless husband as he passed beneath the window, and with a blanched cheek he muttered a deep curse that fortune had distributed her gifts so unequally.

"My poor wife and child," he said, "must try to seek repose with hunger gnawing at their vitals, while within hearing of their voices even the dogs are better fed. If I had refused to labor I might hear it better; but when for days and days I have been from place to place and asked, ay, almost begged for work and been refused, it maddens me. Curse the sordid wretches who riot in wealth, while I and those I love must starve! No, no; I will not bear it. Mr. Holloman has plenty—he must divide." And with a bitter laugh he passed on.

He did not notice the light footfall of his wife behind him as he went on, so busy was he with his strange thoughts. On and on he went till he came to a large block, and then he darted down a narrow court, and was lost to the view of the watcher who had thus far followed him, keeping but a few rods behind. A loud sigh escaped Mrs. Baldwin as she saw her husband disappear in the direction of the rear of Mr. Holloman's large store, but she dared not follow him further for fear that something might happen to her child, whom she had left alone; and besides, she wanted to call at Mrs. Potter's, and if she were absent too long she thought her husband might return ere she had time to do her errand; so turning in an opposite direction from that her husband had taken, the wife and mother hurried on, and in a few moments she stood within her friend's neatly furnished parlor.

"Mary," she said to the pleasant hostess, "I have often needed friends, and sometimes I have been obliged to ask favors of you; but never were my necessities so great as they are to-night, for my child has sought his pillow hungry."

"And has your husband no work yet, Lucy?"

"None, Mary, none—although he has sought for it almost every hour of each day since the shop where he was employed was burnt. You know at this season of the year there are usually so many out of employ who are willing to work for the smallest pittance that I am afraid poor Frederick's efforts will be vain for months to come. Yesterday, unknown to him, I called at various shops and tried to find work for my needle, but O dear, I learned on application for employment that I was not the only one who was destitute in this great city."

"Well, never mind, Lucy," said the friend, cheerfully, "winter will not last always, and when spring comes you know your husband can secure some good place of employment, and when once a person begins to be prosperous favors usually follow on every side."

Mrs. Baldwin tried to smile, but it ended only in contortions of her face, as she answered, faintly:

"Alas! I begin to fear that misfortune will be our lot, for everything has gone so strangely since Frederick first called me wife, although at that time all looked fair and prosperous. First came sickness, when my husband's purse was well nigh drained by the expenses incurred; and then misfortunes ensued, each event small in itself, but all combined weighing heavily; and now, finally, a fire of short duration has consumed his valuable chest of tools and deprived him of labor, the wages of which would have made us comfortable at least."

"O, there is a good time coming," you know, Lucy," said Mrs. Potter, with a cheering smile, rising and going closer to her side. "And," she continued, "I do think it is too bad for you to have so little to do, while I am so hurried in trying to make the children's clothes, that half the time the winter disappears before I can get them fully prepared for the cold season." And going to a closet she took from the shelves various bundles, and rolling all together, gave them into the hands of her visitor, saying: "There are a few aprons and a couple of shirts that I would like to have you make as soon as you can, and when those are done I will have some more work ready for you; not that we are so rich that I wish to hire my sewing done, but you know that I prefer to do all my housework, and when that is done I have but little time to sew; and besides, Erasmus often scolds at me for working so hard, saying that I ought to give up either the one or the other of my employments, seamstress or cook;" and then sinking her hand in her pocket she drew forth her porte-monnaie, and extracting a bill handed it to her caller.

"Heaven bless you, Mary!" exclaimed the destitute wife as she received the welcome money; "and may you never know by experience the gratitude I now feel. Your cheerful manner has inspired me with hope that all will yet be well; so I shall return far happier than when I came;" and again thanking her kind friend, Mrs. Baldwin turned to leave, but Mrs. Potter bade her wait a moment, and taking a basket from an outer room she filled it with various articles of provisions from her closet, not forgetting a few luxuries for Freddy.

As the young wife accepted the gift, saying that she was too poor to refuse it, the mute language of her face expressed more than words could do, and after a little more conversation the two friends separated, both far happier for the benevolence of Mrs. Potter.

"Now I will hurry home," soliloquized Mrs. Baldwin, as she regained the street and drew the veil over her face to keep out the piercing cold; "and I will not be quite so saving of our scant store of fuel, but make a good fire and have the room warm and a good supper prepared for Frederick when he returns. But where can he have gone?" she muttered, half aloud; and stopping suddenly, she turned as if she would go back in the direction she saw him take when she came out, and then once more turning her face homeward, she mused as she quickened her pace: "No, no; I will not suspect him of doing wrong. Surely the deepest poverty will not cause him to forget his honor, or stoop to anything that will tarnish his good name."

In a few moments Mrs. Baldwin stood within her humble home. The lamp was dimly burning where she left it, and she saw by the raised folds of the comforter on the trundle-bed that her darling boy had obeyed her; but he was not sleeping, and as he heard her light footsteps he raised his head from his pillow, saying:

"I have been so lonesome, mother, since you went away, that I almost forgot that I was so hungry, so don't go again."

"I will not, child," replied the mother, taking several cakes from the basket, and kneeling over the low bed she placed them in his hand.

Never did a miser grasp his cherished gold with any more energy than did that half-famished child seize the proffered food; nor did the first gift appease his appetite, for it had been many days since Freddy had eaten aught but stale fragments of bread from a neighboring bakery. It may seem strange to the owner of a full larder that one so athletic as Frederick Baldwin should with his small family suffer for want of food; but let him visit our great city when the snow lies deep on the frozen surface of the earth, and he will find many idle who with their strong hands would gladly work, if it were only to procure bread for the famishing ones at home, but their efforts to find it are vain. The worthy poor seldom beg—they shrink from charity, fearing the taunts of the envious in the future, should they ever break the icy fetters of poverty and soar on the wings of prosperity. But let us return to our story.

When the hunger of the child was appeased he received a good-night kiss from his mother, and then burying his face in the pillow he was soon asleep; while Mrs. Baldwin stepped over the floor with noiseless tread, and soon had a glowing fire in the stove in the adjoining kitchen and the tea-kettle singing its ancient tune preparatory to moistening the tea that had been presented by Mrs. Potter. In a short time an almost luxurious meal was spread neatly on the round table awaiting the coming of the husband. The wife once more looked through the frosty window-panes into the street, and then taking a seat by the table she began sewing on the work given her by her friend.

"'Tis strange that Frederick should stay away so long," she murmured when a half hour or more had passed, and laying by her sewing she turned her ear in the direction of the street. At length, hearing a familiar step on the crisp snow, she sprang from her chair and threw open the outer door.

"You are welcome, dear Frederick," she said, extending her hand, and then continued, "I have been long waiting for you to come and share my present. See," and still holding his hand she led the way to the kitchen.

For several moments the husband did not speak, and Lucy, on looking into his face, perceived that it was very pale, but she pretended that she saw it not, and when he inquired where she obtained those luxuries, she answered, pleasantly:

"O, they are a present from that friend we both love so well, Mrs. Potter; and look here, dear," she continued, holding up the bundle of work she had received, "she has given me all this work to do, and when this is done she says she will give me more;" then taking the bill from her pocket she reached it to him, saying that he could spend it to better advantage than she could.

"God bless you, darling!" exclaimed the husband, as he reluctantly received the money; and then he added: "Would to Heaven that I were worthy of you! but I am not;" and he passed his hand across his brow as if he would fain brush away unpleasant thoughts.

"You are worthy, Frederick," replied the wife, encircling his neck with her white arms, and looking into his face with an expression of love, she added: "Poverty and misfortune, husband, never yet made one unworthy. The manner in which we bear up under these afflictions either adds lustre to our characters or detracts therefrom."

Mr. Baldwin did not reply, but a deep crimson suffused his face, and springing from the chair in which he had seated himself, he paced the room rapidly for a few moments, then returned to his seat. "Away with such thoughts!" he said, mentally; "for they will not give me bread, and I will not sit here idle and see those I love starve." Then divesting himself of his overcoat, he sank his hand into its deep pocket and drawing out several small parcels, he said:

"See here, Lucy, I have brought you some provisions, and I have got a bag of flour, too, outside, but I didn't like to bring it in till I had entered first, to see that you had no company. But I will go out and get it now," and without further remark he left the room, and in a few moments returned with an eighth bag of flour.

A smile was on his features, but it was such a smile as the young wife never saw there before, and a cold shudder ran through her veins as she looked into his face, but she made no inquiries as to where he obtained those articles, but merely remarked:

"I guess you have met with some kind friends in your walk," and then added: "But come, dear, we will talk about those things some other time; now we will partake of this nice supper Mrs. Potter presented us."

"Did she send or bring these things?" inquired the husband, as he now seated himself at the table.

Mrs. Baldwin either was or pretended to be very busy raising various articles from the stove; and she did not answer her husband's question as he did not repeat it. During the meal, Lucy talked cheerfully, and encouraged him by speaking of many other persons whom she thought much more unhappily situated than they were.

"For," said she, "they have not only poverty to encounter but sickness, and many have suffered bereavements, while our little circle remains unbroken and all of us have health."

Mr. Baldwin looked into his wife's face, and once or twice he seemed about to speak, but glancing at the groceries he had brought, his words escaped only in whispers, and in a little while he arose, complaining that he was tired, and pressed his lips to the fair forehead of his wife and then remarked that he would seek his pillow.

"I would," returned the wife, "for you have nothing to detain you: but I think I will remain and sew a little while, for I am no sleepy—so I will enjoy this warm fire."

Then in another moment the wife and mother was alone with her thoughts and her cares. For a long time did Mrs. Baldwin sit by her little stove and sew till the fire began to die out. Faint echoes of music came across the street from the mansion of wealth opposite, and entered the humble dwelling. The little clock on the mantel pointed to midnight; the sounds of revelry had ceased, and the patient wife listened and thought till the heavy breathing of her husband in the adjoining room convinced her that he was sleeping, then cautiously rising, she laid by her work and took into her lap the various packages of groceries that he had brought home.

"He had not a farthing when he went out," she thought, "neither will any one trust him now that he has no prospect of making immediate payment. How could he obtain these things without money and without credit? And besides, his strange manner convinces me that his mind is ill at ease." And in this way did the thoughts of the unhappy wife rove as she turned the bundles in her lap and looked at the various marks on the wrappers. At length a new thought seemed to be gradually revealed to her brain, so with a nervous movement she once more scanned the marks, and as she did so a deeper paleness spread over her features, and she threw the bundles from her into a chair near by as if their touch had been contagion.

"O, God of mercy!" she groined; "it is all plain now. The direction he took, the narrow alley he passed down to the rear of Mr. Holloman's large grocery and provision store, makes it all plain to me now. When he helped to repair a part of the interior of the building he must have observed some spot in the rear that he knew would be easy of ingress, and to-night, in his despair, he has taken advantage of this knowledge and the absence of all from the store, to—O, Heaven have mercy on us! Poverty I could have borne, but to be disgraced by crime—my idolized husband branded as a felon, I cannot bear. He must and shall be saved. I will forget self in trying to save him from the penalty of this dreadful affair, for if exposed before the world, his self-respect would be gone and utter ruin must follow."

A moment later Lucy leaned over the form of her sleeping husband to ascertain that his slumber was real, and it seemed that his crime only made her cling to him more closely, for well she knew that it was committed to save her and their child from want. Retracing her steps to the kitchen and closing the bedroom door after her, she gathered the bundles of groceries in her apron, and hastily throwing a shawl about her went out, locking the outer door after her. The air was very chilly, and the deep drift at the door might at another time have deterred her; but now the young wife heeded them not, for she was too intent on her thoughts and the errand that brought her out. Passing directly across the street, Mrs. Baldwin gave a light rap at the side door of the mansion. Several of the guests she had heard depart within the last hour, their noble steeds driven by lackeys whose situations she almost envied in her destitution.

"Is Mr. Holloman in?" inquired Lucy, drawing her hood in such a manner as to conceal her face.

"He is," replied the servant, "but is very much engaged. If you want to see him you had better call again in the morning, for the guests are now taking their leave."

"I will wait till they are gone," said Lucy, with firmness, and stepping within the door, "for I must see him to-night. Please show me to some room where I can be alone till I can speak with him."

At this moment the servant girl caught a glimpse of the caller's face.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, "is it you, Mrs. Baldwin? If I had known that, I would not have spoken so. I will tell him you are here."

Mrs. Baldwin was a favorite with the kind-hearted Bridget, for in times past she had done her many favors with her needle, which the unskilful girl knew how to appreciate. A few moments later and the sorrow-stricken wife was in a small library leading off from one of the less public rooms of the mansion. Lucy tried to think what she should say when the wealthy business man should enter, but the more she tried to compose her thoughts the more her mind became confused, till the library door was quietly opened and Mr. Holloman entered.

"Did these groceries come from your store, Mr. Holloman?" inquired the wife in a tremulous voice, after the first salutations were over.

The wholesale and retail grocer looked a little confused, and seemed puzzled to think why she should call on such a strange errand at that hour of the night, but he was too gentlemanly to urge her to disclose her business or her motive in calling. Taking a paper of tea and another of sugar in his hands he turned them from side to side and then reached them back, saying:

"Yes, Mrs. Baldwin, these came from my store. They have our private mark on them. When my clerks are at leisure I sometimes have them put up such articles in small parcels to accommodate the poor, who are usually in a hurry when they call." And now curiosity getting the better of him he inquired why she asked.

"Because—be—" faltered the wife, but her tongue refused to speak further, and placing the contents of her apron on a small table near, she burst into tears, and wept as only the truly wretched can weep.

Mr. Holloman was a kind-hearted man; he had spent his youth in poverty, and the lessons he then learned he had never forgotten; so taking the hand of the weeping one in his, he said, soothingly:

"My poor child, something very serious must have taken place to make you grieve so. If I am in any way concerned, pray speak plainly, for it is my nature to sympathize with the unfortunate."

O, what a relief to the unhappy wife were these kind words!

and cushioning back her sofa she told her wealthy neighbor her fears, saying that when her husband left the house she followed but a few rods behind him on her way to seek relief from their present suffering by applying to a friend.

"Why did you not apply to me, Mrs. Baldwin?" inquired the benevolent man.

"Alas!" answered the wife, "it is not every one who has wealth that sympathizes with the poor, and that is why the sensitive so seldom go to them for aid."

Mr. Holloman looked thoughtful, while the wife continued her narrative.

"I should have followed him," continued Mrs. Baldwin, "for I felt anxious about what he might do, but I had left my child alone, and I hurried back, and now I am convinced that he obtained the things dishonestly from your store, but it was our great necessity that made him; and now for the sake of his suffering wife and child, pray forgive him, for all shall be returned immediately. I would rather perish with want, and leave behind me an honest name, than to live in luxury with dishonor attached."

"Noble woman!" exclaimed Mr. Holloman, as he rose from his chair and paced the small apartment, and then after a pause he continued: "For your sake and your child's I would gladly overlook this matter, but if he succeeds well in this, will he not attempt the like again?"

Mrs. Baldwin's face grew deathly pale, and for a few moments the strong man feared her emotion would overcome her, but she soon rallied, and in a hoarse whisper answered:

"No, no; he will not—I know he will not. But O! in mercy to his family is there no chance for him to get employment?"

"I believe he is a carpenter," said Mr. Holloman, looking into the face of his visitor.

"He is," replied the wife; "and had not his tools been destroyed by the fire that consumed the shop where he used to work, he has often said that he might possibly have found employment elsewhere."

Here was another pause of a few moments, and then the trader was the first to speak.

"Go back to your home, child," he said, "you have nothing to fear from me, for I know by experience that grim want will drive a man to do deeds that he would shudder to think of if he possessed the comforts of life. Yes, you can go back now, and to-morrow I will see what I can do to relieve you."

Lucy tried to thank the kind-hearted man, but her words died away in whispers, and wrapping her shawl about her she stepped to the door to leave, but Mr. Holloman called her back and bade her keep the bundles she brought him and also the flour. At first she refused, but when the wealthy grocer urged her, saying the value was but a trifle to him—it was not the worth of what was taken that he minded but the net itself, she accepted the gift, and once more stood in the door with the parcels in her apron. Mr. Holloman wondered why she lingered, but dropping her eyes to the carpet, she said:

"I wish that Frederick might not know of this visit—he is so sensitive. May I—dare I ask you not to let him know that you are acquainted with his dishonesty? This was his first crime. I know it will be his last."

"We will let it all pass," replied Mr. Holloman; "and to-morrow when I call nothing shall be said but what I think will be satisfactory."

Lucy looked her gratitude, but there was a choking sensation in her throat that prevented her utterance, and in a few moments she again crossed the street and stood within her own home. Mr. Baldwin's sleep was often broken during the night by incoherent expressions, and when he awoke his first inquiries were if she had put away the things he had brought in the night previous.

"Yes, dear," replied the wife, who had risen first, "and I have made you some beautiful biscuit from the flour, too."

The husband made no answer, but there was a troubled look on his face, and when she passed them at the table he refused to partake of them, saying that he did not feel as well as usual.

"Mother," said Freddy, who had finished his breakfast and was now looking from the window into the street, "I see Mr. Holloman, the rich man that lives opposite, coming right across the street to our house."

Mr. Baldwin sprang from his chair, and the pallor of death swept over his countenance, and rushing to the outer door he clutched the key as if he fain would lock it.

"I will see what he wants, Frederick," said the wife, turning the knob.

"Do, dear; but don't tell him that I am—"

Mr. Baldwin did not finish the sentence, for the door was quickly opened by his wife, and the neighbor invited to enter.

"Good morning, Mr. Baldwin," said Mr. Holloman, extending his hand.

"Good morning, sir," was repeated by the host, while his face changed alternately from red to an ashy white.

But his agitation passed away as Mr. Holloman went on explaining that he thought of putting up a new building in the spring, dividing it into several tenements, and that he had now called to see if Mr. Baldwin was particularly engaged, for if he were not he would like to have him make the doors, window frames, etc., during the cold season, and then when spring came, if all were satisfactory, he would contract with him to take the entire job.

Mr. Baldwin could not immediately reply, but when he did answer, he said that he should be very happy to do the work, but that he had had the misfortune to lose his entire set of tools.

"That was a misfortune indeed," returned the neighbor; "but if you feel disposed to do the work it shall not hinder you, for I will purchase or hire another chest of tools, and let you have the use of them till such time as you can pay for them; and besides,

I have a little shop in the rear of my store where you can work."

Need we say that this kind offer was gladly accepted by the destitute husband, who nobly strove to make amends in some measure for the past, while the faithful and loving wife was almost overpowered with joy that he had again found lucrative employment; but to the events of that night of poverty she never referred.

When the first payment was made by Mr. Holloman to the carpenter, the latter extracted a five dollar bill from the amount and laid it on his bench, saying:

"You do not owe me that, sir; allow me to return it."

"O, no, no; you are mistaken," replied the grocer. "I cast up our accounts correctly, and find I am debtor to that amount."

Mr. Baldwin said no more, but with a sad, perplexed expression took the money and left the shop. And so week after week went by, and want was no more known at the carpenter's home. Spring came, and the echo of the mechanic's hammer was heard more frequently now, when Mr. Holloman came into the little back shop, and laying down the draft of a plan for a building, said:

"Well, Mr. Baldwin, I suppose it is about time that you and I talked something more about those buildings we were speaking of in the winter."

"Yes," was the reply.

And now with the conversation of the next hour we have nothing to do, for it was all on business, but at the end of that time Mr. Holloman remarked:

"And now our bargain is all settled in regard to your doing the building and my finding the stock. I suppose you will want some advance pay, as of course now you are a boss workman you will hire hands to help you."

Mr. Baldwin smiled, and said he could work to much better advantage if he could be thus favored; and without further remark Mr. Holloman laid a roll of bills on the bench for the carpenter's use. Mr. Baldwin gave a glance at the money and throwing down his chisel he grasped the hand of his benefactor, saying:

"God bless you, my more than friend! I can keep silent no longer. I must confess all; for your kindness has so overcome me that I can no longer endure a guilty conscience." And then in a few words he related to his employer what is already known to the reader concerning his entering Mr. Holloman's store and taking packages from the shelves. "But it was necessity that compelled me," continued the carpenter; "for my poor wife and child were famishing, while all my attempts to get work were vain. But as God is my witness, I did not—I could not taste a morsel of that food. No, I did not become a thief to prolong my own life, but the lives of those I loved."

Great was the astonishment of the carpenter when he learned from Mr. Holloman that both he and Mrs. Baldwin knew all from the first, and that his present prosperity was brought about by her entreaties in his behalf.

"Let it all pass now," said Mr. Holloman. "I am satisfied that nothing but necessity drove you to an act of dishonesty."

"God bless you, my darling wife!" said the husband after returning to his home and relating to her all the conversation that had passed between himself and Mr. Holloman.

Lucy's look of love assured him that to her he was ever the same, in prosperity or adversity; and from this time there was no more want in the carpenter's home.

BIRTHDAY PRESENT OF A TOMSTONE.

The eccentric Orientalist, M. Hammer-Purgstall, who has died recently in Germany, was exceedingly attached to his wife, and the whole effort of his leisure seemed to be the inventing of agreeable surprises for her, in the way of gifts, etc., etc. On one of her birthdays, a few years ago, she chanced to have been confined to her bed for some time with a serious illness, and the fond husband was evidently puzzled to contrive a birthday present suited to her rather doubtful state of health. A week before the anniversary came round, however, a bright thought had dawned upon him, and, keeping it a profound secret, he zealously went about its accomplishment. The day dawned, and madam was raised in bed, and, with great difficulty some toilet was made which should significantly receive the husband's expected visit. The appointed hour sounded, and the door opened. In came four men, bearing a heavy bier carefully enveloped. It was stood on end, and the bearers were requested to uncover it, while the eager husband looked on with evident expectation of pleasure. The cloths fell away—and lo! a tombstone, beautifully sculptured, his wife's name upon it, and only the date of her death left in blank! And, with this "shadow cast before" of the next coming event which would probably demand the proof of his assiduous tenderness—the sweet evidence that he would not fail in providing the expected tombstone—Monsieur Hammer-Purgstall stood waiting for the kiss of gratitude!—Horne Journal.

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of BalloU's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. BalloU, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 75,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us right subscribers add eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the same copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

COLUMBUS DISCOVERING AMERICA.

[For description, see page 141.]

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SNOW-WREATHS.

BY MARY C. GRANNISS.

Drifting through the garden,
Driving o'er the sea;
Weaving spotless garlands
For each shrub and tree:
Wreathing o'er the casement,
Drooping from the eaves;
Clasping round each paling
Chains of starry leaves:
Spangling o'er the hillside
With a glory rare,
Strewing feathery blossoms
On the wintry air;
Till familiar landscape,
Robed in witching light,
Seems a fairy vision
Of enchantment bright!
Beauteous, snowy flowers,
Scattered far and nigh,
On the lowly cottage,
Or the mountain high;
'Brodering fair the mantle
Of our new-year's queen,
Till her royal ermine
Peerless shines, I ween!
Stainless snow-wreath, welcome!
Flowers of heaven are ye,
Sent to glad earth's bosom
With your purity!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPECTRE.

A LEGEND OF GRANITE ISLAND.

BY J. GRAFTON ALLEN.

IN one of our northern bays there is a lonely island which rises abruptly from the water. It is formed of solid granite, and its summit, which stands full two hundred feet above the sea level, is covered over by scanty soil, which careful cultivation has caused to bring forth a little vegetation. Fir, spruce and hemlock are the only kinds of trees which grow here, and the fields give birth only to the coarser kinds of grain. On one side alone is the island approachable; here the precipitous cliff is divided by a deep gully, which forms a gentle descent to the water, and a small cove for boats. On the other sides of the island, however, all is stern, rugged and forbidding; the sailor avoids it, the fisherman shuns it, and its white cliffs shining from afar, only tell of danger.

Granite Island is the appropriate name of this lonely rock. Though lonely, it is not however altogether uninhabited. An old fisherman dwells there; and if you, gentle reader, are ever landed there by any strange chance, you will probably hear from his lips the story which I am going to tell you.

About twenty years ago, two families were living here. They were related to each other, and bore the name of Berton. One family consisted of a father and two sons, Henry and Edward; the other of an old man and his daughter, Emma. They subsisted almost entirely by fishing, although the land produced a few vegetables for their support.

The two brothers and Emma had all grown up together, and had been constantly in one another's society. The limits of their home did not allow any change to take place in their habits, so that when they had grown up they still associated as much, if not more, than ever. It was at this period that their feelings seemed to undergo a change. Instead of the frolicsome intercourse of childhood, a more serious character marked their conduct towards one another. The two brothers were rivals for the love of Emma.

And in truth, to look at the fair Emma Berton, one would have said it was no wonder that they loved her. Imagine the fairest, freshest and most innocent face in the world, with large, dark, tender eyes, curls of rich brown hair, and laughing, rosy lips which pointed for a kiss; imagine a figure graceful and light as that of a fay, yet full of health and strength; a manner full of grace and witchery—imagine all this, and a thousand indescribable charms of word, look and gesture, and then you will have but a faint idea of Emma Berton.

The two brothers differed much in appearance, though both were eminently handsome. Henry, the older of the two, was tall and muscular in frame, with raven hair, thick beard, curling moustache, dark skin, and manly features. Edward, the younger, was quite different. He had a light complexion, and a slighter figure. His hair was flaxen and curling; his eyes were laughing blue. His cheeks round and beardless. In form, feature, character, everything in short, he was a contrast to his brother. Yet in one thing they were but too similar. They both loved Emma with equal passion, and their love showed itself in many ways.

Henry would climb the tallest cliffs to get gulls' eggs for her to admire, or would lower himself down the most frightful precipices in search of cider down, or glittering minerals. The most precious treasures of the deep, the most exquisitely flavored of the fish which came to his net, and the most beautifully plumaged of the birds which fell at his shot, would be laid at her feet—humble offerings truly, in our estimation, but rare and valuable at Granite Island. Edward was different. While his brother was out searching the rocks for rare gifts, he would sit at Emma's feet and play to her on his guitar, or sing to her, in a rich voice, all manner of ballads and love songs. And Emma seemed fond of having him there. She thanked Henry for his gifts, but her glance never shone on him so softly as on Edward, and her voice never spoke to him so tenderly.

So marked was the difference in her treatment of both, that they noticed it too plainly. It gave Edward food for joy and exultation, but to Henry it caused only the fiercest rage and most cruel jealousy. The sight of his brother sitting at Emma's feet, playing or singing, served only to madden him, and gradually, as his feelings grew more and more uncontrollable, the flashing eye, the heaving bosom, and the clenched hand, showed the intensity of his passion. Had not the lovers been blinded by their own love and happiness, they would constantly have seen the sinister look which Henry now so frequently cast on them.

It was a dark and gloomy evening. The clouded sky, the frequent gusts of wind, the thunder of the rolling surges as they beat against the base of the island, and the foaming crests of the innumerable waves, all betokened an approaching storm. On such a time Cain may perhaps have set upon Abel. On this evening Edward went forth from his father's cottage and directed his steps towards the highest cliff on the island. Here Henry had often swung himself down in search of the rarities which he gave to Emma. The evening was dark, and night came rapidly on. As Edward neared the summit he began to untwist a coil of rope which he carried, and let it fall on the ground. So loud was the wind and so intently was he engaged in this work, that he did not notice a man near him, until he had approached closely to him; then he suddenly looked up. It was Henry.

"Where are you going?" asked Henry, in a stern, harsh voice. "Where? Why, down the cliff."

"Down the cliff! Now?" asked Henry, in surprise. "In this storm? You have changed of late. You have thus far been fonder of sitting at Emma's feet than of going over cliffs."

"Any way, I am going over here now," said Edward.

"What are you going down here for?" asked Henry.

"After some gulls' eggs for Emma."

"Perdition!" muttered Henry, under his teeth.

"What's that you say?" asked Edward, hushy with his rope.

"I say it's very risky business."

"O no—it's nothing. Of late you've been doing all the climbing. I remember five or six years ago I could beat you at it. Don't you remember, Hen? I'm going to try my skill now."

"But why on such a night as this?"

"Why? It's the best time. The birds are all in, you know. I can get the best of eggs, and of birds too, if I like. I'm bound to get the finest bird and the most beautiful egg that's been found yet on the island. Wont you try?"

"I know every stone by heart," said Henry, gruffly. "You can't get any more good eggs or stones. Don't go."

"I'll bet you anything that I will bring her a present that she will give the choice to. I'll bet you she will say it is the best one she has had yet. Isn't this reason enough for going? Wont you come down too, and try?"

"She—yes—she will call anything beautiful that comes from her pretty boy. For my part, I don't stay at home, fiddling and playing the baby for any one, and you may go down here after your gulls' eggs as often as you like."

"Henry!" cried Edward, amazed at his tone and manner; "what is the matter with you? Are you angry?"

"Angry? I have every reason to be angry!" cried Henry. "Why do you come to meddle with me here—and tempt me? I was alone, innocent thus far—Who sent you here?"

"I don't understand what you're talking about," said Edward, lightly, twisting his rope around a tree very firmly. "You seem ill-humored about something. You'd better cheer up. I'm going after birds for Emma."

"Emma! Still prating about her!" cried Henry, with a dreadful oath. "Don't bring her name up, if you don't want me to—to—" he hesitated.

Edward stood still for a moment, startled by his brother's manner. Of late, however, he had been accustomed to those words.

"Henry," said he, "I don't understand you. You're always angry at me for something. God knows I never injured you. I always treated you like a brother. I'd lay down my life for you at this moment. Emma and I wonder at the change in you."

Henry seemed softened at Edward's remark, but the last few words again maddened him. He gnashed his teeth, and moved off a little distance, regarding his brother in silence. Edward had fastened the rope and made a basket around him. Then lighting a torch, he took the rope in his hand and stepped over the cliff, singing a pleasant song. Suddenly Henry leaped forward.

"Edward! Edward! don't go!" he cried, fiercely.

"Nonsense. These sides are rough—there is a good foothold. My nerves are strong; I'm cool; are you afraid of me? Why even Emma—"

"Silence!" cried Henry in a rage, interrupting him with a savage gesture, and turning away.

Edward delayed a moment and looked at his brother's retreating figure. Then he muttered a few words and went down. The glare of his torch flashed out amid the gloom, his voice was heard as he sang amid the howling wind, and the rope was stretched tightly as it bore his weight.

A dark figure came stealing towards the edge of the cliff. He approached nearer and nearer—he lay down and looked over. He saw the light down the precipitous side, he heard the sound of Edward's voice, he heard too the roar of the hoarse waves two hundred feet below.

"O God!" he groaned, starting away from the edge and striking his brow with faithful passion; "I'm in the hands of the tempter! I'll fly!"

And he started away. But still a terrible fascination drew him back. He stood on the edge and leaned over; his hand grasped for support the rope which suspended Edward. He looked again. Again he saw his brother, who hung not more than fifty feet below. And as he looked, one hand held the rope and the other played with a keen dirk knife at his side. O! the temptation!—the struggle!—the early remembrances!—the hate!—the jealousy, cruel as the grave! There wrestled the tempted with his tempter!

Again he turned away, impelled by a mighty effort of his will. He clutched the rope to keep him away; his hand fell from the knife which it touched. Was he freed!—could he leave!—would he go? He moved one step backwards.

But at this moment the voice of Edward sounded out more loudly; he was singing a pleasant, a livelier song. It was a song of his own; it was one made by himself to sing to Emma. It was one which Henry was maddened at, whose sound had vexed him to frenzy so often before. Now as its first notes came up, he started as though he had been shot. He sprang to the cliff's edge. He shook his hand savagely at his brother, and cursed him in his jealous frenzy. There came a flash of light from a thunder-cloud—a knife gleamed in the air—the rope sprang back, severed at the cliff's edge! and the murderer saw the torch-light disappear, and heard a heavy fall into the waves, which far beneath howled to receive their prey!

There was much wonder on the following day at Edward's absence. His father sought for him in vain. Emma looked for his coming early in the morning, but he came not. Then they met together and talked anxiously about the missing one. No one knew where he had gone. Henry seemed more sad, more troubled than any of the others. Through the day they searched the island. It was not very large, and a search even through every part of it was not a very arduous task. At about mid-day, Emma, who seemed more active than the others, announced her discovery of something by a piercing shriek, which brought the others to the spot. They found her at the edge of the cliff, speechless, mutely pointing to a rope, severed at the corner of a stone. The family assembled around in unutterable grief.

"See!" cried Henry, mournfully. "O see! Here poor Edward has attempted a descent of the cliff; the rope has ground against the stone. See—ah!" and Henry held up the end of the rope, which seemed all ground away.

The others looked at it in horror and in grief.

"What could have made him try this?" cried Henry. "Could he have been mad?"

They wondered at his attempt.

"Edward was once a famous climber," said his father.

"This is it. Henry has spoken right," said Emma's father. "Edward has gone down after eggs or rocks, and his rope has ground away. I have heard of such things before!"

Silently they all looked over the edge of the cliff, but they could see nothing whatever except the foaming surges. They shook their heads and looked at one another long and despairingly. Then they moved away, and carried the almost lifeless Emma home with them. They moved away, to talk long and mournfully over Edward's dreadful fate. They tried to comfort Emma. She more than any other felt the cruel and unlooked-for blow. Senseless for a time, she only revived to know the full extent of her misery and to bewail her most bitter misfortune.

It was evening again. The storm which had begun on the previous night went on increasing rapidly in fury, and approaching the grand climax of its wrath. They were altogether in the same house. The old men were mournfully seated in one room, and in the other Emma sat with Henry near her. She was pale and languid. The light had left her eye, and the bloom her cheek. She scarcely looked, moved or spoke. She took no notice whatever of Henry, who sat at her feet, trying to cheer her, to console her who was inconsolable. At length the poor girl burst into a flood of tears—the first which she had shed since the dreadful discovery.

"O, Emma! dear, dearest Emma! weep on. You will find relief," said Henry, bending towards her. And the storm went on increasing in fury, and the lightning flashed more vividly, while the thunder rolled more terribly. "He has gone, Emma, he has gone, but do not think that every friend has gone with him."

Emma only wept.

"You have others who love you, and as well as Edward."

"No, no, no! Never—no never!" murmured the weeping girl.

"Ah, Emma," pleaded Henry, "let me take his place. Let me console you. Can I not be another brother—or more than brother—another Edward?"

"O, Henry!" cried Emma, "do not talk so. You can be Henry, but never Edward!"

"Never—never!" cried Henry, passionately, and the strong man's frame was shaken by contending emotions.

"No—never!" cried a deep and hollow voice from a distant corner of the room.

Emma screamed. Henry jumped to his feet and staggered back. They looked towards the door whence the sound seemed to come. There was a crash of thunder all around, and the door burst open, a gust of wind rushed in and extinguished all the lights, and a glare of blinding lightning flashed into the room, revealing a terrible sight.

There, on the threshold, stood a figure like that of Edward. The face was pallid, the once curling hair all dank and dripping, the clothes wet, the hands trembling. There was a terrible scar across his forehead, and drops of blood trickled down his face.

Ere Emma could shriek, or the shivering Henry stir a limb, the figure moved forward towards the fire. With chattering and trembling hands and sepulchral tones, it gasped forth:

"I'm—very—co-o-o-l-d!"

At once there rang through the house a wild, agonizing scream of one in deadly fear and suffering combined. From the fearful, advancing figure, Emma turned her fainting eyes to Henry. Strong and muscular frame convulsed, his eyes starting from their sockets, his hands clasped, he stood, staring,—and uttering screams of terror. It was but for a moment. With a wilder scream and a more convulsed effort than before, he leaped past the figure and darted through the door. Away,—away,—and the figure turned to follow it. Voices rang out on the winds of night:

"Henry! Henry! Stop!" But there came no answer.

Emma lay senseless on the floor. Long had the two old men, startled by the shrieks which announced the presence of the dreadful visitant, endeavored to bring her back. Hour after hour passed, and then she began slowly to revive.

The old men were so engaged in their work that they did not heed a knock which came at the door, until it had sounded more loudly a second time. Then Emma started and hid her face on her father's breast.

"Save me—O, save me!" she moaned. "He's coming again!"

"Don't be frightened!" cried a voice. "Let me come in! Don't keep me out! One death is enough! Henry is gone!"

The voice was weak and tremulous.

"It's Edward—it's himself!" cried his father, springing to the door. "O, my son! my dear, dear boy!"

And as a wet, weary, blood-stained figure entered, the father clasped him in his arms.

"O Heaven!" Emma sobbed out, with awe-struck face.

"Emma, do not turn away! I was not killed. Look at me! If you turn away from me, then I shall indeed wish I had perished!"

"Edward!" sobbed out Emma, in half doubtful joy. She rose, staggered towards him, and fell fainting in his arms.

They laid her gently on the settee and watched over her till sense was restored. Then she implored Edward to change his clothes and dress his wounds. The young man was trembling violently. Cold, hunger and wounds had greatly weakened him. Retiring for a while, he put on other clothes and re-entered the room, where Emma took her seat by his side. Yet in spite of the general joy at his salvation, there was a dark cloud on their souls, and only one thought was present to each. Where was Henry?

Where, indeed. The wind was wild and furious without. Still the thunder burst around, and its long reverberations re-echoed among the innumerable recesses of the island; still the lightning flashed vividly, showing up with added terrors the already terrific scene. Where, amid the strife of elements, was Henry? Edward's head was bowed down, and even the soft hand of Emma could not raise it, and shudders shook his frame. At last their grief found voice, and Emma's father asked:

"Edward, where is Henry?"

Edward looked up. Grief was on his brow, but sternness was in his eye. He spoke in low tones, every word fearfully distinct.

"Listen, and I will tell you all. I'll tell you what will make your blood run cold. Last night I went to the cliff to get some young birds and some rare eggs and stones for Emma. I took my rope and torch and basket. On the top of the cliff I was met by Henry. He was excited, and urged me not to go, and then swore at me for tempting him. I went down, and when I had reached a jutting point, about fifty feet below, I fastened my basket and began my work. I suddenly was startled by violent stamping. I heard Henry's voice faintly, for the wind was loud. All at once, just as I was putting some stones in the basket, it fell from where it was hanging, and I heard it plunge into the water far below. Then—do not start—there is worse yet—then I knew it all. Henry had cut the rope!"

"Edward!" cried his father, starting to his feet, "Villain—you lie! Henry never did—Villain, I curse!"

"Curse on, father!" Edward bowed his head humbly; but his father, overcome by emotion, fell back into his seat, trembling and moaning.

"How do you dare to think that Henry did this? You dare to sit there, just from the tomb, and say this!" cried Emma's father.

"He loved Emma—but Emma loved me!"

Then the old men looked fearfully at one another, and Emma fell sobbing in Edward's arms.

"I knew it all," said Edward, in a hoarse voice, "down on the face of the cliff. There I crouched all night, beaten by the storm. At daybreak I crawled along the cliff to a place of shelter. Here a ledge of rocks overhead prevented me from coming up, and I should have died had not Providence sent a tree to help me. The wind blew it over, and I seized its long branches and struggled to the top of the cliff. Then through darkness, I made my way to the house. I stumbled many times, for I was weak and cold. I entered the house. Henry's guilty conscience made him think me a spectre. He rushed out, and I followed him to save him. I knew he would do something desperate. I was swift, but fear lent him wings. I called after him—I told him I was alive. He rushed to the cliff—I saw him as a blinding flash of lightning lit up all the island. He stood for a second, wildly tossing his arms, and then, with a fearful scream, he went—"

"Where—where?" screamed his father, clutching his arm.

"Where he tried to send me!" said Edward, in a low voice, and with fearful emphasis.

"O Heaven!" cried his father, after an awful silence, "it is thy justice—retribution! I how to fate!"

He buried his head in his hands, and his whole frame shook with emotion. Emma's father put his trembling arm around his neck, and held him in silent sympathy. Then Edward raised the weeping Emma in his arms, and they all sat in silence through the remaining hours of that memorable night.

"I mourned over Henry, but they could not live any longer in the scene of their sorrow, and embarked for another land. And by and by the old men were gathered to their fathers. Then Edward and Emma were married; and time, the consoler of all, came to alleviate their grief and soften the harsh memory of the past. But they never returned to Granite Island.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

WHAT IS IT?

BY MISS CAROLINE T. HENTZ.

I AM a little child, and having strayed off from my playmates, the echo of their merry voices does not jar on the strange, baby-reveries stealing over me. 'Tis spring-time, and the air is heavy with the fragrance of locust blossoms, and ringing with the songs of birds huddling about the locust boughs and scattering the stray white blossoms over me, as I lie on the grass beneath. My head is pillowed on my arm, and my eyes are peering through the leaves and intervening objects, to the heavens. Radiant sunset clouds are spreading far up in the ether, and, like a gorgeous curtain, reflecting their crimson on all objects below. The sun is sinking—sinking, and its slanting beams stream across me where I am.

O, the beautiful clouds! How they press upon me, so that I cannot breathe, changing and wrenching themselves into so many queer shapes! What is this filling my little bosom, fluttering like a vagabond bird, and making me long to float away on one of those clouds, off I don't know where, but away from earth! What is it I feel, and does any other little girl ever have such strange thoughts, and can they tell of them? I am still looking, and longing, and almost pining for breath, for the oppressive weight grows stronger on my heart. I cannot be still!

"Ah, I know who can tell me, and I'll go and ask her."

Away I bound, little feet dancing over the grass and damp curls floating in the air, as I spring up the steps and fly to the quiet corner, where one is seated with eyes of pensive thought fixed on a book in her lap. I kneel before her and look eagerly into her face, with one hand pressing my bosom, whilst I ask:

"O tell me what it is here that feels so strange when I hear the birds sing, and watch the clouds through the green leaves! It pains me, and I thought—I knew you could tell me."

What thought is it that causes a shadow to come over her dear face, as she lays her hand upon my hair and looks earnestly into mine? She is silent, and though I am eager to hear, I do not speak again. Now she speaks:

"Why my little golden-haired sunbeam, what are you doing with such strange fancies? It is only angels that are whispering to you. Listen if you cannot help it, and always, my little one, come to me as you did just now, with your perplexities; by-and-by I can tell you more."

And I sit and listen to her voice until the stars come peeping out. I am stretched at her feet on the carpet, and she thinks I have fallen asleep, when she steals out into her closet close by. I know that she is praying, and this once I dare to creep nearer and try to listen. I catch some words, and they are hard for me to understand. I hear her pray that God, the tender Shepherd, may take me into his fold; that he will watch over me, the child of her love and fears. I hear her whisper that she trembles for her youngest, her strange, wild child, and even now she implores His guardian care for me when she shall be no more. I hear it all, wondering, and smother the violent sobs that are convulsing my bosom, for I dare not let her know I am not asleep.

A few more years of childish experience are passed away, and I am sitting in a parlor on a stool near her who had called me "sunbeam." A gentleman is near us, repeating a poem, stanza by stanza, pausing now and then to interchange thought with her. He does not think of turning to me, but I am listening and dreaming. His deep, melodious accents ring over my senses and vibrate that mysterious inner chord, which awakened once, thrills on through life. I cannot understand all, but there is far more than they can dream of, which sinks deep into my heart. He is a poet, and it is his own production he is reading. I think of this, and I look and listen, whilst again comes the eager self-questioning. O, what is this struggling, captive spirit, striving for utterance? What is it? I long to ask him.

He catches my wistful glance as his eyes wander from the page, and he becomes suddenly silent. My gaze falls, and I feel my cheek redder, for I know he is reading my thoughts. Can he tell that I am asking, What is it? I do not look up, but I hear him say, in a subdued voice:

"What large, startling eyes, so full of unwritten poetry, and I fear foretelling a stormy future!"

Is it indeed so, that this is poetic fire burning within and creating in my bosom a silent world, unapproachable, inexpressible and full of aching loneliness? Am I answered? * * *

'Tis a bright, smiling Sabbath morning. My heart is swelling with gratitude to my Maker for the joy of existence, for the sweet emotions sweeping over me, and causing me to trip silently along beside my companion, a school-girl friend, with hazel eyes, coral lips and a fair, oval face. As we near the church steps, a youth joins us, and my heart beats quicker as he hands me a blushing rosebud, wet with dew. Its exquisite fragrance steals over my senses and thrills anew the chord of Nature worship. Radiant, glorious Nature!

"O, how sweet!" I exclaim, and steal a bashful glance of thanks to the handsome young donor. I am floating along the tide of youthful happiness, careless and light-hearted. Have I forgotten the weird, haunting spirit of my childhood?

As our feet touch the stone steps, suddenly I start as if waking from a dream. The deep tones of the organ burst forth in a rich, rejoicing anthem. Louder, clearer, more holy, it swells forth as if the melody pierces the confining walls, and rises higher and higher in heaven's canopy, up to the throne of God. I feel myself no longer a child, my aspirations are no dream; they are reaching far upwards and filling my soul with strange melancholy. What is it? Am I different from all else, and does no one feel as I do?

My friend Emma walks placidly to her seat, as calm and unmoved as if she had not hearing and feeling. I dare not question her. And my boy sister, alas! I am slow to tell it, whispers in my ear: "You are fond of music indeed, for it makes you quite theatrical."

I hurry up the carpeted aisle and sink into my place with a new grief, for he does not understand me, and ah! who ever will! Again I start and hearken to the sound: "We praise thee, O God, we acknowledge thee to be the Lord." It has died away, and I am asking myself, "Is it indeed music that thrills me thus? Am I answered?"

"And the passionate strain that, deeply going,
Refines the bosom it traverses through,
As the touch-wind over the water blowing,
Ruffles the wave, but sweetens it too!"

It is night, and moonlight. Hazy with the mists of a southern summer day, is the air, where I am wandering with a youth of flashing eye. Slowly we pass through the avenue of myrtles, and I listen to his voice, as in passionate strains he is telling me I am dearer than all to him. Ah, he vows, and I listen as I have never before, to "love's young dream!" I trust and believe, whilst a flood of delicious happiness sweeps over my soul. Surely, surely this cannot pass away. Life's joyous moments cannot all "be fleeting!"

We pass on, out into the snowy light, and he pauses beside a clustering jasmine, whose pure white blossoms gleam like stars in the dark green leaves. He places one amidst my ringlets, and as I raise my eyes they meet his, so full of intense feeling. Again comes the well known longing, the thrilling voice within, and I am forced to exclaim:

"Surely you can tell me of this strange, unutterable spirit struggling in my bosom; waked in my childhood, and growing deeper and stronger with each passing year? Do I not read my answer in your eyes?"

I think he is looking into my soul, and I feel the fulfilment of my long fruitless questioning when he exclaims:

"I read your dear heart through and through. I know what you feel, have felt it with you; 'tis our kindred spirits mingling now, and never to be parted more. It is love's magic that has made your eyes so radiant and your face so beautiful this moment."

And is this my answer? Can this love be the Promethean fire that has been glowing so long within my bosom? * * *

Once more, I am wandering on the sea-beach, alone and sad, watching my foot-prints as one by one they are left behind me—transient tracings to tell that I am here. Thus are our earthly joys as fleeting and as quickly swept away by the dews of sorrow, as these foot-prints by the rising tide. And is life ever to be thus so full of disappointment and sorrow? The sweet bud that you pluck in the dewy morn, is withered ere the sun is set, and she whose heart opens most trustfully and joyously to the early blossoms of love and happiness, will the soonest find its glowing freshness withered and blighted; memory with its aching regrets, ever the companion of her solitude, and lingering cruelly on the thorns.

"O Memory! thou lingering mourner in joy's broken shell!
Why have I not, in losing all I loved, lost thee as well!"

I walk slowly along, and wonder if I am the same "sunbeam" who sought her mother's side and asked, What is it? It all comes back at the beck of memory, that prayer—I hear it now! Great God, didst thou hear, and is not thy mercy sounding through the walls of heaven? O, thou Father of the fatherless! great and adorable, hearken now to my sin-sick, pleading cry! Thou canst hear and soothe the desolated heart! I am lonely, mourning and crying to thee!

I kneel close by the water's edge, and the waves are dashing nearer and nearer as the southern breeze sweeps with increasing might across the gulf. Gray clouds are drifting through the twilight sky, and here and there cold stars are glittering through and leaving a track of silver upon the waters; now and then the beacon-light of some fisher's wife flashes out and gleams cheerily through the deepening shadows. I hear the surf with its low, melancholy booming; I list to the murmur of the waves, and then as my eyes are lifted upwards through the mists gathering over them, I see, think, and feel that strange, old, struggling, restless spirit, still unanswered, craving and unutterable! O, what is it?

The surf's grand thunder moans in reply, and I start to my feet as if a voice had spoken from the clouds; a light breaks in upon my weary heart. 'Tis the Creator's voice speaking to the spirit; it calls, it has been calling from my childhood; in the murmur of the summer breeze, in the flutter of a leaf, in the rustle of a flying bird, and in the language of Nature everywhere! This imprisoned thing is the Soul struggling for immortality, wrestling within its walls, our poor earthly frame, and breathing of a home "eternal in the heavens," where there is no more sorrow or disappointment, no more unsatisfied longings, but full fruition, glorious immortality, and communion with God!

I am answered—and no longer mourning and lone. There is one unwithering garland of happiness that may surround us even here on earth. It is not the spirit of poetry, 'tis not the thrilling power of melody, nor the fierce magic of love, but it is the Soul that speaks within—

"The Soul, of origin divine,
God's glorious image, freed from clay,
In heaven's eternal sphere shall abide,
A star of day!"

HOW WIND PRODUCES COLD.

Winds produce cold in several ways. The act of blowing implies the descent upon and over the earth, of colder air, to occupy the room of that which it displaces. It also increases the evaporation of moisture from the earth, and thus conveys away considerable heat. This increased evaporation and the mixture of warm and cold air, usually produces a condensation of vapors in the atmosphere; hence the formation of clouds, and the consequent detention of heat brought by the rays of the sun. And whenever the air in motion is colder than the earth, or any bodies with which it comes in contact, a portion of their heat is imparted to the air.—Scientific American.

ADAM WALLACE THAXTER, JR., ESQ.

The accompanying portrait of one of our most energetic and popular business men, was drawn expressly for the Pictorial, by Mr. Barry, from a fine photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee & Case, of this city. Mr. Thaxter's countenance is an index of his character, expressing alertness, intelligence, energy and good humor. Mr. Thaxter is a son of Samuel Thaxter, a mathematical instrument-maker, established for so many years at the corner of State and Broad Streets, where the statuette of the old admiral, with his gold-laced hat and quadrant, is an unmistakable landmark. The subject of our sketch received his education at our public schools, than which no institutions in the world better fit their graduates for the active walks of life or a literary career. Mr. Thaxter received his first mercantile education in the counting-room of Hon. Jesse Putnam, and when that gentleman retired from business to assume the presidency of the Manufacturers' Fire Insurance Company, was successively employed by Benjamin T. Reed and by Nathan Bridge & Co. While an employee of the latter, at the age of twenty, and in the capacity of supercargo, young Thaxter visited the principal countries of Europe, and Cuba, thus gratifying his love of adventure, and acquiring that knowledge of sea-life which almost every active young man born in a maritime town is anxious to obtain. In 1830, he commenced business in conjunction with John D. Bates, Esq., the style of the firm being Bates & Co. He is still engaged in business, the copartnership remaining the same. Since his outset in life, Mr. Thaxter has taken a deep interest in politics, and is known as a prominent and active member of the democratic party, by which his disinterested services have been warmly appreciated. He has frequently been honored by nominations for offices of trust, such as mayor of the city and member of Congress, and probably felt no disappointment at his non-election, as he is so entirely devoted to business that he must feel office as a burden. No one, however, doubts that he would worthily have filled any of the positions to which the confidence of his friends has, from time to time, assigned him as a candidate. It is precisely such men as Mr. Thaxter whom we would see graced by official position—intelligent, cultivated, practical and industrious. But the very men who are best fitted to represent great interests, are those rarely chosen, or willing to be chosen, to representative offices. Merchants often complain of blundering legislation on mercantile affairs, arising from the ignorance of legislators of the wants of the business community, and of the practical working of mercantile statutes—and yet what active merchant of this city could afford to be absent from his counting-room, for months, at the capitol? The subject of our sketch is emphatically a business man—a representative man of his class—a class which has conferred such high honors on his native city, and which has made the name of Boston merchant respected wherever the flag of our mercantile marine is carried, and that is on every water that will float a keel. Mr. Thaxter will never probably relinquish business until incapacitated by age and infirmity, and he possesses one of those nervous organizations which sustain so well the wear and tear of employment and time, and which, like a good blade, are the brighter for constant use. We have been told by his friends, that there is nothing which he abhors so much as inaction, and that when a slight illness confines him to his house, he is by no means grateful for the temporary respite, but begrudges every moment of time lost to honorable activity. Mr. Thaxter is a married man, and the father of two sons and two daughters. His eldest son, named for him, has distinguished himself in the career of letters, and is one of the assistant editors of that excellent journal, the Saturday Evening Gazette. Mr. Thaxter was for many years, Russian consul for this port.

ADAM W. THAXTER, JR., ESQ.

SCENE IN WINTER STREET.

The street scene on this page was sketched for us by Mr. Champney, as it actually appeared from our office window during the late snow. The name of the street never seemed more appropriate. The snow is weaving a transparent veil over the granite church, and a team of horses are doing their best to pull a ponderous vehicle through the accumulated drifts. At one time the snow was heaped up before our office to the depth of eight or ten feet, but thanks to the vigilant efforts of the city authorities, the street was not long impassable, men and teams clearing it out in an incredibly short space of time. The experiences of this winter remind us of the great snow-storm in New England, of February, 1717, when the snow was so deep that people stepped out of their chamber windows on snow shoes. With this fall of snow was a terrible tempest; eleven hundred sheep, the property of one man, were found dead; one flock of a hundred, on Fisher's Island, were found buried sixteen feet in the snow, two of them only were alive, they having subsisted on the wool of their companions twenty-eight days after the storm. Well might Cotton Mather term this "An Horrid Snow." In the account of it, preserved by the Massachusetts Historical Society, he says: "On the twentieth of the last February there came on a snow, which being added unto what had covered ye ground a few days before, made a thicker mantel for Mother than what was usual: And ye storm with it was, for ye following day, so violent as to make all communication between ye Neighbours everywhere to cease. People, for some hours, could not pass from one side of a street unto another. * * * But on ye Twenty-Fourth day of ye month, comes Pelion upon Ossa: Another Snow came on which almost buried ye Memory of ye former, with a Storm so famous that Heaven laid an Interdict on ye Religious Assemblies throughout ye Country, on this Lord's day, ye like whereunto had never been seen before. Ye Indians near an hundred years old, affirm that their Fathers never told them of anything that Equalled it. Vast numbers of Cattel were destroyed in this calamity. Whereof some there were of ye Stronger sort, were found standing dead on their legs, as if they had been alive, many weeks after, when ye Snow melted away. And others had their eyes glazed over with Ice at such a rate, that being 100 far from ye Sea, their mistake of their way drowned them there. * * * Ye Swine had a share with ye Sheep in strange survivals. A man had a couple of young Hogs which he gave over for dead; But on ye twenty-seventh day after their Burial, they made their way out of a Snowbank, at ye bottom of which they had found a little Tansy to feed upon. Ye Poultry as unaccountably survived as these. Hens were found alive after seven days; Turkeys were found alive after five-and-twenty days buried in ye Snow, and at a distance from ye ground, and altogether destitute of anything to feed them. Ye number of creatures that kept a Rigid Fast, shut up in Snow for divers weeks together, and were found alive and well after all, have yielded surprising stories us. * * * It is incredible how much damage is done to ye Orchards, For ye Snow freezing to a Crust, as high as ye boughs of ye trees, anon split them to pieces. Ye Cattel also, walking on ye crusted Snow a dozen foot from the ground, so fed upon ye Trees, as very much to damnify them. Ye Ocean was in a prodigious Ferment, and after it was all over, vast heaps of little shells were driven ashore where they were never seen before. Mighty shoals of Porpoises also kept a play-day in ye disturbed waves of our Harbours. Ye odd Accidents befalling many poor people, whose cottages were totally covered with ye Snow, and not ye very tops of their chimneys to be seen, would afford a Story. But there not being any relation to philosophy in them, I forbear them." That was a good old-fashioned snow-storm. After reading Cotton Mather's recital, we may thank our stars that the fashions have changed, though we are a little afraid that the snowy cycle has returned, and that two consecutive winters of snow may but inaugurate a long series of them. We shall hasten to consult Mr. Merriam, the American weather-clerk, to learn his opinion.

THE RED HAND ON FRENCH RAILROAD CLOCKS.

Time is telegraphed along the railway lines of France to each station, from the Paris Observatory, as it is telegraphed along the New York Central line from observations taken in Albany by Professor Ten Eyck. A plan has lately been adopted of having two minute hands on each station clock—one red, one black. The black one shows the railroad time, the red the local time, differing from a minute to half an hour. Thus at Paris, the two hands are identical. A hundred and fifty miles east, the red hand is ten minutes in advance of the black one. A hundred and fifty miles west, the red hand is ten minutes behind the black one. By this simple plan, common mistakes and confusion are prevented. As the two hands are fixed on one shaft, it is as easy to regulate both as one.—Scientific American.

SCENE IN WINTER STREET, BOSTON, DURING THE LATE SNOW STORM.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SERENADE.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

Good night, good night, love! While you sleep
May angels have you in their care;
Above your couch their pinions sweep,
And stir the hushed and charmed air
Softly, as when at evening's close
June's breezes rock the sleeping rose!

Good night, good night, love! If you dream,
Let all your dreams of beauty be—
A lily e'er a phantom stream
Beholding its own purity!
So sleep, or dream, till morning's blue
Sees in your eyes its own sweet hue!

THE SEA.

But to the shore. O, what a depth of wave,
And what a length of foam! That solemn voice!
'Tis louder and yet sweeter—they mistake
Who call it hoarse. They never on the white
And pebbly beach, in peace and quietness,
Have heard it roar; or watched the spray
That, venting farthest on the smooth, white sand,
Kisses, retires, and comes to kiss again.—BRAINARD.

THE SEASONS.

To-day, in snow arrayed, stern winter rules
The ravaged plain—anon the teeming earth
Unlocks her stores, and spring adorns the year.
And shall not we, while fate like winter frowns,
Expect reviving bliss?—SMOLLETT.

WINTER.

O, Winter, ruler of the inverted year,
I love thee, all unlovely as thou seem'st,
And dreaded as thou art!—COWPER.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

Major Norton, the American consul at Picton, N. S., looked in upon us to-day, hale and hearty, on a flying visit to the States. The major has won an enviable reputation for ability in the discharge of his official duty, and for his open-handed hospitality. The literary entertainments given in this city, by Mr. Vandenhoff, have been a rare and choice treat to the discriminating portion of our citizens. We are also gratified to know that they have met with abundant pecuniary success, as well. General Santa Anna, of Mexico, has sent agents to Madrid, to propose to re-establish monarchy in Mexico, with a Spanish prince as sovereign, provided the Spanish government will grant him certain assistance. What a restless spirit he is! An ambitious juvenile, seeing the streets of Boston heaped up with snow, exclaimed, "By George, I wish all that were powder! Wouldn't it be fun to touch it off?" Perhaps the young gentleman will try the experiment on a smaller scale—a couple of pounds would astonish him. The London Illustrated Lady's Newspaper attempts a delineation of the Franklin statue. The figure is well enough, but the surrounding localities are sadly mixed up. Parker's Hotel and the King's Chapel have been made to change places in the picture. We were startled at seeing it stated that not a single death had occurred in Paris during the past fifteen months. But it turned out to be Paris, Maine—a place of somewhat smaller population than Louis Napoleon's monstrous capital. The old English nobility used to live rather coarsely. In a record of the Percy family, we find the following:—"My lord has on his table for breakfast, at seven in the morning, a quart of beer and wine, two pieces of salt fish, six red herrings and four white ones; and on flesh days, half a chine of beef, or mutton boiled." We set better breakfast-tables now-a-days. Dr. Franklin observed wisely, "The eyes of others are the eyes that ruin us. If all but myself were blind, I should want neither house nor furniture." The efforts of English, Russians and Americans to open a trade with Japan are of no avail. The Japanese are willing to supply our ships with necessities in exchange for gold and silver, but there their intercourse ends. If Mr. Watson, of New York, has really invented a portable sewing-machine which can be afforded for ten dollars, as stated, he will soon be the richest man in the United States. Hon. C. P. Villiers has declined the American mission. We did fancy that we Bostonians were mad enough on the subject of sleighing, but a fall of snow in New York turns the head of every man, woman and child in that great metropolis. The winter in Europe has been cold and snowy. Don't confound "coca" with "cocoa." Coca is a shrub that bears an exhilarating leaf, something like tobacco, and much used by the South Americans. Everybody knows what cocoa is. Of the three colors of men, the cold country suits the red; the hot, the black; the temperate, the white. This is the reason for farmers to review their agricultural reading previous to reducing theory to practice. Says the Country Gentleman—"When the business of farming is pursued with interest, intelligence, and a fixed purpose of improvement, there are demands made upon the mind at all seasons of the year." The Sardinian government has resolved, at its own cost, to make a cutting through Mount Ceus, in order to unite the Victor Emmanuel Railway with the French lines. A MS. by the philosopher Kant has lately been discovered in Germany. Of course it is profoundly wise—and foggy. In a recent Christmas tale, edited by Charles Dickens, the crew of a vessel driving before the wind suddenly see a sail "astern to leeward of them!" We leave comment to our blue-jacket friends. A caricature—or, more properly speaking, a little sketch—in the Charivari, has for its subject the intended payment of a few shous to the Bourne, the Parisian Exchange. Two persons meet just in front of the building, one of whom remarks, "Is it on entering that the fee is to be paid?" "Why, of course it is," replied the other; "and for the very simple reason, that on coming out no one has a sou left." The final transfer of the exploring bark Resolute to the British government must have been a fine sight—the British flag ship Victory hoisting the stars and stripes with a salute of 21 guns, while the American colors came down on the Resolute, and the union jack floated alone. Captain Hartstien said to the British commander, "With a pride totally at variance with our professional ideas, I strike my flag, and to you, sir, give up the ship." Long may it be before the stars and stripes and the British jack shall float over ships arrayed in deadly combat with each other! Dr. Livingston found a curious race of "culled gnomes" in the interior of Africa, who never fight, but submit to every conquering tribe. Their reason for this docility is more curious than logical. They say they never fight, because their forefathers once tried to do so with bows of palma christi; and as they broke, they gave up the practice entirely. N. P. Cotton, in his new store, 272 Washington Street, has quite a gallery of art. It is one of the most attractive places in the city—filled with pictures, ings, oil paintings, and almost everything in the art line. At the Massachusetts legislative agricultural meetings, in this city, they have been discussing the Chinese sugar cane question. One sturdy old farmer said he should not raise sugar cane for molasses, while he could buy two gallons with a bushel of potatoes. In the recent row at Canton with the long-tailed Chinese, Yankee guns and Yankee tars did good service. A Chinese fort, which had the audacity to fire on the stars and stripes, was drilled as full of holes as the top of a pepper-box, and knocked into the semblance of that old-fashioned article of wear—a cocked hat. Col. Benton likes the climate of New England. He had a specimen of tall snowing while he was on his lecturing tour. Geo. Jackson's Hermitage, in Tennessee, is talked of as the site of a branch military hospital. They have had fine shooting in Minnesota this year—plenty of deer, which have increased in the absence of the Indians. A man has invented a process for rendering dead bodies incorruptible, and changing them, as it were, to stone. He proposes to place the dead thus preserved on their own monuments. The idea is utterly repulsive to our tastes, though there is something ludicrous, too, in the thought of every man being his own statue. The Chinese shopkeepers are the most diligent mammon-worshippers in the world. They open their places of business at sunrise, and keep on selling, or counting cash, till 10 P. M. The whole number of militia in the United States is about two and a half millions. The emperor Alexander I., of Russia, once asked one of our ambassadors how large an army we kept up. The Yankee, who reckoned the volunteer bayonets, promptly answered two millions—of course astounding the czar, as he intended. The president elect has accepted an invitation to attend the national inauguration ball at Washington. L. A. Elliot & Co., 222 Washington Street, are successors to Mr. Parker, of Cornhill, so well known to lovers of art. The magnitude of their establishment is a proof of the increasing taste for art in this city. The Zouaves, who distinguished themselves as actors in a little improvised theatre in the Crimea, have been giving their countrymen a taste of their histrionic quality at home. They have been trying public masquerade balls at London this season; but they led to so many disgraceful scenes, that that species of entertainment will probably be abandoned forever to the British capital. People who will not show their faces, are capable of any act of rovelism. The latest Parisian croquet is to envelop a bouquet in several yards of the most costly lace before throwing it on the stage to a favorite actress. Poch! in this country we bind the flowers with gold bracelets and diamond necklaces. An overdressed man or woman is offensive to good taste, no matter how costly the material of the costume. It is supposed that when Byron wrote about the "banks and braes of bonnie Doon," he was probably thinking about discounts and denizens. The editor of the New York Sunday Times has been bewildered and bewitched by "an ocean of voluminous flounces and gutter boots." We exercise our horses every day when not actually in use; but many of us neglect to exercise ourselves unless compelled. Why is a printer like a postman? Because he picks up letters and distributes them. "I remember," says the celebrated Wesley, "hearing my father say to my mother, 'How can you have the patience to tell that blockhead the same thing twenty times over?' 'Why,' said she, 'if I had told him but nineteen times, I should have lost all my labor.'" It is fortunate that the early education of children is committed to woman—men never have the patience to instill into them the all-important rudiments of learning. We are sorry that we know not the author of the following sentence:—"The triumph of woman lies not in the admiration of the lover, but the respect of the husband, and that can only be gained by a cultivation of those qualities which she knows he most values." We heard, the other day, that young Hengler, the tight-rope dancer, was also an excellent actor. What a card for him to play Hamlet, and then introduce his sumersets on the eard as a proof of the prince's insanity! William B. Astor is the richest man in New York; but then there is Peter Cooper, a glumaker, who is worth a million. A manufacturer of wire-work invites the public to come and see his invisible wire fences. The fine art exhibition in Paris has been postponed to give place to an exhibition of animals. Cows before canvases! Mr. Dempster, the vocalist, so well known and appreciated in this country, lately sang Tennyson's May Queen to the poet, and, of course, astonished the author, as he has thousands of others. The Home Journal, that arbiter elegantiarum, says "Young New York is getting to be almost as elaborate and extravagant in the article of shirt-bosoms as court ladies in their laces." We have had such cold weather this winter, at times, that we could almost believe the statement of one of the Arctic explorers, that in latitude 75 north, they had to cut their brandy and water into slices, and toast them at a spirit lamp. Ole Bull is going back to Norway. He says he has lost his health, his money, and his good name in this country. He certainly made a good deal of his money here. A French chemist makes excellent bread of acorns. The monument of the Russians who fell at Sebastopol is to consist of a vast funeral chapel. Mrs. McMahon's debut at the Academy of Music, New York, as Juliet, is said, by the critic of the New York Tribune, to have been a complete failure. Mrs. O'Neill, of New York city, has made a quarter of a million of dollars by keeping school—an unexampled success. Teaching the young idea how to shoot is generally a profitless employment. There is a hill in Musso, New Granada, which yields abundance of emeralds, which rank next in value to the diamond and sapphire. Does not the idea of a mountain of emeralds, reader, call up to your mind the enchanting stories of the Arabian Nights? The mine in question is worked by a company of German and English capitalists, who pay sixteen thousand dollars a year for the privilege. A lady of Newark, disappointed of marriage by a "promising" lover, required $10,000 to heal her wounded heart. "Hearts has rise." Mr. Place, the French consul at Mosul, thinks he has discovered the ruins of the Tower of Babel. He probably lies—under a mistake. Somebody says that leeches are the only backbiters that ever did any good in the world. What is fame? An exchange paper tells us that Horace Burnet has been commissioned to paint a battle-piece for the Capitol. Can this man be any relation of the great Horace Vernet? The shipping of the whole world is valued at 775 millions of dollars. Jefferson said he had rather have newspapers without government, than a government without newspapers. Jefferson was a wise man. Louis Napoleon is afraid of newspapers. He allows them to be published, however, but prosecutes them if they publish any news of importance. There is not so much difference, after all, between the ups and downs of life! "Pay up" and "cash down" are pretty much the same thing. A libeller of law says that, in most cases, the poor man is accused, and the rich man excused. Alexandre Dumas has had a cerebral attack, lately. If he had not liberally used the brains of other men, his own would have given way long ago. One of our writers undertakes to defend expensive habits. He says:—"The true enemy of his race is the boarder and miser—the man who is not luxurious up to the limit of his means." We do not endorse the sentiment. The Japanese government are about to organize a small steam navy.

What a blessed possession is that lightness of heart and buoyancy of spirit which enables a man to ride above the billows of this "sea of troubles," and turn their enmity aside with a good joke. An Irish sailor, who had seen long service in the East Indies, without touching terra firma, was in a vessel which was unfortunately run ashore in a violent gale of wind. Pat, being an active fellow, was sent forward on the bowsprit, to clear away. As soon as he had reached the end of it, he called out to a fellow-countryman, "Arrah, honey, come here and smell the primroses. By St. Patrick, I have not been so far up the country these seven years!"

Choice Miscellany.

THE NOBLE REVENGE.

The coffin was a plain one. No flowers on its top—no lining of rose-white satin for the pale brow—no smooth ribbons about the coarse shroud. The brown hair was laid decently back, but there was no crimped cap, with its neat tie beneath the chin.

"I want to see my mother," sobbed a poor child, as the city undertaker screwed down the top.

"You can't—get out of the way, boy! Why don't somebody take the brut away?"

"Only let me see her one minute," cried the hapless orphan, clenching the side of the charity box. And as he gazed into that rough face, tears streamed down the cheek on which no childish bloom ever lingered. O, it was pitiful to hear him cry, "Only once!—let me see my mother only once!"

Brutally the hard-hearted monster struck the boy away, so that he reeled with the blow. For a moment the boy stood panting with grief and rage, his blue eyes extended, his lips sprang apart; a fire glittered through his tears, as he raised his puny arm, and with a most unchildish accent, screamed, "When I am a man, I'll kill you for that!"

A coffin and a heap of earth was between the mother and the poor forsaken child—a monument stronger than granite built in his boy-heart to the memory of a heartless deed.

The court house was crowded to suffocation.

"Does any one appear as this man's counsel?" asked the judge.

There was silence when he finished, until, with lips tightly pressed together, a look of strange recognition, blended with haughty reserve upon his handsome features, a young man—a stranger—stepped forward to plead for the erring and the friendless. The splendor of his genius entranced—convinced. The man who could not find a friend was acquitted.

"May God bless you, sir!—I cannot."

"I want no thanks," replied the stranger, with icy coldness.

"I—I believe you are unknown to me."

"Man, I will refresh your memory! Twenty years ago you struck a broken-hearted boy away from his poor mother's coffin! I was that poor miserable boy."

"Have you rescued me, then, to take my life?"

"No, I have a sweeter revenge! I have saved the life of a man whose brutal deed has rankled in my breast for twenty years! Go!—and remember the tears of a friendless child, and the heart that can wrong him."

The man bowed his head in shame, and went out from the presence of a magnanimity as grand to him as incomprehensible; and the noble lawyer felt God's smile in his soul forever after.—New York Sunday Courier.

DRINKING AT DINNER.

Not seldom do we hear the opinion advanced, that drinking during a meal is an olmosious habit—but quite wrongfully; for the gastric juice may be diluted with a considerable quantity of water without losing its dissolving power in the slightest degree. Only a superabundance of water would diminish or arrest the peculiar action of the matters contained in the digestive fluids. Largo draughts of water, therefore, will be the most injurious with ailments difficult of digestion, like the fats; and hence the drinking of too much water after fat pork, for instance, is properly avoided. But in countries where soup does not constitute a regular part of the meal, drinking water is positively to be recommended. Beer and wine at dinner are also hurtful only if taken in excess; for in the latter case the alcohol coagulates the albuminous substances, not only of the food, but also of the digestive fluids, and thus disturbs digestion. If taken in a moderate quantity, these beverages are calculated to make the meal hold out longer; for the fact that we are not so soon hungry again after a meal with wine, than if we have taken only water with it, is to be accounted for by the slower combustion of the constituents of our body, inasmuch as the alcohol we have imbibed takes possession of the inhaled oxygen. Hence, wine with a meal is extremely useful when a long journey or work in hand renders it impossible to take food again at the usual time; so much the more so, as such detection from food itself causes an acceleration of the metamorphosis of the tissue, which beer and wine efficiently obviate.—Orr's Chemistry of Food and Diet.

THE MANIAC.

Once, on a dimly-lighted bridge, a traveller met a man whose fantastic costume astonished and somewhat alarmed him. The wind blew high, and the waves rolled turbulently under the solemn timbers of the old arches; black and sullen were the waters—black and sullen was the sky. The man wore a red shirt; a handkerchief was tied with fantastic exactness about his head, and under it stood out his wild elf-locks, black as the night, the sky, and the waters. Startled by this apparition at an unseasonable hour, the traveller stood appalled, and each surveyed the other on the long, dismal thoroughfare. At last a peal of sharp laughter filled the air; he of the red shirt sprang forward, laying both hands heavily upon the unprepared stranger, and cried out, in unearthly tones, "Man, man! Did you ever thank God for your reason?"

"I—I never did!" stammered the traveller, striving to regain his self-possession.

"Then, thank Him, now!"—shouted the maniac; and standing back to make a leap, his last cry rang on the night, as he yelled—"for I have lost mine!" And he sprang over the bridge with the heaving waters, whose moaning surge smothered his dying struggles.

Reader, did you ever thank God for your reason? If not, "thank him now."—Olive Branch.

DR. CUMMING, OF LONDON.

A gentleman gives the following incident in the early history of Dr. Cumming soon after he was licensed to preach by the Church of Scotland:—He came to London in search of a place to settle, as destitute and insignificant as could be imagined. He had a letter of introduction to a countryman of his own—a baker—who lived in a plain way, and of small means. After presenting his credentials, he asked him to do what he could for him. "We have a small church," said his friend, "but not a 'baulce' to pay a minister; but as you are anxious to be employed, stay a month with us, and I will board you." The young preacher consented, and at the end of the time found himself well liked, but without a salary at the present, or in prospect. He was then, no doubt—as he has since proved himself to be—some what of a "seer," discovering the "signs of the times." "Give me," said he, "the pew rents, and I will always be satisfied with them."—"The pew rents!" exclaimed his new friend—"why, they will not find salt for thy porridge, man!"—"I take them," said he. The bargain remains till this day, and the doctor's stipend is £6000 (£30,000).—American Presbyterian.

Published every Saturday, by
M. M. BAILLOW,
200  Winter Street, Boston

IRISH BROOM-MAKER.

SAM.
MASTER GEO. W. MARSH,
THE INFANT COMEDIAN.

TOODLES.

POLYDOR.

OF MARSH'S JUVENILE TROUPE

JEM BAGS

CORPORAL O'SLASH.

JEMMY TWITCHER.

SCHNAPPS.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 7, 1857.

$3.00 PER ANNUM { VOL. XII., No. 10.—WHOLE No. 298.
6 CENTS SINGLE

SOUTH STREET, NEW YORK.

The design for the beautiful engraving below was drawn expressly for our Pictorial by Mr. Hill, whose accurate and artistic delineations of local scenes have been so much admired and complimented. It represents one of the busiest localities in our sister city, one side being occupied by stores, the opposite by vessels of all descriptions, with their forest of masts, their projecting bowsprits, and their sails lowered to dry in the sun and air. The figures which crowd the street and sidewalks, the porters, sailors, stevedores, merchants, and street peddlers, are characteristic of the place. New York has a most distinctive character of its own in the external sense; it is entirely unlike anything in Europe, neither is there any other city of the American continent which has the same marked features. It is an unexplored mine of wealth to the artist; such quaint character of picturesque grouping as you continually find in this great centre of attraction to all nations, would make the fortune of a whole academy of European painters. That our native artists have hitherto neglected this available source is a subject of regret. This arises from a common feeling that leads us to slight what is near at hand and attainable, in pursuit of the remote and inaccessible. How much Gavarri or Leech would make out of New York characters and scenes, with their endless variety, strongly marked characteristics and curious combinations!

We have endeavored to direct the attention of our artists to this field, and the result has been some of our most felicitous and popular illustrations. We intend to follow up this vein, from time to time, and work it out. Nor is New York without intense attraction to every lover of the beautiful and picturesque; to such it is an everchanging and exciting panorama, far exceeding in interest the combined effects of all the exhibitions of the past ten years; and we can recommend no pleasanter or more instructive occupation for a spare forenoon or evening, than a stroll through this city, with its manifold suggestions to thought and material for observation. Our picture shows one of those lucky points of situation by which the fortune of the city is made. The largest ships float readily to the head of the longest docks, thus affording every convenience for loading and unloading. South Street is devoted to the wants of ships and their accommodation. Here may be seen the Canton and California clippers, side-by-side with Liverpool packets and river steamboats, the fast sailing fore-and-aft, and fishing vessels. Crowds of these latter craft lay off Fulton Market, which, with the Ferry House, is represented in our engraving. The buildings are devoted to sail-lofts, shipping offices, warehouses of every description, cheap eating-houses, markets, and those indescribable stores, where old cables, junk, anchors, and all sorts of cast-off worldly things, that none but a seaman has a name for, find a refuge. The street is nearly always crowded till sunset with vehicles of all kinds, most confusing to the newly-arrived and uneducated immigrant, whose mind has constantly associated the idea of America with thoughts of primeval forests and Indians. In fact, we are afraid these crude notions pervade the upper as well as the lower crust of European society. A friend of ours told us that when he was giving M. de Lamartine a brief but an exaggerated description of the grandeur of New York, the great author listened politely, to be sure, but the expression of his face, and an almost imperceptible shrug of his shoulders, conveyed to our friend the decided impression that the illustrious poet believed the narrator was adopting a poetical license, and that his picture "was but fancy's sketch." Be this as it may, at night South Street presents as great a solitude as the most reckless foreigner could desire, but by no means a safe one, except in the neighborhood of the Brooklyn ferries, which are all on this thoroughfare. But this is only one phase of New York city life. Like a cut diamond, it has a multitude of faces. Go to one part of the city, you would think yourself in a Swiss town, to another, that you had stumbled into the heart of Germany. New York has many cosmopolitan features, but they are all blended, with the local exception we have noticed. It is a world of itself, but a world very different from any other on the face of the globe.

VIEW OF SOUTH STREET, NEW YORK CITY.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—OR—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCRIBE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XXXII.

THE CRYSTAL FLASK.

THE Countess Altamira said she was ill, and this time spoke the truth. Her heavy eyes, pale face, announced restlessness. A nervous and convulsive movement agitated her features, and her short, cold words showed spite and impatience.

"You here?" said she, to Juan. "What brings you?"

"We have no time to lose, and I will tell you the object of my visit. First, send that chamber-maid away."

"For you, my young brother?" replied the countess, trying to laugh.

"No, senora; for you."

The waiting-maid left the room. When they were alone, and the doors were closed, Juan spoke:

"Senora countess, you have sworn to destroy a young girl whom I have sworn to defend. It is Alitea, my sister."

"What an idea!" replied the countess, smiling ironically. "Me destroy the Duchess de Santarem! She does not need that from me; and the favorite of the king—"

"Will defend her honor and reputation; you can ascribe that to her, senora, and you say truly she needs no one for that. But it is not so easy to defend her life against hidden plots."

"What do you mean by that?" cried the countess, trembling; and she looked at Juan with an uneasy, menacing eye.

"What I wish to say," calmly replied Juan, "your anxiety would be a sufficient explanation, if I had needed one. But we are not among the reverend fathers, your friends."

"That is true," said the countess, striving to recover her self-possession; "you are there no longer. They pretend that you escaped from them."

"Yes, senora; each to his taste. I was not pleased with the convent; there were fine ladies there who did not please me. But let us leave riddles, and speak plainly. You have sworn to harm Alitea, who annoys you."

"Me, senor!" said the countess, with haughtiness and indignation.

"You wish to kill her—"

"An unheard-of calumny—"

"By poison."

"Your new dress does not give you impunity, and I will punish such outrages."

She rose to ring the bell, but Juan seized her hand and forced her to be re-seated.

"You shall not call, and you shall listen to me. If it is necessary for you to destroy yourself, it shall not be here. I will carry my complaint to the tribunal of the Inquisition, of which I am a member to-day; and you and your accomplices would already be in its power, but you are the aunt of Fernand d'Albayda, you are the sister of Don Juan d'Aguilar, my protector, and my father. It is that remembrance which saves you. I will be silent, upon one condition: it is that you renounce your designs, if it is not already too late,—if already," continued he, seeing the anxiety of the countess, "they are not executed—"

"Me!" said the countess, trembling in all her limbs. "What designs?"

"You know them better than I, but God knows them also." And in a grave, solemn voice, like a judge who pronounces a sentence, Juan added: "You received from Father Jerome a crystal flask."

The countess uttered a cry of fright.

"Closed by a gold cover set with emeralds."

The countess hid her head in her hands, and Juan continued:

"That flask encloses a poison—poison slow and deadly."

The countess fell on her knees, and extended her arms.

"Good; you know your place. But you have no need to pray to me; it is not to me, I tell you; it is your noble brother, Don Juan d'Aguilar, who would pardon your deed. He sees us both this moment, and in his name, senora, I demand that flask, this very instant. I cannot leave in your hands such a weapon, which you intended to use against my sister, and, perhaps, against me. Go, then, and give it to me."

"But, my father—"

"I wish it," said Juan, in a menacing voice.

The countess raised herself, and tottered to a little marble cabinet, and unlocking the door, took out the flask.

"At least, you will tell me, senor, how you learned the secret."

"That you shall never know!" cried Juan, seeing the false look of the countess. And he added purposely: "I reserve for myself that means of discovering instantly all the schemes you attempt hereafter."

The countess could not wholly conceal the spite and rage which filled her heart, and she handed the flask to Juan. He looked at it and uttered a cry of terror. The flask had been used! that was evident, for it was not full by a fourth. Juan paled; a cold sweat covered his brows, and he would have fallen had he not supported himself by the chair from which he had risen. The countess stepped towards him. Juan repressed his anger, and cried:

"The crime is consummated! I owe you now nothing more, neither pardon nor pity."

He was leaving the room, when she threw herself at his feet.

"I swear to you," said she, to him, "that I have not used the flask. It is just as it was given to me by Father Jerome. I swear it. Senor, I swear it to you!" And seeing Juan, who eagerly seized upon this hope, stop and appear to hesitate, she cried with a tone of frankness which seemed to come from the heart: "You know it well, senor, since you know the flask,—since you have seen it and held it in your hands."

"So the days of Alitea are respected?"

"She has nothing to fear," replied the countess, with an anxious face.

"You swear it?"

"What need of an oath? You will see yourself that I have told the truth," and looking at him with a curious air, she added, "since you know the effects of this liquor."

"Yes," said Juan; "it is in a month, a month only, that it begins to carry death, and for ten days the flask has been in your hands. Well, if you have deceived me,—if the least danger menaces her I protect, you are lost."

"I know it. You will have the same power then as now."

"And nothing will stop my vengeance," said Juan; "you may be sure of that. As to Father Jerome and Escobar, I can strike them without touching you. Tell them upon what condition I will pardon them: that they are careful, like you, to respect Alitea. At this price, a treaty is between us; otherwise, war. Adieu, senora!"

That very evening, terror reigned in the convent of Alcala de Henares, and among the reverend fathers of the Society of Jesus. How had Juan discovered their secret? It was inexplicable, magical, diabolical! Neither the countess nor the monks could divine it. But when Escobar learned later that he must renounce the idea of being queen's confessor,—that Juan had supplanted him, he was furious. Both the fathers were so exasperated with their young disciple that they swore a war to the death against him. In consequence of which, they would first make him offers of peaceful alliance and friendship.

"He will not agree," said Escobar; "he is our pupil."

"He was here but a short time," replied the superior.

"That is nothing. What one learns is not forgotten. The first lessons remain always."

There was one event, recent and terrible, a secret which Sevilla did not know, and it was upon that that Father Jerome and his friends based their hopes of success for new plots.

From morning until evening, Alitea occupied herself with plans for the happiness of her brother, wherewith to embellish the life of trials and sacrifices which he had chosen for her sake. To him she confided all her joys, pains and most secret thoughts; not all, perhaps; but those which she hid, she wished to hide from herself even. Between Alitea and Carmina, Juan found this the happiest time of his life. In fifteen days, Carmina was to marry Fernand. The schemes of the countess were frustrated; for, through the influence of Alitea, the queen had herself appointed the wedding-day.

The day at last arrived, and more beautiful than ever in her bridal dress, which sparkled with diamonds, appeared Carmina. In presence of the king and queen, Juan blessed the young couple. The Countess Altamira was there, perfectly pale with rage, and in her inmost heart she vowed to ruin Fernand and the priest Juan, who seemed to her like an ever-present avenger.

One day, Juan, who ever watched each passing change on the face of Alitea with an intense agony, saw her pale and discomposed. Eagerly he demanded the cause, and she, blushing, then paling, declared she had a secret pain, and even while she spoke, the palor of death spread over her beautiful face.

"I see it well!" cried Juan. "Thou seekest vainly to hide it from me. Confess to me what it is thou feelest; tell me all."

"Be silent; ask nothing. I cannot tell you of the pain," said Alitea, almost kneeling.

"I know the danger that menaces you."

"There is none."

"Greater than you think; and I will save you, if there is yet time. You must know the truth."

"Whatever it may be, I can bear it. Speak, then, brother,—speak!" And gathering all her courage, Alitea listened calmly and immovably to the recital.

Juan then recounted to her the horrible designs of the countess, the way in which he had discovered them, and the last visit he had paid to the hotel of Altamira. Even while he spoke, the color returned to Alitea's face, serenity to her forehead, to her heart its calm.

"Is it only that?" exclaimed Alitea.

"Only that!" said Juan, astonished at her tranquillity. "Have you heard what I told you, about the crystal flask—the deadly poison it contains?"

"Yes," said Alitea.

"You are the victim."

"Would to Heaven I was, brother!" cried she, eagerly.

"What do you say?"

"Only that instead of stopping the countess, let her go on."

"And why? Answer me."

"Why?" said she, recovering herself. "I am foolish. I have here," and she placed her hand on her heart and head, "a great anguish which never leaves me; it is a suffering so acute that I think sometimes I would better die. But that will pass; I swear it. Re-assure myself, brother."

"I cannot be calm. Recall when you have seen the countess."

"Once or twice at court; but I have not spoken to her."

"Received nothing from her hand?"

"No, brother; I remember well; no. No aliment, no beverage. I swear it!"

"Nevertheless, this flask has been used."

"That flask!" said Alitea. "Show it to me."

He showed her the flask, and she seized it, and was about to break it, when he stopped her. It must be preserved, in order to frighten the countess, as a proof of her crime. Alitea then asked to keep it. She would keep it safely. He yielded to her.

In spite of what she had said, the sufferings of Alitea continued. The young girl strove to hide her anguish before all, but she could not wholly conceal it from the watchful, anxious eyes of Juan. She bore calmly without murmuring, for to him, in whom she confided every grief, this one must be closely hid.

CHAPTER XXXIII.

THE QUEEN'S ORATORY.

In the midst of all the plotting, scheming and intriguing, there was one thing which occupied all thoughts. It was not the danger that menaced the Spanish monarch; it was not the formidable preparations of the king of France: each one partook of the happy ignorance of the minister, and the latter, as we have seen, only learned it by chance. That which troubled all the world, and which no one could explain, was the state of the queen.

For two months she grew more depressed each day. The most skilful physicians could discover no real illness. The queen faded, without suffering. When her best friends, when Alitea questioned her, she answered:

"Nothing is the matter with me; I was never better, nor more happy. I love you; but I die. I cling to life, but I feel that it escapes me. I must hasten. Tell me if I can do anything to make you rich, powerful or happy; for soon I shall be able to do nothing for you,—soon I shall be no more!"

The queen, used to the sternness and severity of the priests who had preceded Juan, was delighted and surprised to find a friend, where she expected only an intolerant judge. The latter never wearied her with the dogmas and superstitious practices of his religion. Sevilla showed her only the moral and celestial virtues. The others frightened her; he re-assured her. The first spoke only of hell; Sevilla spoke only of heaven.

Thus when the queen was not with her young friends, she passed her time in her oratory with Juan. He had her whole confidence, and yet there was a secret which she dared not reveal to the friend or minister of Heaven. That secret was the only one that weighed upon her heart, the only crime she reproached herself with, and that had been involuntary. And more—she felt life was going from her; she understood that it was necessary to confess that crime, and she had not the courage.

"Yes," said she, to Juan, who divined well that some secret grief oppressed her, "yes—it is true; I have a pardon to seek of Heaven,—a fault to confess to you, my father; but not to-day,—to-morrow—to-morrow. Give me one day more."

Thus she pleaded; the days rolled on, and soon would come her last.

While the days of the queen fled away, strange rumors filled the city. The archbishop Ribeira and the grand inquisitor, and all the members of the Inquisition, save one—Juan, said that it was the vengeance of Heaven falling upon the queen, that an illness so sudden, which none could understand, showed the finger of God. God wished to punish Margaret for the protection she had given to heretics, to the Moors of Spain.

Another report, none the less odious, was circulated among the people. Each one was sure that the Count de Lerma, the prime minister himself, with his own hand had poisoned the queen, because she had opposed his favorite scheme—the expulsion of the Moors. These calumnies had already taken such a form that the Count de Lerma, returning from the council, had been insulted; mud and stones had been thrown at his carriage. Although he was completely innocent of the imputed crime, the minister was deeply wounded. Troubles seemed to accumulate; dangers menaced the kingdom, and treachery was in his own family, and now himself losing his popularity.

Don Delaseur heard all these stories, and instantly saw that it was all-important to suspend the signature of the king to the edict of expulsion. For that reason, Juan must be warned to see the queen, prevent it if he could, and without raising the suspicions of Sandoval or the minister.

Yezid left by night. He was to see Juan and the queen, and return immediately to Valencia, that his enemies might not suspect his visit. Yezid arrived early in the morning at Madrid. He knew from Alitea the means of entering the palace; it was by a secret staircase which led to Juniata's room, and to the queen's oratory. Juniata was perfectly astounded to see him enter the oratory, where she was busily engaged arranging and dusting the furniture.

"You, Senor Yezid! you at Madrid! When did you come?"

"Silence, Juniata! All the world must remain ignorant of my visit, except Juan and yourself. I came this instant on horseback with Pedralvi, who is at the hotel of the Duchess de Santarem."

"Pedralvi here!" cried she, joyfully. "And will he stay long?"

"Time enough to embrace you. Go quickly."

Juniata was running off. He stopped her.

"But first, I must speak to Juan."

"That is easy," said she, pointing to a door on the right; "he stays there at present."

"Really?"

"Yes; the queen is very ill, and wished him to be there."

"Very ill!" exclaimed Yezid, turning pale.

"On the other side," continued Juniata, pointing to a door on the left, "is the apartment of the queen, and here," pointing to a little grating ornamented with gold and covered with violet-colored velvet hangings, "is the confessional of her majesty, and Juan remains here to be ready upon the instant when the queen calls him."

"I will see Juan," said Yezid, going to the door of his room. But it was closed and locked. Juniata knocked softly; no answer. She knocked louder; the same silence.

"Sometimes he walks in the park. You will undoubtedly find him there. Come."

"You forget, Juniata, that I must not be seen. I came to speak to the queen and Juan, but no one must know it."

"Ah, well; remain here. In a few minutes, a quarter of an hour at the most, he will return. To be more sure, I will find him, and tell him to come. I am not afraid of being seen."

"Well, go quickly. I will wait for him here."

Juniata was just leaving, when Yezid heard distinctly the voice of the Countess Altamira. She was coming towards the oratory. Yezid thought all lost. The chamber of Juan was closed; the door opposite was the one by which the countess was about to enter.

"There is only one way," said Juniata, quickly, and opened the little gilded grating; "there—in the confessional."

"If they should see me!"

"But they will not. I will draw the curtain, which none have a right to raise without the consent of the priest. Enter, then; quick! they approach."

"But," said Yezid, recoiling a step, "it is the place of a Christian priest."

"No matter; only for a minute."

Yezid hesitated still; it seemed to him that it was a sacrilege to commit, he, a Moor, to enter the tribunal of penitence.

At that moment, the countess opened the door of the oratory. Juniata pushed Yezid into the confessional, and closed the grating upon him. Quickly as Juniata had pushed the young man in, it was not so quick but that the countess had seen, not Yezid, but the confessional door close. The countess had found the queen very weak, and gave her her arm to lead her into the oratory. The moment she entered, the countess cried out:

"Who is there?"

Juniata, although surprised by the question, did not show any signs of anxiety, or lose her self-possession for one moment, but replied with admirable coolness:

"The brother Luis Sevilla, who has entered to pray."

"Silence!" replied the queen; "do not disturb him. I saw him walking in the park, and sent a page to tell him I awaited him here, and he has come."

The queen then made a sign to Juniata and the countess to leave her. Both silently entered the apartments of the queen. Margaret was alone, but Yezid did not know it, and did not dare speak or make a gesture. He waited breathlessly to hear when the companions of the queen left. Suddenly on his right, and near the little interior grating, he heard some one fall on their knees and say to him in a low voice: "My father."

It was the voice of the queen, but so weak and stifled that he could scarcely hear it, which confirmed Yezid in the idea that the countess still was present. Pale and trembling, he kept silence, ready to faint at the sound of that voice so dear to him, and which filled him with terror and love.

"My father," said she, "I wish—I can no longer hide the secret which weighs upon me. To-morrow I shall be no more! I am guilty. I love—yes, I love in secret, in silence, for a long time. But this love was involuntary. I have struggled against it; I have resisted. No one knows it—not even he, and I pray God will perhaps pardon me. What makes me fear that he will not pardon me," murmured she, lowering her head, "what makes me tremble, is that he I love, whom I love always, is a Moor, an enemy of our faith—Yezid!"

At that moment a door opened, and interrupted her. She raised her head, and uttered a cry of terror upon seeing Juan enter. Seized with an indefinite terror, she threw herself into the arms of Juan. The latter did not know what to think of her fright.

"You, Sevilla! Who, then, is in the confessional? who has heard?"

As she spoke, she looked at the gilded grating, and saw a withered pomegranate flower fall to the floor. A ray of hope filled her soul, but not daring to believe her eyes, she cried:

"No, no—it is not possible!"

Juan held the queen in his arms, and laid her gently on her couch, and ran to call assistance. Hardly had he disappeared, than Margaret, ready to die with shame at having betrayed her secret, with the energy of despair, ran to the door of the confessional, and opening it, uttered a cry of joy. It was Yezid, who fell on his knees as once before in the underground hall of Valladolid.

"God alone—God and I! It shall be the secret of my life."

"It will be that of the tomb," said Margaret.

They heard Sevilla returning with her ladies of honor, and with despairing energy, she pushed Yezid into Juan's chamber. Too weak to bear so much emotion, Margaret sunk fainting into their arms. She never rose! That same evening, the funeral bells filled all Madrid. All the people, kneeling in the churches, prayed for their sovereign.

CHAPTER XXXIV.

THE UNKNOWN.

EXTENDED upon her bed of death, the queen of Spain made a sign with her hand for all her ladies to leave her. Beckoning to her a young priest, whose face was covered with tears, and who could not speak, so great was his grief; but he pointed his hand to heaven.

"You believe that God will pardon me?" said she.

And the priest responded:

"Moors and Christians are all children of the same God, and God avenges none of his children. The former were worthy of you, for they revered you; they adored you as they revere virtue, as they adore angels. Your love for them was not a crime, but a long suffering, a struggle, a fight in which you did not fail. God pardons those who suffer!" cried he, in a tone of conviction and hope. "God rewards those who struggle and who conquer."

The queen thanked him with a look, and showing him a turquoise ring which she always wore, said, in a low voice:

"I cannot keep it; take it and return it—to him!"

She signed her women to approach her. Altea, Juniata and Carmina threw themselves upon their knees beside her bed. Summoning all her strength, she whispered in the ear of Altea:

"Take care for thyself and thy relations. I am dying. You will have no one to defend you; and persecution and exile menace you; I know it."

Then raising her voice, she demanded to see and speak with the king. Before he came, she said:

"I wish on my bed of death to do all I can for you. I wish to make him swear before God and before you never to consent—never to sign the edict of banishment."

The effort was too much for her; the voice died on her lips; a cold sweat covered her forehead, and she fell back upon her pillow dead!

The grand inquisitor Sandoval, in pontifical dress, the principal members of the Inquisition and the clergy of Madrid, carried the remains in great pomp. The king, the young prince of Austria and his young sister, Anne of Austria, walked behind the clergy. Long files of monks carried torches, chanting. Altea and her companions retired to the rear; but Juan, to the last, kept his post beside the bed of Margaret.

The funeral ceremony commenced. The grand inquisitor Sandoval approached the queen, who could now take no note of his hated presence. He recited the accustomed prayers, and mounted her forehead with the sacred oil. At that moment, Margaret for a moment opened her eyes, and seeing round her only those cold, icy figures, she turned with terror; but her look encountered that of Juan, and thanking him, her peaceful soul quitted the earth and soared to heaven.

A great cry filled the palace, and was prolonged outside. The priests inclined themselves; the crowd fell on their knees, and Juan Sevilla, extending his hand towards the queen, cried in a loud, firm voice: "Angel descended from heaven, return to thy home!"

The death of the queen was soon known throughout all Spain. Altea and Juan told their father, for Yezid, given up to despair, was capable of nothing, not even of being consoled. All the Moors in Madrid wept for the death of Margaret, who was the death of all their hopes. The bells tolled for the death of the queen and their total destruction.

The Countess Altamira, paying frequent visits of condolence to the king, contrived to fill his ear with the stories of poisoning. She breathed not one word as to whom the public pointed as the author of the crime.

His first grief passed, the king thought only of Altea. It was the thought which filled his mind night and day. All that interrupted that dream appeared odious and hateful. He would not look at anything. But his royal tranquillity was suddenly disturbed by finding on his table this little note:

"If the king wishes to have the real details of the poisoning of the queen, and the true author of the crime,—if he wishes to know the dangers which menace him, his glory and his kingdom, let him be silent about this advice, and order the first gentleman of the chamber to introduce this evening into the cabinet of his majesty the unknown, who will present himself at nine o'clock at the door of the palace, and pronounce these words: Philip and Spain."

After reading this note, the king remained pale and sad. Unable to decide what to do, the weak monarch went to walk and think in the park. There he met Altea, Duchess de Santarem. To her as a friend, he confided the contents of the note. Altea turned pale at the mere mention of the suspicion of poisoning, but strongly advised the king to give the audience requested of him. The king saw the justice of the counsel given by Altea. Accordingly, he gave the orders to the Duke d'Uzede.

He was punctual. At nine o'clock precisely, the Duke d'Uzede ushered into the cabinet a man enveloped in a mantle. The king motioned to the Duke d'Uzede, who left.

"Speak, senior," said the king, when they were alone.

The unknown threw off his mantle.

"Father Jerome!" cried the king, astonished.

"Himself, sire, who has exposed himself to the greatest dangers to tell the truth to your majesty."

"Protected by me, what have you to fear?"

"Enemies, numerous, powerful, cunning, who will not forgive me for having disclosed the truth."

"You think, then, the queen was poisoned?" said the king, with emotion.

"I am sure of it; I swear it before God! I can tell the name of the poison—a poison which leaves no traces, it is true, but the symptoms of which are known to all scientific persons. These symptoms the queen had—"

"Who could have committed such a crime?" said the king.

The reverend father kept silent.

"The queen was loved by all."

"There were those who feared her."

"Who, my father?"

"Public rumor accuses a man placed high in the confidence of your majesty."

"Of whom do you speak?" said the king, trembling.

"It is astonishing that your majesty has not heard. Throughout all Spain a cry of vengeance is raised against him."

"His name!" exclaimed the king, whose anxiety increased every moment.

"Sire, it is the Count de Lerma!"

"The count?" cried the king, falling upon a chair, overwhelmed with surprise and terror.

"He it is, sire, whom all the world accuses; it is easy to tell you that; but I alone can give you the proofs."

"Speak—speak!"

"Three months ago, the queen went to your chapel to say mass; she was accompanied by her lords and ladies in waiting, the Countess de Cambia, Marquise de Escalon, Duchess de Zangla, and the Duchess de Santarem, also the dukes of Medina, Garamara and Uzeda, and the Count de Lerma. The day was very warm. The queen, who was leaning upon the arm of the minister, seated herself under a tree before her pavilion, and before all her train of honor, said to him, laughingly: 'I die with thirst.' Instead of calling one of her servants, as was natural and ordered by etiquette, the Count de Lerma went himself; you hear well, sire,—himself."

"I hear," said the king, who was listening with deep attention.

"He entered one of the little side rooms, and was gone some minutes. I pray your majesty to note that circumstance. He disappeared and returned, bringing the queen, upon a silver salver, a glass of iced lemonade, which the queen took and drank eagerly. After having drunk, she said, gaily: 'That lemonade had a singular taste!'"

The king uttered a cry of surprise.

"These words," continued the reverend father, "all heard distinctly. A month after, the suffering of the queen commenced, and two months after, she existed no more. All who know the effects of that poison, know that all that time is needed for its development. Recall the queen's symptoms. As for me, I cannot make your majesty share in my convictions; but I will say to you, sire, to you alone, I know beyond a doubt that that glass contained a poison."

"How do you know it?" cried the king, eagerly.

"The way in which this mystery was revealed to me, I cannot disclose before men. I can only say to your majesty, that glass contained poison; I know it."

The king, pale and trembling, looked at the monk with a mixture of terror and indecision; he hesitated still, trembling to believe and trembling still more at doubting the truth. Suddenly he uttered a cry; an idea came into his head. He ran and got a book which lay upon his praying desk, and opened it before Father Jerome.

"Swear it upon the Bible, my father,—and I will believe all."

The monk turned pale, and remained silent an instant. But he recalled the words of Escalon: "The end is all, the means nothing," and the mental restrictions for a long time admitted into their order; he laid aside his anxiety, and raising his head, he said, slowly and gravely:

"I swear upon the Bible that the Count de Lerma presented that glass to the queen. I swear that the glass contained poison!"

The king laid his face in his hands, and remained silent for a few minutes; he was stunned.

"He," said he, sadly,—he, in whom I have placed all my confidence! he, whose zeal I admired!"

"If that was all, sire," said the father, "your majesty could lay aside your regrets. I have not only heard, but have proofs to give your majesty, that this zealous minister has always betrayed you; that this minister has led you and the monarchy to the brink of a precipice; that this capable minister has ruined your finances, destroyed your fleet and armies, and left Spain without defence to the enemy who are going to invade it."

"What do you say?" said the king, in fear.

"At this very hour, nearly all Europe is raised against us, and you know nothing of it, sire; your minister knows it all."

And this time, without any Jesuitical turns, the reverend father proved the truth of what he advanced, showing private letters and foreign gazettes; in a word, he made the first part of his accusation still more forcible, by showing that not one word of the last part was false. A stronger will, a more energetic nature than that of the king, would have shrunk before the same situation; but the weak monarch hardly realized what a fierce storm was ready to burst over his head.

"Thanks, my father, thanks!" said he. "Soon—we shall see—to-morrow I will examine—I will reflect."

Father Jerome, leaving the king, ran to the Countess Altamira, who expected him, and exclaimed:

"This time, I swear it, our enemy will be overthrown!"

CHAPTER XXXV.

THE COUNCIL OF CASTILE.

THE next day a council was called. Present were the peers of the realm, and the Duke d'Uzeda, the son of the prime minister, willing and ready to make the downfall of his father a means for his own aggrandizement. A great noise, and the king entered, carrying in his hand letters and papers; his face was sad and troubled, and he walked quickly. All rose respectfully.

"Be seated," he said, in a blunt voice. "We have to-day to deal with important affairs."

All reseated themselves. The king glanced furtively round the room; but the places usually occupied by the Count de Lerma and his brother Sandoval were vacant, which fact seemed to give the king courage, for he said:

"I thank you, seniors, for your exactitude. You belong not to those who fear to show themselves in time of danger."

At these significant words, and astonishing as they were, pronounced by the king, who rarely spoke, a low murmur circulated through the assembly, and each one looked at the other as if to say: "It is done; the minister is overthrown!"

The door of the hall opened, and the Count de Lerma, followed by the grand inquisitor Sandoval, entered. The ticking of the clock could be distinctly heard, so profound was the silence that filled the council hall. Sandoval had a stern, impassible face. The Count de Lerma was strongly agitated.

"I ask pardon of the king, and you, señors," said he, bowing with respect, "for having made you wait—an involuntary detention."

A murmur of disapprobation was heard in the assembly, usually so patient and docile.

"An involuntary detention," continued the count, "and one that I have been unable to foresee; yes, señors,—a detention impossible to foresee. They stopped my carriage; the people surrounded it and threw stones at us, uttering cries that I desire to explain before you and before his majesty the king. I wish to tell the source of the noises."

"It is sufficient," said the king; "we know what to think of it."

"How, sire?" cried the count, indignantly, looking at the king.

"I hear," said the king, a little anxious. "I desire also that the subject be not treated of here—by you, who attach an undue importance to a chimerical accusation, in order to turn our attention from the other griefs and reproaches which are only too real."

The king seemed affected, and his voice was lower at the end than at the commencement of the sentence. It was in all eyes a manifestation of the royal displeasure, and indicated the fall of the minister.

"I hear with respect," said the Count de Lerma, "the reproaches which it pleases your majesty the king, my lord and master, to address me."

The king, bending his eyes upon a paper which he had in his hand, said in a voice which he sought to render firm:

"All Europe is in arms against us; a league of all the Protestant princes is formed against Spain. Is that true?"

"Yes, sire," said the minister.

"The king of France is said to have assembled a formidable army, more than sixty thousand men, a numerous cavalry, and is ready to make war. I wish to believe it to be a false report."

"No, sire; it is the truth."

A general murmur filled the assembly. Again Philip III. proceeded with his accusations, or rather statements, ending his account by saying:

"Are these statistics false or correct?"

The count seemed to hesitate; and the king, gaining his courage as his minister hesitated, repeated in a loud voice:

"I ask, are these statements exact?"

"Of the greatest exactness," replied the count.

Hurriedly the king went on to question de Lerma concerning the arms and strength of the kingdom, of the fortifications. All his questions the count answered faithfully.

"Sire," said the minister, "and you, señors, I have never ceased watching over the glory and independence of Spain. It would be very easy to give an account of all the measures I have taken to defend our territory, what negotiations I have entered into to dissolve this league, what alliances I have formed to resist it."

"Speak, then!" cried the king, impatiently.

Murmurs broke on all sides.

"Yes—I repeat it would be perfectly useless," said the minister, in a voice which quelled the assembly.

"Useless!" cried the Duke de Medina; "and why?"

"Because we have nothing to fear from our enemies outside," replied the count, looking at his adversaries; "because the army of the king of France will not pass our frontiers; because the league of Protestant princes depended wholly upon one man; that league is already destroyed, in the person of the chief: king Henry IV. is no more!"

Every one remained motionless at this news, struck with astonishment.

"The king of France no more?" repeated the Duke de Uzede, pale and terrified.

"Dead!" said the grand inquisitor,—"dead by an assassin's sword. Letters I received this morning from France tell me that at the coronation of the queen, he was assassinated. We deplore his loss, while we adore the just decrees of God, who chastised so promptly the chief of heretics, for he died at the moment when he menaced a faithful Catholic people."

"God protects Spain!" said the king, raising his eyes to heaven. "Maria de Medicis saw with regret the preparations of Henry IV., but to-day becoming regent, in place of war she offers us peace. See the letters signed by her, addressed to us by Epemon and Concini. In the place of a rival, we find in France a friendly union, ready to aid us with arms and treasure, a faithful ally, who asks to mingle his blood with ours, for the queen Maria proposes to us a double marriage, that of her daughter to the prince of Asturias, and that of our young infanta Anne of Austria with the young king Louis XIII. Think you now, sire, and you, señors, that I have betrayed the interests or glory of Spain?"

"Long live the Count de Lerma!" cried the Marquis de Miranda.

"Long live our glorious count!" repeated a part of the assembly, whom the wind of success had already turned to the minister.

As to the king, he knew not what to think—whether to weep or rejoice; and the Duke d'Uzede, enraged in his heart, hastened to the house of the countess, where Father Jerome and Escobar sat in triumph awaiting him, to tell them that never had the Count de Lerma been more powerful, more glorious or more king of Spain than in that moment.

After the death of the queen, Carmina and Fernand, so happy in their love, refused to stay at Madrid. Alitea, though urged, could not follow her friend, for she thought it was her duty to stay near her father and brother. Juniata had already left; she went to Valencia to announce to him the arrival of Alitea.

The day when Juan presented himself before his brother and said, "The queen is dead!" Yezid had uttered a cry and fallen insensible, struck down with despair. For entire weeks he neither slept nor spoke, either to Juan or his sister. From time to time he repeated in a low voice, "Margaret! Margaret!"

One day, Juan presented him with a token; it was a turquoise

The morning after the success, the grand inquisitor hastened to recall the promise that his brother had made in time of danger. The count had promised, if he escaped the dangers which menaced him, he would no longer oppose the designs of Heaven and of his brother, and he would aid the latter with his power, and at last obtain the total expulsion of the Moors from Spain.

The prime minister would have more gladly aided in the expulsion of the Jesuits, his mortal enemies. The coldness of the king, his unusual firmness—all was the work of Father Jerome, who, he knew, still continued to meet the king secretly. The count began to understand from whence came the calumnies which were circulated against him. It was the priest, together with his own faithless son, who were working to obtain his ruin.

The minister, henceforth defiant, examined everything with care. The statements which Juana had given him were correct. Neither he nor Sandoval could conceal from themselves that this unknown monk had done them more service than their most devoted friends. It was he who had saved them, and what redoubled their astonishment was, that this monk, humble and modest, without scheming or ambition, had, since he had gained the place of confessor to the queen, sought to forget and efface from their memory the affair. Ignorant of all the bonds which attached him to Alitea, the minister and grand inquisitor looked upon him as an auxiliary whom they could not serve, but who could serve them. An occasion was not slow in presenting itself.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

WILLIAM TELL.

The beautiful accompanying picture, representing William Tell in the market-place of Altorf, delineates a stirring scene in the history of Switzerland. Every incident portraying the history of this intrepid man possesses an engrossing charm, and is eagerly sought after by those who prize the name and blessings of liberty. The event takes us back to the early part of the 14th century. The scene lies in the market-place of Altorf, whose bell-tower is a conspicuous feature in the landscape. The insolent Austrian governor has set up a pillar in the square, to which he has affixed the Austrian banner and shield, surmounted by his cap, compelling the Swiss to uncover their heads before it, in token of acknowledgement of Austrian sovereignty. The poor peasants, old and young, overawed by the presence of the governor, who, clad in steel, and seated on his war-horse, surrounded by his men-at-arms, is watching them, tamely submit to the imperious mandate. William Tell, a free-hearted peasant of the neighborhood, with his bow and quiver under his arm, and accompanied by a friend, stands in the foreground, watching with indignant eye the abasement of his countrymen, and suppressing with difficulty his just anger. He will soon be espied by the watchful tyrant, and commanded to perform the same disgraceful homage. He will refuse, and then the governor will condemn him to shoot an apple from his son's head. The result is well known. Victorious in the cruel ordeal, a second arrow was detected on his person. When asked the object of secreting the shaft, he boldly answered Gessler: "To kill you, tyrant, had I slain my boy." He was seized and loaded with chains, but when crossing the lake of Lucerne with the governor and his suite, was freed that he might act as helmsman in a terrific storm that overtook the party. He conducted the boat safely to shore, but on the moment of touching, he sprang on a rock, spurning the vessel with his foot. He had his bow and arrows with him, and when the governor escaped the storm and effected a landing, Tell shot him dead on the road to Küssnacht. The death of Gessler was the signal for a general rising of the Swiss against their oppressors, the prelude of a war which lasted till the close of a century. Tell is supposed to have lost his life in an inundation in 1350. His memory is honored, not only in his native land, but the wide world over. His spirit survives among his countrymen, and we have seen, lately, how, when threatened by Prussia, they flew to arms, and like their heroic forefathers, prepared to defend their liberties with their lives.

SCENES AT CANTON.

We give on the next page two graphic sketches of great present interest, the first representing a few of the suburbs of Canton. The water is covered with clumsy junks, and other Chinese craft, while at the distance, on the right, are seen the suburbs of the city blazing from the fire of the British guns. The second picture represents what is termed the Dutch Folly Fort, on the Canton River. It is a very picturesque place, being overgrown with trees; and the landscape is rendered yet stranger to an American eye by the curious Chinese-covered boats floating on the surface of the river, and propelled by oar and sail. The localities, particularly the first, now possess an historical interest, and, as we think that a radical change will take place before long in the condition of Canton, such representations are well worthy of preservation. When European civilization and European architecture have gained a foothold on the shores of the Canton River, it will be pleasant to refer to these memorials of the present time by way of contrast. The ring, upon which was engraven the Arabic word dhawys. At sight of that, reason seemed to return to him, and to their great astonishment, that magical talisman recalled him to life, and Alitea's surprise was redoubled when she recognized the ring the queen always wore.

WILLIAM TELL, IN THE MARKET PLACE OF ALTORF.

"Who gave it to you, brother?" cried Yezid.

"She who is no more, but who watches over us still."

Yezid fell on his knees.

"She told me to return it and order thee to live, and devote, like me, to all thy people, the life that God has given you. Thou wilt obey her?"

"Always!" replied Yezid, carrying the ring to his lips.

From that day Yezid recovered, and was ready to return with his sister to Valencia, always to seek for the good of others, for their happiness, though no more happiness would come to him, or brighten his eyes. The departure of Alitea was fixed upon, but she could not go without seeing the king, without obtaining his permission. She wished an interview with the king.

The Count de Lerma contemplated with joy but afflict still the deep precipice from which by a miracle he had drawn back. He had thought all lost, but found all saved. He triumphed over his enemies, and over the king, even. Never, during all the time of his administration, had he had a moment more brilliant or glorious.

BOMBARDMENT OF CANTON—SUBURBS ON FIRE.

British public are divided in opinion as to the justice of the acts of their officials in China. The quarrel arose from an apparently insignificant cause. Instead of appealing to the British consul, certain Chinese officers violently removed some Chinese criminals from a lorcha lying in Canton River, and hauled down the British flag which was flying from its mast. The British consul accuses the Chinese governor-general of seizing the crew, of hauling down the British flag, of declining to offer any apology, and of retaining the men seized in his custody. The Chinese governor, in a letter addressed to Admiral Seymour, affirms that, having ascertained that nine of the captives were innocent, he directed, on October 10, an officer to put them on board of their vessel again, but that Consul Parkes refused to receive them. As to the lorcha itself, he states that when the Chinese on board were seized, she was supposed to be a Chinese vessel, and belonged to a Chinese, who had fraudulently obtained possession of a British ensign, by entering his vessel on the colonial British register—a method, it seems, habitual with Chinese smugglers. As to the question of the insult to the flag, the governor remarks: "It has been the invariable rule with lorchas of your excellency's nation, to haul down the flag when they drop anchor, and to hoist it again when they get under way. When the lorcha was boarded, in order that the prisoners might be seized, it has been satisfactorily proved that no flag was flying. How then, could a flag have been hauled down? Yet Consul Parkes, in one despatch after another, pretends that satisfaction is required for the insult offered to the flag." From these premises the Chinese governor concludes that no breach of any treaty has been committed. On October 12, nevertheless, the British plenipotentiary demanded, not only the surrender of the whole of the arrested crew, but also an apology. The governor thus replies: "Early on the morning of October 22, I wrote to Consul Parkes, and at the same time forwarded to him three men, namely, Leong, Mingtai and Leong Kee-foo, convicted on the inquiry I had instituted, and the witness, Woo Ayn, together with nine previously tendered. But Consul Parkes would neither receive the twelve prisoners nor my letter." In the evening of the same day, governor Yeh again made inquiry why the prisoners tendered by him were not received, and why he received no answer to his letter. No notice was taken of this step, but on the 24th fire was opened on the forts, and several of them were taken; and it was not until November 1, that Admiral Seymour explained the apparently incomprehensible conduct of Consul Parkes in a message to the governor. The men, he says, had been restored to the consul, but "not publicly restored to their vessel, nor had the required apology been made for the violation of the consular jurisdiction." To this objection, then, of not restoring in state a set of men numbering three convicted criminals, the whole case is reduced. Some of the London papers are very strong in their condemnation of the bombardment of Canton on such a pretext; while others defend it. The American force at Canton was not concerned in the quarrel, but a fort which had fired on our flag was demolished by the guns of an American naval vessel. What the issue of this affair will be, no one at present can tell, but we think that one result to grow out of it will be that European powers and the United States will require the right of having their ambassadors reside at the imperial city, Peking. Recent accounts, moreover, convey the impression that the reigning dynasty, the Manchou, is tottering to its downfall, and that the rebels who have been winning victories and steadily advancing for three years past, will succeed in restoring the Ming dynasty, with liberal laws, regulations, and policy.

THE DUTCH FOLLY FORT, CANTON RIVER.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

YOUTH.

BY C. H. HAMMOND.

"Stay, passing moment, stay!"

Give me a glimpse of thy golden hair,
Thou art so beautiful and fair,
O, do not flee away!

"Stay, passing moment, stay!"

Joy lingers in thy sunlit glance,
And beauty on thy countenance
Doth sparkle in its ray.

"Stay, passing moment, stay!"

My hopes are trembling on thy wings,
And innocence, beseeching, brings
Her voice for thy delay.

"Stay, passing moment, stay!"

The flower of youth is blooming now,
The dew of love is on my brow,
O, do not flee away!

"Stay, passing moment, stay!"

Thy warm, delicious breath I feel
Upon my cheek, as thou dost steal
So silently away.

Gone, and by eternity's decree!
Gone, with the generous joys reposed in thee!

Yes, thou hast gone away
Into the west-for past—the elme
Of youth's lost hopes, where forms like thine
A requiem chant o'er dying time,
And whisper of a life divine
In heaven's celestial ray.

The spell hath fled of tender youth,
But not all manliness and truth
Do I resign
The soul's high aims and moral might,
A heart that beats for human right,
May still be mine.

The melodies of brook and bird,
Of waving trees and bleating herd,
No more I hear;
Yet memory may their charm repeat,
When labor's surges cease to beat
O'er life's career.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

DAUGHTER OF THE HOUSE OF SUSSEX.

BY FRANCES P. PEPPERELL.

ONE scarcely would have thought that a small, low-browed room, dimly lighted, and almost unfurnished, was an apartment of the royal palace of Scotland; yet so it was, and here, in important deliberation, stood King Robert and his privy counsellor, Lord Angus Murray, while attentive at their feet, with fingers that had ceased their play with a shaggy dog, sat the lovely boy-prince, James, joining now and then in the conversation with an intelligence beyond his years.

"I have no proof, Angus, of my brother's designs," said King Robert, sadly; "and loath am I to believe what all tell me, yet I cannot but acknowledge that he hates the child who stands between him and a crown."

"Let him have it, father," said the boy. "It brings nothing but vexation. I am well content as I am."

"But I am not," said the king, bending towards him and speaking very distinctly. "Boy! it is thine inheritance. Back into the dimness of heathendom and the mists of the flood, it hath sat on no brows but thine ancestors'. Give up thy right? Die first! When a wicked, foreign king strives to usurp, do we yield? do we not rather struggle through fire and ice, burrow in caverns, live like wolves, and never own his sway? How much more, then, when one of ourselves plays the traitor! What glory wreathes the brows of a prince who descends from his throne, abjures his oaths, annihilates his birth? Shame, little pale-face! I, too, have struggled and fought, and well earned the right that my son should sit where my sires did. It is my right as well as thine. Thou hast no right to give up my interests!"

Kindled by his father's words, the boy stood erect, with glowing cheeks and brilliant eyes, and looked every inch of the king within him; none beholding him could have questioned the divine right, and grown men might have knelt, as Earl Angus Murray did then, and kiss the little princely hand. Tears sprang to the father's eyes at this unsought act of homage, and in the silent hand-grasp that followed, more was expressed than an hour could have uttered.

"Father," said Prince James, "something says to me that years, unlawful years, will pass ere I hold my own; but I promise, father, never to see your crown desecrated by one not born to it!"

"Not for the crown's sake, darling—gilded toy and bauble—but for the glory with which our ancestors have impregnated it, to every jewel on the rim."

"Not for the crown's sake, but for thine and mine; and you can trust your son's word, father."

"That I can!" heartily answered the king. And the child resumed his play with the dog, while the king and Murray conversed in low undertones.

"So faithful a servant will be pardoned," said the latter, "for suggesting that if the wee one stay longer in Scotland your majesty will soon be childless. He must be concealed, or he will be destroyed!"

"Hush! Hush, Angus! Do not breathe it. He shall go. I will write to our cousins of France, and send him thither in the first skiff that crosses the water."

"But the English cruisers! Should they take—"

"Nonsense, Murray! Thou art a death's head at any feast!"

"Sire, danger being here, you must look it in the face, and I must speak. Should the English cruisers obtain your child, his case were better than if in his uncle's hands; since sparing his life and keeping him tenderly, not for your, their bitter enemy's, sake, but from their own reverence for royalty, we should ransom him; and even should your majesty leave us before that time, were he but anointed, his right would be safe."

"You speak well, Angus. And the ship?"

"Lies now ready for sailing, at the port's mouth."

"Make ready, Angus. He shall go."

"Father," said the boy, rising, "let me be anointed now."

At this unusual proceeding, the earl and king glanced at each other.

"And why not, sire?" asked Murray.

"It was never done before," said King Robert, quite amazed at the temerity of the idea.

"Establish the precedent then."

"But the archbishop?"

"He will have finished high mass in the chapel by the time I can assemble the nobles."

"Hasten then, Murray, and we await you here."

Saying which, the king drew the child into his arms, and the privy counsellor departed. While they were still sitting there, father and son, locked in the embrace and silent happiness which they were never to know again, their candle-wick blazed up, flickered and expired, leaving them in an unnoticed darkness. But the silence was soon broken by a childish footfall along the corridor, and a sweet voice, ringing changes with an English accent on a sad, old Scotch ballad, and the gloom disturbed by the light of a taper stealing in the cracks of the door ere it was gently opened, and a dark-eyed, elflike face, strangely unlike the "braw-bluid" of the Highlands, peered into the room, from under an uneven fringe of dark, waveless hair.

"Who is that?" asked the king.

"It's me. It's Ellie," answered the voice. "Shall I go away? I want my kitten."

A sudden thought seemed to strike the king:

"No, come in," he said; and accordingly the whole figure, that of a diminutive child of six or seven, obtruded itself into the room and closed the door.

By degrees she drew nearer, and planting her light on the table, stood as unabashed before the king as she would have done before a beggar, her head partially turned towards a little yellow bird perched on her shoulder.

"It's in the corner, Ellie," said the prince; and with a magnetic understanding, the little girl immediately found and took possession of her kitten, while rousing with a toss of his shaggy mane, the dog fawned round her feet.

It was hardly singular that a child, who seemed by some inner quality thus to control and reconcile animal natures, should move the quick heart of King Robert, and with the pain which parting from his own child evolved, he felt sharp twinges of remorse at sight of the little dark captive; for Ellie was her father's hostage, a powerful English noble, who, having been made a prisoner, was released that he might procure a ransom, and his little daughter retained in his stead. She had now been a year in the palace, kindly tended, and a playmate of the prince, both bound in a childish friendship by one tie, they had neither of them any mother.

"Come here, Ellie," he said.

Ellie came, but with something of the defiant in her manner and posture, as she stood fronting them, her kitten folded in her arms up under her chin, and the bird securing a loftier perch. The king drew her towards him.

"Little Ellie seldom sees Jamie and his father together," he said.

"O, I wish I was with my father!" returned the child, while large tears darkened the wide searching eyes, and the suddenly released kitten scampered off to its nest. "He would like to see his little Ellie. O, I am afraid he has forgotten, or he would certainly have come!"

"Father!" said the prince, starting up and trying to read his father's face, while his own asked a great question.

"Yes," answered the king, turning to his son and folding him closer, "yes, boy."

Little Ellie had separated herself from the loving pair, and as Murray, with attendants and torches, entered, she stole away, sobbing, to the corner and her comforter there. In a moment, everything was marshalled, and they moved on in a procession to the chapel, the king first stopping to induce himself with his crown and ermine, which the counsellor had brought. The large chapel was filled with different personages of the court, and many merchants and gentlemen summoned from the city, when the king took his seat beside the great altar, with the young prince standing, the centre of a blaze of light, at his left hand. A few words of explanation were given, the prayers intoned, the audience with joyous shouts proclaimed the boy the rightful heir, and the vial of unction was in the archbishop's hand, when a loud clanging of spurs on the stone vestibule resounded through the utter stillness, and with an echoing stir, the haughty brother of the king entered and strode up the broad aisle. The flames of the myriad wax-lights quivered and shone again in the burnished sconces, fetters and altar of frosty silver, like the arrest in this proud man's face. The rich carving on the massive columns and arches staid unmoved, the gorgeous paintings looked down on him with unregarding eyes, and the long tapestry floated solemnly to and fro in the long wave that their length imparted, untroubled by his presence; but neither the vast proportions of the solemn place, the breath of living hundreds, nor the ashes of dead kings below, had any spell upon him. His angry eyes took in the scene at a glance, but fear of discovery alone kept him silent. The prince stood by himself in front of the altar, while the gray archbishop touched him with the sacred oil; when his uncle reached the altar and drawing his short sword quickly presented the point to the bare, snowy bosom of the royal child. The child raised his head, and gently moved the sword aside, saying, in a clear, grave tone:

"Touch not the Lord's anointed!"

With a bitter exclamation and a taunting laugh, his uncle sheathed his weapon.

"By'r lady, brother! A boy of spirit!" said he, and stood with folded arms while the child took the oath upon himself with a clearer understanding of its duties than his uncle could ever experience, and the whole silent procession stole out of the church, leaving only two figures within, one, that of this resolute, bold noble, the other, the child Ellie, with her kitten crouched in her arms and eyeing him keenly from across the transept.

"Come here!" commanded he, at last perceiving her.

Ellie obeyed leisurely.

"So you too are fond of this baby brat?" he said, taking her little shoulder in his rude, hard grasp.

"O, you wicked, bad man!" cried Ellie, vainly striving to free herself, and to deadly fear for her precious burden. "He is far better than you, and he is your king!"

The grasp grew tighter.

"Little prisoner," he began.

"If I am, you are a traitor! I heard the king say so!" retorted she.

A ringing blow on her head that sent her staggering into the arms of the Earl of Murray, who had come to seek her, and the king's brother strode away. Two hours afterwards, the same ship that bore Prince James and the counsellor out into the broad frith, bore also little Ellie. Night and day for a week, passed in quick reversion, and the children, in their happy play, took no note of time or danger, while Earl Murray restlessly paced the deck, alert for the first signal of trouble. It came soon enough; and ere another nightfall, the dreaded English cruiser had three new prisoners on board, and was making a southern port of England.

The little prince, not half aware of the peril, stood by Ellie's side, looking out on the green banks, while changed from the weird strangeness of her demeanor, joy sparkled in the English child's face, and gay as a tropical bird, she laughed and sung till the ship swung round on its anchor and a detachment of Henry the Fourth's army came on board.

"My Lord Suffolk," said Murray, "if you grant any favors to enemies, allow me to leave his little daughter with the lord of the castle, whose turrets I see yonder, not three miles distant."

The request was readily complied with, and still ignorant of her destination, soon Ellie stood in her father's hall. A bewildered glance she cast around, went timidly up to the armors hanging on the wall, and examined them, looked askance at the warders and grooms, and then as her father appeared, half up the great, stone staircase, fled with a frightened cry and found shelter in his arms.

Nineteen years spent in sunshine and the sweet light of home are the lifetime of some, but nineteen years in a dreary prison, lonely, however splendid, had been the lot of Prince James. Every advantage of education had been his, and now at the age of twenty-eight, in the immature science of the day he was an adept. A musician whose melodies drew the griefs from many a melancholy prisoner in the tower, and a poet whose verses enchanted all the aesthetic minds of the realm. But an oppressive sadness appeared in every tone and gesture, sat in the soft blue eye and curved the pensive mouth. Still memories of Highland heather stole in among the primroses of his window, and the stifled city air was not such as had nursed his boyhood. Day after day, bunches of flowers were sent him, pots of exotics edged his balcony, conveyed by some unknown hand during their flowering season, and perfect pictures of countries far away, which he had long ago given up any hope of ever seeing, save only in his dreams, served to beguile the tedium of his life. Nevertheless, all these acts of kindness were of the last year's growth, and it gave him a new interest in existence to feel that any one had an interest in him. Murray had shared his imprisonment but a year, and though since constantly engaged in efforts to procure his liberty, he had never yet gained access to him, nor did the prince know aught that had transpired at home, save that his father was dead, and the Scots resolutely refusing his brother the regent's rule, awaited their liege monarch, and though still uncrowned, he was in all intents himself a king. But close prisoner as he was, one form already haunted his royal eyes; from his balcony he saw it, in his reveries pictured it, now and then heard the silvery tones of sweet voice proceeding from his neighbor's apartment, Earl Rivers whom frequently his cousin, Lady Eleanor Rivers, came to visit.

There was a garden in London attached to the city residence of the Duke of Sussex, and down its fragrant parterre slowly paced a lady and gentleman. One was the earl, Angus Murray, secretly in England, and the other, the duke's daughter, Lady Eleanor Rivers. The dark hair no longer hung unevenly about her face but was trimmed up round the head in a massive coronary braid thickly twisted with brilliants, that same head thrown back as queen might carry it; the eyes were still as dark and weird, the skin soft and dark, the mouth as crimson and finer chiselled, the when a child they had fixed many a gaze; the strangeness of the child's guise had grown into the woman's chief beauty, and the unformed figure into the south-of-England perfection of height and staturesque shoulders.

"I should have hardly recognized the little Ellie in your ladyship," said Murray.

A troubled glance came into her face at the words; it was plain she wondered if another would. Hard would it be to say if as Ellie grew, the memory of the boy-prince grew with her, shutting out other forms, so that having observed his northern comeliness on his only and brief appearance one evening at court, or frequently as he hung over his balcony above the courtyard of the tower, she had become accustomed to image him in her maiden dreams and think of him in her waking hours, and thus remain unwon though not unwooed beneath her twenty-fifth summer for his sake; yet it is but fair to conjecture that some such thing were true. She had heard through her imprisoned relative of noble acts of self-sacrifice on his part towards others more unfortunate even than he; and though yet to her knowledge he had never seen her, she wondered would he remember the childish friendship he had felt for one now changed. Not Eleanor, but her grateful father, had added alleviation to the royal prisoner's restraint, yet nevertheless, many an illuminated manuscript and many a tome of music had found its way into the tower from her.

"Then," said Lady Eleanor, after a pause of thought, "it is scarcely likely that your king will recognize me, which may defeat your purposes."

"But you can make yourself known," he said, bluntly.

"And when must this plan be begun?"

"At once. Your cousin being confined in that quarter of the building, you can obtain admittance as usual under the plea of visiting him, at the outer gates. When once within, after ascending two flights of the main, exterior passage ways, demand the prince's apartment boldly, and enter unannounced, then proceed as may be best. I shall await your ladyship's return in this arbor."

And while he seated himself, Lady Eleanor left him, and donning wimple and stole, shortly presented herself at the tower gates. A short parley with the captain of the guards, whom she well knew, and she had crossed the courtyard and passed the motionless sentinels there, and on the exterior passage, and met the next guards.

"Lord Rivers's apartment!" demanded she, authoritatively, with her arms folded across the small package she bore, and quite as if there were nothing more to be said.

It is a fact that sudden and well-timed boldness will frequently accomplish more than any dint of entreaty, and without questioning her right, the soldier led her to the foot of the first grand flight, where there was another guard, who seeing her thus attended, lowered his weapon and suffered her to pass on. Almost breathless, she at last stood in the hall into which opened the several ante-chambers of important prisoners, and at the door of each of which sat two sentinels. She held a crumpled scrap of parchment in her hand which looked like an order from the lord lieutenant.

"The apartment of the King of Scotland!" said her low, imperative voice.

Two of the watch rose and bowed, and unlocking the frowning, spiked door, accompanied her to the room, the door of which they closed behind her and retired. The King of Scotland sat at a low table, his head leaning on his hand, quite unaware of any one's approach. Gently unfolding the package, she advanced noiselessly, and slid the picture it had contained under his eye. A moment he started, and then gazed eagerly. It was a rude, miniature likeness of herself, years ago, with her bird and kitten.

"O, happy days!" said he, unconsciously. "O, lost childhood! Little Ellie—happy Ellie!" and then remembering himself, glanced upward at the strange lady.

She threw back the hood, smilingly, and looked down upon him.

"Ellie, Ellie!" he cried. "I should have known her through a thousand eternities! O, while watching thee, distant and apart, why did I never know thee for my baby comforter and darling? And springing up, he grasped her hand, and would perhaps have been even more cordial in his greeting, but for a half imperceptible coldness in her stateliness, which remembering the old proverb of "light won, light lost," both prudence and love taught her to assume.

But in a moment she had drawn him to a lounge by the open balcony, and taking her seat upon it beside him, was recurring to old scenes and half-forgotten days which Murray's words had renewed, and explaining the boldness of her call.

"It needs no explanation, Ellie: the lonely prisoner cannot but thank the kindness that prompts your ladyship to break through rules of nicety for his happiness."

"Sire, not only for thy happiness, but freedom."

A flush spread on the cheek, and a glow into the eyes that fell. "No, no, Lady Eleanor, do not lead me to the syrens. Gray hairs will usurp Scotch curls, and still the four walls, whose every grain I know, will close in and stifle my aspirations. Ah, little Ellie, they cannot poison the soul, nor will any chain or bar confine the volatile essence of life that rises at last to heaven, free! Do not torture me with hope of liberty. I have tried already."

"Sire, try again. Even should your majesty fall, all walls and restraints will drop before thee at one word signifying resignation of thy crown."

"Thou rememberest that night in the chapel, my blessed father by me, when I swore never, never to resign. I know what I swore then. I cannot break my word, Ellie."

Thinking but to divert his mind, she returned:

"Sire, I am no longer the little Ellie whom you knew."

He looked up with large, surprised eyes, and the look of calm vanishing therefrom.

"Truly, I think not," said he. "I had forgotten. Pardon such unfolding of my thought to a stranger, and allow me to end this interview by wishing the Lady Eleanor Rivers a good morning." And rising, he bowed and offered his hand to conduct her to the door.

Eleanor took the proffered hand without rising, but lifting her dark eyes to the bending face.

"My friend," she said, "I did not hazard so much, gaining access here, to leave now. Sit again, King James. Do not be angry; little Ellie begs, not I."

But instead of resuming his seat, he stood leaning against the sill of the alcove. Eleanor rose and went towards him, laying both her hands on his arm with a sweet petitionary gaze. To her surprise, he took the arm away, threw it round her waist, bent his head and kissed her on the lips. Angry tears sprang at first to her eyes, but changed to those of joy as she met the passionate gaze of his.

"Ellie, Ellie! tell me," he said, "have I remembered, desired, loved, in vain all these years? Have I heard thy step on these stone stairs, and thy voice in other rooms, and turned away sick with longing, never to experience fulfillment? Have I seen thy beauty at the court, watched thee in thy barge upon the river, known thee in the thousand pleasures thrown around me here, never to fold thee in my arms? Have I heard treacherous tongues dilate on thy perfection of virtue and knowledge, never to prove it for myself? Have I loved so long in vain? O, fool! hard and selfish that I am, fruits of long loneliness, to desire love when it would bring only sorrow. Leave me, Ellie, ere I hear one dissenting word, that I may at least nourish delicious, impossible dreams."

But putting her arms up round his neck, she still clung to him. "Leave me!" he said, hoarsely.

"I cannot. I, too, love!"

"Another?"

"No, no! Canst ask me? Thee, only thee."

"My wife then?" with a glad, sudden trembling in his voice.

"Thine."

Silence ensued.

"Canst thou, then, resign thy wife?" at last asked Eleanor. O, love, leave crown and rank. Come with me. Prove happiness."

"False, false!" he cried. "Temptest thou me to oath breaking?"

"Cruel words. Never, never!"

"Cruel words indeed. Forgive them, sweet delight."

"Always, always will I be faithful to thee. Nor prison, nor death itself part us!" And with hearts full of bliss they remained again long wordless.

When Ellie left the tower, the king had consented again to try escape. The regent of Scotland, the brother of the late King Robert, had but just arrived, the bearer of peaceful terms of freedom for King James, greatly against his will, and was now the guest of the Duke of Sussex. Thus when happy Lady Eleanor reached her father's palace, she found him duly installed therein; and having greeted him courteously, but with much mistrust, she glided into the garden and the arbor, there to relate their plan to the Earl of Murray.

"It is well, my lady," said Angus, "and this night I will row to the tower's foot and receive him."

And with a few more words they parted in different directions. But as Lady Eleanor entered the hall, another form boldly followed her, muttering: "I, too, will be there, my lady!" It was King James's uncle.

It was not singular that a large pot of exotics should be sent from the palace of the Duke of Sussex that afternoon to the royal prisoner, as many a time already similar gifts had passed in; nor was it to be wondered at, that at dusk King James uncouthly therefrom a ladder of cords and a long, hempen rope, the first of which, after one or two attempts, he succeeded in attaching firmly to the side of the embrasure far above; and securely mounting it, while it swayed slightly with his weight at that dizzy height, he at last landed on the roof, and with a light step crossed and leaped upon that of a turret somewhat lower. Spanning another distance with long, agile limbs, he stood on the lowest point of the great mass of masonry, where, safely securing the rope which he had carried in his hand, he wound the other end round his waist and peered over for the signal. Three torches sprang into life directly beneath, and as instantly were quenched in the Thames; when grasping the rope, he sprang over the ledge and slid down its length, till his feet touched the thwarts of a boat, and flinging the rope away, Murray's arms enfolded him, while the loyal counsellor whispered:

"Welcome! welcome brave Heelandman! Wha lets but we gang free now?"

At the same moment, an oar sounded in the water beside them, and a heavy stroke from some upland club struck Murray far into the river and the king lifeless across the boat.

"In no such dishonorable way, Lord Suffolk," said the regent's coarse voice, "shall any Scotchman find freedom while Englishmen treat with his countrymen for his release. His uncle, I; my brother's child, he. But though I be sore wounded, I send him back to his tower till your king unbans his door!"

And at the tower gates the treacherous uncle left the man whose bane throughout life he had been, seeking, with a smiling face, the palace of Sussex.

Much dispute took place in the privy council of England, whether close dungeons or his former apartments should be vouchsafed King James; but as they were already on the point of war with France and constantly harassed by Scotland now in foray, and now in broad battle on account of the king whom they would not suffer to be ransomed, they concluded best to allow him the old privileges, with a closer guard; and it was only because the regent who had betrayed him was her father's guest, that Lady Eleanor could ever again obtain access to him.

"O, for a breath of that mountain air!" he sighed.

"Do not despair," was her answer. "Remember Bruce!"

The thought of his ancestor revived fresh courage in the weary breast, and with reassured hope he imported to her a plan which years ago he had fondly cherished. Long residence in these rooms of no extended dimensions, had familiarized him with every seam in the drapery, every stain in the stucco, and many a time had he measured the distance, if any space might be unaccounted for between the walls, and sounded the solid partitions if anywhere they should ring hollow beneath the stroke. The walls were of stone, carved like panels, and when his suspicions had become fully awakened, accident had disclosed to him a panel that moved aside and opened a narrow space, which in turn opened behind the arras of the ante-room. Here, when Eleanor brought a suit like that of the tower guard, with helmet and halberd, he bestowed it with whatever trifles had grown precious during his confinement; hope fevered his face and excited his heart, every moment wound the chord up to greater tension, and bidding her farewell, he shortly sent for the keeper of the tower, and demanded an interview with his uncle, the regent. A short and stormy one it was, and when the guest left, King James opened his balcony window, stepped behind the tapestry, and entered the secret nook, carefully restoring the panel, and having induced himself in the guard's attire, lighted his candle and disposed himself to read. Thus when the servants brought the evening meal the prisoner was not to be found, and the hue and cry raised thereupon brought not only the lord lieutenant of the tower, but half the dignitaries of the palace and privy council. It seemed evident that he had escaped by the open window, how, could not be devised, and the chiefs of the departments were too trustworthy to be suspected. His uncle was last with him, he had probably assisted his flight, they were fools to trust to the honor of this Scotch regent, and a detachment being despatched, shortly returned with that individual in custody. As this company filled both ante-room and study, holding the new prisoner among them, King James extinguished his candle, noiselessly slipped the panel aside, closed it, and stepped down behind the drapery of the ante-room, emerging, unperceived, near the door, where one curtain folded over another, with drawn visor and elevated halberd. As he stalked majestically through the crowd, he passed near the regent.

"Thou," whispered he, "let all traitors be rewarded," and passed out with one or two others to take the customary night station outside the tower walls.

"That was he!" cried the regent. "That was his voice! The tall guard. King James of Scotland is even now disguised among you!"

"Up visors, guards!" shouted the lord lieutenant, and every face being disclosed, none but the familiar soldiery appeared.

"Lying dog! Have a care!" was the retort on this last betrayal, and the walls which had so long encompassed the nephew, now closed upon the uncle.

But in a large rowing swiftly down the river was the flown bird, and before midnight, the snowy wings of a Scotch brig were stretched up the North Sea for Edinburgh, bearing not only King James, but the daughter of the House of Sussex as well.

He had escaped, and since reward and search were useless, the privy council thought best to conceal the affair from public knowledge. Forty thousand pounds was not to be refused by a nation entering, in those days, on a campaign, and since that sum was willingly offered and given by King James that his father-in-law's suspected share in the transaction might be overlooked, it passed to the ears of the people as the Scotch king's ransom, though on highland or sea shore no clan beyond Pentland hills but knew better. But long misfortune, far from ruining the young king, now crowned with his wife, at Seone, had only developed his sterling qualities, and long and blessed was the rule and reign of noble James and his bonny Queen Ellie.

WEDDED PRIVACY.

Preserve the privacy of your house, married state, heart, from father, mother, sister, brother, aunt, and all the world. You two, with God's help, build your own quiet world; every third or fourth one whom you draw into it with you will form a party, and stand between you two. That should never be. Promise this to each other. Renew the vow at each temptation. You will find your account in it. Your souls will grow, as it were, together, and at last they will become as one. Ah, if many a young pair had on their wedding-day known this secret, how many marriages were happier than, alas! they are.—Home Journal.

ONE DOLLAR!

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of BalloU's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original, humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over two hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has been for sixteen years connected with the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 75,000 copies.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor, No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

SCENE ON THE ICE IN BOSTON HARBOR.

We herewith present another of our local views, delineating a striking scene of the memorable winter we have just passed through—one without a parallel for many years, and which will not be matched, we hope, for some time to come. The value of our publication is greatly enhanced by its being an illustrated record of the times, furnishing matter for reference in future days as well as subjects of present interest. How pleasant it will be, in years to come, when the hard winter of '56-'57 is spoken of, to turn back and study these lifelike delineations of its trying times! What would we not give for a picture of the scenes that transpired during the memorable winter that Cotton Mather described in the extract we published in our last number! The view before us was drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Hill. At the time of his sketching it, the harbor was frozen across to East Boston, and thousands trod the ice as securely as if they were on terra firma. Pedestrians are seen moving about in our picture, ladies and gentlemen promenading, and fishermen pursuing their sport in the air holes. In the narrow channel-way in the middle of the picture, is seen the ferry-boat, no longer proudly driven by her paddles, but painfully dragged along by a volunteer force of citizens, and transformed, for the nonce, into a Dutch treck-schuyt—certainly a novelty in our navigation. Navigation here certainly suffered severely during the past winter, though our citizens had the poor consolation of feeling that other seaboard cities were as badly, if not worse off. Let us hope that the past winter was an exceptional case, and that in future, if not exempt from cold, we may at least not be temporarily embargoed and isolated by the ice.

NEW LOWELL R. R. DEPOT, CAUSEWAY STREET.

The second view on the next page is from the pencil of Mr. Hill, and represents the substantial brick building fronting on Causeway Street, recently erected by the Lowell Railroad Corporation, to take the place of the station so many years occupied at the foot principal posts are placed candelabras of a very neat, but not at all gaudy, design. Five other doors lead from this hall into the parquette lobby, which, in common with the other lobbies running around the auditorium, is thirteen feet in width at the centre, but tapers at either side as it approaches the proscenium ends, until it is but two-thirds that size. Ten doors of entrance open at equidistant points in this semi-circle into the boxes and seats of the parquette. Opposite to them, are other small doors, opening into several retiring rooms. The lessee's room is upon the corner of Locust and Broad Streets, with windows opening upon the two thoroughfares, and has an extent of eighty by fifty feet. It is furnished with a fire-proof safe and the modern conveniences of gas and water. Besides this, the ticket office for the family circle, whose entrance is on Locust Street, is at one end, and the admissions to the first three circles of the building will therefore be under the immediate eye of the lessee. At the south-eastern corner of the academy, leaving an entrance through the other ticket office at the south end of the first vestibule, is found the director's room. In nearly every respect this is similar to the apartment we have just described, having also fire-proof safe, etc. The novel arrangement by which the coil of heating steam-pipes has been covered with a marble slab, and made to appear in every respect as a marble table, will here probably attract the notice of the visitor. From the boiler room six miles of pipe carry the heat over the entire structure. In this subterranean apartment there is a wooden wheel fourteen feet in diameter, furnished with paddles similar to those of a water-wheel, but projecting from the side, which is used for forcing cold air into the house, the air being drawn from the outer world and passing through vaults beneath the building until reaching gratings. By this means the atmosphere of the house can be changed as often during a performance as may be desired, and always preserved pure. The fan is turned by means of a neat ten horse power steam engine. In another vault, close at hand, is a Worthington steam pump, of the largest near the frescoed ceiling, are ventilators, placed in a proper position. The air conveyed through these ventilators is carried by flues in the walls to a point directly above the centre chandelier, where it is suffered to escape. Gas burners of three lights each, are arranged around this in common with the other semi-circles, and the floor is carpeted. The entrance to the family circle, as has been before stated, is on Locust Street, and entirely distinct from that of the other parts of the house. As the gallery steps are steep, the backs of the benches have been made high, but not so as to obstruct the view in the least. From the rear seat next to the proscenium, at either end of the gallery, two-thirds of the entire number of footlights on the stage can be seen by a visitor. Adjoining the third tier is an attic, containing a huge tank, always filled with water, and to be used in case of fire. At the top of the fourteen columns supporting the roof of this circle are fourteen lights of six burners each. The dimensions of the auditorium are 102 feet 6 inches from curtain to back wall, 90 feet wide from wall to wall, and 70 feet in height. The number of seats is as follows: Parquette, 480 seats; parquette circle, 580; first tier balcony, 408; first tier boxes, 128; six first class proscenium boxes, 96; total first class seats, 1692. Second tier balcony, 424 seats; second tier boxes, 134; second class proscenium boxes, 32,—590 second class seats. The amphitheatre has 618 third class seats, which makes a total of 2900 seats, and standing room for 500 in addition. The size of the stage is 72 feet 6 inches deep, 90 feet wide, and 70 feet high. The ceiling of the auditorium is made of ribs of wrought iron, the space between them being filled with wire gauze, on which the plastering is laid. The artistical designs, filling the eight compartments into which it is divided, are Music, Dancing, Tragedy, Comedy, Spring, Summer, Autumn and Winter. The design and fresco work of the ceiling owes its beautiful execution to Mr. C. Kaiser, and the oil paintings are from the hand of Mr. C. Schmolze. The inner dome of the ceiling is azure, diversified with stars. The proscenium boxes are eight in number, four on of Lowell Street, a long distance from this. The building is a well-arranged one, and fully adapted to the purposes for which it was designed; yet no attempt has been made at architectural elegance or costly display. Further on are seen the embattled towers of the Fitchburg Railroad Depot, a grand and imposing structure of granite, which looks like a huge castle of the olden time. Years ago, before the practical operation of these great iron roads was demonstrated, when their prospects seemed all rose-colored, everything connected with them was conducted on the most magnificent scale. Shrewder calculations, and the lessons of experience, have not been without their results. If railroads are no longer regarded as mines of wealth, or as lotteries offering splendid prizes to the adventurous, they present, under good management, safe investments.

SCENE ON THE ICE, BOSTON HARBOR—CITIZENS HAULING THE FERRY-BOAT.

NEW OPERA HOUSE, PHILADELPHIA.

On the next page we present our readers with a fine view, drawn expressly for us by J. R. Chapin, of the new palatial academy of music of which the Philadelphians are so justly proud. This splendid structure reflects the highest credit on the liberality which provided the means, and on the talent of the architects, Messrs. Le Brun and G. Range. The corner stone of this building was laid July 26, 1853. It stands on the corner of Locust and Broad Streets, having 140 feet on the former and 238 feet on the latter. The outer vestibule is a hall seventy-three feet in length and ten in width, with a very high ceiling, handsomely grained. At either end are ticket offices, at which the necessary documents can be procured for admission to the parquette and dress circle. The inner vestibule is three times the width of the former hall. The ceiling is beautifully panelled, and Roman Doric pilasters decorate the walls. Three chandeliers furnish adequate illumination. From the northern and southern ends of this apartment rise stairways, leading to the dress circle. They are thirteen feet in width, and ascend beneath arched openings. The balustrades upon each side are of black walnut, and upon the four size, to force water to fill a tank in the attic of the house, whose height prevents it from being supplied by the Fairmount works. This apparatus is always in readiness for service, and in case of fire, outlets have been provided, both on and through the stage, through which it will send streams of water to almost any required part of the structure. On the ground floor of the Broad Street front of the academy, is the restaurant, a large room seventy-two feet in length by fifty in width. It is furnished with every possible requirement, including adjoining rooms to serve as kitchens, vaults, etc. Ranges have been placed in suitable positions. The sale of spirituous liquors is expressly forbidden. This portion of the premises will be, together with the refreshment rooms adjoining the Foyer, under the supervision and entire control of Mr. Louis Tessant, a well-known public caterer. Entering the auditorium, the dress and family circle and gallery rise in tiers in three successions, while at our feet spreads the parquette. The line of curvature of the tiers is one of extreme beauty, and their fronts are very neatly ornamented. They are supported by fourteen iron pillars, each with gilding on a white ground, and the effect of the whole is very light and graceful. The paper covering the walls of all the circles is deep crimson. Running around the front of the two upper tiers is a slight iron railing, serving for both a useful and ornamental purpose, being a safeguard for those in whom the elevation might induce dizziness. In the parquette and the parquette circle the seats are supplied with arms, and each spectator allowed a space of twenty-one by thirty-three inches. They are constructed of black walnut, with spring cushions and backs of crimson plush, and an enamelled white plate is upon each, bearing its given number. The inclination of the parquette is such as to enable every one, even to the most distant point from the stage, to obtain a fair view over the head of the person in front. The dress circle contains five rows of seats, back of which, running around the semi-circle, are twelve enclosed boxes for family parties or otherwise. The same arrangement is observed also in the family circle above. Along the wall, beneath the gilt cornice each side of the stage. They are richly carpeted, and have the walls covered with a paper of damask and gold. The hangings are of extra rich satin, with gold borders, and fringe of the same material, with crimson. The fitting up of the proscenium boxes reflects great credit on the artist, Mr. John Graham. Lyon J. Levy, Esq., one of the committee, is highly spoken of for the part he took in the supervision and arrangement of the house. On either side of the proscenium, supporting the architect of the stage opening, are columns thirty-three feet in height, three feet thick at the base, and richly gilt and ornamented. Over the stage, in the centre of the arch, is a medallion, on which is painted the head of Mozart. Two recumbent figures are at its sides, representing Music and Poetry. Over the boxes, at the apex of the two outer pillars on either side of the stage, are two colossal caryatides. The act drop is a view of Lake Como, and painted by that unrivalled scenic artist, Mr. Russell Smith. The first drop curtain consists of rich drapery, with golden fringes, ropes, tassels, etc., and is the work of Mr. Martin. The stage is fitted with every modern appliance, and the machinery and general arrangement was designed by Mr. Johnson, the well-known machinist of the Boston Theatre. At the rear of the stage, and over it, is the painter's gallery. At the left hand side of this gallery is the carpenter's shop, where the frames for the flats and wings are prepared. The southern part of the house, fronting on Westmoreland Street, is devoted to the female performers, the north side to the males. The dressing rooms are furnished with every appliance. There are bath-rooms and washing apparatus on every floor of the academy. There are five hundred gas burners in the auditorium and four hundred on the stage. The splendid chandelier in the former is of cut glass, 48 feet in circumference, and containing 200 jets. It was manufactured by Messrs. Cornelius and Baker, who also furnished all the candelabras of the building. Messrs. Archer and Warner supplied the gas pipes. The labors of the original contractor, John D. Jones, Esq., have given the committee universal satisfaction. The upholstering department was under the charge of Mr. Edward Burke, the paper hanging that of Mr. E. Hazzard, the ornamental carving of the auditorium by Messrs. Buscher and Bailey, and the heating apparatus by Mr. Walworth. Charles Conard, Esq. was the general supervisor of the whole. The scenery is from the pencil of Mr. Riviere, an artist from Brussels, renowned in his profession. A remarkable fact in connection with this house, and worthy of the highest commendation, is that it can be cleared of an audience of three thousand persons, without confusion, in the short space of eight minutes. The lessee is Edward A. Marshall, Esq., and the stage manager Mr. Peter Richings, gentlemen in every way fitted for their positions. The house was inaugurated by a magnificent ball on the 20th of January last. Our Philadelphia friends have now an establishment of which they may well be proud.

THE NEW OPERA HOUSE, PHILADELPHIA, PENN.

MRS. RUSH OF PHILADELPHIA.

A correspondent of the N. Y. Sunday Dispatch thus notices the appearance of this distinguished lady at the Opera House ball: Prominent among the ladies in attendance was the majestic and queenly Madame Rush, a lady whose influence and wealth are only equalled by her benevolence and multiplicity of intellectual graces. The centre of attraction, surrounded by a host of respectful admirers, no one could observe her without pronouncing her the beau ideal of an American lady. As she entered the splendidly illuminated ball room, leaning upon the arm of Prof. Leidy of the Pennsylvania Medical University, there was a rush on the part of many of the company to obtain a view of her, it being understood that she was to appear in a robe of novel texture, recently purchased for her in Paris at a cost of three thousand dollars. The vulgar eye, however, was disappointed. The lady appeared in a costume of extreme simplicity, relieved only by the flashing gems which were profusely spread over her person. Thao Madame Rush, no one better understands the art of dress. She is the recognized leader of the beau monde in our city—a position to which her claims are unquestionably paramount. Her parties are the most luxurious and expensive ever given in this country, and by far transcend in sumptuousness anything I have ever witnessed in Fifth Avenue or Fourteenth Street. In physique, Madame Rush is finely developed, inclining slightly to embonpoint. Her eyes are soft and dove-like, while her hair flows back like a rivulet of sherry. Petite hands and feet, lips of scarlet and a smile of inexpressible sweetness, and you have a somewhat tangible idea of our queen of fashion.

THE NEW LOWELL RAILROAD DEPOT, CAUSEWAY STREET, BOSTON.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE PICKPOCKET.

BY FREDERICK W. SAUNDERS.

"Yes, I consider him a tip-top fellow in almost every respect; he has but one fault," I said, in reply to a question from Bob Smith.

"Nonsense!" returned Bob. "How can you make such a foolish statement as that? The man is not alive who has but one fault; we all have scores of faults. It is only when a man practises one particular vice that we put all other follies out of sight, and say 'he has but one fault.' I myself used to be one of these first rate fellows who had but one fault, and a most unlovely course of sprouts did I have to go through to effect a cure. The rock upon which I split was a darling sin that did most easily beset me. From boyhood I was afflicted with an almost irresistible propensity for indulging in practical jokes; many a troublesome scrape did I get myself into, and many a friend did I lose by the means. But nothing, however serious might be the result, could deter me, when an opportunity offered, for practising my absurd sport. If the victims were angry and indignant, I only laughed the louder, and wondered that they could not see the fun of the thing. But at length, one of my most exquisite jokes recoiled on myself with so much force that I can never even think of a practical joke without a squirm at the disagreeable recollections the thought suggests.

"As I was ascending the steps of the Exchange reading-room, one day, about two years ago, I saw, a little in advance of me, my intimate friend, Dick Jones. Accelerating my pace to overtake him, I observed the corner of a large pocket-book protruding from his coat pocket.

"What a careless fellow that Dick Jones is!" I said to myself. 'I'll give him a lesson that will make him more careful in future.' And coming close behind him, I adroitly transferred the well-filled wallet from his coat to my breeches' pocket; then falling back among the crowd that is always coming and going at 'change hour, I entered the room by another door, waiting the moment when he should discover his loss, to step forward and give him his wallet, and a long lecture at the same time.

"I had some little difficulty keeping him in sight, as he rushed hastily hither and thither, bowing to this man, shaking hands with that, and having a few words with another. I managed to follow him, however, taking care that he should not recognize me, and chuckling at the consternation it would occasion him to find his pocket-book missing. Presently he put his hand behind him, started, and turned round, for the first time giving me a view of his face. Great Jupiter! it was not Dick Jones at all, but a gentleman I had never seen before in my life. Here was a predicament. As the enormity of the act of which I had been guilty presented itself before me, I was completely overwhelmed; the blood rushed to my head as though I was about to have an attack of apoplexy, and for a moment everything swam before my eyes. Recovering myself with an effort, I started forward, but only to see the gentleman I had robbed vanish through the door at a high rate of speed, and almost instantly become lost in the hurrying crowd.

"What was to be done? why, return the gentleman his pocket-book at once, of course. But how? I didn't know who he was. True, the contents of the wallet might reveal that, but with what face could I seek out the injured man and say: 'My dear sir, here is your pocket-book which I stole from you a short time since. I am sorry for the theft, and now return the property. The only apology I can offer is, that I mistook you for another gentleman, whom I supposed I might rob with impunity?' What would the deeply injured and badly frightened gentleman say? and, above all, what would he do? Would he not, with righteous and just indignation say: 'You confounded, contemptible thief and pick-pocket, you have been the cause of my having a note protested to-day; you have occasioned me a shocking loss of valuable time; you have prevented a splendid bargain; in short, there is no end to the evils that have resulted from your atrocious crime. Your story of the mistake is a palpable humbug, and you only return the property because you feel certain of being detected before you leave the city. This sort of crime is becoming too common, and I feel it my duty to give you in charge of the police?' Yes—undoubtedly that is what he would say; he would then open the door, beckon to an officer and have me arrested; I should be dragged to prison, examined and committed without bail. At my trial, the plea of insanity would be set up, of course; the intelligent jury would consider the defence lame, and shake their heads gravely at the story of the mistake; the judge would say that every other pick-pocket might plead a mistake if this was admitted, and I should be found guilty, and everybody would exclaim: 'How easy the fellow got off! only three years in the state prison!'

"With these and similar thoughts running through my head, I paced back and forth across the hall with agitated steps, endeavoring to think of some method of extricating myself from my unpleasant predicament.

"What the deuce am I to do?" I kept repeating to myself, as I fingered the confounded wallet which felt like lead in my pocket, and weighed much heavier than lead upon my mind. 'How can I get the infamous calfskin back to its lawful owner? Such things have been done; we often read of similar restitution in the papers. Let me see; how is it we thieves and pick-pockets manage such things without being discovered? Ah, I have it!' I exclaimed, almost alone, in my intense satisfaction at the idea. 'I'll just do the thing up in a neat package, and send it by mail. What a goose I was not to think of that before!'

"With a heart much lightened, I eagerly started to quit the hall. Horror of horrors! at the entrance I beheld the gentleman I had robbed engaged in conversation with a couple of policemen, who stationed themselves at each door, narrowly watching every person who left or entered the hall. Words cannot express the utter, hopeless despair into which I was thrown at this terrifying sight. Any attempt at restoring the property under these circumstances would be sure to be considered the effect of fear and not of honesty. Here I was, as it were, imprisoned with the most convincing and damning proof of guilt about my person, and with a couple of lynx-eyed detectives barring the entrance, from which I kept as far as possible, pretending to be absorbed in the perusal of a paper, for I was conscious my flushed and agitated countenance would betray me at the first glance. What would I not give to have been as free from guilt and as much at liberty to go and come where I chose, like other honest men, as I was an hour before! But no; there I was, a trembling, skulking thief, watched by the police, and liable at any moment to be arrested, with the evidence of my crime upon me. O that accursed pocket-book! how I searched the hall with my eyes for some place where, unobserved, I might hide it! But an instant's thought convinced me that such a proceeding would only render matters worse; doubtless I was already closely watched, and would be seized upon the first suspicious movement.

"And suppose they do arrest me?" I said to myself, making a desperate effort to reason myself into a calmer and bolder frame of mind.—'suppose they do arrest me? I am well known in the city; no one would suspect me of being a pick-pocket. I can produce any quantity of evidence as to my character; I can prove that I am a gentleman and an honest man; only it so happens that I have got another gentleman's wallet in my breeches pocket, and cannot deny that I stole it from him an hour or two ago. Mighty honest and gentlemanly that is certainly! No; I'm a thief beyond all remedy. No one would believe my story; it is so improbable that I scarcely credit it myself.'

"At this moment, a heavy hand was laid upon my shoulder. I felt the blood leave my face and rush back upon my heart; my knees trembled and smote together, and involuntarily I stretched out my wrists for the expected handcuffs.

"Why, what in the world is the matter with you, Smith?" asked a familiar voice; and with an inexpressible sense of relief, I perceived that it was not a policeman, but an old acquaintance.

"Good heavens, Spencer!" I exclaimed, frantically clutching his hand; 'I have got myself into the most deplorable scrape. Will you give me your advice, and assist me to get out of it?'

"What kind of a scrape?—going to have a note protested, or anything of that kind? I'm a little short myself to-day; but I suppose I might make a raise, if it isn't too heavy.'

"No; it's worse than that, a thousand times worse.'

"Worse than that! Why, what in the name of wonder can be worse than a protest?'

"Spencer," I said, blushing clear to the tips of my ears with shame and confusion, 'I have got another man's wallet in my pocket. I thought to play a good joke upon Dick Jones, but found, when too late, that I had picked the pocket of an entire stranger. Now what shall I do?'

"Why, return it, of course," replied Spencer, coldly, bestowing upon me a glance of contempt.

"It is too late to do that," I groaned. 'There are a couple of policemen watching the door, and I cannot pass them without being detected.'

"It's a very awkward affair certainly,—very awkward," he returned, glancing uneasily toward the door. 'For my part, I don't see how you are to get out of it. I don't know as there is anything I can do; and as matters will probably take a serious turn, you must be aware that I am rendering myself liable to suspicion by stopping here talking with you. So good-morning, Mr. Smith. I wish you well, and out of your trouble.'

"For heaven's sake, Spencer!" I exclaimed, observing his look of contempt and suspicion, 'you don't suppose that I am guilty of this thing,—that I did it intentionally and for the purpose of robbing the man?'

"Why, really, Smith, I do not wish to be either judge or jury; but it does look somewhat singular that you should pick any man's pocket of a large sum of money, whether you happened to know him or not. You say it was done for a joke; perhaps it was, though I must confess I cannot see the point.'

"At all events, you'll not betray me?" I asked, in an imploring tone.

"No," he replied.—'I'll not betray you.' Then with a severe look, he added: 'That is, not if you follow up your present intention of restoring the property.' And he turned away and left the room.

"Good heavens, I'm lost!" I muttered, while the perspiration poured down my face. 'He believes me guilty, and so will everybody else. What can I do? I shall never be able to face these confounded policemen. Without doubt I shall pass this very night within the walls of a jail, in company with other felons. What will the world think of me? what will my friends, and, above all, what will Marie think when she learns that I am a common pick-pocket and thief?'

"Almost fainting from excess of emotion, I leaned against a pillar and gazed vacantly about me. 'Change hour was nearly over, and the crowd that had thronged the hall was rapidly thinning out. In a few minutes there would be scarcely a dozen persons present, when the officers would have no difficulty in ferreting me out. I strove to nerve myself for the event that was impending by walking rapidly back and forth across the hall. Presently some one entered the door; it was Dick Jones.

"Dick!" I almost screamed, beckoning him toward me.

"Why, Bob!" he exclaimed, as he came toward me and grasped my hand; 'what is the matter? You look as if you had got the yellow fever. Are you sick?'

"Yes—very sick," I replied; and with a sense of the deepest humiliation, I recounted the circumstances. Dick heard me to the end in silence, looking very grave.

"Surely you do not think I intended any evil?" I ejaculated, in an agony of spirit, as he continued to gaze upon the floor, silent and thoughtful.

"No, Bob," he returned, very gravely; 'knowing, as I do, your unfortunate propensity, I cannot but believe your statement, though the case certainly looks bad, and I fear it would be difficult to convince strangers of your innocence.'

"But you will do something for me, won't you, Dick?" I said.

"Why, yes; I'll do all I can," he replied. 'What is the name of the gentleman you plundered? I will go to him and see what sort of an arrangement I can make; we shall have to do it quick, too, for I see the officers are watching us. What's the name?'

"I have not the slightest idea who he was. I shall have to examine the wallet to discover that. Do you suppose I can do so without being observed?'

"Well, you will have to take that risk anyway. Go into that corner and examine. I will stand before you to prevent notice as much as possible. Be spy now, for there's no time to lose.'

"With trembling fingers, I drew the accursed wallet from my pocket, and read the name upon the clasp.

"It belongs to Jenkins, of South Street," I whispered to Dick.

"The deuce it does!" he replied; 'then I'm afraid we shall have some difficulty in arranging the business, for he has the reputation of being a stern, hard man to deal with. However, wait where you are, and I will go and see what can be done. And I say, Bob,' he continued, lowering his voice, 'if anything should happen before I get back, I will come up to the Tombs and see you this evening or in the morning; and hastened out of the hall.

"People may talk of shipwrecks and disasters at sea,—of the solemn hour before a battle, or of the breathless interval before the word to fire is given in a duel; but I'll be hanged if I believe I should suffer one hundredth part so much in any one of those situations as I did for half an hour after Dick left me. Dinner hour was approaching, and the crowd rapidly dispersed, until there were scarcely twenty people in the hall. That I might not render myself unnecessarily conspicuous by wandering about with an evident want of purpose, I bent over a desk and pretended to be reading, while I kept my eyes upon the door, watching and dreading the entrance of the formidable detectives. O how long seemed the minutes that I stood there waiting and trembling, hoping every minute to see Dick returning, and yet conscious that he had not been gone half long enough to accomplish anything!

"At length, as I turned my eyes for the hundredth time toward the door, I saw the officers come in and walk up the room; they passed and repassed me several times, and though I did not raise my eyes from the paper, I was conscious that they were examining me attentively. Presently one of them came, and leaning over the desk by my side, began carelessly turning the papers, while his searching gaze was bent fixedly upon me. My heart was in my mouth, and my breath came and went with difficulty.

"Can you give me small bills for a twenty?" he asked, abruptly, laying his hand upon my arm.

"No—no, sir, I cannot; I haven't it about me," I stammered, without raising my eyes from the paper.

"Haven't it about you! Why, what's that?" and he rapped his knuckles against my pocket, which the fat wallet caused to bulge as only a rich man's pocket should bulge.

"That—that is only a bundle of papers."

"Papers, eh? well, let's have a look at them."

"What do you mean, sir?" I exclaimed, making a frantic effort to appear indignant, though not daring to raise my eyes to his face.

"You'll soon find out what I mean," he replied, seizing me firmly by the arm and beckoning to his brother officer, who appeared to be expecting the summons.

"I cast a despairing glance toward the door. Could it be that fate had at last relented? Yes. There was Dick and the gentleman I had robbed coming up the steps; they called the officers aside, and a long conversation ensued, Jenkins and Dick appearing to be urging something upon the officers, with which they seemed reluctant to comply, for they occasionally looked at me and shook their heads. But at length the arguments of my friends seemed to prevail, for the officers walked away toward the door, and the former approached the spot where I was standing.

"Give the gentleman his property," said Dick, very gravely.

"Sheepish and blushing, I produced the diabolical pocket-book, and returned it to its owner.

"Young man," said the gentleman, severely, 'I am doing wrong—very wrong, in allowing you to go at large. It is my duty to deliver you up to justice. Your story of the mistake and the intended joke is absurd; people have but one object in picking pockets. But in consideration of this being your first offence, and more in consequence of the entreaties of your friend, I have consented to allow you to depart, and I sincerely hope my mistaken kindness may not be the means of bringing you to the gallows.' And with a bow to Dick, he left the place.

"There, Bob," said Dick, in a grave and serious tone, 'let this be a warning to you! No one but myself knows what a narrow escape you have had; another time you may not be so fortunate.' And he, too, left the place.

"With the deepest sense of humiliation, I slunk out of the room, and sneaked home, a much wiser man than I was in the morning."

Providence does not grant force and faculties at random, but everything is made for some end. The sun, as high as 'tis, has its business assigned, and so have the celestial deities. And where's the wonder of all this? But pray what were you made for? For your pleasure? Common sense would bear so scandalous an answer.—Antimus.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

NAV, PROFFER NOT THY HAND TO ME

BY M. P. J.

Nay, proffer not thy hand to me!
I cannot take it now;
I cannot feel a feeling which
My heart dare not avow.
Though memory may often thrill
My breast with thoughts of thee,
'Tis of the past—the present hour
Brings but regret to me.

'Tis bitterness for me to dwell
On those dear days of old,
When trustfully I deemed thy love
Could ne'er grow changed and cold.
My young heart had not learned to know,
That woman's sweetest smile
Is but assumed by her to hide
Her coldness and guile.

I do not wish thee harm or wrong,
Nor mean I to upbraid
For ruin which thy falsehood wrought—
The sorrow thou hast made.
I could not injure one who once
My every thought controlled:
The manly heart that truly loves,
Can never malice hold.

We never more may meet as friends,
Though thou art now forgiven;
'Tween thee and me affection's tie
Remains forever riven.
In after years, should fleeting time
My sorrowing spirit lead,
I may forget, as I forgive,
All thou hast made me feel.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

FROST PAINTING.

BY MARY A. LOWELL.

"You are preparing trouble for yourself as well as me, Margaret. Depend upon it, the time will come when you will look back to this day, and think of the true heart you are now wronging so deeply. I have heard of the heartlessness and capriciousness of woman; but I thought you, at least, were exempt from weakness and indecision."

"You are unjust, Walter."

"I am not. You are throwing away a heart that has loved you truly and fondly for years. You were the star of my boyhood's dreams, from the time when we played together on the bench at Clifton; and since then, Margaret, haughty and cold as you seemed to others, I have dared to think that I, at least, was not indifferent to you."

"You were right. I have been truly attached to you always, but not as you believed. Friendship is all that I have for any one, and to you the greatest measure was meted out. Take it, and keep it still, Walter. I will be a friend, a sister to you, but a wife I cannot be. I shall never marry. I will never leave my father and my poor little, motherless brother. But you—it would give me true joy to know that you were wedded to some being who would appreciate your worth, and more than fill the place which you imagine is devoted to me."

"And is this all you have to say to me, Margaret, after my years of patient hope?"

"Be content. I am not worthy of the high love you give me. Nothing in life could ever make me forget you—but it is with such memory as a sister remembers a brother, that I shall think of you."

"Farewell then, Margaret! My dream is broken, destroyed forever. When you next hear of me, it will be in other lands; and if you think of me at all, it must be as a stranger to you, and an alien from my country."

Proud and stately Margaret! She quailed for a moment under the accusing look which he gave her, but recovering her usual composure, she gave him her hand in token of farewell.

"It is useless to prolong this painful scene, Walter. You will think better and more justly of me when the emotions of this hour have passed away. Let me be to you as if I too had already passed away."

Without a word or a look even, Walter Ashton went out of her presence. For an hour, Margaret sat where he had left her, absorbed in deep and painful thought. She said to herself, "What if, after all, I have thrown away my only chance of happiness in life—if I have cast off the only heart that will ever love me truly and devotedly? And yet, I am glad that I told him what I did, since it would be mockery to pretend that I love him, when I do not. No. I shall cherish his remembrance, but never as a lover."

Margaret Leland had dreamed of an ideal of which she could never hope to find the real. Walter Ashton did not come up to it, noble and true man as he was; he was not the being whom she had seen afar off, as one sees a spirit, bright and unapproachable, but having seen, can never come down to the ordinary state of mortality again, to find companionship and happiness.

If there was regret or remorse knocking at her heart, when she read in the next day's papers that Walter Ashton had sailed for Australia, the thought of this unknown idol which she had so long dreamed of, soothed the regret and banished the remorse. Perhaps she gave a sisterly sigh for his absence from the home to which her father had ever welcomed him as a son, and to which he had been received by her as a dear friend and brother, and latterly, he had hoped, more like a lover.

Even little Arthur Leland knew that something was wrong about his sister Margaret that week. And Mr Leland missed her music, and her usually cheery voice; for Margaret, though proud and stately to others, was cheerfulness itself to the beloved ones at home.

She went into the little room which she had fitted up for her father's morning hours, when the rest of the household rooms were in the process of cleaning and "setting to right," on the day in which she learned Walter's absence. He slept tranquilly in the large arm-chair which she had ordered for him for that purpose—a luxurious, "Sleepy Hollow" of a chair, and for which he could never thank her kind thoughtfulness sufficiently.

She laid her arm caressingly around his neck, and smoothed and twined about her fingers the soft curls of silver which adorned the handsome head of Mr. Leland. He did not move, and she thought the fresh summer breeze that came in at the open window had lulled him too soundly to sleep. His book lay on his knee, with one finger inside the leaves, and the pencil, with which he loved to mark favorite passages, was in the other hand. She glanced upon the one which he seemed to have pencilled last. It was a broken sentence like this—"the love of parent and child, which is a part of the life of the heart, acting by secret unisons and spiritual accordances, which cannot be put to silence, save by breaking the strings on which they vibrate."

"Thinking of me, when he marked this," said Margaret softly to herself.

She pressed her lips to his forehead as she thought this, and its icy coldness struck to her heart.

"Father, dear father—wake!" she cried, still thinking that he slept, and was chilled by the breeze, summer though it was.

All at once a dim perception of the truth stole into her heart like a dream of death. She sprinkled water upon the pale, beautifully serene face, bathed it with some perfumed essence that stood near, and rubbed the cold hands within her own. It was all in vain. She was fatherless!

No tear could Margaret shed at this time of the hardest and severest trial which her life had ever known. Arthur's wild grief, and the deep sobs of the two old servants, could not bring moisture to the eyes which were hot and burning. She sat motionless, waiting for the physician who had been summoned.

"There is no hope, my dear young lady," said he, as soon as he saw him.

He took her weak, unresisting hand and led her away. As they passed through the hall, her eyes accidentally encountered a portrait of Walter Ashton, which he had presented to her father, and which hung on the wall. "Ah, if he were only here," was her first connected thought. "And it was I that banished him—my father's true friend and mine!" and with that thought came tears, drenching, raining tears, most grateful to the physician to see, although he knew not how they were so suddenly brought forth from those hot eye-balls.

Mr. Leland had not been rich. He believed, up to the morning of his death, that he had a competence for himself and children. On looking up his affairs, it was found that his investments, made in perfect faith by him, had proved to be utterly insecure, and that scarcely anything remained except the house and furniture.

"Thank God, Miss Leland, that you still have a home," said Doctor Warland, as he announced the tidings in her almost unconscious ear. "Do not give it up, come what may; and if you need help, come to me."

This was on the morning after the burial, and before Margaret had scarcely waked to her desolate condition. She had no thought for herself as yet—only for Arthur—and for him alone, she cared for the details of the painful matter on which the doctor spoke.

"I can maintain Arthur," was her response, when he urged her to think what could be done. "I will teach or work, to maintain him. Do not be troubled for me, my kind friend. He who carried my father so gently through the valley of shadows, will not leave his children desolate."

"But not now, my dear young lady. You shall not be hurried or intruded on by any one at present. I will take it upon me, if you wish, to receive and settle with all claimants, and try to save something from the wreck of your father's property."

She gladly assented; but she did not know nor mistrust that many of her father's creditors were satisfied from the doctor's own resources.

Another month saw her quietly seated in what had been successively her own and Arthur's school-room, teaching a dozen bright, rosy little girls, who all looked upon her, in her black dress, and with her pale face, with a secret but admiring awe. Soon this gave way to the perfect love which casteth out fear; and she became the beloved of their little hearts.

Arthur was too dear to Margaret to be sent away; so it was arranged that he should commence a course of study with the minister, who was greatly attached to Mr. Leland's family.

Among Margaret's most cherished pupils, was little Eva Hope, a child of nine or ten summers, bright, affectionate, and beautiful as a poet's dream of angels. She had been confided to Margaret's care by an aunt, who said that when the child's father returned from Europe, she would probably be sent away to some foreign school. She knew nothing of the family excepting this. They were new people, and had made few or no acquaintances in town.

Little Eva came to her one morning with the news of her father's return. She was greatly excited and very happy, until the thought suddenly struck her that now she would be separated from her beloved Miss Leland, and she began to weep bitterly. At noon, not all Margaret's persuasions could induce her to leave her and go home. The child cried until she was actually too ill, and at last she fell asleep, weeping. Margaret laid her on her own couch, and sat down beside her. She felt very sad, for it was the anniversary of her father's death, and Eva's quiet sleep—"the gentle sleep that only childhood knows"—reminded her of that hour in which she found him in that last slumber.

A shadow passed the window of the low room in which she sat watching the child, who lay with one hand on her radiant cheek, where the tears were scarcely dried, and a voice, softened almost to womanly softness, inquired for the teacher. She stepped forward, and a gentleman of noble appearance met her eye.

"Pardon me, madam," said he, "but my child is long in coming home, and I walked out to meet her."

She motioned lightly towards the apartment she had left, and pointed him to the sleeping child on the couch. A half hour's conversation took place, and when the child awoke, they parted, equally pleased with each other.

For the rest of the summer, Mr. Hope remained at Clifton, and no word of his leaving it met Margaret's ear. The child continued to come to her every morning, although the school had been closed for vacation, and Arthur was spending a few weeks at home.

Margaret's school had done much. It had kept her home untouched—paid Arthur's expenses at the clergyman's house where he studied, and had allowed her to retain old Brazier and his wife in their respective stations of gardener and woman servant. She was pleased, encouraged and hopeful, as far as the outward went—but there was an inward sadness, hard to bear.

When Margaret woke up one day to the fact that Mr. Hope wished her to become the mother of his child, she could not believe her senses. The little girl had established this on his part, and he only waited for her to influence Miss Leland too. He was a cold, placid man, whose very nature, still, subdued and unambitious, would have tortured Margaret into madness.

Then again, there was a memory of one who, in her pride she had owned to herself, was an injured being—injured, because she was too proud to own that he was lofty enough in thought or life for her. And with that memory fresh in her mind and heart, she refused Mr. Hope. Mortified and disappointed, he sailed almost immediately for Europe. Margaret wept at parting with Eva, for the child was indeed very dear to her heart. And Arthur, too, was leaving her again; and now Margaret was alone with all her bitter fancies.

And this year was like the type of many, many years to come; for long before she had learned to subdue her spirit to its depth of humiliation, Margaret's hair was sprinkled with gray. Old Brazier still lived, and with his wife, performed all the domestic service which she required. The house itself was quiet enough, for Margaret's school was given up. The school had done more than she expected, and a portion of her father's missing property had been rescued from the wreck by the repentance of one of the officers of the institution where it was invested,—so, to all outward appearance, Margaret might be called happy and comfortable. Peaceful she certainly was—less proud and haughty—more forgiving and charitable towards others; but she could not help owning to herself that she was lonely and dull, in her echoing, silent house.

Looking out upon the ocean, sewing for herself or for the poor, reading, when she could find something to interest her highest feelings, or writing to Arthur, now settled at the head of a flourishing congregation, some thirty miles off,—was Margaret's monotonous life. But the old house, now growing gray with age, was very dear to her, and not all Arthur's entreaties could prevail upon her to remove from it.

Thus she sat one afternoon until near twilight. It was mid-winter, and the frost wrought delicate tracery on her windows. Musingly she looked on these fantastic shapes of castles and battlements and lofty gateways. The bright coal fire burned up cheerily, and lighted the ceiling with a dusky red. It became too dark to see the frost-work, and Margaret's eyes fixed steadily upon the burning coal. Even there, too, were shapes, burning cities and volcanic craters, and ships on fire.

Suddenly she remembered her waning youth. It did not come to her before—this thought of decay and age; and the idea seemed to startle her. With it came also dim visions of death and the spirit-land. Her senses were sharpened into acuteness by their influence, and she heard a footstep crushing the thin crust of snow that had hardened on the garden path. It was a footstep that was all familiar to her ear, and one which she repented having banished. She sat in dreamy stillness, her breath coming and going softly, until Brazier opened the door, forgetting that he had not brought in lights. He did not see her as she sat in shadow, so he asked the stranger to sit down until he could light the room. He did not sit, but continued to walk the room, until he suddenly stopped before her. A jet of flame from the coal fire lighted up her still pale face like a gleam of sunlight upon snow.

There were tears and reconciliation there; and Margaret, though earnestly pleading that she was old and gray, and unfit to become a wife to him who stood there, bronzed and travel-worn, but looking still young—was persuaded to lay by all her scruples, and promise that henceforth one home should shelter both. In foreign lands, Walter Ashton had gathered both riches and fame; and he had come to lay them at the feet of her who through all his wanderings had been his guardian angel, though hardly daring to hope that she would ever be his wife.

Arthur Leland, who had mourned over his sister's voluntary seclusion from the world, and had thought her life so desolate and forlorn, now came from his home to join the two in bands never to be broken; and the happiness which seemed crushed out of Margaret's heart, has sprang up into new life and new beauty. The dreams are in youth—Heaven be thanked, that sometimes gives realities in after life.

Brooding on self is always corrupting; but to brood on self and wrongs is to ripen for madness and murder, and all crime.—Reade.

THE LATE JAMES WILSON.

JAMES WILSON,

THE FIRST MAKER OF GLOBES IN AMERICA.

James Wilson, an accurate likeness of whom, drawn by Mr. Barry, from an original sketch made by John Ross Dix, Esq., we this week present to our readers, had the honor of being the maker of the first pair of terrestrial and celestial globes ever constructed in this country. His grandfather, James Wilson, emigrated to America from Londonderry, in Ireland. The subject of this notice was born in 1763, in the South Range, Londonderry, N. H. He early felt a strong love of knowledge, but was constrained by circumstances to devote himself to farming. Up to the age of thirty-three he pursued that employment in his native place, not however without cultivating his mind. His inclination and genius turned his thoughts and studies especially to geography and astronomy, with the means of their illustration. In the year 1796, he removed to Bradford, Vt., taking up his permanent abode on a farm which he purchased there. When about thirty-six years of age, Mr. Wilson first saw a pair of English globes, and resolved to imitate them. He commenced with balls turned from blocks of wood, which he nicely covered with paper and scientifically finished off, with all the lines and representations drawn upon them. This rude beginning was followed by a much better method. The solid balls were thickly covered with layers of paper, firmly pasted together. The shell was then divided into hemispheres, which being removed, were again united and finished with due regard to lightness and smoothness. But how were the spheres to be covered with maps equal to those of the European artists? Mr. Wilson procured copper plates of sufficient size for his 13-inch globes, projected his maps on them in sections, tapering as the degrees of longitude do from the equator to the poles, and engraved them with such admirable accuracy of design, that when cut apart and duly pasted on his spheres, the edges, with their lines, and even the different parts of the finest letters would perfectly coincide and make one surface, truly representing the earth, or celestial constellations. Though in the use of the graver he was self-taught, and this species of designing and engraving was much more difficult than plain work, he proceeded in producing globes equal in all respects to any imported from foreign countries. He published the first edition of his globes in 1814, and personally presented to the people of Boston the first American globes which were seen there. Quite a sensation among scientific persons was caused by such a novelty; and when earnest inquiry was made, "Who is this James Wilson?—where is he?"—he has been heard to say that he felt exceedingly disinclined, in consideration of his rustic garb and manners, to make his appearance. But the Boston gentlemen knew how to prize his talents, and were proud of the honor he had done his country. They encouraged him to prosecute his undertaking, by the assurance that he should find a ready market for all the globes he could furnish. For a time he pursued his vocation on a small scale at Bradford, Vt., and Londonderry, N. H., but finally, in company with his sons, who inherited much of their father's taste and ingenuity, he established about the year 1815, a large manufactory in Albany, N. Y., and in 1826, brought out from fresh engravings, a still more splendid edition. These globes, consisting of three different sizes, elegantly and scientifically constructed, are an honor, not only to their makers, but to the American people. After Mr. Wilson had attained his eighty-third year, he constructed an excellent planetarium, and with his own hands engraved the large copper-plate, with the signs of the zodiac, their degrees, etc. Mr. Wilson died at Bradford, Vt., in March, 1855, in the ninety-second year of his age. A monument with a suitable inscription is to be placed over his grave.

PETER COOPER, ESQ.

FOUNDER OF THE COOPER INSTITUTE, NEW YORK.

The accompanying portrait was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry, from a fine photograph by Brady, of New York city. Mr. Cooper is ranked among the wealthiest citizens of the empire city, and his large fortune is the result of honorable industry. He commenced life without a dollar to start with, but by perseverance in his business, the manufacturing of glue, he has from small beginnings seen his fortune swell to its present colossal dimensions. He has now a very large business establishment, and is we believe engaged in another branch of manufacture also. Had Mr. Cooper, like many other rich men, chosen to employ his means in a splendid style of living, and made himself renowned by the sumptuousness of his equipages, the splendor of his banquets, the costliness of his private concerts, no one would have disputed his right to spend his own money; he would have furnished matter for report and comment in the newspapers, and enjoyed all the éclat that money can command. But he preferred to invest a large capital in an institution of permanent and unquestionable utility, an institution, which, whether it bears his name or not in its legal title, will cause it to be gratefully remembered and cherished through future generations. New York was not without a similar example of unselfish generosity. John Jacob Astor bequeathed nearly half a million for the establishment of a library, of an extent and value hitherto unknown in this country, and which will be forever free to the citizens of New York. Mr. Cooper's idea is to found an educational institution which will be of equal importance. To this purpose he has set apart $300,000 of his fortune, and if that does not prove amply adequate to carry out his views, he will no doubt increase it. We think he has acted wisely in not leaving his scheme to be accomplished after his death; it is proceeding under his personal superintendence. The title originally given to the Institute was "The Union for the Moral, Mental and Physical Improvement of the Youth of this City, of the State, the Country and the World." We are not aware that he has made any change in the title. The building, now nearly completed, stands at the corner of Astor Place and Fourth Avenue, and is a handsome structure of freestone. Our readers will remember we presented a view of it in the last volume of the Pictorial. The Institute will embrace a library, scientific apparatus, cabinet of natural history, engravings, casts, etc., all the appliances, in a word, for mental cultivation. The best teachers will be provided, and the most approved methods of instruction adopted. Courses of lectures form a part of the programme. We believe that it is contemplated to add a department wherein women will be instructed and fitted for lucrative employment. If we understand rightly the views of Mr. Cooper, the Institute will be a complete educational institution, and that it will be eminently practical in its character. As the work of one individual, accomplishing for his native city what hitherto municipalities and governments have been obliged to undertake, it will be a noble monument to the founder, and an honor to the great city in which it is established. And it is not only in itself that this act of munificence is to be considered; the example is of almost inestimable value. Such acts demonstrate the true use of wealth; they point out the pathway by which the fortunate may achieve the greatest amount of moral happiness in this world, that is, by doing the greatest amount of good to others. Earthly splendors beginning and ending in self, dazzling the world and exciting envy and wonder, bring no peace of mind; only great and good works yield a harvest of content. New York city is full of these good works, and it is evident that it contains energy and philanthropy and well-directed wealth enough to counterbalance the vice and retrograde action, which are incidental evils to all great and expanding communities, wherever they may be.

IRON MOUNTAIN, ST. FRANCIS COUNTY, MISSOURI.

The landscape on this page was drawn expressly for our Pictorial by Mr. Kilburn, during a visit to the spot. The State of Missouri abounds in iron; in fact no country in the world of the same extent contains so much of this useful ore as this State. The metalliferous region of Missouri covers an area of at least 20,000 square miles, or about 12,800,000 acres, and the same formation extends southward into Arkansas and westward into the territories. In this great region is a uniformity of mineral character as unusual as the great extent of the deposits. The whole country is composed of lower magnesian limestone, and bears lead throughout its entire extent, and in numerous localities, iron mines of great value exist. The ore is massive, generally found on or near the surface, and of remarkable purity. Among the most remarkable of these iron formations is the celebrated Iron Mountain, situated in St. Francis county, about eighty miles south from St. Louis. This wonderful metallic formation, with other vast bodies of similar character in the immediate vicinity, is worthy the attention of all students of nature. The urea of the Iron Mountain covers an extent of some five hundred acres. It rises to the height of two hundred and sixty feet above the general level of the surrounding country, and is estimated to contain over two hundred million tons of ore. The ore is found in lumps, from the size of pebbles of a few ounces to those of two or three hundred tons in weight. The ore of this mountain is known as the specular oxide, and usually yields some sixty-eight or seventy per cent. of pure iron, and so free from injurious substances as to present no obstacle to working it directly into blooms. The metal is so excellent that much of it is now used by the manufacturers on the Ohio River, for mixing with the ore found there. There are in operation at the mountain three blast furnaces, producing from seven thousand to seven thousand five hundred tons of metal annually. Besides this immense deposit of ore above the surface, a shaft sunk at the base of the mountain gives fifteen feet of clay and ore, thirty feet of white sandstone, thirty-three feet of blue porphyry, and fifty-three feet of pure iron ore. This bed of mineral would be immensely valuable if there was none above the surface. The landscape embracing these mines is very striking and picturesque, and our engraving accurately delineates its features. The bold outline of hill increases the effect of the foreground completes the picture.

PETER COOPER, ESQ.

THE IRON MOUNTAIN, ST. FRANCIS COUNTY, MISSOURI.

FRANCIS A. DUKIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

Published every SATURDAY, by
M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

"EVEN SO, FATHER!"

BY MRS. FANNY E. BARBOUR.

O, heart, be still; these yearnings vain and wild
For gifts which wisdom still withholds from thee!
Ask rather for a spirit undefiled,
That seeks in all love's guiding hand to see.

O, sinful heart, that knows no rest nor peace,
While for the unattainable it seeks!
Bid the wild strivings of ambition cease,
And listen meekly while the Saviour speaks:

"Come unto me, ye weary, burdened soul!
Sinking beneath life's heavy weight of ill!
Come, when despair's black waves tempestuous roll,
And thou shalt hear my voice say, 'Peace, be still!'"

I come, my Saviour—at thy feet bent low,
In deep contrition for the sinful past,
My spirit pleads for strength and grace, that so
It may be reconciled to thee at last.

My prayer is heard!—a new-born light and peace
Fill all my spirit's life with sweetest joy;
From long unrest I find now blissful release,
And patient hope, which nothing can destroy.

And so I wait, with still increasing faith,
The unfolding of my Father's holy will:
For now I know that his own promise saith,
"My justice shall be blent with mercy still."

"Even so, my Father!" I will trust in thee,
Whate'er for me the future may disclose;
For in thy sight it seemeth good to be,
And I, undoubting, on thy love repose.

SUFFERING.

And that high suffering which we dread
A higher joy discloses;
Men saw the thorns on Jesus' brow,
But angels saw the roses.—FAIRY "PASSION FLOWERS."

THE OCEAN.

The sea remembers not the vessel's rending keel,
But rushes joyously the ravage to conceal.—W. W. SROAT.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

A newspaper poet, speaking of a juvenile lady, states that she has "pounds of auburn curls." We presume he is an apprentice to a wig-maker. . . . A man lately died in London of the bite of a cat—a warning to owners of vicious tabbies. . . . We are pleased to learn that W. M. Fleming has been very successful in his theatrical engagements in California. But we thought he had abandoned the stage for the pulpit. . . . It was Edmund Burke who beautifully said, "Taxes for education are like vapors, which rise only to descend again, to beautify and to fertilize the earth." . . . Careful estimates place the cost of the annual consumption of ardent spirits in this country at $100,000,000; that of tobacco at $40,000,000; from all of which no benefit accrues! . . . A noble colossal statue in marble of the late Hosea Ballou is now being executed by Brackett. Two years were allotted for the completion of the work. . . . Mr. Donald McKay, the great shipbuilder, who has done so much for the commerce of Boston, is hard at work at his ship-yard at East Boston. . . . The Spanish government seems determined to have a down-right quarrel with Mexico, and is preparing to invade the country. Poor Spain!—poor Mexico!—we don't care which whips. . . . We rejoice at the cheering news from Havana touching the health of Dr. Kane. Confident hopes are entertained of his restoration to health. . . . Peter Falcon, of Cohasset, by gallant daring saved the lives of eleven wrecked seamen on the coast during the late storm. Here is one of nature's noblemen. . . . Our neighbor Clapp, of the Gazette, has been lecturing on "Gumption." We don't like the title he gives it, but can vouch for its being a good lecture. . . . We will give three dollars a volume for volume nine of "Ballou's Pictorial." Can't some of our subscribers accommodate us with their copies? . . . It is an interesting fact, stated on good authority, that in the entire Prussian army of 122,897 men, on examination only two were found who could not both read and write! . . . Freezing to death is said to be the most easy and painless mode of shuffling off this mortal coil. We are willing to admit the fact upon others' testimony. . . . Willis advises invalids to buy bugged-up horses. This will do very well for rich people, but it is rather an extravagant practice for men of small means. However, anybody anxious for the article, can find plenty of it at Brighton, where matched pairs range all the way from three to twelve dollars. . . . The restoration of Mrs. Barrow and Mrs. John Wood to the Boston Theatre, after their triumphant tour to New York city, was an event. . . . About this time Washington is full of visitors, and the president is surrounded by thousands of very distinguished friends. . . . It is predicted that the performances of the Collins steamship Adriatic will eclipse everything heretofore accomplished on the ocean. She has been a long time building, and no pains or expense have been spared to make her a model steamer. Long may she float the wave in triumph! . . . That was quite an awkward accident that happened to a gay young man in Pittsburg, lately. While attending divine service, feeling rather warm, he took off his overcoat—when a perfect avalanche of bullets and caps rolled out upon the floor, followed by a pistol. He was as much mortified as a staid old gentleman, whose musical watch during prayer time began playing "drops of brandy," to the horror of himself and his neighbors. . . . We hope our agricultural friends will set out plenty of choice winter pear-trees the coming season. Fine pears, well ripened, sell readily in Boston and New York markets, during the winter season, for at least three dollars a dozen. . . . Most of the quails on Long Island were destroyed last year by the severe cold—and so the supervisors of Queen's county have forbidden the destruction of this bird for two years from the first of January, 1857, under a penalty of $25. This is a noble move. All birds do more good than harm; and the idea of having our woods and coasts depopulated of feathered warblers is sad. . . . Leaping—a very manly exercise—is almost out of vogue, like a great many other athletic sports, there seeming to be an ambition among our rising men to be as "slab-sided" as possible. Professor Wilson said that a first rate jumper could clear six feet in height. How many of our young Shanghais could do that? . . . A certain sensible old lady used to express her astonishment at three things:—I am surprised," she said, "that little boys will knock the apples off trees, when, if let alone, they would soon fall off themselves. I am surprised that men should kill each other so much, when in time they would all die of themselves. I am surprised that the girls will go after the young men so far, when otherwise they would much quicker come for them of their own accord." . . . Forty American ladies were lately presented to the French empress at Paris. They made a dazzling display of beauty. American ladies against the world for loveliness! If the dear creatures would only use a little more out-door exercise, their charms would be as permanent as they are peerless. . . . How rarely you read in the papers an account of a fire in Paris. In fact, there a large fire is impossible. The houses are built of stone, and the partition walls, also of stone, are of extraordinary thickness—so that if a fire does occur, it is confined to the locality where it happens. Then the firemen, or pompiers, as they are called, are as active as cats. Zouaves or Ravels—and, in consequence of their exertions, little personal property is sacrificed in case of fire. In some of these things it might be well to imitate our Gallic friends. . . . The Boston Post lately had a long article on the tortures inflicted by boots. Why can't our people learn to make and to wear boots that will fit the foot easily the first day they are worn? . . . An incident lately occurred at the death-bed of M. de Salvandy, a distinguished Frenchman. When no longer able to speak, he asked his wife to hand him a slate, on which he wrote "Sixty years of existence—thirty-two years of happiness." Envious bachelors wish to know whether the thirty-two years of happiness referred to the single or the married portion of his existence. . . . Mr. Hue, in his travels in China, tells us that the long-tailed people of flower-land have a singular sort of dial to tell them the time of day. They catch a tomat and watch his eyes. At the hour of noon, the pupil of the animal's eye is nothing but a bee-line. There is some trouble with this kind of chronometer. In the first place, it is very difficult to catch a tomat; and in the next, there is ten chances to one that he will fly in your face, and perform an operation on your eyes which will prevent your repeating the experiment. . . . A witness was called in a New York case, lately, to define the business or calling of a defendant in a certain case. "Why, bless your soul, judge," said the witness, "he aint got no callin'!—he runs wid der masheen!" . . . At the sale of B. V. French's stock at Brainerd, the "natives" seemed to be greater favorites than the foreigners. All the stock sold low; but while a yoke of native oxen, eight years old, weighing 3520 pounds, sold for $225, one yoke of full-blooded Devons, weighing 3460 pounds, sold for $162 50 only. Practical farmers have not yet been brought to recognize the superiority of foreign bred neat stock. . . . The Bank of England does not absolutely prohibit the wearing of moustachios to its clerks, but only insists that they shall not wear them "during business hours," which is certainly very kind, considerate and liberal. . . . It seems that city fathers in Canada are no more paternal in their behaviour than city fathers anywhere else. A city father of Toronto lately informed another city father of Toronto, that it was his intention to "pitch into" the latter—for which benevolent design he was put under bonds to keep the peace, much to his mortification and regret. . . . Placards, menacing death to the emperor Napoleon, continue to be posted in Paris. Now, "threatened men live long," and "barking dogs wont bite." So long as the Red Republicans menace the life of their ruler in placards, he is perfectly safe to ride his pet mare Fanny along the Boulevards, or in the Bois du Boulogne, or anywhere else. Whereas, if he saw no threats, he might expect any fine morning to hear the crack of a Minie or a Colt too near to sound agreeable. . . . The sheep of the British isles are believed to number 55,000,000. Nobody has thought of enumerating the donkeys. Thus it is, in this world, that modest merit is ever overlooked. . . . The introduction of horse railroads has had an effect on the passenger receipts of the Fitchburg and Worcester steam railroads. Considering the weather the past winter, the horse railroads have done remarkably well. But they must carefully look to it that they do not attempt to monopolize the country roads over which they run, but have a due regard to the rights of country teamsters and others, else an injurious reaction may take place in the popular feeling with regard to them. . . . Alfred Bunn has been lecturing on America and John Bull in Edinburgh. Bunn was in this country three months; half that time he was in bed an invalid, consequently he knows all about America. If he says anything savage against this country, we shall call him a "hot cross bun." . . . The New York Journal of Commerce learns that the estate of the late Anson G. Phelps will prove to be worth from $1,700,000 to $2,000,000, whereas it was estimated by the deceased at only about $1,200,000. It is rare that a rich man doesn't know the value of his property to a fraction of a cent. . . . The author of "Dore" (a very clever book, by the way), speaking about pedestrians, says that a man cannot claim that title unless he is able to do his thirty miles a day, and rise the next morning without being footsore, or stiff, or otherwise out of sorts. Of course this can only be done by constant training. Begin with four or five miles, and so keep on increasing the "stent." There are some countries of the world where a man must walk, if he would enjoy the scenery—for instance, Switzerland and the Tyrol. . . . An excellent institution of New York city, suggested by a similar one in Paris, is a "Nursery," where children can be taken care of while their mothers are sick or at work. . . . The New York correspondent of the Boston Transcript writes:—"There is a curious principle of estimation in the social scale of Gotham. Fifth Avenue palaces enjoy a prestige according to the commodity in trade which has paid for them. Thus one bought with cash made in foreign commerce, is unimpeachable; while the residences erected by the profits of patent sales, beaver hats, note shaving or candy, rank lower." How unworthy of a republican country! . . . Franconia, N. H., is a very nice place to live in. The spirit thermometer there, one day last winter, indicated 49 degrees below zero! Who would go to Havana, where the living is exceedingly expensive, when he could so easily and cheaply sojourn at Franconia, where the thermometer is only 49 degrees below? . . . The Massachusetts State Industrial School for Girls is working admirably. The poor girls are readily managed—and some almost hopeless cases, apparently, are numbered among the most prominent subjects. One important fact has already been discovered, and which the trustees would impress upon the minds of all, viz., that in nearly every case, the parents, or those who previously had them in charge, were more in fault than the girls; and that in nearly one half the number, their unfortunate condition was attributable to the neglect or abuse of a stepfather or stepmother. . . . We are glad to learn that politics have not entirely absorbed the minds of Bulwer Lytton and Benjamin D'Israeli. We are told to expect new romances from both these novelists. O, for another "Pelham," or "Vivian Gray!" . . . The prairie girls out West, in winter, dance in blankets in the open air, warm their noses at the camp-fire after every cotillon, and break a hole in the ice to wash their faces. These are the girls for wives and mothers! . . . About these days look out for spring," as the almanacs say. Never will spring be more welcome. Already the gales have what we may fancy a vernal odor, if we are very imaginative. . . . Green is the fashionable color just now in Paris; but those who do not wear it are regarded as exceedingly verdant, unwithering. . . . Emerson says that Walter Savage Landor is without a library—as he gives away his books, and has never more than a dozen in the house.

The worst ingratitude lies not in the ossified heart of him who commits it; but we find it in the effect it produces on him against whom it was committed. As water containing stony particles incrusts with the ferns and mosses it drops on, so the human breast hardens under ingratitude, in proportion to its openness, its softness, and its aptitude to receive impressions.—Landor.

Good men are human suns! They brighten and warm wherever they pass. Fools count them mad till death wrenches open foolish eyes. They are not often sung by poets when they die; but the hearts they heal, and their own, are their rich reward on earth, and their place is high in heaven.—Charles Reade.

Choice Miscellany.

FEMALE BEAUTY.

Dean Swift proposed to tax female beauty, and leave every lady to rate her own charms. He said the tax would be cheerfully paid, and very productive. Fontenelle thus daintily compliments the sex, when he compares women and clocks—the latter serve to point out the hours, the former to make us forget them. The standards of beauty in woman vary with those of taste. Socrates called beauty a short-lived tyranny; Plato, a privilege of nature; Theophrastus, a silent cheat; Theocritus, a delightful prejudice; Carneades, a solitary kingdom; and Aristotle affirmed that it was better than all the letters of recommendation in the world. With the modern Greeks, and other nations on the shores of the Mediterranean, corpulency is the perfection of form in women; and those very attributes, which disgust the Western European, form the attractions of an oriental fair. It was from the common and admired shape of his countrywomen, that Rubens, in his pictures, delights so much in a vulgar and odious plumpness; when this master was desirous to represent the "beautiful," he had no idea of beauty under two hundred weight. His very graces are all fat. But it should be remembered that all his models were Dutch women. The hair is a beautiful ornament of women, but it has always been a disputed point which color most becomes it. We account red hair an abomination; but in the time of Elizabeth it found admirers, and was in fashion. Mary of Scotland, though she had exquisite hair of her own, wore red fronts. Cleopatra was red-haired; and the Venetian ladies to this day counterfeit yellow hair.

After all that may be said or sung about it, beauty is an undeniable fact, and its endowment not to be disparaged. Sidney Smith gives some good advice on the subject. "Never teach false morality. How exquisitely absurd to teach a girl that beauty is of no value, dress of no use! Beauty is of value—her whole prospects and happiness in life may depend upon a new gown, or a becoming bonnet; if she has five grains of common sense, she will find this out. The great thing is to teach her their just value, and that there must be something better under the bonnet than a pretty face for real happiness. But never sacrifice truth."—Salad for the Social.

DEPARTING INFLUENCE OF CALICO.

When we look into the thoroughfares, alas, we see no calico! Silk, and all its half sister fabrics, glide along—some dazzling, some queer, some splendid, some fantastic; but none have the sweet, clean, fascinating, elegant appearance of the calico which used to skip by, with pretty skippers in it. There are those who mourn over little things—the drooping violet, the stricken bird, the broken rattle-box, the fading rose, the dying kitten, the rain-spoiled bonnet; but we mourn for exalted, animated, small-figured calico! Silks, trailing through the dust, have lost favor in our eyes; fancy dry goods are as unattractive as tattered awnings, and every costly thing of feminine apparel no longer surpasses the Ludsey home spun gowns of old. Nations spring from the wilderness, then moulder in decay; cities are built in barren places, expand a while and waste away; men from obscurity rise to fame and power, then gather disgrace and neglect; the rich grow poor, and the poor grow rich; the high sink to ignoble graves, and in the multitudinous variety of things there are mighty movements and mighty changes. We are, therefore, of the opinion that the article of calico has had its days of glory, also, and is not as much in use as it once was. Where is the man who will not promptly say that the handsomest object he ever beheld was a being clad in a handsome piece of calico! He can't be found. Masculine eyes are the eyes for feminine grace to please. Jewels and toys, and the richness of silks captivate no man of sense, or taste, and add not a charm to nature; but calico heightens, and brightens, and softens, and makes a fellow feel good when he sees it—and, besides, it costs a wonderful sight less!—Sacramento Age.

MORNING.

Beautiful descriptions of the morning abound in all languages, but they are the strongest perhaps in those of the East, where the sun is so often an object of worship. King David speaks of taking to himself "the wings of the morning." This is highly poetical and beautiful. The "wings of the morning" are the beams of the rising sun. Rays of light are wings. It is thus said that the Sun of righteousness shall arise "with healing in his wings"—a rising sun, which shall scatter light, and health, and joy throughout the universe. Milton has fine descriptions of morning, but not so many as Shakespeare, from whose writings pages of the most beautiful images, all founded on the glory of the morning, might be jilted. I never thought that Adam had much advantage of us, from having seen the world while it was new. The manifestations of the power of God, like his mercies, are "new every morning," and "fresh every evening." We see as fine risings of the sun as ever Adam saw, and its risings are as much a miracle now as they were in his day—and I think a good deal more, because it is now a part of the miracle that for thousands and thousands of years he has come to his appointed time without the variation of a millionth part of a second. Adam could not tell how this might be! I know the morning. I am acquainted with it, and love it, fresh and sweet as it is, a daily new creation, breaking forth, and calling all that have life, and breath, and being, to new adoration, new enjoyments, and new gratitude.—Letter of Daniel Webster.

MRS. WASHINGTON.

In her "Life of George Washington," just published, Mrs. Kirkland gives us a little closer view of that stately lady, Mrs. Martha Washington, than other writers have done.—"If we were to give our private opinion," says Mrs. Kirkland, "we should say that Mrs. Martha Custis Washington, with her large fortune, her strong domestic tastes and affections, and her dutiful common sense character, exercised her full share of influence over the commander-in-chief of the armies of the United States of America. She had a very decided way of speaking; and as she never meddled in public affairs, we can easily imagine the general letting her have her own way in pretty much everything else. A guest of Mount Vernon happened to sleep in a room adjoining that occupied by the president and his lady. Late in the evening, when people had retired to their various chambers, he heard the lady delivering a very animated lecture to her lord and master upon something which he had done, that she thought ought to be done differently. To all this he listened in the profoundest silence; and when she, too, was silent, he opened his lips and spoke, 'Now, good sleep to you, my dear.' This anecdote of the great man in his night-cap is quite characteristic of him; but it is equally so of most lords and masters, who, we imagine, all receive certain lectures—as Mr. Candor and Washington did—in profound silence. Experience, probably, teaches them that it is the better way."

Published every Saturday, by M. M. BALLOU,
No 22 Winter Street, Boston.

VIEW OF HONG KONG, CHINA.

[For description, see page 157.]

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, | NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 14, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM. | VOL. XII, No. 11.—WHOLE No. 299.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

WINTER SCENE IN NEW YORK HARBOR.

The picture on this page is from the pencil of Hill, and drawn expressly for our paper. It represents a steam-tug bringing up an emigrant ship through the snow storm and ice in New York harbor. The good ship, freighted with hundreds of lives, bends before the gale, but she is staunch and strong, and the little steamer is making a good headway, and will bring her safe to anchor. But what a dismal introduction to the promised land is such a day of cold, storm and ice as that depicted in our engraving! The poor immigrant, as he stands shuddering in the chill atmosphere, and gazes over the icy bulwarks on the fields of ice, as he hears the hard cakes grinding against the copper sheathing, as he vainly seeks to penetrate the cold veil woven by the storm around him, might fancy that he was embarked on an Arctic expedition, and just entering the dread regions of eternal ice and winter. The bright visions of the New World that grew up in the light of a distant fireside, prompted by a returning traveller's tale, or a letter from America, are rudely dispelled. Friendless and a stranger here, with loving hearts forsaken but beating for him three thousand miles away, the sense of loneliness and of uncertainty as to the future, will bear with a double weight upon his heart from the utter desolation of nature in her most forbidding aspect. For as his limited vision extends he sees only repellant images—the cold white wing of the storm fanning his brow with freezing airs, grinding ice cakes eddying in the blue-black current, jarring and crashing as they quiver on the tide. Even the paddle-wheels of the friendly steamer have a fierce, impatient dash, and her iron lungs snort defiantly. As he draws nearer, the strange features of the shore look stranger from the atmosphere that envelopes them. Castle Garden seems a fortress framed for defence—the tall spires of the city, ghostly giants in white robes, indignantly frowning intruders from the shore. When he lands, the hustle and confusion, the icy docks, the hurrying crowds, the selfish pre-occupation of every man he meets, will strike a chill to his heart, consonant with the weather, but jarring to the feelings of the lonely adventurer. We have placed ourself in the position of a lonely man, poor and friendless, ill in body and mind, who has expended his last shilling in making this last struggle for existence, but whose heart fails as the adventure is about being accomplished. Cheerless enough is the aspect of things to the stout-hearted Tenton who stands beside him, calm and philosophic in external bearing, warmly clad, with plenty of guilders stowed away in the locker, and ample resources both physical and pecuniary, to give him a fair start in a new field. He is fitted for the rough and tumble of adventure. He looks beyond the chilly prospect of the present to the brightness of the future. He is bound for the far West to join comrades who have gone before him to till the soil, to shoot the deer, or perhaps pursue the buffalo in company with the wild Indian far beyond the Mississippi. There are groups of families on board the emigrant ship, of course; but over all the steerage passengers the winter weather hangs a sort of funeral pall. Far different is it with the rich cabin passenger who comes hither, merely as a temporary sojourner, to see new phases of nature and of character, and who welcomes a little hardship as affording a variety in the monotony of a luxurious existence. Wrapped in costly furs, he comes on the quarter deck, a little before the time of landing, and looks about him with a curious and unconcerned eye. As soon as the vessel touches the pier, he will spring into a carriage, and, being well posted up beforehand, be whirled to one of the palatial hotels. But certainly, strangers, whatever their position, arriving at New York during the past winter, formed a very erroneous impression of its climate, and if among them there are any bookmakers of the sort that jump at conclusions from first ideas, we shall expect to see published accounts stating that the Empire City is the coldest and dreariest spot on the face of the earth, a sort of Spitzbergen, and we anticipate being told that the readiness with which Americans volunteered on the Arctic expeditions was only from a desire to get into a warmer and more comfortable climate than ours.

TOWING UP AN EMIGRANT SHIP THROUGH THE ICE, NEW YORK HARBOR.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—on—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCAIDE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XXXVI.

THE KING'S RESOLVE.

GASPARD CORDOVA, the king's confessor, died. To gain the place for Escobar, had been the aim of Father Jerome, but he was doomed to the same disappointment as Escobar when hoping to be confessor to the queen. The same person supplanted him. The Count de Lerma thought Juan wholly devoted to him, and knew him to be the mortal enemy of Jerome and Escobar. The inquisitor accepted him; and the king, frightened at having shown so much courage on the day of the meeting of the council, dared not refuse him, and Juan Sevilla was appointed king's confessor, without even having asked the situation.

Escobar, seeing himself defeated a second time by Juan, in spite of the good intentions of the king and the protection of the Duke d'Uzede, began to believe that the latter was not sincere, and playing a double game. From that moment commenced a misunderstanding between them, which de Lerma took every occasion to augment. Juan, on his part, began to believe that it was his destiny to rise by his enemy's downfall.

The grand inquisitor promised, in his turn, to favor the Count de Lerma in his project of expelling the fathers of the Society of Jesus from the kingdom. He promised that after the expulsion of the Moors. One argument he used which decided the prime minister at once. The Count de Lerma had long wished a cardinal's hat, thinking it would protect him, and that hat the pope had promised to give when the Moors were expelled from Spain. All obstacles seemed to disappear upon the death of the queen, who left them without a protector. The peace with France allowed them now to turn all their forces upon Valencia and Grenada, in case of a resistance.

The young king loved Alitea more than ever, and since he had been unable to see her, his love had increased. Indifferent to the affairs of state, the reins of which he had wholly abandoned, he dreamed only of means of approaching the only person who was dear to him. When he was racking his brain for ways to see her, Alitea requested an audience. At the moment when the Duchess de Santarem entered, the king turned pale, and his anxiety was so great that Alitea was disconcerted.

"What have you to ask of me, senora? Speak. What do you wish?"

"To thank your majesty for all the kindness with which he has loaded me, and to give him my adieu."

"You leave—you?" said the king, and he stopped and murmured with an air of great sadness, "I am very unhappy."

"You, sire?"

"Yes. For many days my misfortunes have been accumulating. This is the last stroke."

"In truth, I can scarcely believe what you say. My departure is an event of little importance."

"Hear me, duchess: I love you! Yes, yes; it is the first time the words have passed my lips; but you have known it."

Alitea, too frank and truthful, only remained silent, and the king went on:

"Yes, you know well that I love you, and you understand then how much your departure afflicts me. I have no other pleasure but that of seeing you."

"And since the death of the queen, I have not come to court."

"What need is there of telling me that? Do you not think I have perceived it? I have so few friends that the absence of one is remarked. You have not been at court, but then I knew you were at Madrid, near at hand. I could meet you like to-day, for instance. That was something; it was the hope of my life."

At this declaration of love, so sudden, so frank, Alitea knew not what to answer. She stammered a few words about respect and devotion for the king.

"Yes!" cried he, bitterly; "the king—always the king! that is to say no one loves me; he who is condemned to respect and isolation is the king. Duchess, I have had but one happy moment in my life, or rather evening; it was when I was Augustin de Villa-Flor, your cousin—at least, you treated me as such; and I bless that evening, I know not why, for it is since then that I have loved you."

"Your majesty will permit me to tell him—"

"Speak to me as then; speak to me frankly; turn to derision my weakness."

"Never, sire. To-day, as then, I thank you for your friendship. To-day, as then, I will say: Why does the king give to others the power Heaven has confided to him? Why does he not seek in his duties, in the work imposed upon him, a distraction from the griefs which weary him? Henceforth let him watch alone."

"Yes; you are the only one who has spoken so. But this courage, this strength of will—it is not sufficient to talk to me of them; it is necessary to give them to me, and I have them when I listen to you, when you are present. Do not leave me, then, duchess. I am not my own; I am wholly yours."

And in the eyes of the king appeared a tear which, better than words, seemed to say, "Remain."

"Sire, it is impossible."

Then, in inexpressible trouble, he fell on his knees and seizing her hand, bathed it with tears, and cried earnestly:

"It is me—it is your king! no—it is your friend who supplicates you. Remain, that the people who scorn me may honor and esteem me; remain, that my reign may be glorious, or rather because I love you; for that I throw at your feet the sceptre and crown, to which I owe not a day of happiness, except those you have given me."

"Sire—sire, rise!" said Alitea; "return to reason, and deign to listen to me. I cannot remain in the palace without failing in my memory of the queen, your wife and my benefactress,—without failing in my own duties; and can you think for one moment, when I recall yours, I shall forget my own? My sole fortune, my kingdom, is my honor, and that kingdom I will preserve and defend, as I counsel you to defend yours. Do not mistake my words, sire; your friendship alone is valued more than the kingdom. I have no ambition, save that of remaining an honest woman; and if I consent to your wishes, you who pretend to love me, you will always be unhappy; for the day when I should become your favorite, would be the last of my life; I would kill myself!"

These words were pronounced in a voice so firm, so energetic, that the king felt and knew she spoke the truth. He looked at her for some moments in silence and respect; then, as if struck with a new idea, his face brightened.

"You are right, duchess, and I will prove to you that I am worthy of understanding you; I will prove that my love is not a common love. Do not leave yet; grant me eight days more. You will not refuse that to your king, to your friend?"

Alitea bowed assentingly.

"I thank you, duchess, for that promise. I demand another: it is that you will not leave without bidding me farewell."

"I thank your majesty for the honor which he does me, and I await his orders," coldly replied Alitea.

The duchess made the king a profound bow, and retired. The king followed her retreating form with eager eyes. He admired the majestic height, the proud, noble carriage, and queenly head and step.

The king had made a resolve. Understanding well that the Duchess de Santarem was not the woman to yield to the wishes of the king, persuaded that she would rather die than become his favorite, he could not and would not renounce her, and so he resolved to make her his wife and prime minister. His character needed directing, and it pleased him better to be directed by Alitea than the Count de Lerma, and decided that, in the defeat of the latter, he could not find a better successor than the Duchess de Santarem.

The king had not concealed from himself the difficulties attending his project—the pride of Spanish nobility, the rigor of the court, the inflexible severity of etiquette. But if the Duchess de Santarem could not become queen of Spain, nothing could prevent her from becoming the wife of the king. He was a widower; he was free. Marriages of the left hand were then very frequent among personages of the highest distinction. Spain even had seen Maria Padilla seated by degrees upon the throne of Don Pedro.

The king saw on his table a note bearing these words: "Important and secret; for the king alone." This note was addressed to him by the archbishop of Valencia, and demonstrated by victorious argument the necessity of the expulsion of the Moors. The king had not read this letter; he had contented himself with looking at the signature.

Now a new idea had come into his head. He wished to confide to some one his wishes for marriage. The Count de Lerma did not please him, or Sandoval the inquisitor. Father Jerome he knew to be an enemy of both. The Duke d'Uzede was not influential enough. The archbishop was the one. The king seated himself and wrote a summons for the archbishop to leave Valencia, and come secretly to Madrid.

The archbishop, confident that this summons was caused by the effect of his statement, lost no time in hastening to obey the royal summons. The archbishop arrived without either the Count de Lerma or Sandoval being cognizant of the fact. He was introduced immediately into the king's cabinet.

"Be seated, my father," said the monarch, affectionately, and made him take a chair near his desk, and the prelate saw his note under the eyes, almost under the hands of the king, and flattered himself that the king read it unceasingly. "My father," continued the king, "I have called you upon an important affair—the affair which holds the firmest place in my heart; an affair which occupies me day and night."

"I see that well," said the prelate, pointing with his finger to the manuscript.

"How is that, my father?" inquired the king.

"Your majesty," replied the prelate, with satisfaction, "wishes to speak to me of my memorandum."

"No, my father."

"Your majesty has read it nevertheless?"

"Not yet."

If the king had not been so intently occupied with the sole idea in his mind, would have been struck with the angry, bewildered look of the haughty prelate at hearing his master's answer.

"He acts, nevertheless," cried the archbishop, with warmth, "for the triumph of the faith!"

"We will speak of that later. Listen to me at first."

The king, then, with more address, warmth and wit than his auditor believed him possessed of, disclosed his wishes and plans.

The archbishop, unfavorably disposed towards it, and with his eyes fixed upon his elaborate account, shook his head with an air of doubt and disapprobation, and finished by saying the affair seemed to him impracticable and impossible.

The king turned pale; he bit his lips, and answered, coldly: "Perhaps, senior archbishop; we counted on you to help us; we will turn to others."

"Sire, I have answered your majesty upon my soul and conscience, and it is with the same frankness I will speak of the project which brings me. It concerns the Moors, your subjects."

The king did not listen.

"The statement I had the honor to place before your majesty—"

"I will read," said the king, with icy coldness; and taking the prelate's memoir in his hand, he threw it upon the farthest pile of papers.

"In that memoir," said the archbishop, anxiously, "I have the honor to expose to your majesty—"

The king rose and paced up and down the room with an agitated air, and forgetting wholly the archbishop, dreamed of Alitea. The prelate began to understand his fault, and felt he had vexed the king. He hastened to recover his lost ground.

"I do not approve, I have said it, of the marriage your majesty desires."

The king stopped and listened.

"It will excite the censure of the people and nobility, and I do not even know if it would be agreeable to God."

The king began to show signs of impatience. The prelate hastened to add in a higher voice:

"But—"

The king grew calm.

"But if the approbation of the people and of God is obtained by a grand work, pious and desired by all, by a work as useful to religion as to the state, O then, sire, permit me to say to you with the same frankness, it will be very different."

"I hear," said the king.

"All minds will be disposed to welcome any idea of your majesty, and will think that, having insured the happiness of his people, he should obtain his own; and I go further: if some blame still, if some rigorous casuists dare to find fault, they will be told, and by me among the first, no—it is no fault, for it is expiated; where there is expiation, there is no fault; or if we have the expiation first, the fault is effaced before it is committed."

"I hear," replied the king, with joy, "although I do not comprehend perfectly."

"So," continued the prelate, with warmth, "if your majesty approves of the projects contained in my manuscript—"

"I approve of them!" cried the monarch.

"If your majesty will sign as soon as possible this decree, so ardently and impatiently awaited by all, I will promise, I dare promise that your marriage, approved of by the grand-master and familiars of the Inquisition, will obtain the general approbation of his subjects and the benediction of Heaven."

"I consent! I consent!" cried the monarch, at the completion of his wishes, "on condition that you charge yourself with all, next to Heaven, Sandoval, and even the Count de Lerma, with whom I do not wish at this moment to entrust the subject."

"I take care of all," replied the radiant prelate.

"And as soon as possible."

"I promise it to your majesty, and ask of him only one thing more."

"What?"

"To read my memorandum."

"This very instant."

And the king, recalling the unfortunate manuscript from the exile he had imposed upon it, opened it the moment the archbishop left. But at the first page he abandoned the reading of it, and thought of the Duchess de Santarem, and the surprise which awaited her when she came to take leave of him, according to her promise.

CHAPTER XXXVII.

THE DISCLOSURE.

WHEN the archbishop left the king's presence, he went direct to the palace of the Inquisition, where he found Sandoval and the Count de Lerma.

"Ah, well," cried he, with a proud smile, "the cause of Heaven is gained. While you deliberate, I fight; while you seek for means of conquering, I triumph. The king has received my document, and the expulsion of the Moors is agreed upon. The king will sign the decree when we wish, or, rather, as soon as possible, for that was his own expression."

The inquisitor and minister were stupefied and delighted. One saw the Moors at his feet, and the other a cardinal's hat upon his head. Ribeira recounted to them his conversation with the king, word for word; and while he spoke, the faces of Sandoval and his brother lost their smiling aspect and became clouded.

"Thus, then," continued Ribeira, terminating his recital in a triumphant manner, "the king can be allowed to make this secret marriage—this marriage of the left hand, after all; it is of little consequence, for he consents, he signs. I have obtained all."

"You have obtained nothing," said Sandoval, with a stern air. "She whom he wishes to marry is the Duchess de Santarem, whom he adores."

"Well."

"The duchess is the daughter of Don Delascar d'Alberique. She is a Moor," said the Count de Lerma.

"And has never been baptized," added Sandoval.

The archbishop remained overwhelmed by his pretended triumph. The king, it was evident, could not ally himself, even in secret, to Moorish blood; it was a scandal too great for the grand inquisitor to approve of, a political measure too absurd for the minister to consent to; for if the king of Spain married a Moor, he could not sign the banishment of her brothers; the new wife of the king would oppose any such measure, and her authority would be more powerful than that of the last queen. That was an invincible obstacle.

"How is it that the king did not speak of that difficulty, which is the greatest of all?" cried the archbishop.

"The king knows nothing of it," replied Sandoval.

"Ah, well; let us, like him, appear ignorant of the fact. Let him sign the decree; once his signature given and the edict published, it will be irrevocable, and for the rest, let us see about that afterwards. The Moors once banished from Spain, the duchess will have to follow them and quit the kingdom. The king cannot think that the archbishop of Valencia would engage to make him marry any one but a Christian."

This idea stopped them, and the next day the minister and two prelates went to the king. He expected them with impatience, for it was the eighth day, the day when Alitea, as she had promised, would come to the palace to take leave of her sovereign. The king received the archbishop with affection, the inquisitor with reserve, and scarcely looked at the Count de Lerma.

"Thus, as I promised your majesty," said Ribeira, "we have come to obtain his signature to an edict which will make his reign illustrious. That which Charles V. did not dare to do, that which Philip II. only dreamed of, your majesty will accomplish, and insure forever the security of the state and religious unity of Spain."

He presented respectfully to the king the parchment, who ran his eye over it.

"I see well," said he; "I see that you propose to me to send from the kingdom, back to Africa, the Moors, our faithful subjects; and this project, my fathers, is approved of and signed by you?"

"Yes, sire."

"And by you, also, senior count?"

"As the most useful measure the friends of your majesty can counsel to you."

"Your advice," said the king, "is of great weight in the affair. I hope to find in you the same unanimity for the project which the archbishop of Valencia has spoken to you."

"Your majesty wishes to marry some one secretly?"

"Yes."

"A person of rank and birth."

"The Duchess de Santarem."

"A person brought up in the Catholic religion."

"Undoubtedly."

"If that is so," said the inquisitor, looking at his two colleagues, "I see no reason for opposition."

"Nor I," said the count.

"Nor I, either," added the archbishop of Valencia.

The king shook the hands of the two prelates, and even looked graciously at the count, seeing his wishes so easily accomplished.

"You bring me this decision signed by you?"

"No, sire; but we will write it while your majesty signs the edict."

"I desire," replied the king, "that this marriage be celebrated first."

"And why, sire?" cried the archbishop, anxiously. "That will make it much later."

"No matter," said the king. "On the day of my marriage, upon leaving the chapel, I will sign the edict, which will, you tell me, conciliate all the hearts and bring me all the benedictions of my subjects."

The three counsellors looked at each other in embarrassment, and this embarrassment redoubled when the king, deaf to all their entreaties and representations, declared, against his habit, firmly and decidedly that he would not sign the edict, would have nothing to do with affairs of state before his marriage. The three counsellors began to think that the king had suspected their designs; but he had not; he was simply amorous.

"Well, my fathers," said he, seeing their anxiety, "what is the matter now?"

"There is a great difficulty, sire," said the inquisitor, decided to end the matter. "It is, of course, the intention of your majesty to marry a Christian?"

"Well, is not the Duchess de Santarem a Catholic?"

"No, sire."

"O mercy!" cried the king, affrighted. "Perhaps by chance she is of Lutheran or Calvinistic faith?"

"Worse than that."

"O heavens! Jewish?"

"Worse still. She is a Moor."

"Moor!" cried the king, overwhelmed with grief and affright.

"She is the daughter of Don Delascar d'Alberique, of Valencia, who had her brought up far from the paternal mansion to preserve the secret of her faith, and, above all, to escape the baptism."

"Yes, sire," said Ribeira; "she, whom a Roman Catholic king wishes to marry, has never been baptized."

"Our zeal for your majesty," continued the Count de Lerma, "made us ascertain these facts, and it was to save our sovereign—"

"That you wished to make me first sign the edict for the banishment and, perhaps, death of her I love?"

"I thought only of my sovereign!" cried the count.

"Yes, yes—I know it!" said the king, bitterly; "you do not love the queens of Spain. There is a fatality that pursues me. We will examine together if God decidedly orders me to renounce my hopes, or if, perhaps, the conversion of so high a person will not be agreeable to Heaven, and bring about this union."

The three ministers trembled.

"But that which I know," continued the king, whose love rendered generous and noble as well as clear-sighted, "that which I know is that I will not persecute those I deemed worthy of my hand and heart. I will respect her, defend her, herself and her brothers, and, above all," he added, with passion, "I will never consent to send her from Spain."

"Well, I," cried the furious bishop, "I will never permit your majesty to expose himself to the excommunication."

"Compromise his safety," said the inquisitor.

"And that of his kingdom," added the Count de Lerma.

But the two prelates and count could obtain no other answer than:

"I will never sign that edict—I will never sign it!"

In vain they menaced him with the thunders of the church, the anger of Rome, the rising of the whole nation. The king, with long obstinacy, repeated always: "I will never sign it!"

Suddenly his face, which had been animated by the fire of discussion, became pale, and the words died upon his lips, and his eyes, brilliant with hope and love, became sad and dull, and remained fixed upon a little paper lying upon his desk, which he had not seen. Without thinking of the three counsellors, who, seated before him, were watching every movement or change in his face, he read it, and suddenly cried with fury:

"I will sign the edict you proposed to me!"

The three ministers made a sign of joy and surprise, and the king continued:

"Yes, I will sign that edict, but I wish to do it this instant—this very instant! Give it to me."

"We have had the honor to present it to you," said the Count de Lerma; "it is before you—under your hand."

But instead of reading the document, he took the little billet and read a second time these words, which had already produced such a terrible effect on him:

"Sire, Alitea deceives you; she loves another. His name I do not know. The two will marry when she returns to Valencia."

This friend, whom the monarch was far from doubting, was the Countess Altamira. She it was who had written the fatal note. The king remained absorbed in contemplation of the billet, and the three ministers, without knowing from whence came the new resolution, awaited in great anxiety the event which they dared not hasten. At last, the king, shaking off his stupor, said quickly and loudly:

"A pen—a pen! give it to me that I may sign!"

The grand inquisitor offered him one, the Count de Lerma unrolled the parchment, and the archbishop of Toledo, with a beating heart, held the inkstand for him. The king's hand trembled, and he could scarcely hold the pen. After a few minutes his intense agitation passed off, and though his hand still trembled somewhat, he was placing his signature to the fatal edict, when the gentleman of the chamber announced at that moment senora the Duchess de Santarem.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.

THE KING AND THE DUCHESS DE SANTAREM.

THE king, ready to sign, stopped, threw quickly from him the pen, and cried out with rage:

"The Duchess de Santarem! We are delighted to see her. Let her enter—let her enter! Pardon, my fathers, and you, senior count. We will attend to this affair another time."

There was in his gestures and voice an expression so imperative that they had no cause to stay. They left them. The count, in leaving, looked indignantly at the unfortunate valet who had announced the duchess, and consequently, without knowing it, overturned all their projects. The poor valet did not perceive the menacing look of the count, for at that moment he was bowing to the earth to salute him. But the next day he lost his situation, without knowing the cause of his disgrace.

The king felt now not love at seeing the duchess, but fear. His blood recoiled from his heart; he was pale; his trembling lips stammered in articulate words, and his anxiety was greater from the efforts he made to hide it. He signed Alitea to be seated, and smiled as he did so, but the smile was so ghastly and convulsive that she was frightened, and asked the reason.

"What is the matter with me? Ingrate!"

Then the king, forgetting his rank, furious like the lowest of his subjects, overwhelmed Alitea with reproaches and menaces, with scorn and hate, and finished by falling on his knees at her feet, distracted with rage and love.

Alitea tried in vain to calm this excess of fever and delirium, of which she understood nothing. At last she exclaimed:

"How have I merited these reproaches? I have not acceded to your wishes."

"No, no; but you have acceded to the wishes of others."

"Have I promised to your majesty my heart and hand?"

"No; but you have given them to another, an unknown. Do you dare deny it? If you quit me—if you go to Valencia," he continued, with an impetuosity which nothing could stay, "is it not to marry him? Answer—answer me! Who keeps you from answering?"

"Yourself only, sire."

"I!" said the king, angrily, "I, who on my knees supplicate you to speak, to tell me the truth!"

"You know all of it, sire. I know not who could have told your majesty."

"Then it is not true?" cried the king, with an accent of joy, extending his hands to her.

Alitea recoiled a step, lowered her eyes, and answered:

"It is true, sire!"

"And you dare avow it to me?"

"Yes, sire. But then, I swear it, stop my enemies, and the rest that you accuse me of never entered my head or his. Mistress of my hand, I have not disposed, have not promised it to any one—not even to him. I return to Valencia, not to marry any one, but to embrace my father, Delascar d'Alberique, who is a Moor."

"I know it."

"And who brought me up in his faith, sire?"

"I know it—I know it!" repeated the king, impatiently. "And also to be near your lover whom you will never marry!"

"I did not say that, sire."

"How!" cried the king, furiously. "You will not accord me even that consolation. What did you say then?"

"That I could not marry him, even if I wished it, for he has not asked me, never will, nor ever can."

"But if he could, if he did!"

"Then I would pray your majesty permission to accept him," cried she, falling on her knees before him. "But that," she added, with despair, "can never be, never on earth!"

"Me!" said the king. "You would ask me to consent to it. But you do not know, then," continued he, with a cry of grief and anger, "that I wish to marry you?"

"You! O mercy, it is not possible!"

"Ask the Count de Lerma, who left as you came; ask these ministers of heaven; they will tell you; they will testify that I wished to place you upon the throne of Spain, that I wished to make you queen!"

"And I—I do not wish it!" cried the young girl, eagerly. "I respect your majesty too much, I am too much attached to his glory, to permit him to descend from his station. Spain would blame you, and the Inquisition scorn you. I am a Moor."

"Well, what matter?" said the king, looking at her with love.

"I am of the race and faith they detest."

"But I—I love you!" cried he; "and hold—hold! one moment more, I would have signed an edict which banished from Spain thy father and all his race."

"Is it possible!" cried Alitea, trembling.

"An edict which proscribed them, which confiscated their property, which condemned them to wander and die in a foreign land; and that edict—"

"You will not sign!" cried Alitea.

"Never, if thou lovest me, if thou wilt have me—"

"I cannot, sire; but do not sign."

"Heaven wishes it, and my God commands it; that is what all say. Well, I will leave the will of Heaven, and even the anger of God, if thou lovest me, if thou consent."

"My duty prevents me."

"And my duty," cried the king, almost beside himself,—"my duty orders me to be nuptiating!"

"Mercy, sire, mercy!" cried she, falling on her knees; "I supplicate you!"

"I supplicated in vain, and you repulsed me; thou lovest another."

"I love him no more; I will renounce him; I swear it to you!"

"That is not sufficient. I have not the courage or strength to resist the supplications and threats of those who wish it, unless you accede to my wishes."

"My duty, sire, my duty!" cried Alitea, pale with fright. And she added, almost frantically: "My honor and my duty, sire!"

"Thy honor," cried Philip, "thy honor and thy life belong to thy king; and thy duty—thy duty is to save thy father and all thy race! And since love can obtain nothing," continued he, his anger increasing always, "since I can obtain nothing by tenderness, I will try other means. I will see if thy hatred for thy king is stronger than the love of daughter or sister."

"Mercy, sire, mercy!"

"No, no—no mercy!" cried the king, delirious. And seizing her hand firmly, he said: "Listen to me well; thou shalt be here to-morrow evening—to-morrow; hearest thou well? and then I will destroy that edict, will insure the safety and happiness of thy brothers, of all thy race. But thou wilt come; I will wait for you here to-morrow. Thou promisest me—thou swearest it to me!"

"Never—never!" cried she, rising.

"Be silent—be silent!" said the king, placing his hand on her lips; "for if you do not come, then it will be thou who signalizest the ruin, exile, death of thy father!"

"My father!" repeated Alitea, bewildered; "I cause his death!" Then with a movement of despair and affright, an involuntary movement, she cried, almost beside herself: "Mercy—mercy! I will come!"

The king uttered a cry of joy, and his eyes grew brilliant with hope and happiness.

"No, no—it is a blasphemy!" said Alitea, recovering her reason, which intense mental agony had for a moment clouded. "No, no—never, never!"

But the king, as if he feared to hear this disavowal, had already left Alitea, and entered an adjoining room and closed the door tightly behind him.

When the poor girl saw herself alone, she staggered for a moment; driven to despair, and almost wild, she fell on her knees, and raising her pale face, and trembling, to heaven, cried: "Come to my aid, O my God, the God of my fathers, and counsel me!"

Meanwhile, Bernard de Sandoval and the archbishop Ribeira had been taking the necessary measures for the execution of their plans. At Valencia, at Grenada, and in all Andalusia, in Arragon and the two Castiles, their emissaries spread the most alarming news, and raised all the population of Spain against the Moors. The statement prepared by Ribeira, and which the king had not read, was circulated throughout the kingdom, and made a great impression not only upon the members of the clergy, but upon the most powerful and influential personages.

The holy prelate demonstrated that Spain had in its midst a million of conquered enemies, but not subjugated, who formed a separate nation, and who had never entered freely into the manners and interests of Spain. He attested that the Moors revolted continually, and that, above all, in the dangers from which Spain had escaped by the watchfulness and foresight of the Count de Lerma, the Moors, learning the preparations of King Henry IV., had offered him gold and soldiers; and if, by a miracle, King Henry had not died, Spain would have been attacked from within and without, and that if at the first foreign war all the Moors of the kingdom took arms, the Spaniards would be, like their ancestors, forced to submit to the yoke of the conqueror, or find an asylum in the rocks and mountains of Asturias.

These reasonings produced a great effect upon the higher classes; and for the people, Rileira had recourse to other means. He spoke of a conspiracy which tended to nothing else, but to make the sultan of Morocco embark for Spain. The Moors, it was said, had promised to rise on his approach and furnish him with fifty thousand combatants, to aid him in pillaging the churches, profaning the monasteries and driving all the monks from the kingdom; which conspiracy, it was added, was discovered by the tribunal of the Inquisition. The panic was great; the priests invented strange recitals, wonderful signs, which passed from mouth to mouth, and added greatly to the general fear.

They said that at Daro-a the noise of trumpets and drums had filled the air, at the moment the procession left the monastery; that at Valencia there had been seen a cloud of dazzling whiteness, streaked with blood, hanging for many days over the city; that an image of the Virgin had appeared, covered with sweat, and at last that the bell of Villila had rung for many days. All were expecting some great event, and awaited with almost breathless attention for the signal. Signs of strife were read in every passing cloud, warping bells were believed to sound from every tower, and all the Spaniards laid their hands upon their swords whenever they saw a Moor approach. The latter, peaceful and industrious, grew fearful, and scarcely dared to move from their houses.

Yezid received at Valencia all the news, and the day after Alitea's last interview with the king, he came to Madrid. He found her pale and tearless. She had not retired that night, but passed it in agonizing prayers—prayers to her brother and God for counsel.

CHAPTER XXXIX.

THE LAST RESOLVE.

"SISTER!" exclaimed the young Moor, "you must go to Valencia to-day."

"And why?"

"Our father and our brothers are in great danger; our place is near them." And in hurried words he recounted what our readers are already acquainted with. The populace, furious and excited by secret agents, had wished to set fire to Don Delascar's house.

Alitea trembled.

"That is not all," continued Yezid. "All the vessels Spain can dispose of are ready on the coasts; all the troops are ordered to march upon Valencia and Grenada. What odious plot has been formed against us I know not. My father writes that to save our brothers and religion, everything is permitted."

"He said that?" cried Alitea.

"Here is his letter. He asks our pardon for what he does, but knows that we think like him,—that we will not hesitate for an instant to sacrifice all that we have, the most precious and dear."

"He said that?" cried Alitea, with terror.

"See for thyself; see his last words. Save our brothers, and then die!"

Alitea took the letter, and a deadly palor spread over her face, which made Yezid very much frightened.

"Let me keep this letter, brother. Thou art right: we cannot remain here; it is necessary to go. Make all thy preparations; have a carriage ready. It is a daughter's duty to go to her father. Thou wilt lead me to him, Yezid," she murmured, in an imploring tone.

Yezid was going, when he turned and saw Alitea stagger. He returned quickly and sought to calm her.

"I have frightened you, dear sister, by telling you this news too abruptly, and speaking of the misfortunes which I hope will not be realized. My father will be able to prevent them."

"Only at the cost of his own life," said Alitea. Then casting aside her anguish, she added, calmly: "I hope, as you, that our enemies will draw back before the exile or massacre of our brothers. Juan has been called to the palace of the Inquisition; he will tell us all that has been decided upon, and, perhaps, this evening you will be able to carry to Valencia the news that the king and his minister have renounced their sinister designs forever."

She pronounced these words so slowly, and with such an evident effort, that Yezid said:

"You are striving to hide your suffering from me."

"No; nothing is the matter with me. At what hour do you set out?"

"This evening, that we may not be seen; this evening at eleven o'clock."

"That is well. I will be ready. Let the carriage wait for me, but not here; let it await me at the little palace gate which leads to the queen's apartments. Thou knowest it well?"

Yezid trembled.

"Yes, I know it; but why at that gate?"

"Because it is solitary, and because I have a duty to perform. Ask no more, I pray you; brother, trust me, and ask me nothing more. Now, go—go!"

Yezid looked at her with surprise. But he respected her secret, remembering the time when she had respected his own. He embraced his sister and left.

Alitea remained alone for a long time perfectly motionless. She re-read the letter of her father, and with a bewildered air, repeated many times these words:

"You will think as I do, my children; you will not hesitate to sacrifice all you hold dearest and most precious for the defence of our religion and the safety of our brothers. Save them, then die. It is our duty."

"I will follow your orders, my father," murmured she. "You shall be saved by me, and this evening Yezid shall lead your daughter to you; but he will bring her dead!"

She fell on her knees and prayed. Then gaining more strength, she rose and drew from her bosom the tiny crystal flask which Juan had taken from the countess, and gazed for a long time upon the only friend, the only hope that remained to her. Only a few drops and death would come.

Fearing no longer to survive her wo, and certain of death, she breathed more freely and took courage. Going to her desk, she wrote a long time and very rapidly. Having finished her but the pursuer fled. Again she went on, and again the steps followed her. Fearing now not a murderer, but a spy, she hurried on and gained the little gate. A door opened, and she was shown up to the king's chamber. The chamber was empty, and the wild resolution she had taken left her.

"No, no—I will not remain here!" cried she, rising from the chair into which she had fallen. "I will fly; I have yet time, thank God!"

There was no time. She heard quick steps. She uttered a cry, and in her anxiety and fright, she fell on her knees. A door opened before her.

"Mercy! mercy!" cried Alitea, in a stifled voice, extending her hands in supplication.

"What do I see? A woman here—at my feet!" said a low voice.

Alitea raised her eyes. The door which had opened led not from the king's cabinet, but from the corridor by which she had come. She saw before her, not her royal master, but the being she most loved in the world, the whom she wished to think her most worthy. What would he think finding her at that hour in the king's apartments?

"Juan!" she cried, and fainted.

Sevilla, as pale as death, seized her in his arms, and without questioning, without giving a thought to the vile suspicion which entered his head, he raised her up and bore her from that fatal room. As he entered the corridor, and paused for a moment to recover his strength, he heard the king enter his room, and speak with the servant who had led Alitea up.

"Why did you not tell me instantly that the lady I expected was waiting for me?"

No doubt remained; Alitea came of her own accord to the king. To say what Juan felt were impossible. One moment he felt like throwing her down the stairs on the marble pavement beneath; the next he held her to his wildly throbbing heart, and with unequalled speed flew down stairs with her to the little palace gate. He found two men waiting there, one was undoubtedly the one who followed Alitea. The two men approached Juan, who thought all lost. The foremost one looked intently at the young girl and monk, then said in a low voice:

"God be praised, brother! It is you whom we serve."

Sevilla dared ask nothing. The former continued rapidly:

"What shall we do? Dispose of us as you please."

"Aid me to carry this young woman."

The unknown whistled, and many men, clothed in black mantles, approached from places where they had hidden.

"Where shall we conduct her?" inquired the unknown.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

THE CHAMOIS HUNTERS.

Perhaps there is nothing that can well be conceived more exciting than the hunting scenes often engaged in by the Swiss mountaineers. The very spirited picture on this page represents a pair of Swiss chamois hunters following their perilous avocation. In their picturesque, brigandish costume, armed with their short deadly rifles, they have gained a foothold on the face of an almost perpendicular cliff; and while one is looking out for a shot, the other is just raising his weapon to his shoulder to bring down his quarry. In the distance are seen a pair of chamois, one in a listening attitude, and the other bounding across a ravine with the agility which these nimble animals are so celebrated for. The chamois hunter's calling is one that calls for desperate energies. Provided with a gun, a bag of provisions, an iron shod staff to assist him in climbing and leaping, and an axe to cut steps in the ice, his shoes studded with iron points, he traverses the mountain by night as well as by day, tracking his swift and shy game along narrow ledges of rock, or up the rugged sides of precipices, where a false step, or a spring not vigorous enough, would be followed by instant destruction. The chamois inhabits the elevated portions of the Alps and Pyrenees. It is about the size of a large goat, of a dark chestnut brown color, with the exception of the forehead, the sides of the lower jaw and the muzzle, which are white. The horns, rising just above the eyes, are black, smooth and straight for two-thirds of their length, then suddenly curve backward. Its hoofs are so constructed as to enable it to cling securely to the smallest roughness or projection of rock and soil. The hair is thick, long and coarse, and serves to protect it from the bruises to which it is constantly liable. The skin of the chamois makes a fine leather, which is a valuable article of commerce. These animals are sometimes seen feeding carelessly at morning or evening, with their young ones gambolling about them; but there is always a sentinel on the lookout, to give warning of the approach of danger. If a hunter or a beast of prey draws near, the sentinel makes a loud hissing noise, the herd prick up their ears, and as soon as they are satisfied that it is no false alarm, away they bound with the speed of arrows, springing from point to point, sweeping over the ice-fields, hurling themselves down precipices, and finding safety in flight, though apparently rushing on destruction. In speaking of these animals, the Rev. Mr. Williams, a traveller there, relates a very interesting anecdote:—"A hunter," he says, "had been for some days endeavoring to discover the haunt of one of these animals, and at length he saw writing, she sealed and directed it; then upon another sheet she wrote:

CHAMOIS HUNTERS IN THE ALPS.

"When I am gone, give the enclosed to the person to whom it is addressed. Farewell! ALITEA."

In this she enclosed her first letter, and sealing it, directed it to Don Fernand d'Albayda.

At last night set in, and as the moment approached, Alitea felt her terror redouble. With her eyes fixed on the clock, whose hand seemed to fly, she heard seven, eight, then nine, strike. Her heart beat violently; her head felt on fire, and she felt consumed by a living fever which produced a strange hallucination. She thought she saw her old white-haired father followed by several murderers, and he cried to her, "Save me, my daughter! save me!" She sprang forward to save him, but too late. The old man was struck and his blood spouted over her; she saw him at her feet, his noble head in the dust.

At this moment the clock struck ten. Alitea uttered a horrible cry. Without hesitating, without reflecting, she covered her shoulders with a mantle and her face with a thick veil, and quickly left the hotel and walked along the street. The night was dark. The cool night air scattered the delirium which had possessed her, and she became her own fearful self. She looked around her, but no one was near, and she sped onward. Soon she heard stealthy steps follow her. A wild hope filled her breast. She thought it was a murderer, and she turned, welcoming the assassin's knife;

BUSHIRE, ON THE PERSIAN GULF.

The bright and sparkling landscape on this page is the city of Bushire on the Persian Gulf, which presents to the artist many points of attraction. Its quaint towers, its ancient fortifications, the bold sweep of the neighboring hills, and the bright waters that reflect its features combine the most striking elements of the picturesque. In another point of view it is an important place. We have given it its popular designation, but the true title is Abscher, a word signifying the "Father of Cities," for the Orientals do not give unmeaning names to their settlements. It is built on the extremity of a sandy peninsula which juts out into the Persian Gulf.

It is inhabited principally by Persians, Arabs and Armenians, whose numbers have been variously estimated at from 10,000 to 20,000. As a reference to our engraving shows, it is protected on the land side by a wall with round towers, and on the other side by the waters of the gulf, which form a harbor on the north. It is built of white stone, and furnished with hollow towers for ventilation, which make a distant view of it very attractive. But like many other showy cities of the East, it does not improve upon acquaintance. Its streets prove to be narrow, dirty, and unpaved; it is ill-supplied with water, and its houses, with a very few exceptions, are shabby, dirty and inconvenient. Among the public buildings are several mosques, but they are by no means creditable specimens of architecture. The sheik's palace is a structure of some pretensions; and so is a depot of the East India Company. The coffee houses are poor affairs, and, what is strange for an oriental city, there is but a single bath in the whole place. Ships of three hundred tons are compelled to lie in a roadstead, six miles from the city. Bushire had, previous to the recent war, a large trade with British India, importing thence rice, indigo, sugar, English cotton goods with other manufactures, with steel, spices, porcelain, etc., from China and the Malay archipelago. Coffee is imported from Mocha; bullion and European manufactures of various kinds come from Bassorah. The principal exports are raw silk and shawls, horses, carpets, silk goods, dried fruits, grain, sheeraz wine, turquoises, pearls, assafetida and gallnuts. The anchorage is indifferent, but the best on the coast. It consists of an outer roadstead, exposed to the northwest winds, and a safe inner harbor, with four and a half fathoms of water, two and a half miles from the town. In 1831, the plague, that scourge of Eastern cities, committed great ravages here, carrying off more than one third of the inhabitants. The events of the present war may seriously affect the welfare of this city and give it an additional interest in the eyes of the world. Late advices state that the fort of Bushire has been seized by the British East India Company's troops. This is a most important capture, and if it can be held out will prove a valuable depot in the hands of the enemies of Persia. In that event the war will undoubtedly soon come to a close.

HIGH AND LOW LIFE.

We have placed on this page two engravings which form a historical antithesis and illustrate the extremes of social condition in New York. In one is seen a lady in full dress in her box at the Academy of Music. Brilliantly beautiful, and arranged in the height of fashion, the rhapsody of many eyes, the voluptuous Italian music she is listening to, accords with her feelings, and poetises her sensations. With one sweep of the pencil we pass to the other extreme of society as the fingers of Thalberg glide from the highest to the lowest notes of the chromatic scale. We have presented a type of the Upper Ten—let us look at a type of the Lower Twenty. The transition from Fifth Avenue to Five Points is not so very great, after all. Here is a wretched creature, whom we shall recognize as feminine, the picture of indigence and despair, seeking excitement or oblivion in strong drink. She has scarcely two little ones sporting around the mother, in a niche at the top of a high rock, while she was glancing warily down the valley to watch for any hostile approach. To avoid being seen, he made a great circuit, and so reached a path which led to the spot. Exactly in front of the niche the rocks descend perpendicularly to an immense depth. At the back was another steep descent; some fragments of rocks formed a kind of bridge between the large masses; but these were placed too high to be accessible to the little ones, and could only be available to the mother. Escape, therefore, seemed to be impossible. No sooner did the mother, however, catch sight of the hunter than she sprang upon him with all the fury that maternal love will breathe into the most timid creatures. As the hunter now found both hands necessary to sustain him on the narrow path, he warded off the blows of the chamois as well as he could with his feet, and kept advancing. The anguish of the mother increased; she dashed back to her young, coarsed round them with loud cries, as if to warn them of their danger, and then leaped up before the fragments of rocks, already mentioned, from which the second but most difficult egress from the niche was to be won. Again and again did she descend and make the leap, as if to show her young ones the way, but they were not equal to the task, and the hunter had advanced some steps nearer. He was just preparing to make his last effort, when the mother, fixing her hind legs firmly on the rock behind, stretched her body to the utmost length, and planted her forefeet on the rock above, thus forming of her back a temporary bridge. In a moment the young passed over it; the hunter sprang into the niche, thinking himself sure of his game, but all three were off with the speed of the wind, and the bullets he discharged after the fugitives were expended in vain."

THE OPERA.

THE TAP-ROOM.

attained her end. Her haggard look, the writhing of her clasped hands, show that misery cramples her heart closely and will not be shaken off even by the desperate means to which she resorts. What an appalling picture! How low humanity sinks when it voluntarily takes the downward path, or when inexorable circumstances press it down into the mire! It is to remedy such terrible evils, to raise such fallen natures, that the best efforts of the good and true-hearted are directed. The condition of the poor and vicious in New York has enlisted the warmest sympathy and the most active benevolence. Foremost in the work are the noble ladies of our sister city. They have feared not to enter the polluted purlieus of sin and shame, and with their white garments unsoiled, have proved ministering angels to the fallen and the wretched sons and daughters of humanity.

BUSHIRE, ON THE PERSIAN GULF.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TO C—G—.

BY J. P. HOWE.

Friend of mine! how dear I prize thee!
What have I of greater worth,
Than the love thou bearest for me—
Love of pure, celestial birth?

Thou art more than all else to me—
More than honor, wealth, or fame;
Toil and hardship suffered for thee,
I count gladly "more than gain."

O, when I am sad and lonely,
When the world seems dark and drear,
Oft there comes a vision holy,
Sent my sorrowing heart to cheer.

It is thy sweet face appearing
Through the gloom around my heart;
And thy voice, so sweetly cheering,
Bids all grief and care depart.

And I gaze enraptured on thee,
Filled with love, and hope, and light;
Gaining courage for the future—
Courage for the darkest night.

Thus I'm cheered upon life's journey,
Joyfully I wend my way;
When thy lovely form is near me,
Darkest hour is turned to day.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE GOLD LOCKET:

—on,—

JESSIE WALDO'S REVENGE.

BY EMMA CARRA.

It was a little low room, and scant of furniture, where Jessie sat, and yet there was an air of comfort about it. The white curtains at the windows were as pure as the wintry drifts without, and the soft cushion in the large rocking-chair in the corner looked inviting. A small, round stand was drawn up near a shining stove, and beside it sat Jessie. Her foot was on the rocker of a neat willow cradle in which reposed an infant. One had only to look into the face of the sleeper to know that mother and child were before them. The same kind of soft curls shaded the face of each, and the high broad forehead was similar; but there was an air of melancholy on the countenance of the youthful mother that the child had not, and there was a look of unrest about her that infancy can never wear; and let us thank the Creator that it is so, for if it were otherwise, few like he of whom we write would ever come to maturity. Jessie sat rocking the cradle to and fro, and by her side lay a piece of embroidery unfinished. The girl—for we must call her so, although she was a mother—looked first at the muslin and then at an open book on the table before her as if she were undecided which to take. At length, grasping the work nervously, she whispered to herself: "I must finish this, or Alvah and I may have no home to-morrow;" then trimming anew the wick of the lamp she drew it closer and began to stitch. A half hour or so passed away, and yet it was scarcely dark in the narrow street where Jessie lived, and she drew a low sigh as she heard the pedestrians go tramping by, to think that she too could not go out into the fresh air and feel its grateful coolness on her brow; but the infant stirred now, and she rocked the cradle with more energy, and hurried with her work, rocking, thinking and sewing; but it was plain that her meditations were painful, for dark shadows of thought flitted across her face. The babe continued restless, so leaning over and looking into the face of the drowsy little occupant of the cradle, she sang:

"Sleep on, sweet innocent, sleep;
Thy mother alone must weep!"

Two or three times the youthful mother repeated the lines in a low, sweet voice like the carolling of some bird, and then as if to carry out the spirit of her song, a tear glistened on her lashes for a moment and then moistened the muslin in her lap; another might have followed, but at this instant a low tap on the outer door made her press her handkerchief to her eyes and rise to her feet.

"Good evening, Mrs. Waldo," said she who tapped, as the young mother opened the door.

"Good evening, Miss Dinsmore," returned the hostess; and then continued: "Will you walk in?"

The visitor bowed assent, and in a moment she was seated in the little square room occupied by Jessie. Miss Dinsmore was richly dressed, and there was an air of gentility and refinement about her that could but be interpreted as indicating that she moved in the higher walks of life; and yet she was easy and approachable in her manner, rendering the way to her heart accessible. Stepping quietly in, she seated herself by the cradle, and looking in, she exclaimed:

"What a beautiful child you have, Mrs. Waldo!"

"Call me Jessie," said the hostess, her cheeks changing to a deeper crimson.

"Well, I don't know that I can blame you for not wanting to be called Mrs.," said Miss Dinsmore, "for you look nothing but a child now. You must have been married very young."

"Yes—yes," returned Jessie, her color not receding, and turning her face in another direction to hide her blushes.

"How long did you say your husband had been gone to California?" continued the visitor.

The young mother was or pretended to be busy in putting fuel into her little stove, and the rattling of the coal so drowned her voice that Miss Dinsmore did not rightly understand her answer; but she did not inquire again, for her mind was too pure to surmise that any unhappy circumstance could be connected with the marriage of the beautiful being before her; so she dropped the subject and made inquiries concerning the business that brought her there.

"Is the embroidery finished, Mrs.—Jessie?"

"Nearly," said the hostess, with some hesitation, "and it would have been quite, but Alvah has not been very well to-day. I am very sorry it is not done; but I will sit up to-night and finish it."

"O, no, Jessie, you must not do that. I should not enjoy wearing it if I knew that you were broken of your rest to finish it. I will wear the last skirt you embroidered for me, for I shall wear a thicker dress than when I attended Madam Glendon's party; so give yourself no uneasiness because it is not done—finish it at your leisure, and when it is done you may bring it to me. If I am not at home to settle with you, you have only to mention it to mama and she will pay you." Then looking into the cradle again she exclaimed: "O, he is a beautiful babe! I declare he looks very much like an acquaintance of mine. If I did not know that he is your child, I should think he must be a relative of Ormond's."

"Of whom?" said Jessie, her voice a little tremulous.

"Of Ormond Delamere, a young gentleman of fortune, who is very popular in all our assemblies of fashion. But O dear, Jessie, how pale you look! Do lay by your work to-night. Why, you really look ill."

"O, it is only a little faintness that I am subject to—I shall be better in a moment." And she staggered from her chair to the fresh air, and after a few moments returned, her face still pale but without trace of emotion.

In the mother's absence, the babe was so restless that Miss Dinsmore lifted him to her lap, and when Jessie took him, the child held in his hand a tiny locket of gold, attached to the chain around the visitor's neck which she had given him to look at and which he was now very loth to relinquish, every effort to induce him but bringing forth fresh cries.

"Well, never mind now," said the visitor; "let him retain it a little while; you can take care of it afterwards and return it when you bring the skirt."

"But I am afraid he will injure it," said Jessie.

"No, I think not; it has a strong close case, and very likely he will soon relinquish it when I am gone. But I must go now, as I have to dress in season to leave home at nine." And then gathering her warm furs closer and bidding the young and lovely mother good-by, she went out.

When Miss Dinsmore was gone, Jessie did not weep, but after various attempts she coaxed the locket from the babe and placed him back in the cradle where he soon fell asleep. With a trembling hand the unhappy girl touched the spring that held close the covers of the locket, and as the picture within met her view, she recoiled with a smothered shriek, while the cold perspiration started from her temples. "Tis plain," she whispered, hoarsely. "Yes, I can read it all now; this is the likeness of Ormond Delamere; and he flirts and dances with the favorites of wealth and fashion while his—yes, I am his wife in the sight of Heaven—his wife and babe are here almost suffering for the necessities of life. I have suffered wrong, but my patience will not hold out forever, and should there come a reverse in my love, I feel that reason would be dethroned and my revenge would be terrible. For myself, I can endure, but to see my darling babe suffer and be scorned by the world as a child of shame, makes my heart recoil. It shall not be so. If he has wealth, a part at least is mine—is Alvah's, and shall be given to him that he may not know want from his cradle."

"Jessie!" said a pleasant voice outside of the outer door, for the young mother had fastened it when her first visitor departed. "Jessie," it repeated, "are you there?"

"Yes," answered the girl, dropping the locket in her bosom and trying to crush back all signs of emotion from her fair face.

In a moment she opened the door, and a young man stepped within the little square room. His figure was tall and commanding, and there was a varying expression in his face. His dress was fashionable in the extreme and made of the finest fabrics. A heavy gold chain glittered on his breast and attached to it was a watch of great value. Such was the appearance of Ormond Delamere when he entered the little low room occupied by Jessie, the once happy little rustic of the New Hampshire hills.

"All alone to-night, Jessie?" he said, looking around cautiously as he entered.

"Yes, Ormond," replied the girl, with a half sad expression.

"Why, what is the matter, my dear?" continued the young man, gaily, as he caught her hand in passing, and then added: "Is anything the matter with Alvah that I find you so sad? Is he sick?"

"No," answered Jessie, "he is not sick;" and withdrawing her hand: "Would to Heaven that he—"

She did not finish the sentence, for a cold chill crept over her as she looked towards the cradle, and thought that, though perhaps he might never be able to acknowledge any parent but her, he was all that she had to depend upon for love.

"Do you want anything, Jessie?" continued the young man, pleasantly, as he saw her wild look and heard her unfinished sentence.

"Yes," answered she, with emphasis, "I want those marriage vows once spoken by a stranger repeated again now before witnesses, and I want my marriage certificate that you took as you said for safe keeping."

"Jessie," replied the young man, again attempting to take her hand, "I thought you had done with all these childish outbursts long ago—they can do you no good. I have told you in what relation we stood, and you do but make your situation worse to dwell on the past."

"Worse!" repeated the girl, hoarsely; "it cannot be."

"Yes it could, for I could leave you in this great city without means of support, and then you would perish with want."

"Better to die," continued the girl, "than to live dishonored." Ormond was silent a moment, and looked around uneasily, and then said:

"What has produced this outburst? I thought our future plans were all settled long ago."

"Settled!" repeated Jessie, ironically.

"Yes, Jessie; don't you remember when one day while under the influence of wine I told you he who married us was not a clergyman, you said from that time forth we should be as strangers? I acquiesced, but promised that I would contribute to the maintenance of our child; and have I not done so? You know that I have kept my word, and paid liberally for his board."

Jessie was ghastly pale, but she did not break the silence that followed, so in a moment the young man continued, in soothing tones:

"If I could recall the past, Jessie, I would, and restore you to your native hills as happy as you were ere I knew you; but still, because I erred in the past, I must not bring a father's curse on me now by acknowledging one as my wife that he would not recognize as a daughter, but would disinheritor me if I attempted it. So think no more of these things. I will see that you never want, and by-and-by you can pass for a young widow and marry some one with whom you can be happy."

"Wretch!" muttered Jessie in a suppressed voice; and with her large dark eyes riveted on the face before her: "I am no longer the confiding Jessie Waldo that you wooed and deceived, but Mrs. Delamere, your injured wife. But it is not because I love you that I wish now to be publicly acknowledged as your wife, but it is that my babe may not be called a child of shame. Since that fatal moment that made known to me your villainy, I have dissembled and smothered my resentment, hoping thereby you might be induced to relent, and for the sake of your child recall those dreadful words, and own your wife and boy before the world; but the delusion is past—from you I expect no wrongs to be redressed, so now beware! for I know more of your false heart than you would have me know. You say you provide for the babe liberally,—ha, ha! liberally,—and that you will leave us to starve. That we should have done long ago had I not from house to house sought employment for my needle. And Ormond, in my wanderings I have learned something of you, and of the falsity of the tale you told me, that all your time was engrossed in business, which made such heavy demands on your purse that you were not able to provide a better home for the babe. For my child's sake I have misrepresented and deceived, assuming my maiden name and making it appear that I was the wife of an absent one; but I will do it no longer; and now I repeat what I have said before—Give me the certificate you took from me almost ere the conclusion of the ceremony, that I may have some clue by which to find one who by word bound me to you so that I thought death only could sever us."

"I have destroyed it," said the young man, firmly.

Jessie's whole frame grew convulsed; her hands dropped motionless in her lap, and for several moments she did not speak, but when she did there was a hollowness in her tone that caused the color in his cheeks to come and go in quick succession.

"Ormond Delamere," she said, "one summer when you spent the summer months in the country near my home, I thought you worthy, and I loved you. I was very young then, and against the advice of my aged aunt, and with whom I, an orphan, lived, I consented to become your bride, though you were a stranger. I was poor, it is true, but to that you made no objection, saying you had plenty for us both. You said you wished to be married by one whose church you frequented in your childhood; to this I agreed, and by your request we were privately married. I had never seen much of the great world, and knew not that such a wretch lived till it was too late to retract. So now I repeat, beware! for if I am fallen I will not submit without an effort to bring you to my level."

The young man gave a defiant laugh, and all his mildness departed as he said, with scorn:

"I make you my lawful wife! I ignorant country rustic, without character, friends or wealth. No, you should have looked before you leaped—you should not have wedded with a stranger; so trouble me no more, as from this time forth I shall not know you."

Cold perspiration stood on the face of the youthful mother, but there was a look of firmness that almost made the young man tremble.

"Did you ever see that before?" she said, drawing from her bosom the small locket that Miss Dinsmore left with the babe, and reaching it to him.

Several times Ormond essayed to speak, but the words died away in whispers. He knew the locket well—it was a present he made to the daughter of the wealthy Mrs. Dinsmore, a few months back. It contained the pictures of himself and the heiress.

"How came you by this?" he said at length, the tremor of his voice betraying the emotion within.

"Honestly!" was the only answer deigned.

"Do you know the original of this picture?" continued Ormond, holding the miniature of Miss Dinsmore towards her.

"I shall answer no more questions," was Jessie's reply; and then she remarked, while a wild fire flashed from her eyes: "know your intentions there, but never attempt to wed with th heirress of the Dinsmore estates, or you may be thwarted by means you do not think of now."

Ormond broke out into a loud, defiant laugh, saying, derisively: "Be silent, child, or you may repent your words when it is too late."

Jessie returned his scornful look, saying, with emphasis: "Is my ruin the only crime you ever committed? How obtained you the wealth that enables you to linger at the gaming table, in spite of the prayers of an aged father? Ha! you trouble, do you? You have cause for it. I could a tale unfold, and yet it is but of late I learned it."

Ormond arose and paced the floor rapidly, for a few moments, and then putting on his former pleasant manner, he approached the side of Jessie, saying:

"Forgive me, dear, and let us be friends again. I meant not half I said."

But the girl waved her hand for him to be gone, saying: "I know you now, Ormond, and flattery will not again overcome me. Think not to wed with Gertrude Dinsmore, or she shall know all full soon. Believe me, she has a heart, and should she learn your true character, she would sooner die than become your wife."

"I defy you," was Ormond's reply, and without further remark he went out.

After the young man had closed the door, the injured girl turned the key in the lock and pured the worn carpet hurriedly. In spite of the absence of all luxury, as we have said there was an air of comfort in the young mother's apartment, and she would have been happy with no more of this world's wealth had Ormond proved to be all she once thought him; but now there was a spirit aroused within that nothing but retribution for past wrongs could calm. Going to the cradle she made sure that her babe was sleeping quietly, then stepping to a chamber on the first floor above her, which was occupied by a widow and her two children. "Mrs. May," she said, "I have come to ask a favor. Would you be willing to take care of Alvah till I return? I am going out to see a friend, and I may not be back till it is late."

"O, certainly," replied Mrs. May. "We will bring the cradle up here, and then you may stay as long as you wish."

With a look of satisfaction Jessie thanked the woman, and a few minutes later she started out, warmly clad in coarse outer garments. Emerging from the narrow street in which she lived, she walked rapidly down another that wore a much more business-like aspect. Her step was quick, nor did she slacken it till she came to an alley that led to the rear of a large brick store. For a moment Jessie stood in the well-shaded yard as if undecided. At length, murmuring in a whisper, "It must be so—my injuries must be avenged," she stepped cautiously to one of the closed shutters to the building and giving a gentle tap, whispered loudly with her lips at the aperture:

"Luther!"

In an instant a light step was heard inside, and then a back door opened and the girl was invited to enter.

"Why, Jessie," said the young man who had bidden her to enter, taking her hand in his, respectfully, "how came you here at this late hour of the evening?"

"To know the worst; and if all be true that I surmise, to seek revenge."

The store was closed and the two were alone, so without further comment, Luther still retaining her hand, led her to a small counting-room adjoining. Jessie was the first to break the silence.

"Luther," she said, "I need not tell you my history now, for from early childhood you have known me, and had I never met with Ormond Delamere I should have yielded to your request long ago, and become your wife."

The color came and went alternately in the young man's handsome face, and then his features settled into a look of melancholy, but he did not answer, so Jessie continued:

"You know that I was married to him clandestinely, and that he brought me here where I was a stranger, and under one pretence and another, which he said he could not now fully explain, he has provided me with only a miserable home."

"True," remarked Luther; "and this I never could account for, while he seems to have so much at his command."

"I know the reason," whispered the girl. "It is—he says I am not his wife. Our marriage was but a mockery."

"Impossible!" said Luther, springing to his feet.

"For his child's sake would that it were, but for mine, death were preferable now to a life with him. So I have come to you for aid." And then the girl told the young man the occurrences of the evening, of the call of the heirless, and the locket, and that from the manner of each she was convinced that it was the intention of Ormond to obtain the hand of Miss Dinsmore, and that Gertrude thought him all he appeared to be. "Luther," said Jessie, in continuation of her remarks, "if it were in some degree from a selfish motive that I wrote to you when I knew that you were in want of a situation, asking you to come to this city and apply for one to Ormond, but to keep it a secret that you knew me,—for I began then to suspect that all was not right between him and me,—I hope, now that necessity requires it, you will prove my friend."

"God forbid that I should be otherwise, Jessie," replied the young man, with enthusiasm. "And now in what manner can I serve you?"

"By obtaining from him my certificate of marriage; for although he says he has destroyed it, I do not believe him, and I think you can in some of his unguarded moments come in possession of it. It may be about his person, and perhaps when he is sleeping you may be able to procure it. I think I heard you say that he has a room fitted up for a sleeping apartment in this store."

"Yes, Jessie, he has a room here, but he seldom visits it till very late at night, and often after deep potations from the intoxicating cup; but I shall do as you desire, and if he has such a document, in a few days or weeks at least it shall be yours, and if I can be of further service to you, you have but to command me."

The girl hesitated a moment, and then said:

"There is one thing more, Luther: you will remember at a former time you told me that you did not think he came honestly by the wealth he spends; have you any further proof?"

The young clerk looked cautiously around, as if he almost feared to trust the air with what he was about to utter, and then he whispered in the girl's ear:

"Jessie, he is a forger. I know it to be true, for I have watched him closely, and now I hold the proof beyond a doubt." And the young man took from his pocket a small key and went into an adjoining apartment, and in a few moments he returned and placed in her hand a small roll of papers.

Jessie read them hastily, and then said:

"Why did you not make these known?"

"I was but waiting for an opportunity," was the reply.

"Leave it all to me, now," returned the girl, "and if you meet with no recompense now, the God of the injured will reward you in the future."

"I ask for no reward," said Luther, gallantly, "save your hand should it ever be free; for come what may, I will never believe that Jessie Waldo ever did anything to sully her fair name."

No answer, but a grateful look was returned, and in another moment Jessie, by her desire, left her childhood's friend unattended and walked through the gas-lit streets to her lonely room.

About a month has passed, and now, reader, we must again visit that little low room where dwelt the youthful mother and her babe. It is scrupulously neat, with no one present but the tenants we first introduced, but a low rap soon caused the elder inmate to open the door, when two men entered, and Jessie, with a slight bow, requested them to pass into an inner room. They obeyed, remarking that they believed they were a little late, but the girl answered no, and they had but just disappeared when another rap was heard, and Jessie again opened the door.

"I believe I am come precisely at the time your billet appointed, Mrs. Waldo," said Miss Dinsmore.

"Yes," said Jessie, "and I am much obliged to you for complying with it." Then desiring her to enter a small room that led off from the right, she added: "You may think my request strange, but pardon me, and all shall soon be explained."

In a few moments another rap was heard, and Ormond Delamere entered.

"What do you desire?" he asked, sternly. "Speak quickly, for I have little time to spare on such as you."

"I sent for you to again ask from you the certificate of our marriage."

"Fool!" shouted Ormond; "have I not told you that I destroyed it, and that you need trouble me no more?"

"Then I shall acquaint Miss Dinsmore with the past; she will not wed a man who has a wife living."

"How do you know that I intend to make her my wife?"

"Why does she wear your picture if she does not expect to become your wife?"

In an instant the whole manner of Ormond changed, and stepping to her side, he said, pleasantly:

"I do indeed intend if possible to marry the rich heirless; not that I love her half as much as I do you, though I have been unkind, but the cause of my unkindness is not any lack of love for you, but I must have money; and now if you will say no more to thwart me, when I am married to Gertrude I will provide you with every luxury, and maintain you in any style you choose."

There was a pause of a moment, and Ormond was confronted by the presence of those that of all others he would the least have liked to see now; for within a few feet of him stood Miss Dinsmore, his clerk, Luther Russell, and an officer of the law. Ormond attempted to rush from the room, but soon found his egress was impossible until attended to a place for safe keeping till the law should acquit or condemn him; for now the papers that proved him a forger were produced, and in a package of old receipts and cancelled bills in a drawer in the secretary in Ormond's room, Luther had found the desired certificate, which on investigation was found to be genuine, the man who married them having been a justice of the peace, though Ormond was ignorant of the fact. Thus Alvah became the lawful heir to his grandfather's property, by whom he was acknowledged as his grandchild when all was made known.

We have but little more to add: ere the day of trial came Ormond died in prison—whether by his own hand, or remorse and disease, the world never knew; and in after years Jessie rewarded the young clerk by the gift of herself and the guardianship of her beautiful boy.

THE LOVE OF THE DEAD.

It is written in the Moralist that to have laid a strong affection down among the dead may be a great sorrow, but it is not a real misfortune. Whatever one's aftergoings may be, there is a deposit for the future, a stake in the better country, a part of the heart which the grave keeps holy in spite of the "evil that is in the world." The living may change to us, or we to them; sin may divide, strife may come between us, but through all times and fortunes the dead remain the same to our memories and our love. The child taken away from us long ago is still the innocent lamb that was not for our folding. The early lost friend or lover is still the blessed of our youth, a hope not to be withered, a promise not to be broken, a possession wherein there is no disappointment.

DOMESTIC LIFE OF THE FRENCH IMPERIAL FAMILY.

A Paris correspondent gives the following: The prince imperial was yesterday, in spite of the coldness of the weather, taken out for air and exercise in the garden and court of the Tuileries. In the afternoon his imperial highness was carried in the carriage, with a military escort, to the park of Monceaux, where he remained an hour and a half. What he may grow up to it is impossible to say; but though a strong, healthy looking child, he is assuredly, at present, far from prepossessing in appearance; the mouth is gross and altogether unseemly; the cheek bones are long and prominent; the complexion is swarthy. But he is lusty as a young eagle. Scarcely nine months old, he rolls himself over and over after any object which attracts him with surprising agility, and shows all the germs of future despotism in his determined manner of exercising his free will on all matters within his domain. The fondness of the imperial parents is absolutely intense, and the genuine amiability of both is never more apparent than when the child is in their presence. As to the empress, it seems to be the only thing that was wanting to draw out the great depths of her character; and in the duties of maternity she displays a grave sobriety and womanly earnestness of which she was not always supposed capable. The health of the emperor, if it were affected to the degree so generally reported, is surprisingly recovered. He now rises at seven o'clock, is frequently at work in his cabinet by candle light; at ten receives his ministers, marshals and high functionaries, as heretofore. The only difference discovered in him by those most intimately associated with him—and I am speaking on the best information—is that he is often seized with long fits of abstraction, and will sit for hours sometimes doing nothing, and yet it is evident that this is not a state of inaction, for there are unmistakable indications of his mind being in constant operation. He has an affection of the instep—a sort of tic douloureux, as he calls it—which often prevents him drawing on his boot, and induces him to move about. The general health appears excellent, and thus secures him from the imputation of gout.

GROWTH OF NEW ZEALAND.

Fifteen years ago this colony was an unexplored, unexplored group of islands, inhabited by native cannibals. The New Zealand Company undertook it, sent out emigrants, turned to account its abundant agricultural and mineral resources, discovered the superior intelligence and aptitude for civilization of the indigenous race, and with the aid of indefatigable missionaries, converted the heathen to Christianity. In a short time the British government erected New Zealand into a separate colony. The population was not then over 50,000; it has increased to nearly 180,000, of whom 50,000 at least are whites, mostly all emigrants from the mother country. Sir Robert Peel once emphatically called it the Great Britain of the Southern Seas. Its revenue from the customs exceeds £100,000 a year; the exports amount to more than a quarter of a million. It has a free constitution, "almost equal to universal suffrage." The next clip of the wool of the province of Wellington alone will not be less than a million of pounds, and, including the other southern provinces, may be estimated at three millions. Education is extending among the natives by means of industrial schools, in which their children are provided with everything. The missionary establishments are numerous. A Mr. Smith, of Wellington, "came home after a residence of seventeen months in New Zealand," and communicated much interesting information. He deems it probable that the population will be doubled every three years. Within two months two thousand persons left Victoria for New Zealand. It will certainly be among the most prosperous and wealthy of the British possessions. —Journal of Commerce.

LORD NAPIER, THE NEW MINISTER.

The new British minister at Washington appears to come up to all the requirements for his particular mission. Objections have been taken to Lord Napier because he has served his diplomatic apprenticeship at the courts of Naples, Teheran, Madrid and St. Petersburg; a bad school, it is said, for a minister to the republican United States. We are not sure of that. It is affirmed that Lord Napier's liberal opinions have only been strengthened by what he has seen at absolutist courts. It is by no means impossible at the present day: despotic governments may thus instructively play the political helot. Lord Napier has served in no post without gaining credit. Personally he is able, frank and conciliatory in his manners—a true specimen of the English gentleman. The Americans have sometimes remarked that they select their best men to send to us—those who have been distinguished in the public service, in literature, or in some other way; while we have not always returned the compliment. The selection of a popular nobleman will unquestionably be taken by the republicans to prove that we have the desire to pay them the compliment of appointing to the post at Washington a man of high estimation among ourselves. There is much good to be done at the American capital, and by all accounts there is a probability Lord Napier is the man to do it. —London Spectator.

PLEASANT INCIDENT.

A loud shout from the boys in the street drew me to the window. An old man, with a market basket on his arm, was staggering along under the influence of ardent spirits, sometimes plunging against the fence on one side, and barely saving himself from the ditch on the other. The boys seemed to regard it as fine sport, but the old man was of a different opinion, and would, evidently, have taken a summary vengeance had it been in his power. As it was, he could only look daggers, shake his fist, swear at them, and threaten a terrible retribution at some future time. At length he attempted to cross the street and would have fallen headlong had not a young lad, some twelve or fourteen years of age, who was passing at the time, sprung forward, caught his arm, and restored his equilibrium. Then, with a gentle "this way, sir," and a rebuking gesture to the boys, which kept them at a proper distance, he kindly led the old man forward, nor did he leave him till he reached the door of the market to which he was bound. I know not that boy's name, but I venture to predict that he will yet make his mark upon the age in which he lived. —Peter Parley.

TRUE INDEPENDENCE.

The man who has seven acres of fertile land may always retire within the circle of his own productions; he may laugh at the monopolist, and receive his bread from the God of heaven. No matter how much the seller asks for his wares, no man is obliged to buy them. Let him store his fine flour if he please, until it is devoured by the rats. I thank Heaven that I have two hands and an humble stomach; I can bear coarse food and woolen; I can retire from flour to Indian meal, and from Indian meal to potatoes, or some humbler root. —Washington.

VIEWS IN ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

In the last volume of our Pictorial (Vol. 11, No. 10) we published a series of views in this flourishing and growing city, drawn expressly for us by Mr. Kilburn, which were very highly spoken of for their interest and accuracy. The same artist, from sketches made upon the spot, in fulfillment of our direction, has furnished us a set of elegant drawings, from which the accompanying engravings were made. The first of these represents the new reservoir in the upper part of the city, a solid and costly structure. St. Louis is supplied from the Mississippi River, the water being pumped up by steam and forced into the reservoir shown in our engraving, whence it is distributed to all parts of the city. It is taken out from a point above all the sewers, and where the current is the swiftest, so that the supply is the purest that can be obtained. The water-works are city property and the expense of them is defrayed by the water tax, as in most other cities. The well-water of St. Louis is peculiarly clear and limpid in appearance, and a stranger would be apt to contrast it favorably with the dark, muddy river water, but it is impregnated with limestone, and on that account unwholesome, while the Mississippi is said to be very healthy.—The next engraving delineates the Jewish synagogue at the corner of Cerre and Sixth Streets. It is very peculiar in its embrace all varieties of the eastern steamers, from the clumsy, slow-moving tow and freight boats to the gorgeous river-palace, whose commodiousness, splendor and comfort cannot be exceeded. We think no one can fully realize the importance of steam, or the vast strides that American enterprise and capital have effected in river navigation, who has not sojourned in some such locality as that we have delineated. And it requires long use to get over the feeling of wonder and admiration excited by the spectacles which the "Father of waters" presents. The wonder is en-architecture, but certainly presents a picturesque appearance. It is very oriental in its character, and this peculiarity is rendered the more striking by the aspect of the buildings in its immediate vicinity, which are decidedly American in style.—Our third picture delineates the Levee or landing, with the fine buildings on the left, the forest of smoke-pipes on the right, bales, boxes and barrels of goods and produce piled up as far as the eye can reach, representing a prodigious value; and the busy draymen employed in loading up their trucks and wagons. The amount of business transacted here, and the consequent noise and confusion, would bewilder and surprise any one not conversant with the landings of our western river cities. The constant arrival and departure of the steamers, and the shipping and landing of the immense amount of freight, render the scene on the Levee the most interesting to a stranger that can possibly be conceived. The visitor from the eastern seaboard sees the bustle of an Atlantic port surpassed, and scans with a curious eye the novel features presented to his observation. The principal objects of interest are the boats, which we regret to say, has been destroyed by fire since our sketch was taken. This was a truly noble building, and an ornament and credit to St. Louis. Beyond, in the perspective, is seen the smoke of the numerous manufactories mingling with that of the steam-boats. At the right is seen a part of Bloody Island and Illinois town. The opposite shore of the river is in Illinois, and the bank of the stream, unlike the bluff on which St. Louis is situated, stretches back several miles in a low bottom called the "American bottom." Our view is taken from the lower ferry landing, and embraces the principal part of the Levee, the whole of which, from its extreme length, cannot well be drawn.—As an illustration of the many fine business structures which embellish the city, we present, on the next page, an accurate sketch of "Verandah Row," the light and agreeable architecture of which cannot fail to make a favorable impression on the spectator. This range of buildings fronts on Washington Avenue, Fourth and St. Charles Streets. It is not only picturesque, but admirably adapted to the purposes for which it was erected. St. Louis abounds in fine mercantile edifices, and more are being constantly erected to meet the wants of the rapidly-increasing population.—We close our series of sketches with a pleasing and animated street scene. This is emphatically a "street of churches." On the left, is a portion of the Mercantile Library building; a short distance beyond is the Third Baptist Church, corner of Sixth Street. On the right, beginning at the distant point, rises the spire of the First Presbyterian Church. The next, with the chimney-like tower, is the New-School Presbyterian; that partly hidden by trees is the Central Presbyterian, and the structure nearest the spectator is the St. George's Episcopal Church. The figures on the sidewalk and the carriages in the street seem to give an idea of the appearance of the place. There is an air of elegance, ease and refinement about it which reminds the traveller of some old European city, or of one of the gay thoroughfares of New York. We have thus endeavored to place on record some of the most interesting features of St. Louis as it is. It is constantly progressing, and constantly putting forth new claims to admiration. The astonishing growth of our western cities, if a marvel to ourselves, is yet greater to visitors from abroad. They are astonished at the old world look of our Atlantic cities, but when, in penetrating into what they had thought to be a wilderness, they find wealth and civilization, their surprise is boundless.

JEWISH SYNAGOGUE, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

RESERVOIR, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

FIFTH AVENUE, NEW YORK.

Fifth Avenue has not a solitary store or workshop in its entire length of nearly two miles, except one which has most pertinaciously maintained its position there for years. That has at last disappeared, not because business is unwelcome, but because this edifice was old and unsightly, and a nuisance to the "Ascension Church." The building was used as a paint-shop. For many years it has been left in the worst condition, with the hope that the church and property owners there would yield to extortion and purchase it. Years since, efforts were unavailingly made to buy it. The owner has yielded at last, and a handsome structure will supply the place of the demolished old "paint-shop."—N. Y. Journal of Commerce.

THE LEVEE OR LANDING, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

A LEGAL INCIDENT.

The question of the innocent convicted having been lately brought under public attention, Mr. Brady, of Warwick-place, Belgravia, sends to the London Times the following statement of a most painful case that came under his observation within the last four years. For obvious reasons he withholds the name of the unfortunate victim of "legal accident." Mr. T—, a young man of high character, with respectable family connexions, was employed for twelve years in one of the largest firms in the "Manchester line" in London, the last three of which as buyer for the establishment; in that capacity he laid out on an average from £40,000 to £50,000 a year. In the early part of the year 1853, he left town for Manchester by the night mail; on arriving at — station, he changed his mind, and determined not to proceed to Manchester that night. On leaving the station for the hotel, he was stopped by a police officer, who accused him of stealing the carpet-bag which he had in his hand; on examination, it was found to be the property of another gentleman. He endeavored to explain that he took it by mistake; but to no purpose. He was searched; his ticket for Manchester was found on him. This fact was considered conclusive evidence that his leaving the train at this intermediate station was done for felonious purposes. Another policeman coming up at that moment, at once recognized in the person of Mr. T—, a notorious swellmobman from London, and, jocosely taking the gold watch and chain from my friend's neck, said, "I suppose this is part of the proceeds of your calling." Expostulation on the part of the accused was vain. He declared his innocence and asked for his own bag, but the idea of his possessing such an article was utterly ridiculed, and his request was looked upon as part of the sharper's dodge. After a little further ceremony, he was consigned to a cell for the night, to wait his examination. He implored permission to write to his wife, but so great a favor could not be granted. The accusation, even at this early stage, had done its work. Excitement set in, and in the agony of his distress he conceived the futile design of attempting to escape from the horrors of the place he was in and the foulness of the charge. Unfortunately the attempt was made, and from that moment his fate was sealed. Without being permitted to communicate with his friends, he was examined before the magistrates and committed to the county jail. Eight days from this time, his wife, who was in perfect ignorance of what had happened to her husband, went in great distress of mind to the city to make inquiries as to his absence, when to her consternation she was told that there was an account in a country newspaper of his having been committed to prison on a charge of robbery. At once she set off to his prison, and, after an interview, proceeded to the magistrate who had committed him, with a view of having him bailed out, but in vain. Now, without going into minute detail of what took place from the time of his wife seeing him in prison to the day of his trial, I shall state that the day for his trial was appointed; the solicitor for the defence had instructions to telegraph to his brother, a gentleman of high character in the city, who, with my unhappy friend's employer, intended to be present at the trial, to speak as to his character. But the fatality which in the first instance befell him, pursued him with unrelenting perseverance. The business of the court, which was calculated to occupy a certain time, was got over much sooner than was at first expected. Poor T— was called upon to plead to the charge. His counsel, in defence, pointed out to the judge and jury the improbability of a man committing such an act who held a position of great trust in society, and whose character for honesty was beyond all question, as he should prove by evidence of the highest respectability. After his address, the names of the witnesses for character were called, but, as the trial unfortunately took place twenty-four hours earlier than in the ordinary course was expected, they were not present. The jury, without leaving the box, found him guilty; the judge approved the verdict, and the poor man was sentenced to some years' imprisonment. It may be asked, where was the wife all this time? Why was she not present? Wonder not. The day before the trial, she gave birth to her sixth child, and from distress of mind, was not expected to survive the day through. Fever came on, insensibility followed, and for ten days she was unconscious of everything about her. At the first gleam of returning sense, she inquired of her nurse if John had returned home, evidently alluding to his usual return from business; but memory, like a flash of lightning, recalled to her his sad position, and she sank back into the state of insensibility from which she appeared to be recovering. I am not indulging in sentiment; I narrate what I saw. Three weeks later her two eldest children were carried off by an attack of scarlet fever; ten days more her infant died. Within three months from that time she received information from the governor of the jail that her husband was dying, and that she must proceed immediately to him if she wished to see him alive. She entered the wretched cell. There, before her, lay her husband—a helpless, paralyzed old man—an idiot. His hair, which three months before had not a gray hair in it, was now perfectly white. His age, thirty-five. Fortunately for him, he knew her not. Her passionate and heart-rending grief, which wrung the hearts of those around, fell dead on his ear; all human sympathies were gone. Benson was rudely jostled from her seat. He cared not for judge, jury or policeman, and he gazed unconsciously on the wife of his early and affectionate love, and the mother of his helpless children. I need not dwell upon this scene. After some formalities at the Home-office, he was removed to a private asylum, near London. He was once more a free man, but to what purpose? In a short time he sank and died. This was just one of those cases in which it is easy to fix suspicion, and next to impossible to remove it. If no two carpet-bags were alike; if there were no confusion at a railway-station on the arrival of a train; no rush for luggage; but, on the contrary, such order that it would be difficult—instead of easy as it is—to make a mistake; if the railway authorities had on their part done their duty, and made proper search and inquiry for T—'s carpet-bag, which they would not believe he possessed, but which they afterwards found; if they had allowed him to communicate with his friends, so as to give him an opportunity before he was consigned to prison, of proving that he was not one of the swell-mob, as they rashly and fatally suspected, and if he had failed to verify the account he gave of himself—then it might have been said that there was a case for a jury. But there was no such case. The man was falsely accused, imprisoned, convicted and driven mad. Two years passed, and the little all the wife had was consumed in the support of her helpless children. She sought for employment at one of the houses of business in the city as a blood-runner, and she is now to be found, with a shattered constitution and skeleton form, stitching from daylight till twelve o'clock at night, for a scanty support for her three surviving children.

VERANDAH ROW, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

VIEW IN LOCUST STREET, ST. LOUIS, MISSOURI.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

TO MY HUSBAND.

BY L. B. NORTON.

Six years ago—six years ago—when youth its mantle o'er us spread,
And cheek and lip their color caught of healthful, glowing, rosy red,
We little thought that coming years would find us to each other bound
By every tie affection weaves; our joys by love and marriage crowned.

Life then to us a garden seemed, where thornless roses bloomed and smiled
Upon us, as we journeyed on with all the gladness of a child.
Our sky was clear; no cloud dimmed the brightness of our morning sun,
Or warned us that a coming storm might blast our joys ere half were won.

But one by one life's roses fell, and where they blossomed thorns arose,
Yet not bereft of beauty, seemed the path which led through joys and woes;
For though the flowers had lost their hue, and shadows stole where sunlight played.

The sweetest perfume lingered still, and golden fruit hung 'neath the shade.

Our early friends—where are they now? where, too, the hearts we deemed our own?

Alas, the grave hath gathered some, and others old and strange have grown;
But those there are, fond, warm and true; whose hearts round youthful loves still cling,

As ivy clasps the sturdy oak, and greener grows from spring to spring.

And we, as years have o'er us rolled, bringing us nearer to that shore
Where angels wait with outspread wings to wait us hence forevermore.
Have still loved on, with hearts unchilled, though oft by worldly cares oppressed,

Owning no joys we have not shared—no griefs not suffered in each breast.

Still hand-in-hand we'll walk life's way; still will we seek for flowers that bloom,

E'en though they pale and paler grow as nearer we approach the tomb;—
Our hopes on these shall not be fixed—we'll gaze not long on leaf or sod,
Onward and upward will we look, as we press on to meet our God.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR.

BY HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT.

IN the year of grace 1028, there was born to Robert, the fifth duke of Normandy, in lineal descent from Rollo, its first pagan conqueror, a son, who was named William, after his great-great-grandfather, son of the wild Norse sea-king, who won the fair land of Neustria from the unwelcome Charles the Bald, the Capetian king of France.

His mother was the beautiful Harlotta, the daughter of a tanner of Falaise, of whose charms, seeing her by chance dancing with her playmates, the Duke Robert became so enamored, that, being forbidden by the obligations of his nobility to marry one so far below his station, he prevailed on her to become his concubine, and took great delight in her conversation.

William was, of course, illegitimate—what we should now term lase born—but it does not appear that in those days, although it unquestionably disqualified its bearer from rights of primogeniture as relating to sons born in wedlock, the repute of bastardy was held the blot and stigma on an escutcheon, which it is now everywhere regarded. Indeed it would seem that persons of note, about that period, of whom the subject of this memoir was one among the most notable, rather prided themselves, than the reverse, on this peculiarity of their birth.

Many indeed believed, as Byron has splendidly embodied the thought in his fiery lines in Parisina, that from the very violence and uncontrolled action of love in the erring progenitors, who would suffer no law to prevent or retard their passions, there arose, in the children of such loves, a like energy of will, a like intolerance of restraint; that as they were the offspring of strong physical and mental feelings, so they were, by nature and of necessity, born strongly organized in mind and body, impetuous in undertaking, persistent in action, quick, penetrating, fiery, resolute—of that mettle, in a word, which makes men or women great, whether for good or evil. Certainly William of Normandy was so born; and so far was he from being ashamed of his birth, that he was wont to write himself "the bastard."—Ego Gulielmus, cognomento Bastardus.—Old Norman Charter.

Previous to his birth—for the founder of the great race and nation, whosoever they exist, which speak the Anglo-Saxon tongue, could not be born unheralded by omens—"his mother dreamed that her intestines were stretched out and extended over the whole of Normandy and England."

Had Columbus then given a new world to Castile and Leon; had Balboa then descried the broad Pacific from the summit of that "Peak of Darien," had Tasman and Dampier then found the island continent and archipelago far in the southern waters, far greater would have been the tension which should adumbrate the almost illimitable spread of the domain, which one day should belong to the race, soon to originate with him who yet slept unconscious in her vitals.

"At the very moment, also, when the infant burst into life and touched the ground, he filled both hands with the rushes strewn upon the floor, firmly grasping what he had taken up." In the old phrase, he had "taken seizin of the soil," an inaugural form of assuming possession of the sovereignty; and, accordingly, we read that "this prodigy was joyfully witnessed by the women, gossiping on the occasion; and the midwife hailed the propitious omen, declaring that the boy would be a king."—William of Malmesbury. 259.

Perhaps it was the recollection of this involuntary act of "taking seizin of the soil of Normandy," that led him in a famous after-day, to convert what was regarded as an evil omen into an auspice of success; when he likewise "took seizin of the soil" of an independent royalty. However this might be, and however improbable it may have seemed that the love-child of the tanner's daughter of Falaise should ever be so much as duke of the duchy of which he had prematurely "taken seizin," it was not long before this first step was achieved to future royalty.

When William was seven years of age, his father resolved, as was a frequent usage of the times, to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem; and aware of the uncertainty of life, before his departure, assembled all the lieges of the land in council at Fescamp, where he declared Harlotta's love-child his successor, the barons swearing fidelity to the boy, who was committed to the guardianship of the Earl Gilbert, and his guardianship assigned to the protection of Henry, king of France.

Robert, as he seemed to have anticipated, died before he could return to his dominions. As usual, the oaths of fidelity were forgotten; the barons provisioned and armed their castles, and sought opportunities to revolt from the child; but, as was not usual in that, if any other age, the guardian, Earl Gilbert, was faithful, and almost alone defended by arms what was just and right, so that the destined heir of great sovereignty grew up uninjured, giving promise of vigorous and audacious manhood, if he should attain it.

At length, "Gilbert was killed by his cousin, Rodolph, and fire and slaughter raged on all sides. The country, formerly most flourishing, was torn with intestine broils, and divided at the pleasure of the plunderers; so that it was justly entitled to proclaim, 'Wo to the land whose sovereign is a child!'"—Ecclesiastes. 10: 16.

But then there fell another fortunate chance for the young duke. King Henry of France, instead of arming to appropriate to himself the dukedom of which his ward had been already dispossessed by others, loyally raised the feudal forces of his realm, and rushed on the revolters at Walesdae, where many thousands were slain with the sword, many more driven into the river Orne, the rebels totally defeated, and William reinstated in his ducal authority.

Shortly after this, we learn that William was enabled to repay the king's good service by the like service in the field, assisting him against Geoffrey Martel at Herle-Mill, a fortress of Anjou, which province the said Hammerer had disloyally invaded. So great at this time was his repute for headlong and indomitable rashness, made good only by his wonderful prowess, that the king, his suzerain, would often admonish him not to hold in contempt a life which was the ornament of the French, the safeguard of the Normans, and an example to both.

But he soon learned to temper his valor with discretion, and thereafter largely to season both with craft. In the meantime he brought his barons back to their allegiance, ruled moderately and wisely, and maintained excellent relations with the church of Rome, already governed by Hildebrand, soon to be Gregory the Fourth.

It was during William's minority that the sons of a poor, private gentleman, Tancred de Hauteville, of the Cotentin, setting out penniless and winning their way by selling their adventurous swords, had made their way to Italy, rendered themselves masters of Apulia, Calabria, and the island of Sicily, which they held really as independent monarchs, but nominally as a fief from the pope. This wonderful success re-awakened all the predatory appetite which they had inherited from their Viking ancestors, in the fiery French Normans; but it was now a nearer, wealthier, easier conquest than Sicily, on which their leader cast his eye to see how he might possess it.

He was, at the least, as subtle as he was brave; and it was not long ere he devised how he should lay a claim to the crown of England, by which at a future day to justify its seizure. This arranged, he proceeded to establish himself so firmly at home, that there should be no fear of losing one game in Normandy while playing for another beyond the stormy channel.

He feared no evil from Brittany or Anjou, both of which were convulsed by civil war; and he contrived to put an end to his long-enduring feud with Flanders, by marrying his beautiful cousin Matilda, daughter of Baldwin, the earl of that province, "a woman," says William of Malmesbury, "who was a singular mirror of prudence in our time and the perfection of virtue."

At about this period, difficulties had occurred between William and his early friend and patron, the king of France, and actual hostilities had commenced; but Henry dying, opportunely left his son, Philip, to the guardianship of Baldwin, who easily mediated between his ward and his son-in-law, so as to leave the latter to pursue his plans of conquest at his pleasure.

Anglo-Saxon England had by this time become wholly powerless and effete. The fierce and stubborn Angles, who, invited to protect the effeminate, half-latinized Britons from the incursions of their piratical neighbors, the Picts and Scots, had made it their own and held it by the sword, during six centuries of stormy sovereignty—had fallen into a yet worse condition than the Britons, whom they had supplanted; and suffered, from the roving and predacious Danes, the same extremities which their predecessors had undergone from their northern neighbors.

The picture drawn by the same accurate historian above quoted, of the manners of the Saxon people, shows that it was indeed time that by some means the race should be regenerated, not only by a change of rulers, but by a change of blood.

"The clergy," he says, "contented with a very small degree of learning, could scarcely stammer out the words of the sacrament; and a person who understood grammar was an object of wonder and astonishment. The monks mocked the rules of their order by fine vestments and the use of every kind of food. The nobility, given up to luxury and carelessness, went not to church in the mornings after the manner of Christians, but merely, in a careless manner, heard matins and masses from a hurrying priest in their chambers, amid the blandishments of their wives. The commonality, left unprotected, became a prey to the most powerful, who amassed fortunes by either seizing their property or by selling their persons into foreign countries, although it is an innate quality of this people to be more inclined to revolt, than to the accumulation of wealth. Drinking, in particular, was a universal practice, in which occupation they passed entire nights as well as days. They consumed their whole substance in mean and despicable houses—unlike the Normans and French, who, in noble and splendid mansions, live with frugality. The vices attendant on drunkenness which enervate the human mind followed. In fine, the English at that time wore short garments reaching to the mid-knee; they had their hair cropped, their beards shaven, their arms laden with golden bracelets, their skins adorned with punctured designs. They were accustomed to eat till they became surfeited and to drink till they were sick."

At this period, when the vigorous and indomitable Normans began to cast longing eyes on the ocean-island, this effete and vicious people was governed, if one call it being governed, when he was himself but a tool and slave to others, by an effeminate, weak monk-king, who lacked alike the vices and virtues of a man. In his own estimation, the greatest merit he possessed was this, that he lived with his wife, a beautiful Saxon lady, as if she had been his sister; and that he had so effectually mortified his flesh, that there was no hope, or fear, of there being left an heir to the Saxon throne of England. Earl Godwin and his sons, Harold in chief, had long ruled both the kingdom and the kiosk; and the latter aspired to the succession, when the monk-king should depart in the odor of sanctity.

Edward, however, a distant relative of William—his mother was sister of Richard, that prince's grandfather—had himself resided many years in Normandy, was attached to the Normans, and would have had his ministers, and all the high officers of his court, men of that nation, but for the influence of Godwin, who had forcibly expelled them from the kingdom, and of his sons after his decease.

Once, while Godwin was in temporary exile, William had visited his cousin, had been received as befitting his high reputation, his kindred blood, the gratitude which Edward owed to his family, and not, perhaps, least, that monarch's predilection for the Normans.

William asserted that at this time Edward promised to appoint his successor to the throne; nor does it appear unlikely that he did so, as his detestation of Godwin and his whole family is well known. Shortly afterwards, however, Godwin returned, expelled the Normans by a counter revolution, and so long as he lived, was virtually governor both of the king and people. At his death, Harold, who was a man equal in dissimulation and not far inferior in ability to William, though unequal in fine astuteness and decisive energy, obtained all his father's influence over the monk-king, though perhaps as hateful to him in his secret heart.

William, foreseeing that Harold would probably induce or compel Edward, on his death-bed, to nominate himself his heir, and that he would assuredly prevail with the Saxon council, astutely took advantage of an unguarded visit which the Saxon earl paid him in his own dominions, to obtain from him a promise, ratified by an oath made by him unconsciously under the sanction of the most awful relics, that, on Edward's decease, he would to his utmost aid him in securing the English crown; in return for which service he should have to wife the daughter of the Norman.

Shortly after the return of Harold to England, Edward died; and, it being uncertain what disposition he made, if any, of the realm, the kingdom itself being in doubt whom it should elect as its ruler, Harold, by a concurrence of circumstances and his connection with the leading nobles, secured to himself the prize.

He palliated, it is said, his perjury to his own eyes, certainly to those of others, by maintaining that the death of William's daughter, before he had espoused her, absolved him from his oath. In truth, he supposed that prince to be involved too deeply in home-fends, to have time for foreign conquest; and himself more dreaded the treasons of his brother, Tosti, who had engaged Harold Hardrada, king of Norway, to support his counter-claims to the throne, and who actually invaded England some weeks before the fatal field of Hastings.

But William of Normandy was not one so to be put off. He had taken so much pains to place himself in the position of the right, not that he cared so much to be, as to seem in the right. For he well knew what had an effect on the minds of men. So he affected moderation, summoned Harold to submit to the arbitration of Rome, and on his failure to appear, procured the pontiff's judgment in his own favor, and the excommunication of his rival. Then, with a great force of cavalry, clad in old Norse scale-armor, with conical steel caps, having nose-pieces only, in lieu of vizors, and a powerful archery—for the long-bow was at that time the Norman, as it afterwards became the Saxon, weapon—he landed in the Downs, and at the single fight at Hastings, won for his posterity and his people three great kingdoms.

It is said that, as he landed from his boat, he missed his footing and fell on the strand, some of his men crying out that it was an evil omen; but, recovering his feet on the instant, he showed his mailed hand full of the sea-sand, and exclaimed:

"I have taken seizin of the soil of England, which is my right, and by God's aid, with my sword, I will hold it!"

That night, the hosts encamped within sound of each other—each spent it after their own fashion. The Saxons, in revelry and brutal drunkenness—the Normans, in hearing mass, a light supper and refreshing sleep.

On the next morning, all was decided. The Saxons fought like men, even after their king was killed, or mortally wounded, by an arrow shot in the eye. If they had held to their entrenchments, they might have won the day; but they were tempted to sally by a feigned flight, and, having no horse, were ridden down, trampled under foot, and hopelessly defeated, by a single charge of barbed cavalry.

After that, they had no fortified towns—no castles; and forty thousand cavalry easily conquered a nation, numbering, even then, its hardy millions. The remainder of the conquest, which was not in fact completed for above a century, was but a series of dogged insurrections and bloody exactions, until the two races were amalgamated into one people, the two tongues into one language—the Saxon and the Norman-French into the English.

William the Conqueror would, it seems, have done his work moderately and mildly, had the rapacity of the victorious Normans and the doggedness of the vanquished Saxons permitted him to do so. Had it been so, instead of a united English people, the world over, we might have had, to this day, a crouching commonality of Saxon slavish helots, and a tyrannous nobility of Norman despots. Such seems to be the case, wherever countries are subdued and held subject, without amalgamation of the races. Such, however, was not the work of William the Norman, nor so did he perform it.

This is his portrait by one who was nearly his contemporary, and must have known those who had seen him.

"He was of just stature, extraordinary corpulence, fierce countenance; his forehead bare of hair; of such great strength of arm, that it was often matter of surprise that no one was able to draw his bow, which himself could bend when his horse was on full gallop. He was majestic, whether sitting or standing, although the protuberance of his belly deformed his royal person; so that he never was confined with any dangerous disorder, except at the last; so given to the pleasures of the chase, that, as I have before said, ejecting the inhabitants, he let a space of many miles go desolate, that, when at liberty from other vocations, he might there pursue his pleasures."

He was not, as it appears, even in the judgment of the Saxons, who could not of course love him as their conqueror, ruling them against their wills, perforce a naturally bad or unnecessarily cruel man. His greed of gold seems to have been his worst point. He created a wonderful kingdom, which his descendants govern to this day; and from him originated a wonderful people, which may one day rule the earth. He was a great man, but a far greater instrument of God; which may be said, also, of far worse men than he.

EVERY SITUATION HAS ITS IDEAL.

Let him learn a prudence of a higher strain. Let him learn that everything in nature, even moths and feathers, go by law, and not by luck, and that what he sows he reaps. By diligence and self-command, let him put the bread he eats at his own disposal, and not at that of others, that he may not stand in bitter and false relations to other men; for the best good of wealth is freedom. Let him practise the minor virtues. How much of human life is lost in waiting! Let him not make his fellow-creatures wait. How many words and promises are promises of conversation! Let his be words of fate. When he sees a folded and sealed scrap of paper float round the globe in a pine ship, and come safe to the eye for which it was written, amidst a swarming population, let him likewise feel the admonition to integrate his being across all those distracting forces, and keep a slender human word among the storms, distances and accidents that drive us hither and thither, and by persistency make the paltry force of one man re-appear to redeem its pledge, after months and years, in the most distant climates.—Emerson.

THE COLISEUM AT ROME.

The Coliseum is one of the grandest ruins in the world. It is one of those rare buildings whose reality surpasses any engraving. Everybody knows the form of it, but few can rightly estimate its magnificent proportions without seeing it. The seats rose in terraces four stories high; each story was about forty feet high. In fact, the height of the outer wall was one hundred and fifty-seven feet. The arena was two hundred and eighty-seven feet long by one hundred and eighty wide. Including the walls, the building measured six hundred and twenty feet by five hundred and thirteen, being as usual, elliptical. The material was the travertine stone, in large blocks, with which brick masonry is intermingled. The blocks of stone were not cemented together, but were kept in their places by iron pins between each two blocks. The walls have all been defaced by holes made to get out these iron pins or bolts. The work of destruction on this, as on all the other ruins, is arrested, and the present pope is doing all he can to preserve them.—Ladies' Repository.

Leaves are light, and useless, and idle, and wavering, and changeable; they even dance; yet God in his wisdom has made them part of the oak. In so doing he has given us a lesson not to deny the stout-heartedness within, because we see the lightness without.—Iliad.

ONE DOLLAR. WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years' experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 71,000 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

FLOATING AWAY.

BY SPILLER WILD.

Floating, floating away,
The moon is high overhead
But she hides her face in a cloud,
And the little stars burn far away,
And a weird-like brightness she

The wind comes over the sea
The sweet south wind from the bay,
And it fans the curls of her raven hair,
All tangled like midnight thought,
And her face is fair, with a shadow there,
Like the moon at the close of day.

The chiming of village bells
Is stealing, she thinks, to her ear;
And murmurous music swells
From her lips, as he whispers: "Hear, O hear
The chiming of evening bells!"

O, beautiful, silent land,
A soul is floating away;
O, send thy messengers hand in hand,
Sweet guides to the silent land!
The fairest guides will this soul convey
Away to the silent land.

The moon looks out from her veil,
She silvers the sleeper's brow;
She turns into shadows the midnight hair
That was never so still as now,
The signet of peace is there,
An angel has touched the lip;
For there rests a smile like the summer stream
The king-fisher loves to sip.

The room is filled with the night,
How beautiful is her sleep;
Her spirit away in the silent land,
And her marble for earth to keep,
To keep so safely till time is done,
O, who for the dead would weep?

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LAST DAYS OF HAYDN.

BY RALPH TRYON.

An old man had fallen back in his arm-chair, exhausted by the labor that his pen, which he still held in trembling hand, had just completed. It was the oratorio of the Four Seasons, the last great work which Haydn gave to the world. But who would recognize in this wreck of manhood, the mighty genius of bygone years!

"Joseph, I have done," he said, in a weak, thin voice.

"I am thankful for that, master," was the reply of his faithful servant.

"The Seasons are completed; spring, summer, autumn and winter. Joseph, spring can never return to me."

"O, say not so, sir; you are still hale and vigorous, although you have of late greatly overtasked yourself; but be guided by me, and lay aside your pen for a few days, and we shall soon have our beloved master moving about us in renewed strength."

"It is idle, my good Joseph, to talk thus. You remember my beloved friend and pupil, Mozart?"

"One of his country can never forget him."

"You know the fatal presentiment which lingered over his last work—even so in regard to mine. I do not think that I shall be called from these scenes immediately, but I know my end is drawing near."

"My master must not let these gloomy fancies possess him."

"Cimarosa and Mozart both have gone, and why should I remain, when I can be of no further use to the world? Joseph, formerly my ideas outstripped my pen, but now it lingers while I am obliged to seek them by a painful effort."

The old man placed his withered hands upon his wrinkled brow, and at that moment a vertigo seized him, and he would have fallen from his chair, had not his faithful servant caught him in his arms. After this, these attacks were more frequent, although he persisted in writing a few short quartettes, and arranging some ancient Scotch airs, in spite of the remonstrance of his friends.

But day after day his feebleness increased. His mind also became unsettled, and, though comparatively rich, he was continually oppressed with the fear that he should lack the necessities of life. Occasionally the visits of his friends would arouse him, and then the old spirit would shine forth with something of its former brilliancy. At one time, the papers of Paris actually announced his death, and his friends in the French capital caused a mass to be celebrated in his honor. The news reached Haydn in one of his lucid moments, and he affected to be greatly amused with the idea.

"If these French gentlemen," said he, chuckling with a show of his former humor, "did not act so hastily, they might have sent for me, and I would have conducted the mass with the greatest pleasure. But after all, I am not much gratified with their kind intentions."

During this period of his decay—it could hardly be defined illness—he had remained secluded at his snug retreat at Gumpendorf, but the public of Vienna, aware of the loss they were about to experience, made efforts to bring about a grand ceremonial concert, where they could bid adieu to this wonderful man.

The Austrian prince, Lobkowitz, took upon himself the management of this affair, and arranged to have the oratorio of The Creation performed at his palace; and for this purpose, engaged one hundred and sixty musicians, under the direction of Salieri, an old friend of Haydn's. The old man, notwithstanding his weakness, was delighted with this new mark of honor, and desirous of seeing once more the kind public which had so well appreciated his labors.

Under the excitement of this idea, he rallied immensely. His ride to the palace was more like a triumphal procession than a simple escort to a poor, decrepit, worn-out German musician. The apartment at an early hour was filled with invited guests to the number of fifteen hundred. A grand flourish of orchestral trumpets announced his arrival, and the princess Esterhazy and the then celebrated Madame de Kurbuck went to meet him. He was then brought into the presence of the prince in an easy chair and placed on a platform, which was richly decorated for the occasion.

Salieri, as the director, came to Haydn to receive his orders concerning the performance, but the old man was too affected to speak, and could only embrace his friend in silence. The latter with streaming eyes rushed back to his place, and amid a general emotion, the orchestra opened the concert.

The music of this oratorio is so well known to the reader that a review is unnecessary, but it may be easily imagined that a composition of so sublime a character, with all the accessories to ensure a perfect performance, in the presence of its author and an audience comprising nobility, beauty, and the most renowned professors and artists of the day, in connection with its sad purpose, should produce a most solemn and thrilling effect.

At the close of the first part of the oratorio, an incident occurred, which is worth more than a passing notice. The physician of the prince perceived that Haydn was apparently suffering with cold, and communicated this fact to his highness. Before the latter had time to give an order, the ladies of the court gathered around him, and the old man was literally enveloped in a dense mass of shawls of the most costly fabrics that that gay city could boast.

At the close of the concert, he bowed his thanks to his kind audience, and then turning to the orchestra, which numbered many of his old companions, with upraised hands he pronounced a solemn benediction on them all. Thus he took his sad but glorious leave of the public.

The excitement incident to his public appearance proved too much for him, and his few remaining powers were greatly shattered. Still he lingered until he entered the seventy-eighth year of his life. He frequently desired to be brought to his piano, but his tremulous fingers could only snatch a few chords before the vertigo seized him, and he was compelled to desist.

"Joseph," he said one morning, "they tell me that my pupil is becoming great. Where is he, and why does he not visit his old master and friend?"

"Of whom is my good master speaking?" asked the servant.

"Of Mozart, to be sure."

"Alas, sir, you forget that he died long since."

"Dead! Mozart dead! Why he was but a boy!"

"My master cannot have forgotten his splendid requiem and the occasion on which it was performed?"

"True, Joseph, I remember now I have directed that great work myself. Yes, Mozart is dead; Boselli, the only woman I ever loved, is dead; Cimarosa, too—all are gone—gone!" Then starting, with a look of anxiety, he said, "Joseph, have we any money in the house?"

"Certainly, sir, an abundance."

"You are sure of that?"

"Why, master, we are absolutely rich."

"Be prudent, my good fellow, for it would break my heart to be dependent upon charity."

The war between France and Austria had now commenced in earnest, and the French, in their rapid advance, had already reached Schonbrunn, scarcely a half league's distance from Haydn's retreat. The next morning, at a stone's throw from his house, they fired fifteen hundred cannon shot upon Vienna, the city which he so dearly loved. The old man's enthusiasm on this occasion could not be controlled. Madame de Kurbuck had used every entreaty to prevail upon him to remove to her house, which was situated in the city, but without effect, for he stoutly persisted in remaining where he was.

"Joseph," he asked, "is the city entirely given up to the sword?"

"By no means, master."

"Then Heaven be praised!"

At that moment a terrific explosion was heard. A house near by had been destroyed by a bomb. The servant fell on his knees and cried:

"The saints preserve us, master, or we are utterly lost!"

Haydn, with a majestic air, rose unaided from his chair, and, approaching the trembling Joseph, said:

"Foolish fellow, of what are you afraid?"

"Can it be that my master is unconscious of danger?" exclaimed the servant, startled still more to see the old man standing alone, when, for many weeks, he had been unable to leave his chair without assistance.

"Danger!" he exclaimed; "know you not that no danger can come where Haydn is?"

He then rushed to the piano and sung, three times as loud as the weak tones of his voice would permit, "God preserve the emperor!"

The effort was more than his weak frame could bear, and he fell to the floor in a stupor from which he never recovered. The servants bore him to his bed, but in a short time this great man was no more. He died on the 31st day of May, in the year 1810, aged seventy-eight years and two months, and was buried at Gumpendorf, as he had desired in life. Such were the last days of this celebrated man.

HON. CHARLES WENTWORTH UPHAM,

PRESIDENT OF THE MASSACHUSETTS SENATE.

The accompanying portrait of the President of our Senate was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry, from a fine photograph by Messrs. Whipple & Black, of this city. Charles W. Upham was born in Boston, May 4, 1802. He was fitted for college by Deacon Samuel Greele, then an eminent classical teacher in this city, and was graduated at Harvard University, in 1821. He then studied divinity for three years, and on December 8, 1824, was settled as pastor of the First Church in Salem. In this charge he remained for several years, but was finally compelled by ill health to resign his ministry in 1844. He subsequently edited the "Christian Register" for one year, his brief editorial career being marked by distinguished ability. Another year was spent by him as agent of the Board of Education, and during this term of service, he visited all parts of the State, and addressed the people in a hundred towns, producing a marked effect by his untiring exertions. At a later period, Mr. Upham was chosen mayor of Salem. In November, 1848, he was elected to the Massachusetts House of Representatives from Salem. He was chairman of the Committee on Education in that house, a position which his antecedents admirably qualified him to fill. In November, 1849, he was elected to the Senate from Essex County, and was chairman of the Joint Committee on Education. He introduced the important measure which resulted in organizing the Department of Education as a branch of the government by placing the secretary of the Board of Education in the State House as a chief officer of the Commonwealth. Mr. Upham represented the sixth district of Massachusetts in the 33d Congress of the United States. He particularly interested himself while a member of the national house in promoting the reciprocity treaty, in preserving the fishing bounties, and in securing justice to private claimants. In this brief sketch we have confined ourselves to a succinct record of the public career of Mr. Upham, without noticing his various and honorable literary efforts. The position he now holds shows the estimation in which he is held by his political friends. But it will be seen that he has accomplished enough in the course of his laborious career to merit the respect of men of all parties. His untiring services in the cause of education have won him an enviable name in the old Commonwealth, where he will always be remembered.

CRESCENT CITY, CALIFORNIA.

The pleasing landscape on this page was drawn for us by Mr. Hill, from an accurate sketch made on the spot by John R. McComb, Jr., Esq., of Crescent City, and kindly placed at our disposal. The city occupies the curving shore of a bay, whence it derives its name, and is in latitude  $41^{\circ} 44'$  north, and  $124^{\circ} 10'$  west longitude. It is on the northern coast of California, about twenty miles south of the Oregon boundary. The town is built on a sandy level beach, and is over half a mile long and directly facing the ocean. It contains a population of over 700 resident inhabitants, besides a large number of transient packers and traders, who make this their rendezvous, for obtaining their supplies of goods for the interior mining towns. From here may daily be seen large numbers of pack mules leaving with their loads for Sailor Diggins, Alt House, Orleans Bar, Happy Camp, Indian and Deer Creek, Jacksonville, and Yreku. The town is about three years old, and is situated in the heart of the mining districts, some of which are but a mile distant. It is admirably situated, and is the only safe harbor for vessels north of San Francisco and south of the Columbia, easy of access and dangerous only for a few months in winter. Propositions are now being made to build a break-water for a few hundred yards on the south, and when the work is finished, it will be commodious and safe at all weathers. The United States government have lately erected a fine lighthouse on an island in the bay. The town contains a large number of brick buildings, stores, etc., also a Presbyterian church, a masonic and odd fellows' hall, hotels, saloons, express and a newspaper office. The steamships Columbia and Goliah run to and from this port to Oregon and San Francisco, making five trips a month. Back of the town is a dense forest of spruce and fir trees, only passable by the trails, and here abound deer, elk, bear, and other noble game; while at a distance of four miles further back, is a large lake or lagoon, where the sportsman can at all times find ample amusement with water fowl, and of endless variety.

THE HAIR SNAKE.

This singular species of "animated nature," so readily explained by every country child, as the simple metamorphosis of a horse-hair that chanced to fall into water, is an unsolved enigma with naturalists. Science has not satisfactorily determined either the origin or the modes of existence of these animals. In reply to inquiries by a correspondent of the "Michigan Farmer," who found hair snakes in a pan of milk, Mr. Justus Gage, of that State, furnishes a very interesting account of his experiments and observations. He is satisfied of the fact that both the large and small crickets deposit these snakes in water, during the month of August; but whether the cricket resorts to the water to rid itself of a parasite or to deposit a natural product of its body, he is unable to determine. Mr. Gage says that one morning after he had been experimenting in his room, by throwing crickets into water to obtain snakes, and had succeeded in procuring two, of about four inches in length, he noticed a black cricket crawling up the side of his water-pail. "It jumped into the water, lay quiet for a moment, produced a snake nearly seven inches in length, and then nimbly made its escape over the edge of the pail." He also found a live hair snake, nearly seven inches in length, coiled up in the abdomen of a dead cricket that lay on its back under a flat stone. The hair snake, he says, will live a long time in moist earth, where he has found them of a grayish or white color, sometimes of great length, and much resembling the fibrous root of some vegetable. When seen through a magnifying glass, the hair snake presents an almost exact resemblance to the lamprey eel.—N. E. Farmer.

SPIDERS AND THE WEATHER.

Quatremere Disjonval, a Frenchman by birth, was adjutant-general in Holland, and took an active part on the side of the Dutch patriots, when they revolted against the stadtholder. On the arrival of the Prussian army under the Duke of Brunswick, he was immediately taken, tried, and having been condemned to twenty-five years' imprisonment, was incarcerated in a dungeon at Utrecht, where he remained eight years.

Spiders, which are the constant, and frequently the sole companions of the unhappy inmates of such places, were almost the only living objects which Disjonval saw in the prison of Utrecht. Partly to beguile the tedious monotony of his life, and partly from a taste which he had imbibed for natural history, he began to seek employment, and eventually found amusement in watching the habits and movements of his tiny fellow-prisoners. He soon remarked that certain actions of the spiders were intimately connected with approaching changes in the weather. A violent pain on one side of his head, to which he was subject at such times, had first drawn his attention to the connection between such changes and corresponding movements among the spiders. For instance, he remarked that those spiders which spun a large web in a wheel-like form, invariably withdrew from his cell when he had his bad headache; and that these two signs, namely, the pain in his head and the disappearance of the spiders, were as invariably followed by very severe weather. So often as his headache attacked him, so regularly did the spiders disappear, and then rain and northeast winds prevailed for several days. As the spiders began to show themselves again in their webs, and display their usual activity, so did his pains gradually leave him until he got well, and the fine weather returned.

Further observations confirmed him in believing these spiders to be in the highest degree sensitive of approaching changes in the atmosphere, and that their retirement and re-appearance, their weaving, and general habits were so intimately connected with changes in the weather, that he concluded they were of all things best fitted to give accurate intimation when severe weather might be expected. In short, Disjonval pursued these inquiries and observations with so much industry and intelligence, that by remarking the habits of his spiders, he was at length enabled to prognosticate the approach of severe weather, from ten to fourteen days before it set in, which is proved by the following interesting fact, which led to his release: When the troops of the French republic overran Holland in the winter of 1794, and kept pushing forward over the ice, a sudden and unexpected thaw in the early part of the month of December threatened the destruction of the whole army unless it was instantly withdrawn. The French generals were thinking seriously of accepting a sum offered by the Dutch, and withdrawing their troops, when Disjonval, who hoped that the success of the republican army might lead to his release, used every exertion and at length succeeded in getting a letter conveyed to the French general, in January, 1795, in which he pledged himself, from the peculiar actions of the spiders, of whose movements he was now enabled to judge with perfect accuracy, that within fourteen days there would commence a most severe frost, which would make the French masters of all the rivers, and afford them sufficient time to complete and make sure of the conquest they had commenced before it should be followed by a thaw.

The commander of the French forces believed his prognostication, and persevered. The cold weather, which Disjonval had announced, made its appearance in twelve days, and with such intensity that the ice over the rivers and canals became capable of bearing the heaviest artillery. On the 28th January, 1795, the French army entered Utrecht in triumph; and Quatremere Disjonval, who had watched the habits of his spiders with so much intelligence and success, was, as a reward for his ingenuity, released from prison.—Boston Portfolio.

A character endued with a large, viracious, active intellect, and a limited range of sympathies, generally remains immature. We can grow wise only through the experience which reaches us through our sympathies and becomes part of our life.—Mrs. Jameson.

CRESCENT CITY, CALIFORNIA.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

- B. P. H.—Daguerre was born in France, 1789—died, 1851. By consulting files of French papers for the latter year, at the Mercantile Library, or Boston Athenaeum, you would probably find an extended notice of him.
- T. D. K.—Your handwriting is very clear and legible, but a little more freedom is wanted. "Practice will perfect."
- W. W.—It costs £1000 to get one's name changed in England, and involves a special act of parliament. Here it costs nothing.
- FANNY.—We frankly acknowledge that a young lady polking with a young gentleman, is a slight out of the most refined character. But custom sanctions it among all classes of the community.
- U. L. S.—Hard putnam is made by melting slowly together one pound of prepared tallow and three ounces of white wax, perfuming it with any favorite essential oil.
- J. E. P., Quebec.—We know nothing of the concern you speak of.
- M. P.—There is a duty or tax paid in London on private carriages; the same principle is adopted in our cities upon hackney-coaches. It amounted to nearly £200,000 last year in the great English metropolis.
- J. J.—The term "hydra" is sometimes used in a metaphorical sense for any manifold number. The Hydra of mythology was a fabulous many-headed monster, which infested Lake Lerna, in the Peloponnesus, and was destroyed by Hercules.
- F. T. F.—The English Star Chamber Court was so called from the stellar ornaments of the ceiling of the room in which it once held its sittings.
- MEASURE.—In the centigrade thermometer, the space between the freezing and boiling points of water is divided into 100 parts.
- SATURDAY.—The soldiers of the ancient Tuscan militia were called Strellatores; they were very turbulent and troublesome. Their last revolt was in 1628, in consequence of which the Czar Peter endeavored the entire corps.
- TRAVELING.—It is not at all improbable that steam-carriages may be adapted for traveling on common roads. Several eminent mechanics have furnished plans for them. The full applicability of steam has not yet been developed.
- PERLINISH.—Hoo's ten-cylinder press will throw off 24,000 sheets an hour. We believe the cost of one of these machines is about $32,000.
- M. D.—There are well authenticated instances of somnambulists expressing themselves correctly in languages with which they were imperfectly acquainted. Somnambulism is one of those inexplicable phenomena which have puzzled the wisest heads.
- HISTORY.—The title of sans culottes was first given to the French Jacobins in derision, and afterwards adopted by them as an honorable appellation—not an unusual fate for political nicknames.
- MAGNET.—The taxes on salt in France were formerly very heavy. From 4000 to 5000 persons were annually sent to prison and the galleys for infractions of the salt laws—the severity of which was one of the moving causes of the revolution of 1792.
- G. W. W.—F. S. Frost is one of our most promising landscape painters. At the free exhibition of the "Art Club," in Bedford Street, you will find some fine productions of his pencil.
- TRAGEDY.—It is not many months since Miss Matilda Heron played in New York without attracting much attention. But she has made grand strides in her profession since.
- S. S.—It is believed that many of the insurgents in China, including their principal leaders, have been converted to Christianity.

RAIL ROADS.—The year 1856 has largely increased the value of stock in all the solvent railroad companies of the country. The time is near when most of them will pay large cash dividends; and when they do the stock will all fly up as bank stocks have from the same cause.

GOOD OLD TIMES.—Humboldt says that in the 13th century the habit of eating human flesh pervaded all classes of society. "These and a few other equally startling facts should be kept before those persons who are constantly prating about "good old times."

SPLINTERS.

- .... The story that the circumference of ladies' dresses in Paris was reduced was false; they are larger and costlier than ever.
- .... Mr. Benjamin Champney, the landscape painter, passed nearly all last winter in the White Mountains, sketching.
- .... The crime of "garotting" seems to be spreading with fearful rapidity. Armed resistance is the only way to meet it.
- .... There is French preaching by Rev. Mr. Lorianx, in the Old South Chapel every Sunday afternoon and evening.
- .... Good men, it has been well remarked, are human suns; they brighten and warm whenever they pass by.
- .... Miss Jane Stuart, daughter of the famous Gilbert Stuart, the portrait painter, has a studio in this city.
- .... The Empress Eugenie offered to settle a handsome sum annually on the poet Beranger. He kindly declined the offer.
- .... The united ages of a venerable couple lately married in New Bedford amounted to one hundred and thirty-eight years.
- .... Gov. King of New York lately said the prettiest sewing-machine in the world was a pretty girl's hand. Gallant governor!
- .... We believe the fierce war waged between the East Boston and Chelsea boys has been settled by treaty.
- .... A tall man has lately been exhibiting himself in Manchester, N. H. He is over six feet high and weighs but 88 pounds.
- .... Judy Williams, a colored slave woman, lately died in Pittsburg, Pa., at the age of one hundred and five years.
- .... Madame Cora de Wilhorst, the New York prima donna, has lately been suffering from an attack of brain fever.
- .... There are 150 "Ragged Schools" in the worst part of London, which provide 20,000 boys with some education.
- .... Dr. Ure, the famous chemist, author of the "Dictionary of Arts, Science and Mining," died lately in London, aged 89.
- .... A boy was fined lately here for stealing an umbrella. Hitherto umbrellas have belonged to nobility in particular.
- .... Magee and Cater, the Charleston State Prison murderers, will be tried before the Supreme Court, this month.
- .... Mr. Gerry, the landscape painter, now settled in Boston, has lately finished some very beautiful pictures.
- .... Mademoiselle Gabrielle de la Motte, the distinguished young pianiste, has now more than sixty pupils.
- .... The "Star," a successful penny paper in London, frequently sells forty thousand copies a day.
- .... M. de Stoeckl, long Russian Chargé d' Affaires at Washington, D. C., has been made a full minister.
- .... There are 107 sawmills on the Wisconsin River above the Falls, manufacturing 107,000,000 feet of lumber annually.

THIN-SKINNED PEOPLE.

We constantly encounter in our daily walks men who are afflicted with such a morbid sensitiveness that the slightest breath of undeserved censure or of slander deprives them, for the time being, of all peace of mind. A newspaper squib affects one of these poor fellows as much as a blow from a bludgeon would a robust nature. Place one of them in a gossiping village, and purgatory would be preferable to his position. Sometimes one of these unfortunate struggles into political life, and then his career is one long martyrdom; for the man who, in this country, essays a public life, must have the triple brass of the poet on his breast, and be cased in the hide of a rhinoceros from head to foot. To measure the excess of abuse which every public man encounters the moment he rises into eminence, we have only to run over a file of partisan prints from the date of the adoption of our constitution, and see what they have said of our leading political characters. If ex parte statements were taken as historical proof, then we have been governed and led by the greatest act of unkind reproaches that ever preyed upon society. Every president of the United States, according to his opponents, has been guided by one fixed purpose—that of ruining the country. More than that: it has been asserted that the country has been ruined time and again. Considering these awful and repeated catastrophes, it must be confessed that we bear up against it wonderfully well.

But seriously, how many noble men have suffered themselves to be stung to death by insects! The more they write and flatter under the penitence of their assailants, the more venomous are the attacks. There was poor Keats, "done to death" by a venomous article. Many a gentle spirit has gone to a nameless grave simply for want of a little fortitude. This extreme sensibility is like many of the foibles of human nature, an exaggerated virtue. It is the burlesque of a decent respect for public opinion. Burke's advice should be written on every man's heart—"Live down slander." The true man will come out brighter and purer for the assaults to which he is subjected by the envious and unprincipled. History is full of glowing tributes to the memory of self-reliant men who have bravely followed out their convictions in spite of the storm that howled around their path, raised by contemporary enemies. Even Washington had his traducers; but where are they now! who remembers a word uttered in defamation of his pure and brilliant character! The voice of posterity reverses every unjust verdict; but, in most cases, contemporaneous applause follows contemporaneous detraction. "Truth is great and will prevail." Purity of conduct and greatness of purpose always win their way to ultimate triumph. A fair fame is imperishable; like a thing of beauty, "it is a joy forever." But to shrink and cower before attack is to confess its justice, and to invite its repetition. Such weakness is pitiable and deplorable.

A PERTINENT QUESTION.

A correspondent of the Boston Post asks: "Would you rather see your child at the age of twenty-one with the learning of a Mezzofanti, or the accomplishments of a Sevigé, and a broken-down constitution, or with the stalwart form and sound system of a Daniel Boone, and unable to tell one letter from another?" We fancy no parent would hesitate to go in for Boone and the constitution, against Mezzofanti and miraculous acquirements. Yet in practice the hot-bed, forcing system of education is almost universally adopted. "Acquire learning—healthily if you can, but at all events acquire learning," seems to be the motto adopted. Now health and ignorance do not of necessity go together; physical and mental training are compatible. Look at the Germans; there is not a longer-lived set of men on earth than their literary celebrities, in spite of the enormous mental tasks they accomplish. But in Germany, gymnastics are as much a part of education as Greek and Latin, and a foundation is laid in early life for a healthy old age of study.

AS HONEST PENNY.—Some of the sharp little boys who have to provide for themselves in New York, get planks by which they bridge slushy street-crossings, asking a penny toll from each passenger. If the tribute is refused, they simply turn the plank edge-wise, and the lady or gentleman has the gratification of wading through the mud, which is one of the "institutions" of our sister city.

A GRAVE JOKE.—Somebody was describing to young Dumas, lately, the death of a distinguished man, in the following terms: "He seated himself, he turned his head, removed his spectacles, and—was gone!" "Ah!" said the young scape-grace, "he took off his spectacles first. Then he was at least spared the pains of seeing himself die."

GENEROUS.—Mr. John H. Eastburn, of this city, has become the owner of a bed in the Massachusetts General Hospital, which he intends to keep for the use of any member of the Franklin Typographical Society, or any other printer who is sick and needs the cure afforded in that institution.

THE WAVERLY NOVELS.—Carlyle said, that for the purposes of harmless amusement, these creations of genius were the "perfection of literature." Ticknor & Fields are publishing a splendid yet cheap illustrated "household edition" of them.

MRS. FANNY KEMBLE.—This distinguished lady has lately been paying our city a visit. She has lost none of her matchless power as a Shaksperian reader, and none of her attractiveness.

CLERGYMEN AND SCHOOL TEACHERS.—Ballou's Pictorial is sent to clergymen and school teachers for $2 a year.

FAVORITE HOBBIES.

There are very few men and women who do not have some favorite hobby, which they are ready to trot out and mount on every occasion. One man's speciality is horses; another's is dress. One lady's penchant is for old china; another's for autographs; a very troublesome whim. Antiquarian hobbies are often sufficiently amusing. Book collectors furnish a good deal of mirth to the million. Some of these respectable gentlemen will give a sum that would furnish the shelves of a library with standard authors, for a single specimen of a rare old copy of some worthless book, valuable only because noted for some famous typographical error. We were reading the other day a laughable story of a man whose pet mania was the collection of rare shells. He had purchased, at a fabulous price, a rare specimen, and invited all his fellow maniacs to come and look at it. He had it enshrined in a glass case with a costly frame, and it was the envy of all his friends and the pride of his own heart. To be sure, it was a little, ugly, discolored affair, but then it was a rarity. He was offered enormous prices for his treasure; but to no purpose, he positively refused to part with it. The day after his grand exhibition, he was taking a walk, when at the window of an old curiosity shop, where all sorts of lumber were exposed for sale, he saw an object which filled his soul with dismay and rage. It was nothing but a basket heaped up with shells exactly like that which he had so dearly bought. He went in and inquired the price. The dealer told him that he sold the shells for a cent a piece, but that if he took the lot he might have them for half a dollar. Were there any more to be had? No—the dealer had never seen any. A bargain was soon struck. "Shall I send them home, sir?" An indignant no! The purchaser took the basket from the window, laid it on the floor of the shop, and then jumping on the shells with monomaniacal fury ground them into powder. "Now," said he, as he walked home, with the proud heart of a Roman conqueror, "I am a happy man again. How fortunate I happened to see them. I am now the possessor of a unique treasure worth a million of dollars!"

Verily, the poet was right when he described man as "pleased with a rattle—tickled with a straw." It is absurd to suppose that we forsake toys when we graduate from the nursery. Our favorite hobbies are the most trilling toys:—An old ribbon that has been worn by some decapitated queen—a worthless weed, valued for its rarity—an old book or an old skull—an insect—a dash of a painting with an old master's initials forged in the corner. The world is a toyshop. Two-thirds of the population are engaged in making and selling knick-knacks, and the other third in buying them. "It's a queer world, my masters!"

FINE ARTS.—We are confident that we shall see painting and sculpture attain in this country an eminence greater than that ever reached in Europe. What we have seen already is an ample guarantee for the future.

EQUIVOCAL COMPLIMENT.—A wife wrote to her husband absent in California, that the longer he stayed away, the better she liked him. Distance often "leads enchantment to the view."

BINDING.—All styles of binding done at this office, at the lowest rates, and in the best manner.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Mr. Streeter, Mr. Francis Smith to Miss Mary Lewis; by Rev. Mr. Skinner, Mr. Carlton F. Ribout to Miss Nancy Manning; by Rev. Mr. Steele, Mr. Leonard P. Mayo to Miss Martha J. Case; by Rev. Mr. Miner, Mr. Henry J. Newman to Miss Katie E. Lawler; by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. David Albion to Miss Elizabeth Leitch; by Rev. Mr. Stowe, Mr. Henry Mansfield to Miss Margaret Lee—At Roxbury, by Rev. Mr. Ryder, Mr. Michael Kevie to Miss Ellen Cunningham—At East Cambridge, by Rev. Mr. Eaton, Mr. Caleb B. Bradbury to Miss Eliza Fielder—At North Reading, by Rev. Mr. Tolman, Mr. Otis Buck, of Wilmington, to Miss Caroline B. Howard—At West Boxford, by Rev. Mr. Park, Mr. Charles Pearl to Miss Charlotte A. Tyler—At West Newbury, by Rev. Mr. Edgell, Mr. Moses H. Poor to Miss Susan C. Thurston—At East Bridgewater, by Rev. Mr. Wilcox, Mr. Shepard Whitier to Miss Betsey A. Greely—At Plymouth, by Rev. Mr. Johnson, Mr. Alvan H. Norton to Miss Katie Holmes—At Leominster, by Rev. Mr. Smith, Mr. Francis H. Colburn to Mrs. Frances A. Smith—At West Boylston, by Rev. Mr. Cross, Mr. Charles A. Kidder, of Sterling, to Mrs. Martha A. Thomas—At South Gardner, by Rev. Mr. Stowell, Mr. Lorenzo Cheney to Miss Sarah Greenwood—At Uxbridge, by Rev. Mr. Clark, Mr. Robert D. Lee, of Milford, Conn., to Miss Mary E. Cough.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mrs. Rebecca Austin, 60; Mr. Jacob F. Stodder, 55; Mrs. Sarah Elizabeth Johnson, 25; Mrs. Mary French, 75; Mrs. Maria Victoria Clark, 23; Mrs. Nancy Bell, 55; Mrs. Harriet E. Sperry, 29; Mr. Joshua Sears, 65; At South Boston, Mrs. Maria W. Henderson, 17; At Somerville, Mrs. Mary Ann Keith, 60; At Dorchester, Mr. Isaac Bird, 68; At Cambridge, Miss Abigail R. Sargent, 36; At Brookline, Samuel Jackson Prescott, Esq., 84; At West Medford, Mr. James R. Turner, 49; At Brighton, Mrs. Nancy E. Smith, 84; At Lynn, Mr. Benjamin Richardson, 78; At Salem, Mr. Zeph. Poor, 81; At Beverly, Mrs. Harriet A. Jones, 43; At Woburn, Mrs. Abigail W. Brown, 75; At Newburyport, Mrs. Polly Prescott, 78; At Braintree, Mr. Nathan Thissell, 60; At Plymouth, Capt. John Russell, 70; At Worcester, Mr. Adolphus Tall, 72; At Oxford, Miss Laura Eddy, 40; At Townsend, Mr. Warren Brooks, 24; a graduate of Harvard College, July, 1856; At Nantucket, Mr. Samuel Dow, 89; At Providence, R. I., Mrs. Lydia Wright, widow of the late Mr. Ebenezer Wright, 98; At New, Mr. John S. Stepley, formerly of Fitchburg, Mass., about 70; At Washington, D. C., Dr. Joseph D. Weston, of Dalton, Mass., 47; At Fort Wayne, Allen county, Ind., Mr. Cornelius O'Brien, 41; At Mobile, Ala., Capt. S. C. Burall, a native of Boston, 68; At London, Capt. David Allen, of ship Forest City, of Portland.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

|                        |       |        |
|------------------------|-------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year | ..... | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers " "      | ..... | 10 00  |
| 10 " " " "             | ..... | 20 00  |

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirtieth copy gratis.

* One copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL and one copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, when taken together by one person, one year, for $5.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

OWED TO WINTER.

BY JOAN G. SAGE.

Go—get thee gone, Old Winter! I make bold
(While others praise thee) to declare the truth:
Thou art a tyrant, without Christian ruth;
Capricious, crusty, and "cornfounded cold!"

Thou art a blustering, blistering, bullying wight:
A burglar entering every cottage door,
Borne by the rich and hated by the poor—
A very rascal in a cloak of white!

Thou fill'st the farmer with foreboding fears;
Thou bitest sharply at the school-boy's toes;
Thou reddens't e'en the daintiest lady's nose,
And pinches't rudely every body's ears!

Thou makest rime without the slightest reason:
Unless it be to raise the price of coal;
And, bluster as thou wilt, upon my soul,
Thou art a most unseasonable season!

HUSI OF NATURE.

All heaven and earth are still—though not in sleep:
But breathless as we grow when feeling most,
And silent as we stand in thoughts too deep.

All heaven and earth are still—from the high host
Of stars, to the lulled lake and mountain coast:
All is concentrated in a life intense,
Where not a beam, nor air, nor leaf is lost,
But hush! a part of being, and a sense
Of that which is of all creator and defence.—BYRON.

WINTER.

Whist! we do speak, our fire
Doth into ice expire;
Flames turn to frost—and ere we can Know how our cheek turns pale and wan,
Or how a silver snow
Springs there where jet did glow,
Our fading spring is in dull winter lost.—MATNE.

TRUTH.

Truth needs no color, with his color fixed;
Beauty no pencil. Beauty's Truth to lay;
But best is best, if never intermixed.—SHAKESPEARE.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

When the warm weather comes (if ever, alas!) we hope some of our musical and literary friends will try what inspiration there is in composing in the open air. Mozart wrote much in this way. The greater part of "Don Giovanni" was composed in the bowling green of his dear friend, Dussak, at Prague, and "The Requiem" at Frattner's garden at Vienna. . . . The mayor of an English city lately issued a proclamation headed "Victoria rex" (Victoria, king). So it seems the race of Dogberys is not utterly extinct. . . . Everybody, we suppose, to tell the truth, likes flattery; but it must not be laid on with a trowel. Tackling is more agreeable than plastering. A loyal courtier of James I. once expressed a wish that his majesty might reign as long as the sun, moon and stars endured. "Then," said the king, "if I do reign so long, my son must govern by candlelight." . . . What a fund of wit Curran had! He was dining once with a certain judge, who, for the severity of his sentences, was known as the "hanging judge," and who never shed a tear but once, and that was at the "Beggars' Opera," when Macbeth was reprieved. Well, the judge asked Curran if the dish next to him was hung beef, because, if it was, he would try it. Curran instantly replied, "If you try it, my lord, it is sure to be hung." . . . People should be very cautious how they give money to street-beggars; they may be encouraging very dishonest persons. The other day, a widow woman, who begged from house to house in Brooklyn, Long Island, dropped a bank-book, which showed $500 to her credit—and a mendicant in London was lately searched at a station-house, and found to have $400 on his person. . . . The passion for music—the true musical fièvre—sometimes becomes uncontrollable. Thalberg related the other day a story of Brenda, a famous German composer. His wife had just expired in his arms, and Brenda was in an agony of grief. He rushed to the piano, and drew from it a series of most mournful modulations; but soon interested, in spite of himself, in the succession of chords he played, and carried away by his imagination into the realms of fancy, he forgot so completely the subject of his inspiration, that a servant having come to ask him if he would send the customary funeral invitations, Brenda answered, "Ask my wife about it," without leaving his piano. . . . Types commit strange mistakes sometimes. A passage in a letter describing the famous charge of Captain May, he "behaved like a hero," read in print "like a hare," an animal not very famous for its intrepidity. . . . The story of the "man who drew an elephant in a raffle" was founded on the following fact. An Indian prince presented a poor man with an elephant; and as the custom of the country forbade him to part with the gift, he was ruined in providing the means for keeping it. Improper or unreasonable generosity inflicts the greatest injury upon the receiver. . . . We heard a sharp old lady, the other day, criticising the rambling sermons of her minister. "If," said she, "his text had the small pox, his sermons would never catch it—never!" . . . It is said, but falsely, that any man who has cunning can become as rich and honored as he pleases. Then all the people who would have kicked him if he had spoken to them in a humble station, will be glad to come to his balls, eat his ice, drink his champagne, and laugh at his jokes. Is not this a libel on "poor human nature"? . . . The French have certainly done a great deal for Algiers. Formerly, culprits there had their heads cut off with a sabre; now they are decapitated by the guillotine. How happy the Algerines must be to live under a civilized government! . . . Nineteen times out of twenty duels end without bloodshed, because the seconds, we suppose, charitably load the pistols with powder only. We hope no man of honor will take umbrage at this charge, which cannot be deemed serious where there is nothing but powder. . . . We strayed into a pleasant green-house the other day, and tasted the joys of summer by anticipation in its warm atmosphere. What wonders there are in the world of flowers! Take the sensitive plant, for instance, which shrinks from the hand of man; the ice-plant, which almost cools one by looking at it; the pitcher-plant, with its welcome draught; and the carnivorous "Venus's fly-trap." Only think of a plant being carnivorous! It is said this plant baits its prickles with something which attracts the flies, upon which it then closes, and whose decay is supposed to afford food for the plant. . . . Literary men sometimes do and say queer things. Morland, the author of the "Capricious Woman," was in a box at the theatre during the first representation of that comedy. The pit loudly expressed disapproval at the improbability of the heroine's character. The author put his head out of his box, and called out, "I assure you, gentlemen, this is a perfect picture of my mother-in-law. What do you say now?" . . . Dean

Swift said:—"Men of great parts are unfortunate in business, because they go out of the common road by the quickness of their imaginations. This I once said to Lord Bollingbroke, and desired he would observe that the clerks in the office used a sort of ivory knife, with a blunt edge, to divide a sheet of paper, which never failed to cut it even, requiring only a strong hand; whereas, if they should make use of a sharp penknife, the sharpness would make it go often out of the crease, and disfigure the paper." . . . We have always stood up for the healthfulness of hearty mirth. There is no lack of authority to support the position. Lord Bacon said:—"A person who sees a good farce, or comedy, or pantomime, and does not laugh at the same, must be a solemn ass." Such persons had better abstain from Warren and the Ravens. . . . At the president's levee at Washington, the other day, an officer of the army was hunting venison for his chapman. "You might have expected to lose it," said Ben: Perley Poore, "because a bat when it's cocked is sure to go off." . . . Isn't smoking on the increase among us? We think it is. But married ladies should not repine at their lords' addiction to the cigar. Men who smoke seldom get in a passion; it causes the most irritable to "draw it mild," and renders them as smooth as a flat-iron does a mudlin kerchief. . . . Birds sing less in August than in other months. Ladies chatter less in February. The former of these curious facts in natural history has some mystery about it; but the why and wherefore of the latter may be found in the fact that February is the shortest month in the year. . . . In old times, ladies were not such mermaids as they are now. In 1633, the Duchess de Chevreux, who was then for the first time in England, won the title of the "Female Leander," by swimming the Thames, near Windsor, in a frolic. . . . Sugar is pretty well up now. We are afraid it will become as dear as it was in the days of Henry IV, of France, when it was sold by the ounce, by apothecaries, nearly as Peruvian bark is now sold. . . . Paying a note that you merely endorsed through kindness and good nature is said to be concentrated misery. . . . Gambling, we see from one of Plancius's letters in the Boston Post, is fearfully rife in Paris. We look on every man as a suicide from the moment he takes the dice-box desperately in his hand; and all that follows in his fatal career is merely sharpening the dagger before he strikes it to his heart. . . . Some wag insists upon it that life is a railroad, with the doctor at one end, who forwards expresses to his brother Death at the other. . . . Notwithstanding the variety of perfumes in the market, Eau de Cologne holds its own as a favorite for the toilet. And this reminds us of an amusing anecdote. When the French army entered Germany, two conscripts, fresh from the plough, stopped on the bridge of boats at Cologne, and gazed intently on the Rhine as it swept majestically by. "O, that's it, then!" exclaimed one of the greenies. "Yes, Farina's famous Cologne water." They must have thought the article rather plenty. . . . This is certainly the golden age of authorship. Long before he reached his thirtieth year, Dickens's pen was bringing him in $35,000 a year. . . . Probably there are no two words that more distinctly point out cause and effect, than these—gin and bitters. . . . None are so fond of secrets as those who do not intend to keep them; such persons covet secrets as a spendthrift covets money—for the purpose of circulation. . . . How much truth there is in this saying—Experience is the most eloquent of preachers, but she has never a large congregation. . . . "I shall die happy," said the expiring husband to the wife, who was weeping most dutifully by the bedside, "if you will promise not to marry that object of my unceasing jealousy, your cousin John." "Make yourself quite easy, my love," said the expectant widow, "I am engaged to his brother Bill." . . . Cotton says, "Hurry and Cuning are the two apprentices of Despatch and Skill; but they neither of them ever learn their masters' trade." . . . Swift called dancing "voluntary madness." The Chinese seem to think it useless fatigue. At a ball on board one of our frigates, a Chinese said softly and pitiably to the commodore, "Why don't you let your servants do this for you?" . . . A Yankee, who had just lost his wife, was found by a neighbor emptying a bowl of soup as large as a hand-basin. "Why, my goodness, Elathian!" said the gossip. "Is that all you care for your wife?" "Wai," said the Yankee, "I've been cryin' all the mornin'; and arter I've finished my soup, I'll cry another spell. I reckon that's fair—any how." . . . They have been transplanting ornamental trees in Philadelphia, lately, from thirty to forty feet in height, having balls of frozen earth about the roots weighing from five to six tons each. With care, such trees may be set out without their feeling the removal; but, of course, the process is an expensive one. . . . We wonder mules are not more extensively used at the North by farmers. Mules are longer lived and much harder than a horse. A farmer residing near Ballinglass, Ireland, has one in his possession which has been used for purposes of transportation since 1798, and which is about seventy years old. Col. Middleton, of South Carolina, had one which attained the age of eighty. . . . Queen Victoria has received from Mr. John Ticknor, of Mobile, Alabama, a present of a pair of horned owls. . . . The Welly's Place, in Hartford, famous for comprising the old Charter Oak, is up for sale. . . . The public spirited citizens of Salem are moving in the matter of having a new music hall erected there. . . . Long Wharf, Boston, in 1810, was the only place of embarkation for passengers to go on shipboard. . . . The Secretary of War recommends Congress to supply all the militia with the rifle musket. . . . At Honolulu, they have free "dance houses," or "hulahulas," for the benefit of mariners and citizens. . . . A school of design, under the direction of Miss Imogene Robinson, has been established in Worcester, Mass. . . . It is stated that a bank of fine porcelain clay has been discovered on the estate of Mr. Throckmorton, of Virginia. If this be the case, the owner will realize a fortune. . . . The recipe for resuscitating an Englishman is to hold a beefsteak under his nose. A Spaniard, or a Frenchman, may be revived by garlic. . . . An advertisement, the other day, called for "a female who has a knowledge of fitting boots of a good moral character." . . . In Siam, the penalty for telling a falsehood is to have the mouth sewed up. Every community has gossips who richly deserve this punishment. . . . The Olive Branch says: "Preaching without notes, it has recently been discovered, is more common than it was supposed to be—that is, preaching without bank-notes." We suppose such preachers would like to have a cheque put to their proceedings. . . . No glasses are so bad for the eyesight as glasses of brandy. . . . Do the net profits of Mrs. Barrow's benefit at the Boston Theatre constitute a Barrow-net? . . . If Gen. Walker triumphs over the "concatenation of circumstances that surround him," we shall believe that he is indeed a man of destiny. . . . J. Howard Payne, the author of "Home, Sweet Home," never had a home of his own, and died and was buried in a foreign land. This idea is embodied in the correspondence of the Watchman and Reflector.

MAHOMET'S BIBLE.

The Koran was written about A. D., 610. Its general aim was to unite the professors of idolatry and the Jews and Christians in the worship of one God—whose unity was the chief point inculcated under certain laws and ceremonies, exacting obedience to Mahomet the prophet. It was written in the Korish Arabic, and this language, which certainly possessed very fine quality, was said to be that of paradise. Mahomet asserted that the Koran was revealed to him, during a period of twenty-three years, by the angel Gabriel. The style of the volume is beautiful, fluent and concise, and where the majesty and attributes of God are described, it is sublime and magnificent. Mahomet admitted the divine mission both of Moses and Jesus Christ. According to Gibbon, the leading article of faith which Mahomet preached is compounded of an eternal truth and a necessary fiction, namely, that there is only one God, and that Mahomet is the apostle of God. The Koran was translated into Latin in 1143, and into English and other European languages about 1763. It is a rhapsody of 3000 verses divided into 114 sections.—New York Sunday Dispatch.

Choice Miscellany.

GAIT AN INDICATION OF CHARACTER.

Observing people move slow—their heads move alternately from side to side, while they occasionally stop and turn round. Careful persons lift their feet high, and place them down flat and firm. Sometimes they stoop down, pick up some little obstruction, and place it quietly by the side of the way. Calculating persons generally walk with their hands in their pockets, and their heads slightly inclined. Modest persons generally step softly for fear of being observed. Timid persons often step off from the sidewalk on meeting another, and always go round a stone instead of stepping over it. Wide awake persons "toe out," and have a long swing with their arms, while their hands shake about miscellaneously. Careless persons are forever stubbing their toes. Lazy persons scruple about loosely with their heels, and are first on one side of the walk and then on the other. Very strong-minded persons have their toes directly in front of them, and have a kind of stamp movement. Unstable persons walk fast and slow by turns. Venturous persons try all roads, frequently climb fences, instead of going through the gate, and never let down a bar. One-idea persons are very selfish, and "toe in." Cross persons are apt to hit their knees together. Good-natured persons snap their thumb and finger every few steps. Fun-loving persons have a kind of jig movement. Absent-minded persons often take the wrong road, and sometimes find themselves up to their knees in a mud puddle, although the sidewalks are excellent. Dignified men move slow and erect. Fast persons cut across the corner, kick every dog they meet, knock down little children, run against the ladies, and hit every twelfth man's ribs with their elbows. Very neat men occasionally stop to wipe the dust from their boots—their hands hang by their sides. Very polite persons are sometimes seen bowing in their course to black servant girls and black stumps.—Wisconsin Farmer.

INTERESTING FACTS CONCERNING PHOSPHORUS.

It is now just two hundred years since phosphorus was first obtained by Brand, of Hamburg. So wonderful was the discovery then considered, that Kraft, an eminent philosopher of the day, gave Brand three hundred dollars for the secret of its preparation. Kraft then travelled, and visited nearly all the courts of Europe, exhibiting phosphorus to kings and nobles. In appearance, phosphorus resembles bees'-wax; but it is more transparent, approaching to the color of amber. Its name, which is derived from the Greek, signifies "light-bearer," and is indicative of its most distinguishing quality, being self-luminous. Phosphorus, when exposed to the air, shines like a star, giving out a beautiful lambent, greenish light. Phosphorus dissolves in warm sweet oil. If this phosphorized oil be rubbed over the face in the dark, the features assume a ghastly appearance, and the experimentalist looks like a veritable living Will-o'-the-Wisp. The origin of phosphorus is the most singular fact concerning it. Every other substance with which we are acquainted, can be traced to either earth or air; but phosphorus seems to be of animal origin. Of all animals, man contains the most; and of the various parts of the body, the brain yields, by analysis, more phosphorus than any other. This fact is of no little moment. Every thought has, perhaps, a phosphoric source. It is certain that the most intellectual beings contain the most phosphorus. It generally happens that when a singular discovery is made, many years elapse before any application of it is made to the welfare and happiness of man. This remark applies to phosphorus.—Johnson's Chemistry.

THE WATERS OF THE NILE.

The Nile water is particularly soft. It fills the mouth with a rich creamy taste; and in drinking it, in order to enjoy it, it is well to spread it over every part of the palate. It should be drank, not to quench thirst, but to create high pleasure. It should not, therefore, be swallowed in large draughts at a time, but taken at short intervals, every other hour or so. In the house the water-jar—the admirable Egyptian water-jar, which is so much more porous than the Judian jar—should be at hand by day and by night continually. The passion for Nile water, like the love of everything that is intensely exquisite in its taste, increases with its enjoyment. No one who has once or twice tasted Nile water, and has a capacity for pleasure, will ever after consent to drink of it poisoned with the infusion of any other liquid. Jealous of its own honor, it appears to be the most averse of all waters to join in harmony with wine. Indeed, mixed with wine, it is a most nauseous compound. In the hotels, the water undergoes filtration. In the cottages through the country, it is kept in large vessels, which allow the sediment to fall to the bottom. The small clay jars, in which it is placed before you in the hotels, are very graceful in form, and finely adapted to keep the liquid cool.—Bruce's Scenes and Sights in the East.

ESQUIMAUX WEeping MATCHES.

They weep according to system. When one begins, all are expected to join; and it is the office of courtesy for the most distinguished of the company to wipe the eyes of the chief mourner. They often assemble by concert for a general weeping match; but it happens sometimes that one will break out into tears, and others courteously follow, without knowing at first what is the particular subject of grief. It is not, however, the dead alone who are sorrowed for by such a ceremony. Any other calamity may call for it as well; the failure of a hunt, the snapping of a walrus line, or the death of a dog. Mrs. Eider-Duck, nee Small Belly (Egmk), once looked up at me from her kolupsut, and burst into a gentle gush of wo. I was not informed of her immediate topic of thought, but with remarkable presence of mind, I took out my handkerchief—made by Morton out of the body of an unused shirt—and, after wiping her eyes politely, wept a few tears myself. This little passage was soon over; Mrs. Eider-Duck returned to her kolupsut, and Nalegak to his note-book.—Dr. Kane.

PARISIAN FLOWER MARKET.

Few persons have any idea of the vast number of flowers which are daily exposed for sale in the markets of Paris. Almost the whole of the florists in or near the city are engaged in this branch of the trade. The principal market is held under a double avenue of trees, on the Quai aux Fleurs; and here are assembled in the open air, both in summer and winter, more than four hundred florists, who find a ready sale for their produce at about the average price of eight sous. The extent of this trade may seem strange to those unaccustomed to the manners of the French. It is the custom with all classes to make presents to their friends on their birthday, or the fête of their patron saint; and among other things, plants and flowers are always given. This necessarily causes a large demand.—Galignani.

Editorial Melange.

The potato, in its native wild of tropical America, is a rank, running vine, with scarcely the appearance of a tuber on its roots. — To ascertain the length of the day and night any time of the year, double the time of the sun's rising, which gives the length of the night, and double the time of its setting, which gives the length of the day. — The Montreal Gazette says that a young bride and bridegroom were riding in that neighborhood, when the lady was found to have become speechless from the effect of the frost on her brain, and she died soon after reaching home. The sad event is attributed to the scanty style of bonnet she wore. — Smoking is recommended to young gentlemen who wish to look sallow and unhealthy. — In the town records of Boston, England, under the date of 1578, the following resolution is found: "That a dictionary shall be bought for the schoolers of the free school; and the same book to be tied in a cheyne, and set upon a deske in the scoole, whereupon any scoller may have access, as occasion shall serve." — But very few shad have been caught at Savannah this season, and an experienced fisherman attributes the scarcity last year and this to the quantity of coal tar which flows into the river from the gas works. — Gobelins, the place where the most beautiful tapestry in Europe is produced, derived its name from Gilles Gobelin, who, in the reign of Francis I., discovered the fine scarlet dye which is known as the Gobelins' scarlet. In the same district in which Gilles Gobelin lived, Louis XVI., in the year 1667, founded the establishment which bears his name. — Every liquor shop in Monroe, Georgia, has been closed. The citizens raised one thousand dollars, bought them out and shut up their doors. — A very black little rascal stepped into a stable at Tonawanda, lately, stole a horse and cutter, and "put." He went to Williamsville and got a meal of victuals, and tried to pay for it with a whip. This was refused. He then stepped into the stable where the first stolen horse was, saw another horse there, swapped his horse for horse No. 2, harnessed him up and "put" back for Tonawanda, and from there disappeared. — The greatest length of Lake Superior is 335 miles; the greatest breadth is 160 miles; mean depth, 988 feet; elevation, 687 feet; area, 23,000 square miles. — Dr. Kane, on his Arctic expedition, outward bound, used the following daily prayer: "Lord, accept our gratitude, and bless our undertaking." After all hope of further explorations ceased, and the only effort was to get his party back home, the prayer was changed, and read thus: "Lord, accept our gratitude, and restore us to our homes." — The first marriage of a Hindoo widow that ever occurred in Calcutta, took place on the 7th of December last. The parties in this transaction are of the highest respectability, and this will prove a marked event in the history of Hindostan. — Bishop Reynolds, an arduous minister of the gospel in the Methodist Episcopal Church in Canada, and highly respected by all who knew him, died from disease of the heart, at Hamilton, Canada West, on the 17th of January, aged 71 years. — Bayard Taylor, in one of his recent letters, mentions a contrivance which he noticed at Hamburg for warming railroad cars: "Long, flat boxes of tin or zinc, covered with carpeting and filled with hot sand, are placed upon the floor between the seats, so that the passengers on both sides can make use of them. These boxes were mildly warm when we started, and not quite cold when we arrived at Hamburg, eight hours afterward." — The electro-magnetic telegraph has been introduced into the island of Java, and a line of wires has been completed between the port of Batavia and the capital of the island Benicdorf, a distance of about seventy miles. — The Emperor Charles V. paid Titian the sum of eight hundred crowns for each portrait he painted of him. One is a full-length, representing the emperor in a complete suit of mail. Charles was painted many times by the Venetian artist, for it was by his pencil that he wished his likeness should be transmitted to posterity. He had his wish. — Cardinal Rauscher has published a circular, in which he proposes the establishment of a Catholic University for the whole of Germany. — The French emperor has pardoned M. Lehon, who was sentenced to transportation six years ago by the High Court of Justice at Versailles. At that time, nineteen persons were sentenced to transportation; of these, twelve have been set at liberty at various periods, two have died, and five still remain in captivity.

CURE FOR DISEASES.—The French Academy of Medicine has decreed a grant of 8000 francs to found an annual prize for any discovery or means of cure in diseases hitherto deemed incurable, such as hydrophobia, cancer, epilepsy, typhus, cholera, etc. Incurable! why, the advertising columns of the newspapers teem with infallible, warranted cures for all these afflictive maladies.

DEATH OF AN ARCHITECT.—George Carstensen, architect of the Crystal Palace, New York, died at Copenhagen on the 4th of January. He commenced the publication of a Sunday newspaper at Copenhagen, and died the same day that the first number was issued. A portrait of him was published in Ballou's Pictorial some month's since.

A SPLENDID OFFER.—A Western boatman had fallen into the Mississippi, and was sinking for the last time; a comrade who was trying to save him, was about to relinquish his hold, when the dying man exclaimed: "Hang on, Sam! hang on! I'll treat—I say I will!" It is needless to add that he was saved.

SNOW IN MEXICO.—In the city of Mexico, snow is the greatest rarity; yet last winter they had a heavy storm there, and the effect of the pure flakes piled on the rich foliage of the trees and gardens is described as magical.

Wayside Gatherings.

The price of tin has risen steadily the past year. The ones composing it are becoming scarce. — A couple were married in the cars of the Memphis and Charleston Railroad lately. The bride was a "widow" aged 16 years. — Self-defence clubs are being formed in New York, for mutual protection against garrotes. 4000 are already enrolled. — The towns on the Cape have this far spent from ten to twelve thousand dollars for clearing roads of snow. — The secretary of war has determined to send a new regiment to California early in the spring, a part to go across the plains for the protection of emigrants. — An inhabitant of Corfu, who recently returned from Spitzbergen, after an absence of twenty-eight years, found his wife in very good health but the widow of three husbands. — The Cambridge Chronicle states that pumpkin hoods have appeared in the streets of that city, and proposes "three times three" for the ladies who have had the courage as well as the good sense to wear them. — A matrimonial alliance of an uncommon character has lately been effected in Fluvanna county, Virginia. Mr. Robert Gray, the gallant groom, is ninety-five years of age, and the late Mrs. Catherine Reilly (now Mrs. Gray), ninety two years of age. — Jailor Bartlett remarking lately to a wealthy Boston merchant that the desire for books among the prisoners should be encouraged, the latter gave the jailor $100 to be spent for books, directing that his name should be kept a secret.

At the annual town meeting in Gloucester, Mass., ten thousand dollars were voted for the public schools. This is $500 more than last year, and is a most liberal and creditable appropriation for a town of 3000 people, and less than $4,000,000 valuation.

The French are as quick as Yankees at turning a penny when circumstances permit. The day following the murder of the archbishop of Paris, a medal commemorative of that event was selling in the streets.

Lettuce was introduced into England from Flanders in 1520. A salad was a rare treat in Henry the Eighth's reign; in the earlier part of which, when Queen Catherine, this king's first consort, wished for a salad, she despatched a messenger for lettuce to Holland or Flanders.

Fred. S. Cozzens—"Mr. Sparrowgrass,"—in his recent lecture in New York on "Wit and Humor," said of Dr. Samuel Johnson as follows: "Johnson, when quite a boy, was brought to London to be touched by the king, for scrofula, with which he was afflicted; but never completely recovered from either the disease or the touch!"

In St. Petersburg, the czar is engaged in the erection of one of the largest forces, iron ship building yards, and engine factories in the world, on one of the principal quays, in the government part of the city. The operations are being conducted with the greatest secrecy and despatch. The works are being built chiefly by English mechanics.

The Milan censorship is very severe just now; the last number of Cunita's "History of the Italians" has been stopped, on account of a passage relating to the history of Piedmont, of the last century. M. Schivardi, of Brescia, having in his "Scientific Facts" used some expressions hostile to the existing state of things, he has been arrested for high treason.

White was anciently used as a term of fondling or endearment. In the "Return from Parnassus," 1606, Amoretti's page says: "When he returns, I'll tell twenty admirable lies of his hawk; and then I shall be his little rogue, his white villain, for a whole week after." (Act. ii, sc. vi.) Doctor Bushby used to call his favorite scholars his white boys. Various other authorities might be cited.

A letter from Palermo announces numerous executions throughout Sicily for political causes. At Catania, Louis Pellegrino, a young man, but a distinguished chemist, was shot a few days previously. Several students had been arrested. The troops mount guard during the day with loaded muskets. The streets are deserted, and many of the shops closed. At Messina the arrests are not less numerous than at Catania.

In Lawrence, lately, a small girl who said she could not read, requested a lady at the post-office to look upon the list for a given name. While the lady was examining the list, the girl pressed close to her side, and upon being told there was no such name recorded, hastily left the office. The lady subsequently discovered that her porte-monnaie had disappeared, and the inference was that the girl was an expert pickpocket.

M. Dumont, in his "Recollections of Mirabeau," the leading orator of the French revolution, thus describes the persevering industry of Sir Samuel Romilly: "Romilly, always tranquil and orderly, has an incessant activity. He never loses a minute; he applies all his mind to what he is about. Like the hand of a watch, he never stops, although his equal movements in the same way almost escape observation."

An important improvement has been made in the construction of bakers' ovens in Paris. The oven is paved with slabs of terracotta, laid on a bed of sand, which rests on bricks that form the roof of a low vault supported by small columns of fire brick. Into this vault the heat and smoke of the fire are admitted by eight radiating passages, any one of which may be opened or closed at pleasure, so that one eighth, one-half, or the whole of the oven may be heated or cooled as occasion requires. The vault communicates with the chimney by an opening kept under perfect control.

A thermostat for regulating temperature and ventilation, is described in the English journals. It consists of a series of circular that hollow cases about one foot in diameter and one inch deep, attached together in the centre. Each case contains a small quantity of sulphuric ether, which is readily affected by change of temperature. The cases, comprising about six, are suspended one under the other, and to the lowest one is attached a weight by a cord that passes over an eccentric pulley. On an increase of temperature the ether expands, and the weight falls down, and when the air is cooled, it is drawn up by the pressure of the atmosphere on the external discs.

The following process for making wood incombustible is simple, and should be adopted by those who are necessitated to put up buildings wholly of timber: Take a quantity of water proportionate to the surface of the wood to cover, and add to it as much potash as will dissolve therein. When the water will dissolve no more potash, stir into it a quantity of flour paste and a sufficiency of pure lime to render it of the consistency of cream. Immerse the wood in the preparation, and it will ever be secured from the action of fire and water. This preparation may be applied to the surface of wooden roofs or other places particularly exposed to the action of fire. In the most violent conflagration, wood saturated thus may be carbonated but it will not blaze.

Foreign Items.

An account of Sir Charles Napier's Baltic campaign, from the pen of the admiral himself, is about to be published.

A letter from Vienna announces the sudden death of Marshal Radetzky, commander-in-chief and governor-general in the Lombardo-Venetian provinces. The marshal died of apoplexy.

A speculator at Berlin has bethought himself of establishing a "skating academy" in a garden near the canal. This is lighted up in the evening; and, being supplied with a tolerable band and abundant refreshments, attracts numerous customers.

The Paris papers announce the arrival of Fernk Khan, the Persian ambassador. His suite is said to be composed of 100 followers, among whom are some of the nobility of Teheran, who solicited as a great favor to be permitted to accompany him.

The British fleet in commission on the 1st of January, 1857, numbered 261 ships, 5078 guns, and 18,738 men, as compared with the last year of the war, January 1, 1856, when the strength was 325 ships, 6231 guns, and 63,335 men.

A letter from Sebastopol states that the city is gradually becoming re-peopled. It now contains about 7000 inhabitants; Kamesch, 2000. Three hundred houses partly destroyed during the siege have been rebuilt, and eighty new ones constructed.

Among the lower orders of Paris, it is said that their patron saint, Saint Genevieve, must have abandoned the city, since she allowed her neurair to be interrupted by the murder of the archbishop. The superstitious augur ill for the year 1857 from that circumstance.

Sands of Gold.

.... Those sentiments of love which flow from the heart cannot be frozen by adversity.—Sir Philip Sidney.

.... A beautiful woman is the hell of the soul, the purgatory of the purse, and the paradise of the eyes.—Voltaire.

.... Growth is the nature of habit, not of one sort or another, but of all, even of an unnatural habit.—Charles Deade.

.... If I wanted to punish an enemy, it should be by fastening on him the trouble of constantly hating somebody.—Hamish More.

.... Love is the great instrument and engine of nature, the bud and cement of society, the spring and spirit of the universe.—Dr. South.

.... What a wonderful incongruity it is for a man to see the doubtfulness in which things are involved, and yet be impatient out of action, or vehement in it.—Bulwer.

.... Youth and age have too little sympathy with each other. If the young would remember that they may be old, and the old remember that they have been young, the world would be happier.—Burton.

.... Self-deception will probably cease at the first blast of the archangel's trumpet; but what human heart will part with it till then? The circumstances under which a human being cannot excuse, or delude, or justify himself, have never yet occurred in the huge annals of crime.—Charles Reade.

Joker's Budget.

Among the "lost arts," is the art of making large loaves, which was formerly well understood by bakers.

Tom says the other day he saw a walking match, and Bill says that's nothing, for he saw a candle run.

A witty fellow slipped down on the icy pavement, when he muttered, "I have no desire to see the town burned down, but I sincerely wish it was laid in ashes."

To make hens lay perpetually, hit them on the head with a big club. Other modes have been recommended, but this is the only one we have found to be effectual.

An exchange asks "why so many mothers go on journeys with their infants in their arms?" Does our contemporary expect that mothers will carry their babies in carpet-bags?

"Great men," says Aristotle, "are always of a melancholy nature." If this be true, the tax on greatness is more than the property is worth. For our own part, we would rather be merry with Sam Weller than dismal with Plato.

Ignorant people are to be addressed through the eye. If you want to pass for a great man with a blackhead, sport a hundred dollar cloak and a fifty dollar watch-key. An ignoramus thinks that he alone has "sterling" parts, who exhibits shirt-buttons made of bullion. Make a note.

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

THE FAVORITE WEEKLY MISCELLANEOUS JOURNAL.

DESIGNED FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

This long established and well known weekly paper, after eleven years of unequalled prosperity and popularity, has become a "household word" from Maine to California, gladdening the fireside of rich and poor, in town and country, all over the wide extent of the United States. It should be a weekly visitor to every American home, because

It is just such a paper as any father, brother, or friend would introduce to the family circle.

It is printed on the finest satin-surfaced paper, with new type, and in a neat and beautiful style.

It is of the mammoth size, yet contains no advertisements in its eight super royal pages.

It is devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

It is carefully edited by M. M. Ballou, who has sixteen years of editorial experience in Boston.

It contains in its large, well filled and deeply interesting pages not one vulgar word or line.

It numbers among its regular contributors the best male and female writers in the country.

Its tales, while they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in humanity.

It is acknowledged that the good influence of such a paper in the home circle is almost incalculable.

Its suggestive pages provoke in the young an inquiring spirit, and add to their store of knowledge.

Its columns are free from politics and all jarring topics, its object being to make home happy.

It is for these reasons that it has for years been so popular a favorite throughout the country.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " "..... 7 00
10 " " " "..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirtieth copy gratis.
Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address at the lowest club rate. — Sample copies sent when desired.
Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU, No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

SHERWOOD FOREST IN THE OLDEN TIME.

The beautiful woodland scene on this page, carries us back to the days of bold Robin Hood and his followers, the outlaws of merry Sherwood. The gallant robber, "the English ballad-singer's joy," is the most conspicuous figure in the group, designated by his plume and bugle-horn, and cross-bow. He is superintending the transport of a noble red deer which his unerring shaft has days were shockingly severe and oppressive—the forest laws particularly, and Robin Hood was a sort of popular revolutionist, as far as his influence went. The punishment for an infringement of the game laws in the days of the Norman kings of England, was the loss of eyes and mutilation, and the very severity of these statutes caused their violation. Bold yeomen, trained to the use of the long and cross-bow, and enticed by the abundance of game, but such as would invade them, or by resistance for their own defence. The said Robert entertained an hundred tall men and good archers, with such spoils and thefts as he got, upon whom five hundred (were they ever so strong) durst not give the onset. He suffered no woman to be oppressed; poore men's goodes he spared, abundantly relieving them with that which by theft he got from abbeyes and the houses of rich old earles, whom Maior (the stricken down in the "king's green wood." Other trophies of successful sport are scattered about, and the outlaws will have a gay feast of it in their sylvan retreat, where Friar Tuck, and Scarlet, and Little John, and Maid Marian, and the rest of the goodly company will be assembled. Chronicles and tradition has handed down a singularly fair reputation for the bold archer of Sherwood, considering that he lived in open violation of the laws of the land. But it must be remembered that the laws of those took to the green wood and defied the power of the royal troops and rangers. The most noted of these outlaws was Robin Hood, who made his headquarters in Sherwood forest, in Nottinghamshire. He flourished in the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. Stow says: "In this time (about the year 1190, in the reign of Richard I.) were many robbers and outlaws, among which Robin Hood and Little John, renowned thieves, continued in the woods, despoiling and robbing the goodes of the rich. They killed none historian) Mameth for his rapine and theft; but of all the thieves, he affirmeth him to be the prince, and the most gentle thief." He was a man of unquestionable courage, of matchless skill in archery, humane, the friend of the poor, if the enemy of the rich and the oppressor, and his memory has been accordingly cherished, and handed down in song and story. His death is reputed to have occurred at the manory of Kirkstree, in Yorkshire. This event is said to have occurred in 1247.

SHERWOOD FOREST, ENGLAND, IN THE OLDEN TIME.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 21, 1857.

$1.00 PER ANNUM. } VOL. XII., No. 12.—WHOLE No. 200-298
6 CENTS SINGLE.

THE AUTHOR OF "HOME, SWEET HOME."

The portrait below, of John Howard Payne, the author of "Home, Sweet Home," a sweet and touching song, which will live as long as the tongue in which it was written, was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry. The artist has surrounded the portrait with graceful vignettes suggested by the sentiment of the song which has immortalized its author: a returned wanderer catching a glimpse of his cottage home; his welcome by his wife and children; the laborer in his native fields; the exile gazing on a triumphal arch, with his mind reverting to the scenes of his childhood. John Howard Payne was born in New York city, June 9, 1792. His father was educated as a physician under General Warren, of revolutionary fame, but afterwards attained high eminence as a teacher of youth. The family was a distinguished one, Judge Payne, one of the signers of the Declaration of Independence, being a member of it. John Howard Payne was one of the eldest of a family of nine children—seven sons and two daughters. While an infant, his father removed to this city, and opened a school here, which attained great celebrity. John Howard proved a bright and precocious boy. While a mere lad, he commanded a company of youthful soldiers, well remembered by some of our older citizens. Under his father's tuition, he distinguished himself as an elocutionist, and an actor, fresh from London, where Master Betty, who was creating a furore as a juvenile tragedian, urged his appearance on the stage, and offered to bring him out. His father, however, declined. Subsequently, young Payne was placed in a counting-house in New York, and when only thirteen, commenced the publication of a theatrical paper, called the "Thespian Mirror." His passion for the stage led to his making his appearance on the boards of the Park Theatre, New York, Feb. 24, 1809, when in his sixteenth year. He was completely successful, and starred it throughout the country. In 1818, both his parents being then dead, he visited England, appeared with success at Drury Lane Theatre, and played a brilliant provincial engagement. He next turned his attention to writing for the stage. Among his many successful pieces, we may mention the "Magpie and Maid," "Accusation," the tragedy of "Brutus," written for Edmund Kean, "Charles II.," and "Clari, or the Maid of Milan," in which last he introduced the song of "Home, Sweet Home," first sung by Miss M. Tree, sister of Ellen Tree (Mrs. Charles Kean). Upwards of 100,000 copies of this song were estimated to have been sold in 1832, yielding the publishers a profit of two thousand guineas. Most of Payne's pieces still keep the stage as standard dramas. But Payne, compelled to sell his pieces for low prices, and failing in several speculations, returned home in 1832. Soon after his return, he issued a prospectus for the publication of a periodical with the fanciful title of Jann-Jehan Nima, an Eastern title, signifying "The Goblet wherein you may behold the Universe." The publication, however, never saw the light. He was next appointed consul to Tunis, at which post he remained a few years, and then returned home. Failing in his attempts to obtain a more lucrative diplomatic mission, he accepted a re-appointment to Tunis, and died there in 1832. Payne was unfortunate in his career. He won fame, but not money. A sort of fatality seemed to attend every speculation he engaged in, but then, it is true, he confined himself principally to the most precarious branch of literature, dramatic composition. Managers are hard people to deal with, and theatre-goers are proverbially capricious in their tastes. For the most part of his life he was a straggling wanderer in foreign lands, and he who sung so sweetly of "home" in strains that will forever live, may be said never to have had a home of his own, where he might realize his own glowing emotions.

(Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.)

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—OR—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCRINE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XL.

THE COUNT AND CONFESSOR.

JUAN hesitated a moment. Of all the places the hotel of Santarem seemed the most dangerous.

"We must leave Madrid this instant, but how?"

"While we were waiting, I saw by the walls a carriage drawn by two good mules, whose conductor seemed to wait for his masters. Go!" said the unknown, to one of his men. "At the name you pronounce, all ought to obey."

The astonishment of Sevilla redoubled when the unknown said: "All the gates of Madrid are closed. By which do you wish to leave?"

"By the Alcala," answered Juan.

The unknown made a rapid gesture to one of his men. In a moment they heard the rolling of carriage wheels, and it appeared surrounded by the men, who cried:

"Silence! silence!"

"I will not be silent!" cried in a high tone the young man who led the mules.

Juan, astonished, recognized the voice of Yezid. He stepped to his side, and pressing his hand, said:

"No—you will not refuse; will obey in silence; you will aid me this instant to take this young woman out of Madrid, and you will be, I promise you, richly rewarded."

Yezid recognized Juan and Alitea. He bowed and answered roughly:

"Ah! that is another thing; these are good words. I will not be forced to do anything. You speak of a good reward, and that alters all. I await your orders, my father."

An instant after, Alitea, carried to the carriage, was in safety between her two brothers. The carriage rolled to the Alcala gate, and the porters, already forewarned, bowed with respect and opened the gate, and the carriage in a few minutes more was beyond the city in the open country.

The freshness of the night air, the motion of the carriage and the cares of her brother awoke Alitea from out of her deep swoon.

"Where am I?" cried she, raising herself and looking around.

"Near us—near thy brothers," said Yezid, holding her in his arms.

"You—with you?" said she, uttering a cry of joy. Then remembering all that had happened, she cried: "You and Heaven have saved me, but you are lost!"

Then, while the carriage rolled rapidly onwards, she related all that had taken place since she went first to bid the king adieu. She told them of the condition which would prevent the signature of the edict—the condition the king had made, and Yezid uttered an indignant cry when he thought on what price depended their safety.

"Yes," cried the young girl, telling them of her torments, her despair, of her struggles,—yes; to save my father and you all, I would have stooped to woo. But rest easy," said she, to them, showing the crystal flask, "I would not have survived it, I swear it! You are silent; speak, then, Juan."

Instead of answering, the latter bowed his head upon his hands and wept, while he murmured brokenly:

"Pardon—pardon, my sister!"

"For what?"

"For infamous suspicions, for horrible ideas which filled my heart, and for which I can never forgive myself. Knowest thou that when I saw you in the king's chamber an idea filled me which I had to fight against?"

"What was it?"

"To kill thee."

"Thanks, my brother!" said she, seizing his hand. "If Heaven ever reduces me to the same extremity, do not forget thy promise, Juan. Willingly would I die by thy hand, brother," she added; and God alone knew that no greater joy did she hope for.

They stopped at break of day at Alcala, and refreshed their mules. At the door of the hotel they perceived Pedralvi. They exclaimed at seeing him. He had come with Don Delascar, who was on his way to Madrid. The old man embraced his children joyfully. The two brothers spoke to him of the dangers Alitea had escaped.

"Is it possible!" cried he, indignantly. "You would have sacrificed yourself for us! Who gave you the right?"

"You, my father,—you!" said Alitea, showing him the letter.

"Yes," replied the old man; "I said it was necessary to sacrifice for your brothers, your most precious goods, fortune and life, and I am ready to do it. But what, my daughter, is not our own property, we cannot dispose of. Yes—our existence and property belong to our king, but our duty to God."

The old man was going to Madrid to intercede for his countrymen. Juan, although worn out with fatigue, declared it to be his intention to return with the old man, for he knew that unless some influential person introduced him, he might wait hours, even days, for an audience with the minister.

Some hours afterwards, Delascar and Juan descended at the door of the hotel of Santarem, which Alitea had placed at their disposal. Snatching but a few minutes of rest, they proceeded to the palace of the Count de Lerma. Never had a larger number of solicitors filled the ante-chambers. The king, disappointed in his hopes of Alitea, rendered more furious by a note from the countess informing him of Alitea's flight from Madrid, gave up all the affairs of state, and retired to Valladolid. The minister was king; titles, honors, favor or disgrace, all depended upon him. Had Don Delascar been alone, there would have been little chance of his meeting the count till too late. But at the sight of Louis Sevilla, the king's confessor, the crowd opened, the ushers bowed and opened the door for them. Don Delascar wished to speak with the count alone; he would, on his return to the hotel of Santarem, tell his son all. Turning to an usher, Juan said:

"Announce to his excellency the senior Don Delascar d'Alberique."

At this name, which recalled the old protection of the queen, the minister rose in surprise, surprise at such an unforeseen visit, and one which, owing to circumstances, embarrassed him very much.

"You at Madrid, Senior d'Alberique?"

"I have just arrived to speak to you upon—"

"The interests of the Moors of Spain? I know—"

"No, sir; upon your own interests."

The count looked astonished, and could not help admiring the high bearing, white hair and noble, calm face of the old man. The latter continued by unrolling a parchment and laying before the count a true statement of the riches and industry of the Moors. All this wealth would go to enrich France, England, and other foreign soils, if the edict were published. If the edict were not signed and made public, the Moors would pay larger taxes, have always ready twelve regiments, ready at the battle-call to lay down their lives for Spain, and place in the coffers of the state fifteen hundred thousand dollars. The count, who was as avaricious as ambitious, sat in bewilderment before the old man, who added:

"That will the Moors do, and I will add to that revenue two hundred thousand dollars, for which I demand nothing in return but the renunciation of the edict, which, if fatal to the Moors, will be more fatal still to Spain, to the kingdom you are sworn to protect, whose welfare you are sworn to advance. Whoever are your adversaries, your excellency is powerful enough to overthrow."

"Who knows of this?"

"No one, save Brother Louis Sevilla, confessor of the king, and by whom only I can enter into relation with you."

"Very well," replied the count, while he added, to himself:

"Sevilla is mixed up in this affair; that is astonishing! All the happy chances which have befallen me have come for a long time through him."

There was in the old man's manners and words a dignity and truth which compelled belief, and the count hastened to say:

"I believe you—I believe you, Senior d'Alberique. I accept!"

The old man trembled with joy.

"You swear it?"

"I swear it to you," answered the count.

The old man seized the minister's hand, as he said:

"God hears you, and soon Spain will bless you. To-morrow Brother Sevilla will come from me to your excellency, and I this evening leave."

Alberique went to the hotel of Santarem, where his son waited for him impatiently. He related to him all that had passed. Juan, who was ignorant of the immense resources of which his father was master, was frightened at first by the engagements the generous old man had entered into. The latter, however, soon proved to him how easy it was for him to fulfil them, by disposing of only a part of his treasures.

Thus certain of success, d'Alberique left that evening for Madrid, and Pedralvi ran by his orders to the two Castiles, Arragon and Catalonia, with the joyful news. Before his departure, d'Alberique gave Juan the two hundred thousand dollars for the Count de Lerma.

The next day, Sevilla appeared before the count; all the doors opened before him, and he was led, not into the cabinet, but into Lerma's chamber. The count was holding a conference with his brother Sandoval, and Juan waited for him.

"I have been," said the count, entering, "with my brother Sandoval, who agrees with me in thinking you deserve a high recompense for your services. You not only warned me of the treason of my son and the plots of the Countess Altamira with the fathers of the Society of Jesus, but you were the first to apprise me of the league of King Henry against Spain; and now you save me from another danger."

"You exaggerate my services, senior."

"No; we know still more for which we are indebted to you. It was evident that Alitea only influenced the king. He left us without making any answer to the entreaties of Sandoval and myself, for he expected to find in his chamber the Duchess of Santarem. I knew it, for I placed spies upon her movements. At the gate of the palace were placed our emissaries, who were to seize the duchess when she appeared; but she was too quick, and gained the palace before our men, and all would have been lost but for your timely intervention."

"I have my projects and my ideas, senior," said Juan, with embarrassment, "which I did not think you knew."

"We do not reproach you," said the count, quickly. "In that affair, as in all others, you say nothing, I know, but you act, which is much better. It is for that that you came to-day."

"I came to bring you the two hundred thousand dollars promised you by Don Delascar."

"I know it," replied the count, in an undertone, "and you are too much our friend, too devoted to us for us to hide anything from you, to hide any part of this affair, which you ought to share with us."

"I wish nothing—I ask nothing!" cried Sevilla, earnestly. "To you alone belong the glory and reward of such a noble enterprise."

"We will not hear of it! for each day, each moment, and from your position near the king, we have need of you. We can do nothing without your concurrence."

"It is granted you."

"I know it."

"I am ready to serve you, ready to second you to the extent of my power in the task you have undertaken, and which now, I hope, offers you no more difficulties."

"On the contrary, very great ones. It becomes more complicated than ever."

"How is that?"

"I will tell you, because you are not only a man of prompt action, but can give good advice. I have promised Delascar d'Alberique—"

"You have sworn it, senior."

"I know it."

"He believes you."

"Ah! that is what troubles me."

"And why? The treaty he proposes is less advantageous for him than for you, and for the country."

"Certainly. I ask nothing better than to exercise it. I wish it; but I spoke to my brother Sandoval, this hour, at the palace of the Inquisition."

"Well, what conclusion did he come to?"

"What he concluded," said the count, lowering his voice, "was a cardinal's hat for me."

"For you, senior?"

"Yes; beyond a doubt, the court of Rome, who promised it to me, sent it; and when the Vatican keeps its promises, how can I fail in mine?"

"And those you made Don Delascar d'Alberique, the Moor?"

"That is true; but you understand, my brother, that between a Moor and the pope, one cannot hesitate. That is what Sandoval says; that is what the supreme council of the Inquisition unceasingly repeats to me. To deceive the pope is to fail in the oath I made him; is to extort the cardinal's hat; it is to place a ban upon Christianity. That is an end of my fortune and safety."

"And the fortune and safety of Spain, which the expulsion of the Moors will ruin forever! and the prosperity which they carry with them, and the riches which we promised!"

"That is the point of the question. It is necessary to conciliate both, and Sandoval has found a way to do it."

"What?"

"It is upon that that I consult you, my brother. First, you advise them—make the king act upon it."

"What does that mean?" said Juan.

"The Moor makes almost fabulous promises; they offer us enormous sums."

"And you refuse them?"

"No; we can never consent to have such vast riches leave the kingdom; so the edict reads thus: 'The Moors are expelled from the kingdom, and their property confiscated to the state. They cannot defend themselves; under pain of death they carry nothing with them. That is the reduction proposed by Sandoval, and which conciliates all. The Moors are exiled, but their treasures remain to us. What do you say?'"

CHAPTER XLI.

THE CHALLENGE.

RAISING himself to his full height, Juan launched forth with fierce, fiery words:

"I say, senior, that it is infamous! and that the author of such a proposition ought to be given to the execration of Europe, and all his posterity!"

Had a thunderbolt fallen at his feet, the count would have been less astonished.

"How!" stammered he, in a trembling voice. "Is it you, Brother Sevilla, who speak so?—you, whom we have placed near his majesty? you, on whom we counted?"

"You can count still, senior, if you wish it; that depends upon you. Repulse the infamous suggestions of your brother, renounce the cardinal's hat—sooner than your honor, execute your promises, declare in an edict which we will make the king sign, that the Moors shall be treated henceforth as the other subjects of Spain, and I will become instantly faithful to your excellency, devoted to your designs, and ready to second them."

"I cannot—I cannot! I have accepted—I have promised. The legate of the pope has received my oaths."

"The pope himself," replied Sevilla, with unsparing frankness, "cannot order the perjury, and you promised that yesterday to d'Alberique. The pope himself cannot approve of that which denies all human and divine laws."

"What do you say?"

"The exile which they propose to you is an injustice; the confiscation a theft—"

"My brother, my brother!" cried the alarmed count, "I recognize no longer your upright judgment, or your usual reason; that which is a crime for a private individual is not for a minister. Policy permits many things, and when you have reflected—"

"My reflections are made. I go direct to the king."

"What is your project?"

"To tell him the truth; to enlighten him upon his true interests—those of Spain."

"That is not your mission. I placed you near his majesty as a director of his soul and conscience."

"And you think that between the misfortune of the people and the conscience of the king there is no relation? I hope, senior, that yours does not reproach you; that concerns you; I am not charged with it. But if you prepare remorse for the king, my duty is to spare him from it, and I go now to do so."

"You shall not go!" said the minister, placing himself before him. "He is this moment engaged with the pope's legate."

"I shall go! I can enter at any hour. I know my rights, and I will use them."

"Well," cried the minister, "if you speak against us, if you place any obstacles in our way, recollect that the hand which raised you will overthrow you."

"Senior," replied Juan, "I did not ask for the situation where you placed me; but in accepting it, I promised to do my duty, and I do it. Your excellency can say that. Have I not done it?"

"To question thus," cried the count, haughtily, "is to forget that you owe me everything."

"I have paid my debts," replied Juan. "Yes," pursued he, warmly; "I have taken part with you against the stranger; it was the duty of a Spaniard. I have taken your part against a son who betrayed his father; it was the duty of an honest man. But here, senior, ceases our alliance. I will have nothing more to do with a man who betrays his king and his country."

"That speech shall cost you dear!" cried the count.

"I know that your anger is formidable, senior. All yield to you; all obey you. You have the right to try everything, dare everything, even tyranny and injustice. In a word, you are at the highest power; but do not forget that the highest places are the first struck with lightning."

"Is that your hope?"

"You have said it. You have often reproached me with want of ambition. Ah, well! since you force me to it, I will become ambitious, not to raise myself, but to overthrow you."

He left. The count followed his retreating form with anxiety, for in his firm and even haughty tread there seemed to be a foreshadowing of power to come. The count murmured to himself:

"He is king's confessor, appointed by me; that is a fault." Then a smile of satisfaction and security spread over his face, as he added: "Yes—he is confessor, but I am cardinal. He could overthrow the Count de Lerma, but cannot overthrow a cardinal, cannot contend with the court of Rome, with the Inquisition, with the man who holds in his hand the destinies of the kingdom. Even if the king wished, he would not dare now; and as to Brother Louis Sevilla, what can he do? Join himself with my enemies, Father Jerome, Escobar, and even my son? So much the better. Let them unite; I will annihilate all together, and with the same blow."

Sevilla, meanwhile, went to find the king. He found only a note, desiring him to follow him to Valladolid. While Juan had been conveying Alitea away and waiting for Don Delascar, Sandoval had obeyed the summons of the king, who, disappointed and furious at not finding Alitea where he had expected her, had sent for the grand inquisitor and archbishop, and with a heart filled with rage, had signed the fatal edict, both articles, one commanding the expulsion of the Moors, the other the confiscation of their property. He had signed, and quitted Madrid. When Sevilla arrived, all was finished; the act of iniquity had been consummated.

Finding the note, and still ignorant of the signing of the edict, Juan, although worn with fatigue and hunger, did not hesitate, but set out with all speed for Valladolid. All the gates opened before him. He hardly recognized the king, so much had twenty-four hours of anxiety and disappointment changed him. His first feeling of rage subsided, and grief alone remained. Eagerly Juan unfolded to the king the true state of the case, the true effects of the expulsion of the Moors, the disastrous result it would have upon the prosperity of Spain.

Each word added to the king's fright, and at last, unable to bear it any longer, he cried out:

"Enough—enough! there is no longer any time. All is ended. I have signed!"

Juan uttered a cry of grief.

"Signed—signed?" repeated he, like a person in a dream. "Your majesty has signed?"

"Yes—yes. I was beside myself; I was furious, and you were not near me."

He then related to his despairing confessor all that had passed within the last few days. Seeing the grief and despair of Juan, he was filled with remorse at the guilty deed he had done, and weakness for having left all to his ambitious minister.

"Is there no means of revoking the fatal edict?" asked Sevilla.

"None—none!" replied the regretful king. "It was done in the presence of the pope's legate, who has already carried it to the court of Rome. Already it is published in Spain, and perhaps, even," said he, in a low voice, "they have begun to execute it."

"The evil is irremediable, sire, but there may be means found of softening it and rendering it less cruel."

A deputation of barons from Valencia waited upon the king, and with Juan for his minister, Philip III. received them. In their presence, Juan defended his majesty from all blame. It was proposed that a part of the proscribed population should remain to finish and carry on works which they only were capable of; that ten families out of every hundred should remain. Juan was too much interested in one family at least not to think even that small amendment of vast importance. The king himself, thinking only of Alitea, believed that he had done a great deed and repaired all the evil he had committed.

While the king was seeking by all means in his power to repair the evil he had done, the grand inquisitor and Ribera lost no time in publishing the edict and enforcing it, too. The news had spread with great speed, and everywhere were armed troops ready to enforce the edict, and strike down any who made any resistance. Before the barons of Valencia could return and declare the amendment the king had made, the bells of the churches had rung, and crowds of poor Moors, who had been born upon the soil and had hoped to die there, had embarked in vessels ill calculated for such use, to go to a foreign land and die there.

It was a sad sight. Long files of women, old men and children abandoning their properties and hearthstones, all their eyes filled with tears and despair in their hearts, looked for the last time upon the heavens and beautiful fields of Valencia. An immense crowd stood upon the banks of the river. More than fifteen hundred thousand Moors were assembled upon the banks of the rivers. Nothing was heard by agonizing sobs and mournings.

Alitea, meanwhile, guided the steps of her father, who leaned upon her, and her kind looks and consoling voice reanimated the courage of her young companions and servants. Arrived at the river side, where Captain Giampietri and his vessel awaited them, they looked around for Yezid.

"My son—my son!" said the old man; "where is he?"

Pedralvi stepped forward and said in a low voice:

"Do not ask, my master. These Christians can hear you."

Then, when a few steps further on he found himself alone with the old man and Alitea, he said: "Last night Yezid received a message from the Sierra of Albarracien. All the Moors of the mountain are assembled there. They did not wish to fly; they remain. They say that, intrenched in the defiles and rocks, they can defy their persecutors and revenge their brothers. They have written to Yezid: 'We are twenty thousand, but we need a chief. We expect you.'"

"He has gone!" said the old man, trembling.

"He has done well, my father!" exclaimed Alitea, bravely. "God protects and guides him."

"I wished to accompany him," said Pedralvi; "but I promised him I would conduct you even to the shores of Africa, you, my master, and Senora Alitea and Juniata; then I will return."

"Thou!"

"Yes. When you are in safety, I will return to Yezid, to fight by his side, and who knows but to save him, perhaps?"

D'Amerique and Alitea seized the hands of their faithful servant; then the old man, brushing away a tear—the last which he shed upon the soil of Spain,—he raised his eyes to heaven, and cried: "Let the will of Allah be done!"

At the mouth of the river a white-sailed ship floated slowly away. A long time the vessel remained in sight, then, little by little, it decreased in size, became a speck, and vanished. All the squadron began to move. The bank of the river, a moment before so crowded with people, was now left deserted and arid. Sad night—sinister emblem—image of the future of Spain!

The king, after having received the visit of the barons of Valencia, returned to Madrid with Juan, whom he could no longer do without. Each day his confidence in his young confessor increased, augmented by two reasons: the first, he never spoke to the king of affairs of state; and second, the king could speak to him of Alitea.

A great change had taken place in Juan; until then without ambition, he had it now; it was to repair the disasters of the fatal edict which he could not prevent. He felt that the return of his brothers depended upon his credit and power; it was for them, and not for himself, that he wished to acquire it.

The next day, the Count de Lerma, troubled by the sudden return of the king, hastened to meet him. The king was shut up in his cabinet, and saw no one. In the saloon adjoining the king's cabinet, where no one was allowed to enter, the minister perceived a man seated and plunged in a profound revery. It was Juan. The latter raised his head upon hearing the door open, and found himself face to face with the cardinal-count—it was so the count wished to be called.

"Ah, well! Senior Sevilla," he said to him, with a disdainful smile, "do you comprehend now that it would have been better to have remained in our ranks, and faithful to us? You wished to prevent the edict, and it has been obtained, signed and published. You wished to get it revoked, and it has been executed, without noise, without revolt, without the least resistance. The archbishop of Valencia and the viceroy of Cazaura, my nephew, send me the details, which I bring to the king."

"Senior," coldly answered Sevilla, "your eminence brings it, but if such a triumph remains unpunished, there is no longer any justice upon earth, and, thanks to Heaven, there is still—"

"What do you say?" said the count, haughtily.

"That I have confidence in its decrees, and await them. Happy if I can be the organ or instrument."

"You!" exclaimed the count, looking at him scornfully,—"you overthrow me, Brother Sevilla! Know, then, that even in my fall I will drag you down with me."

"And I, senior, even on that condition, accept it."

CHAPTER XLII.

JUAN'S JOURNEY.

THE king entered from his cabinet just then. At the sight of Sevilla, he ran to him with an open, joyous air; but perceiving the cardinal-count, he stopped, and his face became sad and severe. He seated himself; Juan remained standing, and the count, without waiting for an invitation, seated himself and remained covered in presence of his king; his new dignity gave him that privilege. The king made a gesture of surprise; then recovering himself, he said, coldly:

"It is just, senior cardinal; your eminence is right."

Then turning to Juan, he requested him to be seated with a very gracious air. The cardinal-count had come to render to his majesty an account of the execution of his orders, and said all the country blessed the king.

Philip III. paled, and replied, coldly:

"Yes, yes! I have received from Valladolid the complaints of the barons of Valencia; they tell me of their despair and ruin."

"These complaints are from disaffected ones, who do not wish order and peace to reign in the kingdom."

"I have learned," coldly said Juan, "that all the mountains of Albarracien and the adjoining countries have already risen, and that thirty thousand Moors have taken arms."

"That is true," said the king, "and you were ignorant of it, senior cardinal!"

"I knew it, sire. I did not mention it, for fear of making your majesty anxious. Augustin de Mexia, the former governor of Auvers, present governor of Valencia, marches against them with all the forces he could collect. My brother Sandoval, the grand inquisitor, left Madrid yesterday, for the two Castiles, Estremadura, Murcia and Grenada, and soon there will not be a Moor in Spain. All those of Valencia have embarked."

"All?" asked the king.

"Yes, sire."

"Except the families to whom we gave permission to remain in Spain."

"Pardon, sire," said the minister, looking at Juan, "I don't know who could have given your majesty such advice. He could only be an enemy of your glory. That was to detract from the pious work, and expose your majesty to the scorn of the infidels."

"That is to say?"

"That they have all disclaimed and repulsed your clemency. No one wished his fate to be separated from his brothers."

Juan uttered a cry of surprise and admiration.

"Don Delascar and his family?" asked the king.

"All have departed, sire," replied the count.

The king remained stunned; then throwing upon his minister a look of rage, he said:

"Send this instant a courier, who shall travel night and day, to Valencia, with the order to the viceroy, your nephew, for him to fit out the best vessel in my fleet, to overtake Don Delascar and the Duchess de Santarem, and bring them back. If in eight days they do not return to Spain, the marquis, your nephew, is no longer viceroy of Valencia."

"But, sire—"

"You will arrest him and conduct him here to Madrid, where he will render an account of his conduct."

"It is necessary, nevertheless," cried the count, with anger, and looking at the young confessor,—"it is necessary that I learn here from the servants of your majesty—"

"To obey the king," answered Sevilla, respectfully, "is what I will always do, and it is what your eminence must do!"

"Brother Louis is right," exclaimed the king, delighted with seeing his minister humiliated. "You hear, senior cardinal!"

The king rose and together with Juan went out of the room leaving the count stupefied by this unaccountable energy.

"Was Louis Sevilla right?" he asked himself, with a slight feeling of fear.

Full of doubt, he hastened to obey. A courier set out instantly for Valencia, and in the evening returned to the palace of the king, to say that his orders were executed. The king did not receive him. The next day, Juan Sevilla left on a secret mission, which the king did not deem necessary to confide to his minister. In the evening, Father Jerome, Escobar and the Duke d'Uzede were cloistered with the king, without the cardinal-count having been called. From that moment the minister began to feel uneasy.

Since the banishment of the Moors from the kingdom, the calumnies against the count had redoubled. It was now proved, said the people, that it was to gain that end that the cardinal-count and Sandoval had destroyed the queen; she alone was opposed to their designs; her death was necessary, and they had not recoiled before the crime. A thousand details, exaggerated by public rumor, came to support these calumnies. At Toledo, even, where Sandoval was archbishop, the cares of the governor, of the alguazils and familiars of the Inquisition could not prevent the circulation of infamous libels and pictures. One, the most widely circulated, was a picture representing the Count de Lerma with a black hat, kneeling in the road, where was the queen with a poignard in her breast. The drops of blood flowing from her wound fell upon the hat of the minister, which it colored red, and turned it into a cardinal's hat. It was evident to the count that these calumnies were spread by the cunning and malice of Father Jerome Escobar. These rumors reached even the court of Rome and the pope.

The king would permit no one but Juan Sevilla to bring the Duchess de Santarem to Madrid, and it was upon that mission that he had set forth so secretly. Juan journeyed alone in a carriage, bearing the arms of the king; he was alone, but two postillions drove four stout mules, richly harnessed. Armed cavaliers preceded or followed the carriage, and others kept constantly beside the vehicle. Juan could scarcely realize it all as he passed through villages and countries which he had travelled through, alone, on foot and poor. His heart was sad as he rode along, passing through fertile districts, formerly full of life and happiness, now deserted and waste.

Suddenly he came upon a body of fifty men, alguazils, familiars of the Inquisition, and some poor, pale men chained together, two by two.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

(Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.)

AN ALGERINE FAMILY.

SCENES IN EUROPE.

We have placed on this and the next page a series of very fine engravings, illustrating manners and scenery in the old world, and affording a pleasant and instructive contrast to our American sketches.—AN ALGERINE FAMILY first engages our attention. This group was taken from a photograph, and bears every evidence of authenticity in the naturalness of the attitudes and expression. It is not often we have an opportunity of studying such a family picture, the ladies of the East being so strictly and jealously secluded from observation. The slight air of constraint visible in this group, something beyond the stiffness incidental to sitting for a mechanical picture, betrays a consciousness of departing from the routine of domestic habit. The father is a fine, dashing fellow, with a richly-embroidered dress, and would doubtless appear to advantage on a blooded horse. His wife, seated on his right, is a plain, matronly-looking character. A grown-up daughter, seated on the left, has some pretensions to personal beauty, and is rather richly and gracefully attired. The youngest child presents nothing very striking, but the girl who is represented in a standing posture, is evidently the belle of the family circle. Her dress is peculiar, from the crescent in her hair and the pearl ornaments, to the sash and loose, short trousers. We commend her costume to the consideration of the female dress reform societies.—APPLICATION OF THE EGYPTIAN BASTINADO. This fine picture illustrates the severity with which offenders are treated in the East. This cruel scene is being enacted in an apartment opening by graceful Moorish arcades on a garden. The culprit lies on his face, and is held down by a kneeling Nubian, while his feet are secured by a loop of cord to a horizontal stick maintained in position by two stout fellows while two others are applying the bastinado with ruthless severity. Culprits subjected to this torturing punishment frequently have the soles of their feet so lacerated as to be incapable of locomotion for many days. Several persons grouped about in the room are stolid witnesses of this degrading and revolting spectacle. An Arab seated in the corner under the trophy of arms suspended to the wall, enjoys his pipe, totally indifferent to the sufferings of a fellow-creature. The man on the right, seated on a divan, with his richly ornamented pipe standing on the floor, appears to be the official who has decreed the punishment. The old man kneeling at his feet may be the father of the sufferer pleading in vain for mercy. We are reminded by this painfully interesting picture, of a scene in one of Morier's Eastern romances, the "Adventures of Hajji Baba," a book of very great value for its interesting details of Oriental manners. Shir Ali, the shah's chief executioner, tells under what circumstances he was sometimes lenient in the administration of the bastinado, and it is probable that well-to-do culprits all through the East are similarly favored. "Before I was a nuib," says he, "and when I was called upon to lay the bastinado on some wretched culprit, many is the time that my compassion has been moved by a direct appeal to my purse; and then, instead of beating the sufferer's feet, I struck the felek on which they rested. It was but last year that the principal secretary of state incurred the wrath of the shah. He was ordered to receive the bastinado, and, by way of distinction, a small carpet was spread for him to lie upon. I and another were the operators, whilst two more held the felek. When we were taking the shawl and cap from his head, his girdle and outer coat (which became our lawful perquisites), he whispered to us, low enough not to be heard by the shah (for this was all done in his presence), 'By the mothers that bore you, do not beat me much! I'll give you ten tomanis if you will not strike me.' His heels were tripped up, his feet placed in the noose, whilst his back reposed on the carpet; and then we set to work. For our own sakes, we were obliged to start fair, and we laid on till he roared sufficiently, and then, having ably made him increase his offer until he had bid up to any price we wished, we gradually ceased beating his feet, and only broke our sticks over the felek. Much ingenuity was displayed on both sides, in order that the shah might not discover that there was any understanding between us. His bidding was interwoven with his groans, something after this manner: "Ali, aman, aman! For pity's sake, by the soul of the prophet! twelve tomanis. By the love of your fathers and mothers! fifteen tomanis. By the king's beard! twenty tomanis. By all the Imans! by all the prophets! thirty, forty, fifty, sixty, hundred, thousand—anything you want!" When it was over, we soon found that his generosity had diminished quite as rapidly as it had before increased, and we were satisfied to receive what he first offered to us, which he was obliged to give, fearing if a similar misfortune again overtook him we should then show him no mercy."—EGYPTIAN INFANTRY SOLDIER. The equipments of this queer figure are an incongruous mixture of European fashions. The striped cloth wound around his tasselled "fez" gives his head the appearance of those we see in Egyptian sculptures of centuries past. The body of his jacket is as closely-fitting as those of the stupid shell-jackets of the British service. But the sleeves and trousers are loose and flowing, in the Eastern style, affording free play to the limbs, a style which the French have wisely adopted in the equipment of their troops. The arms of this soldier are the European musket and bayonet, and the formidable curved sabre of the East. In the distance a group of Egyptian drummers, in their hybrid costume, are beating the roll-call.—THE CASTLE OF CHILLON. The light of genius has hallowed the scene which our next engraving depicts, the castle of Chillon, on Lake Lemman, in Switzerland, immortalized by a sonnet and a narrative poem, "The Prisoner of Chillon," by Lord Byron. The castle of Chillon is situated between Clarens and Villeneuve, which last is at the extremity of the Lake of Geneva. On its left are the entrances to the Rhone, and opposite are the heights of Meillerie, and the range of Alps above Boveret and St. Gingo. Near it, on a hill behind, is a torrent; below it, washing its walls, the lake; within are a series of dungeons, in which the early reformers, and, subsequently, prisoners of state were incarcerated. Across one of the vaults is a beam, black with age, on which the condemned were formerly executed. In the cells are seven pillars, or rather eight, one being a pilaster. In some of these are rings for securing fettered prisoners. The steps of Bonivard have left their traces on the pavement. He was confined here several years. Mr. Tennant, who examined the place in 1821, says: "The early history of this castle is involved in doubt. By some historians it is said to have been built in the year 1120, and, according to others, in the year 1236; but by whom it was built seems not to be known. It is said, however, in history, that Charles V., Duke of Savoy, stormed and took it in 1536; that he there found great hidden treasures, and many wretched beings pining away their lives in these frightful dungeons, amongst whom was the good Bonivard. On the pillar to which this unfortunate man is said to have been chained, I observed, cut out of the stone, the name of one whose beautiful poem has done much to heighten the interest of this dreary spot, and will perhaps do much more towards rescuing from ruin and oblivion the names of 'Chillon' and 'Bonivard' than all the cruel sufferings which that injured man endured within its damp and gloomy walls." In gazing on these picturesque white towers, we recall the lines of Byron placed in the lips of the illustrious Bonnivard, and vividly descriptive of this remarkable and picturesque locality:—

APPLICATION OF THE EGYPTIAN BASTINADO.

EGYPTIAN INFANTRY SOLDIER.

"Lake Lemán lies by Chillon's walls;
A thousand feet in depth below,
Its massy waters meet and flow;
Thus much the fathom-line was sent
From Chillon's snow-white battlement,
Which round about the wave enthralls:
A double dungeon wall and wave
Have made:—and like a living grave,
Below the surface of the lake
The dark vault lies wherein we lay;
We heard it ripple night and day;
Sounding o'er our heads it knocked,
And I have felt the winter's spray
Wash through the bars when winds were high
And wanton in the happy sky;
And then the very rock hath rocked,
And I have felt it shake, unshocked,
Because I could have soiled to see
The death that would have set me free."

The following particulars are derived from a statement furnished Lord Byron by a citizen of Geneva, and appended, in French, to the poem, in the various editions of his works. Francis de Bonnivard, son of Louis de Bonnivard, was born in 1496, and was educated at Turin. In 1510, Jean Aimé de Bonnivard, his uncle, resigned to him the priory of St. Victor, abutting the walls of Geneva, and which was richly endowed. This great man (Bonnivard deserves this title by his strength of soul, the rectitude of his heart, the nobility of his plans, the wisdom of his counsels, the courage of his movements, the extent of his knowledge, and the vivacity of his mind), is remembered with warm gratitude by the Genevese. Bonnivard was one of their warmest supporters. To assure the liberty of their republic he did not hesitate to jeopardize his own; he neglected rest, despised wealth, omitted nothing to secure the happiness of his adopted country, cherished it as one of her own citizens, served it with the intrepidity of a hero, and wrote its history with the simplicity of a philosopher and the zeal of a patriot. He says, in the commencement of his history of Geneva, that as soon as he had begun to read the history of nations, he felt himself attracted by his taste for republics, whose interests he always espoused. It was doubtless his love of liberty that made him adopt Geneva as his country. While yet a young man Bonnivard proclaimed himself the defender of Geneva against the Duke of Savoy and the bishop. In 1519 he became the martyr of his country. The Duke of Savoy having entered Geneva with five hundred men, Bonnivard feared the duke's resentment; he wished to retire to Fribourg to avoid the consequences; but he was betrayed by two men who accompanied him, and was called by order of the prince to Grêlée, where he remained prisoner two years. As his misfortunes did not abate his zeal for Geneva, he was always a formidable enemy to those who men-

Handred in 1537. After having struggled to render Geneva free, he succeeded in making her tolerant. He induced the council to grant ecclesiastics and peasants time to examine the propositions submitted to them, and succeeded by his gentleness. Christianity is always preached triumphantly when it is preached charitably. Bonnivard was learned; his manuscripts in the public library prove that he was well read in the Latin classics, and that he was deeply versed in theology and history. His great attachment to the sciences made him desirous of establishing them in Geneva, and in 1551 he gave his library to the public. This was the foundation of the library of Geneva, and their books are partly rare and beautiful editions of the fifteenth century, now seen in that institution. During the same year he constituted the republic his heir, on condition that his property should be employed in sup-

THE CASTLE OF CHILLON.

need her, and was consequently exposed to their attacks. He was encountered on the Jura in 1530 by robbers, who plundered him and once more placed him in the hands of the Duke of Savoy. This prince placed him in the castle of Chillon, where he remained without being examined till 1536. He was then delivered by the Bernese when they seized on the Pays du Vaud. Bonnivard, on regaining his freedom, found Geneva free and reformed, and was gratefully received by the inhabitants. He was made a burgher of the city in the month of June 1536, was assigned the house formerly occupied by the vicar general, and a pension of 200 crowns of gold as long as he remained in Geneva. He was made a member of the council of Two porting a college, the foundation of which he projected. Bonnivard is supposed to have died in 1570.—THE NEAPOLITAN "CALESSO" OR "CORRICOLO." The engraving with which we close this series is a representation of a curious vehicle, which attracts the attention of every stranger in Naples. It is a singular carriage, and may be said to hold any number of passengers. Our picture shows how many may be stowed in and about it. The seat is a tripod resting on a pole with very high wheels, which, in their rapid revolutions, create a constant cloud of dust. After the front and back of the carriage are full, more people clamber on to it, as they will persist in piling up one of our omnibuses or horse rail-road cars on a stormy day. Even the net which hangs beneath receives its contributions of children and dogs. The driver cracks the whip, and away goes the "calesso," at a very good pace

THE NEAPOLITAN CALESSO, OR CORRICOLO.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

CHILDISH FANCIES.

BY NELLIE WILD.

Whither have the fairies gone—
Fairies robed in green and gold;
Dwelling in the hills so green,
Dell and wood, in days of old?
Dancing on a moonlit ledge,
Hiding in the hills by day;
Wearing forms like ladies bright,
Sitting where the fountains play?

Where are all the fairy gifts?
Where the brownie's lucky penny,
Thrown upon the children's path,
Baying for them toys so many?
Do they never haunt the woods,
And the dell, and rock, and river?
Is the wild-wood silent now?
Are the fairies gone forever?

Ah, our childish faith has fled!
All those fancies, now so wild—
Then, so beautiful and true—
Vanished with the little child;
And the dreams youth loves so well,
Like that fanciful belief,
Melt away like summer clouds:
Gray old Father Time's a thief.

He is stealing dreams away:
Thoughts and fancies that seemed true;
Pulling airy castles down,
Ever building up anew.
But he brings no faith as pure,
For all true and bitter things;
No, with years comes unbelief:
But the heart to childhood clings.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

ZILARA.

A STORY OF THE CONQUEST OF MEXICO.

BY RICHARD CRANSHAW.

THERE was revelry and mirth reigning throughout the gorgeous palace of the last of the Montezumas. The great steel mirrors, set in marble, and decorated with burnished gold, reflected the forms and faces of Mexico's noblest sons and daughters. The lamps of perfumed oil shed abroad their radiance over the polished pavements, and lent a lustrous beauty to the priceless gems which sparkled on the foreheads and breasts of the assembled throng. Beyond the illuminated hall the moon threw its calm rays down among the quiet trees and flowers and fountains without, and formed a pleasant, holy contrast to the gay scene within.

It was the bridal night of Quarroneka, the youngest son of the renowned Montezuma, and Zilara, of the race and lineage of Mononez, princes of the empire. The city walls were even then besieged by the determined army under Cortez; but the reflection of a foe's proximity dwelt not now upon the minds of the light-hearted assembly, and they danced and sung, forgetful of everything but the joyousness of the passing hour.

Wearied of the noise and glare of the illuminated hall, the young bride laid her small hand on the arm of her princely spouse, and pointed to the outer portico, between the huge pillars of which the dark-blue heaven, the dim foliage, and the playing fountains were indistinctly visible.

"Come," she whispered, "let us exchange the glare and heat of the crowded hall for the soft air and the bright moonbeams."

Quarroneka drew the little hand through his arm, and replied only with a gentle pressure of it within his own, as he turned and led her away, followed at a respectful distance by a couple of noble attendants. And as they reached the portico, he passed his arm around his young wife's slender waist, while nestling close to his breast she gazed up into the clear sky above their heads, that twinkled with its myriads of gems celestial.

"How beautiful!" she softly murmured.

"Fittingly so," he answered, looking tenderly down into her eyes, "for the happiness of this sweet hour. Our wedding night, Zilara, hath even nature's smiles to bless it, and the bright stars twinkle in very joyousness of our propitious bridal."

She said nothing, but continued to gaze upward into heaven's vault, as though utterance would break the spell of holy peace that reigned around about her. But as she continued to look above her head, suddenly the aspect of the sky underwent a menacing change. Heavy clouds began to float up from the horizon, and thunder muttered sullenly in the far-off distance. The wind, which previously had with playful gentleness lifted the leaves of the trees, now grew motionless and silent; and the whole air became thick and dense around them. The princess tremblingly drew closer to her husband's side.

"See! the omens of hopefulness are becoming shadowed and overcast. Now may our gods forebode that those lowering clouds foreshadow not clouds and darkness on our late united fates!"

Quarroneka endeavored to laugh away her terrors; but his country's superstitions held him also partly a believer in such signs; and though he tried to drive off her fears, he had no arguments with which to meet his own. To a tangible foe he could present an undaunted front, but against the ministrations of destiny he felt no courage might avail.

"Quarroneka, the enemies and invaders of our country are even now without the city's walls. May not the danger threaten in that quarter?"

"The enemies of our country," he replied, "are few and weak; wearied with hardship and oppressed by famine. The loyal hearts that guard the throne of Montezuma are as the uncounted grains sparkling on the sea-shore."

"But the invaders are invested with the valor of desperation, and combat with the aid of the dread spirits of fire and thunder. Our people are brave, but they cannot stand against their fearful engines of destruction."

He forced a smile as he answered:

"The valorous blood of great Menonez, thine ancestor, I fear, descended not to the women of his line. It runs in their veins a pure stream of gentleness and love. Is it not even so, my own Zilara?"

The harmless banter had yet the effect of sending her ancestral blood with something of a flush to her brow and cheek, as she drew her graceful form to its full height.

"Let the hour of trial come, and even the daughters of her house may prove to possess some share of the courage of Zilara's kindred! Let deadly and imminent danger fill her path, and it may be seen that Zilara has not derogated from the name from whence she sprang."

"Well, well," said he, drawing her once more fondly towards him, "may the hour be far, far distant when such heroism is called on for display. To banish these gloomy fancies let us return to the joyous scene going merrily on within."

But as they turned to re-enter the palace, a dreadful and well-known sound broke thunderingly on their ears. A loud report was followed by a crashing volley, which echoed through the lofty halls, and shook their firm foundations to the very centre. Peal upon peal of musketry mingled with the shrieks of affrighted women, the groans of wounded men, and the war shouts of the invaders: "Dios y Espanola!" and "Cortez y Santa Maria!" (God and Spain. Our Lady and Cortez!)

Quarroneka comprehended all in a moment. The Spaniards had entered the city unawares, and stealing silently towards the palace, attacked it on all sides; trusting, from the very boldness of their plan, and the suddenness of their descent, to strike terror to the defenders, and ensure themselves possession ere any plan to repel them could be formed. He drew his sword as a party of yelling and furious soldiers sprang up the marble steps leading from the garden, and rushed towards him. His two attendants followed his example.

"Murva—Tuneco—away with the princess through the passage you know of, that leads beneath the palace walls. I will remain and keep the blood-hounds off. Away, away!"

Zilara would have refused to leave her husband, choosing rather to perish with him—a fate which to all appearance was his doom—but the two nobles obeyed his commands, and even used some gentle force for their mistress's salvation. She struggled wildly for a moment or two, and then fell fainting into their arms, and was quickly borne away between them.

Quarroneka seemed gifted with the sinews of a giant, and his sweeping blows descended with the rapidity of the lightning's flash, bearing down all before him. The mailed bodies of his antagonists were not proof against the keen temper of his sword, and the terrific force of his arm, and one by one they fell back into their comrades' arms or swelled the heap of slain at the feet of the undaunted Mexican.

"Dog of a heathen!" exclaimed a voice from between the set teeth of an old Castilian, "I'll send thee to the shades in as many pieces as thou canst number dead enemies at thy feet!" And so speaking, he placed his petronel at rest, and blew his match preparatory to taking deadly aim at the obstinate foe. But before his intentions could be carried into effect, the hand of an officer was laid on his arm, and he was commanded to forbear.

"Do you not see, from the royal headdress of scarlet plumes, that he is of the Montezuma blood? Fool! would you miss the chance of handling the hidden riches of which he can name the hiding-place! Rush on him and secure his arms, but do not injure him." And as the Spaniards became masters of the palace, they swarmed upon him back and front, and he was quickly overpowered by the numbers of the foe.

They led him into the main body of the palace, and as he entered the hall where so lately had been mirth and joyfulness, a scene of fearful contrast was presented to his gaze. Arms which had been twined about the forms of partners in the dance were still folded in the same embrace, but they were now locked in the stern rigidity of death. Brows lately smiling and open, were now knit in the defiance of despair—their marble pallor looking more deadly white from the crimson streams which flowed from their ghastly and gaping wounds.

But the sight that froze the blood in his heart as he gazed on it, was the spectacle around the throne. A hecatomb of bodies lay piled there, and the well-known form of his father—the great Montezuma—lay extended on the ghastly heap.

With a cry of horror, Quarroneka sprang from his captor's grasp, and rushing to the royal figure, lifted, with the tenderness of a loving son, the head that never more would throb with worldly cares or woes. The bodies of his faithful subjects formed a monument of affection, well fitted to commemorate the overthrow of the last of the Montezumas.

The capital was in the invaders' hands. They had entered by the means of a small stream that passed through the city and ejected its waters beyond the walls. The storm and darkness of the night were taken advantage of by two of the most expert swimmers in the camp, and having succeeded in surprising the sentinels before the alarm could be given, one of the great gates was thrown open, and the silent entrance of the wary foe was thus made good.

The attack and capture of the palace, together with the death of Montezuma, sent a panic to the hearts of the defenders, and the subjugation of the entire city was a comparatively easy task to the determined Spaniards. Many of the inhabitants were slain; some succeeded in escaping from the captured city; while those of highest consequence were carefully confined, in hopes of eliciting from them by treacherous promises or cruel tortures, the supposed hiding-places of the immense wealth known to be contained within the capital of the western El Dorado. Among the latter the young prince Quarroneka remained a prisoner in the self-same halls that had been the abode of his childhood and the heritage of his prime.

Night again had set upon the great city. On the walls, the iron clang of Spanish warders jarred the pavement in the place of the light feet of its late defenders. The streets echoed with voices, whose unknown tongues had never before been heard by their silent slaves; and the loud bursts of the trumpet's voice startled gay-plumed birds as they essayed to rest a moment on the luxuriant boughs of the gardens that spread around on every hand.

Within the palace a scene far different from that of the preceding night was now being enacted. The great chamber was filled with armed men, in the midst of whom, extended upon a rude semblance of that horrible instrument, the rack, was the form of the brave young prince Quarroneka. By his side, and holding his wrist within his palm, stood a gray-headed surgeon, who appeared to gaze upon his subject with the same pleasant concern that a philosopher might display regarding an impaled butterfly of an exceedingly curious species. At the sufferer's head appeared the tall figure and gaunt features of that western conqueror, who might have been entitled the great Cortez, but for the inhumanity which marked his snubbing progress. He turned from the face of the tortured man toward the absorbed physician, and demanded:

"Senor Chirurgeon, will he bear another turn of the rack, think ye?"

The old man was silent for a moment, while he felt the patient's wrist, tenderly, and counted its pulsations with minute exactness. He then looked up, but still abstractedly, and replied:

"As near as my professional experience will permit me to compute, the vital energy in the possession of our very interesting case has become wound up by force of surrounding circumstances, to such an extreme pitch, that the probabilities are greatly in favor of his still adhering tenaciously to existence, even after an additional turn of the instrument. But," added he, seeing that Cortez was about to give the signal to the men who held the levers to proceed, "but it may be as well to add," and here he carefully knocked a fly off the prince's forehead, "that the same will most likely result in the entire separation of the members of his body. He will, in short, be torn asunder."

"Ha!" exclaimed the conqueror, "Mannel," addressing one of those present who had served in the capacity of interpreter, "tell this to the barbarian, and let him note it well."

His eyes gleamed with ferocious fire as he glanced around him for an instant. He looked out and saw the dim light of the rising moon just visible in the distance. He pointed towards it:

"The instant the silver rim of yonder messenger of light is perceptible above the wall which yet hides it from our view, that moment, if he have not yet confessed the whereabouts of the vast hoards of hidden treasure of which he owns he knows the situation, that moment I give the signal that shall see his body rent into quivering, gory particles. I swear it, by my soul!"

The tortured man made no reply directly to the interpretation, but looked out toward the illuminated sky, and in a firm and triumphant voice spoke:

"Spirit of the night! arise and east thy rays upon the last of a kingly race, as he ascends to the abodes of his undaunted forefathers. Let thy bright beams be the funeral torch to light the soul of Quarroneka as it wings its everlasting flight. Quarroneka dies, and with his last breath curses, now and forever, the souls of his country's foes!"

Cortez sprang fiercely forward, and yelled out:

"Tear the impious heathen limb from limb! Let not such blasphemy be breathed another moment!"

The hands of the executioners were laid upon the levers, and their firm sinews braced to fulfil upon the instant the horrible command; when the great door at the upper end of the hall was, with a loud crash, burst open, and with the fury of rage and revenge burning at their hearts, a host of Mexicans dashed wildly into the apartment. At their head appeared a female figure who, as soon as she entered, flew towards the rack whereon the exhausted prince was laid. With the fury of an enraged tigress she swept down all who opposed her passage. In both her delicate hands she wielded a heavy blade, and with this she hewed down all before her until Quarroneka's side was reached. To sever the bonds that held him was the work of a moment, and she then fell upon his breast and murmured forth: "Thou art saved at length, my husband!"

Not a moment was to be lost to make their victory sure. It was too frail a band to dream of winning the city back again from the invader's hands, and therefore they waited but to lift the form of the prince tenderly upon their shoulders and return as they had come, first driving the Spaniards forth from the palace, or leaving their bodies on the marble floor, through the same secret passage they issued by which the night previous Zilara had found an escape beneath the city even beyond the walls. On finding herself in safety, she had instantly collected a few brave hearts and returned silently to the palace, determined to rescue her husband, or find death by his side. And thus did Zilara prove that the bravery of her ancestors was not alone confined to the men of her proud race, nor that the women of her line were only fit to be carefully nurtured in tenderness and love.

The throne of the Montezumas was levelled with the dust, never to be upraised again in its pride and glory. But amid the groves of South America, Quarroneka and his sweet bride found a home, and as much happiness as exiles from their country and the graves of their kindred could ever look to obtain.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

CHANT OF WORSHIP.

THE FANE "NOT MADE WITH HANDS."

BY BLANCHÉ D'ARBOIS.

Not for me in the lordly place—
In a temple made with hands;
I'll bow me down where I feel the smile
Of God on his glorious lands.
The wreath of nature entwines my brow;
Its trailing vines are around me now;
And low on the turf I'll humbly bow
In a fane not made with hands.

Chant we not in the lordly place—
In a temple made with hands;
When bells are warbling in glorious strain
Their songs o'er the goodly lands.
They're chanting now their Sabbath strain;
We'll hear may listen their song again;
So let us join in their wild refrain,
In a fane not made with hands.

Not to-day in the lordly aisle,
In a temple made with hands;
We'll bow us down where we own the smile
Of God on his glorious lands.
The smile of God may not remain,
We may not feel it for sin and shame;
But our hearts now join in a wild refrain,
In a fane not made with hands.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

COUSIN SARA'S FIRST BALL.

BY ESTHER DEENE.

OUR quiet village was plunged into excitement last spring, by the arrival of the Mannings from the city. They were reported to be unusually rich, and various were the surmises about, as to their object in coming to such an out-of-the-way place as our village was. The head of the family, Mr. Manning, was said to be, by those who had had the good fortune to see him, an agreeable man, with a certain air of gentility about him,—a gentility which seemed to be a part of his nature. Then there were Mrs. Manning and two daughters, who were excessively genteel and affected. Of course, the family furnished the one topic of conversation in all the village circles. Never was there a tea-party convened, or did one neighbor drop in to have a social chat with another, but that the first subject discussed was the movements of the Mannings.

"I declare," said Miss Ray at a tea-party held at the house of the Widow Sly, "I should like to know for certain why the Mannings came here to live."

"I heard the other day," said Widow Sly, "that Mr. Manning was going to build factories all along our river. I shouldn't wonder if he was a millionaire, after all."

"I, for one, don't believe any such thing," said Miss Deborah Dale, who was the only daughter in the village. "I dare say they have come here to live fashionably with the least expense."

Such were a few of the surmises as to the Mannings. Yet days and weeks passed on, and nothing was known precisely concerning them. In the meantime their reported wealth made them the objects of admiration to a certain class of people in the village. Mr. Manning had hired a large, handsome house, where they were to live, so it was reported, until a suitable site could be chosen for the erection of a splendid mansion. As to their furniture, everybody said it was magnificent, and perfectly in accordance with the taste and refinement of the owners.

As to the Misses Manning, they were the leaders of fashion in the place. Every article of their dress was studied by the village belles, who endeavored to imitate it as far as their humble means would allow.

My Cousin Sara, who was one of these belles, if she was not a beauty, was at least one of the prettiest girls in the village. So thought nearly everybody, and so thought especially William Lee, the young blacksmith, who had known Sara from childhood.

Soon after the Mannings made their appearance in our village, there arrived one day, a tall, genteel, handsome man, whose name everybody soon discovered to be Mr. Graham. He seemed to be known to the Mannings, and soon he became very intimate at their house. As he dressed well, talked well, and was never seen employed, he soon obtained the name of the young gentleman.

It so happened that Cousin Sara had met this young gentleman several times, and as he always paid her great attention, and had selected her as a partner in all kinds of amusement, people began to say that Sara had made a conquest. Sara, in reality, cared not a straw for Mr. Graham, but she was a little inclined to be coquettish, and moreover she enjoyed immensely the frowns which William Lee bestowed upon the young gentleman. If frowns could annihilate any one, Mr. Graham would have been disposed of in a very short time.

Matters stood thus, when one morning there was an immense excitement. It was rumored that the Mannings, assisted by Mr. Graham, were making preparations to have a ball in our quiet village,—an affair which should surpass anything of the kind which had ever been seen in the place before. The next morning brought more news,—the Mannings had hired the town hall for the occasion, and had issued invitations to nearly all the people in the place.

Of course the young ladies were in a state of anxiety and suspense as to whether they would be invited to the ball, and many a one waited with some curiosity to hear whom the handsome Mr. Graham would select as a partner. As it happened, Sara was the one to whom that great honor was decreed. Consequently she was so delighted that she could talk of nothing else but the ball and her expected partner. Her vanity was increased tenfold by knowing that she was the envy of half the girls in the village, and by the thought that perhaps she was making William Lee bitterly jealous.

"I wouldn't let her go," said Sara's grandmother, as we all sat round the tea table a day or two before the great event; "the girl is growing so vain."

The father laughed at this remark, and merely said:

"I think Sara better do as she pleases about it."

Sara's mother, who was a very sensible woman and a great partisan of William Lee's, said nothing, deeming it best to let affairs take their course. Sara's sister, the pet Lizzie, was in raptures with the ball, and had begged that on the important night she might sit up to see Sara dressed, which request had been acceded to.

After mature deliberation, Sara had resolved to wear a simple white muslin, with some natural flowers in her hair. As for the rich silk dresses which some of the girls were having, Sara's father could not afford one, and he declared Sara looked ten times better in her simple muslin, than she would in the richest silk ever made.

During the week preceding the ball, Sara had repeatedly passed by the shop of William Lee. Instead of the smile and the nod she had ever bestowed upon him at such times, she now held her head a little higher, and did not deign to notice him at all. But William took no notice of such conduct beyond mentally vowing that Sara should be punished in some way or another; he was confident that her pride would fall before long. As for the ball, he had secured a ticket, resolving to go and watch the progress of affairs.

The eventful night of the ball did at length arrive. The moon shone brightly, and Sara could hear the sleighs rushing past, as she sat, already dressed, awaiting the arrival of Mr. Graham. Never had Sara looked lovelier than on this particular night, and Lizzie actually fell asleep while contemplating her.

It was rather late when Mr. Graham arrived, and consequently when they came into the ball-room, the dancing had been commenced for an hour or two. But Sara felt that it was quite fashionable to enter late, or else Mr. Graham would have come earlier; and besides that, the Mannings, who formed a criterion of gentility, had not yet arrived.

Sara, who was a dancer of grace and spirit, supposed she had really fascinated Mr. Graham, for he whispered to her as he led her to a seat, that she must dance with him many times that evening. But just as he was about to write his name upon her card, there was a great bustle at the door, and presently the Mannings under their appearance,—the carriage they had come in was heard driving away at a furious rate. Mr. Graham dropped Sara's card, and hastened away, muttering something about "coming back immediately." The next moment she saw him handing the Misses Manning to a seat with his most obsequious bow.

In the meantime, everybody was securing partners for the next dance, and William Lee, who saw that Sara was sitting alone, solicited the pleasure of dancing with her. Of course, Sara refused this request in a very decided way, as she did also several others; she was waiting for Mr. Graham, who, she was confident, meant to engage himself to her for that dance.

But Mr. Graham had other thoughts. Whilst wondering what could become of him, she caught sight of a couple, who seemed to be the admiration of all round them, whom she recognized as Mr. Graham and Miss Manning. The dress of the latter was a very rich silk, and Sara felt half ashamed of her simple muslin; and besides that, she overheard some remarks concerning it by some girls, who were very gaudily dressed. But Sara felt somewhat comforted when she thought of the praises her dear old father had lavished upon her; it was rather a pleasing reflection also that he had not been obliged to deprive himself of any comfort to buy her a rich silk.

But the dance was over, and again she waited the appearance of Mr. Graham; but he studiously avoided her, and the Mannings also passed her without bestowing the least notice upon her. It was very reluctantly that she rose to dance with one of the young men of the village. At the close of the cotillon, she gladly withdrew to a quiet corner to watch the dances.

As the evening wore on, Sara still sat in her corner, nobody offering to ask her to dance. Those who had had one refusal did not like to risk another, and there were others who rejoiced in her evident humiliation.

Mr. Graham still kept himself aloof, and Sara would not have danced with him now, even if he had begged the pleasure on his knees. She watched William Lee as he danced with a pretty creature in blue; he was seemingly the happiest of the happy, while she was so miserable that she wished the earth would open and she could sink into it. She dared not think of the honest heart she had thrown away from her,—it only added to her misery. And this was the evening, the pleasure of which she had anticipated so much. She longed to cry, but pride prevented her,—she must wait until she was at home.

The Mannings departed at an early hour, and Sara saw Mr. Graham follow them, probably to assist them into the carriage. She wished he would make haste and go home with her, and once clear of him, she would have nothing more to do with him. But Mr. Graham did not make his appearance, and Sara heard some one say that he had gone away in the carriage with the Mannings.

Here was a dilemma,—how was she to get home? But fortunately she recollected that some neighbors of theirs were at the ball, and perhaps they would permit her to accompany them. It was consequently in a very humbled frame of mind that Sara arrived home,—the ball had proved nothing but a source of regret.

"I told you so," said grandmother, the next day; "the girl is as cross as a bear, so much for going to a ball."

"Perhaps she is tired," suggested Lizzie, who always took Sara's part against her grandmother.

Sara, who was washing dishes in another room, heard these words. They brought back such a bitter recollection of what she had endured the night before, that she could not keep back her tears.

Just at this moment, she caught sight of William Lee, who was crossing the garden to speak to her father, as was often his custom. He was near enough to the window to know that she was crying, and yes—she actually detected a smile upon his face as he looked up to her. To be mocked was more than Sara could bear, so acting upon the impulse of the moment, she opened the window and threw the saucer she held in her hand at William.

William actually laughed aloud as the saucer flew past him and broke into a dozen pieces, and with a good-natured nod he passed on. Sara, in endeavoring to shut the window, dislodged a pile of plates, which fell crashing to the floor. Attracted by the noise, in came mother, grandmother and the children, to ascertain what the matter was. There was no help for the catastrophe but to pick up the pieces; Sara, as she did so, inwardly determined to preserve her temper next time, come what might.

"Quite a piece of news stirring," said Sara's father, as he came in to tea that same evening, "and what do you think it is?"

Everybody was in an agony of expectation to hear this piece of news,—not even Lizzie vouchsafed a guess. Accordingly, the old gentleman having enjoyed their curiosity for some time, at last said:

"The Mannings departed, bag and baggage, from the village last night."

"Last night?" repeated Sara, in an incredulous tone.

"Yes, last night, my dear. The ball was contrived purposely so that they might get off unmolested. They owe for nearly everything they ever obtained in the village, and must have been miserably poor."

"Dear me," said grandmother, "I knew how it would be."

"How did they manage it?" asked Sara.

"Nearly all of their neighbors were at the ball," said her father, "so that the moving of the furniture attracted but little attention. Mr. and Mrs. Manning followed that, and later in the evening, the two girls went, attended by Mr. Graham."

"Mr. Graham!—has he gone too?" asked Sara, looking down.

"Yes, he turns out to be quite a scamp,—owing everybody in town. I think the place is well rid of them all."

By the next morning, everybody in the village had heard the news, and everybody was indignant to have been so imposed upon. Every effort to obtain a clue to the retreat of the Mannings proved in each case unsuccessful; the flight had been admirably managed, so that all people could do, was to talk about it.

"O dear! I don't believe William will ever care for me again! Ah, how could I have been so foolish!" said Sara, half aloud.

She was alone at home, every one else having gone to church. There was a sigh behind her, and Sara, a little frightened, looked round and saw William Lee standing by the door. It was a mystery to her how he came in unperceived, but nevertheless she turned away without saying a word.

"Well, Sara,"

"Well, William," said Sara, "do you always steal into places like a thief?"

"I made as much noise as usual coming in," said William, "but you were deep in thought."

"Well," said Sara, frankly, "I know you heard what I said just now, though it was not meant for your ears,—and really William, I am very much ashamed of myself, and—"

"That will do, Sara,—no more confessions, or else I shall have to make some too. But are you not sorry you so nearly broke my head with that saucer?" said he, laughing.

"Very sorry indeed," said Sara, blushing.

What more was said was not exactly for our ears. But it was rather curious that not long afterwards there was a wedding at the home of my Cousin Sara, and the bride, in her simple white muslin dress, leaned very confidently on the arm of the handsome, sturdy blacksmith.

"I told you so," said grandmother; "there is some good in the girl after all, since she has chosen wisely."

A week or two ago, we heard through Miss Ray's sister, that Mr. Graham had married the younger Miss Manning, and that the whole party were staying at one of the best hotels in the country.

"I am sure she is welcome to Mr. Graham for all me," said Sara; "I don't at all envy her," and Sara threw a look across the table at William, a look which spoke a world of contentment.

"You will never forget that first ball, Sara," was William's malicious answer.

OLD TIMES.

The heavy snows of the past winter forcibly recall the old-fashioned seasons of my youth—for I well remember the incidents connected with village life in New England, when the present century came in. How would our dainty ladies of this luxurious day shrink from the cold, square pews, in the unpainted meeting-house, where my young ears heard the gospel preached! I can see it now,—and the rigid deacons sitting in front of the roomy pulpit, with its bell-shaped sounding-board, threatening, in our young imagination, to fall upon the venerable white wig underneath, especially when the respected individual who wore it threatened to bring down the house with a tremendous slap on the cushion, while illustrating the breaking of a "potter's vessel." Had not the good matrons brought foot-stoves under their ample red cloaks, which they generously loaned to their freezing neighbors, no semblance of fire would have been there. We betide the young girl who should attire herself in anything so gay as one of these same crimson red cloaks! I have known a village belle somptuously rated for tying about her white throat a crimson tippet, which, in connection with feathers, placed jointly in a coquetish little black hat, was thought by the watchful matrons to impart a military air.—Correspondent of Home Journal.

HARRISBURG, PENN.

The views of Harrisburg herewith presented were drawn on the spot expressly for us, by Mr. Kilbourn, and exhibit his praiseworthy fidelity of delineation and picturesque effects. The first picture represents the United States Arsenal, an unpretending structure, located on 3d Street. It is built for use, and not for show, and makes no pretensions to architectural elegance. The large engraving which follows, embraces an accurate view of the State House, which stands upon a commanding elevation fronting the river Susquehanna, at the head of State Street. It is a fine, well-proportioned building, as our picture shows; the circular cupola and the dome, together with the semi-circular portico with its lofty pillars, giving it an imposing and elegant aspect. The building is 180 feet wide, 80 feet deep, and 108 feet from the ground to the summit of the cupola. The adjoining buildings are occupied by the State departments. The area in which the State House is situated, is laid out in walks, bordered with fine shade trees, which much enhances the effect which it produces. The reservoir, shown in our third engraving, is immediately west of the State House. It is an elevated, terraced structure, supplied with water from the Susquehanna River, which is thence distributed by means of iron pipes all over the city. The building depicted in our last engraving, surrounded by trees, is the Court House, the style being that of our public buildings some fifty years ago. Its architecture, however, is not unpleasing. The jail is situated in the rear of the Court House. Harrisburg is situated on the east bank of the river Susquehanna, in the midst of some of the finest scenery in the United States. The river here spreads out to a considerable width, and forms a most beautiful feature in the landscape. The location of the place is unsurpassed for beauty, and it enjoys great facilities of communication with the interior and seaboard. Harrisburg was founded by John Harris, in 1785, and was incorporated in 1808. It became the capital of Pennsylvania in 1812. In 1855, the population was estimated at about 10,000. It is about 100 miles west by north from Philadelphia. The Pennsylvania Railroad connects at this point with the Lancaster and Harrisburg Railroad. The Lebanon Valley Railroad leads from Harrisburg to Reading, and the Cumberland Valley Railroad extends in an opposite direction. The visitor who desires a fine view of this pleasant city, should ascend to the top of the State House, whence he will look down on the broad river studded with green islands and crossed by handsome bridges, while the Kittatinny Mountains form a bold and picturesque background to the landscape. There are about twelve churches in Harrisburg, some of them handsome structures. A number of papers are published here, well edited, and well supported. Among the manufactures of the place are three large iron furnaces, a rolling-mill, several breweries and potteries, and an extensive railroad car manufactory. The Susquehanna, to the beauty of which we alluded above, is formed by the union of two principal branches, which unite at Northumberland, about sixty miles above Harrisburg. From this point, the river flows nearly south to the mouth of the Juniata, and turning towards the southeast, it passes Harrisburg, Columbia and Port Deposit, and falls into the northern extremity of Chesapeake Bay, at Havre de Grace, in Maryland. The main stream is about 150 miles long, but very unequal in breadth, sometimes expanding to a mile, and at others narrowing to a quarter of that width. Its surface is gemmed by many verdant and picturesque islets, and its channel is frequently interrupted by rocky rapids, which put a stop to navigation during low stages of the water. A canal has been constructed along the river from its mouth to Columbia, 45 miles, and another from Columbia to Northumberland, about 80 miles. The Susquehanna is the largest stream in Pennsylvania, and flows through a fertile and populous country, which is diversified by limestone valleys, and mountain-ridges abounding in iron. The East Branch, called also the North Branch, rises in Otsego Lake, New York, and in its winding course, estimated at 250 miles in length, intersects the beautiful and romantic valley of Wyoming, and the valuable coal region of Luzerne county. A canal has been opened beside this stream, about 124 miles above Northumberland. The West Branch rises in Cambria county, Pennsylvania, on the western declivity of the Alleghany Mountains, and follows a winding course of 200 miles in length, through a region abounding in pine timber and hard coal. The Susquehanna and its branches are invaluable to the development of the wealth of Pennsylvania.

UNITED STATES ARSENAL, HARRISBURG, PENN.

OLD FASHIONS.

At the period of my earliest recollections, men of all classes were dressed in long, broad-tailed coats, with huge pockets, long waistcoats and breeches. Hats had low crowns, with broad brims—some so wide as to be supported at the sides with cords. The stockings of the parson, and a few others, were of silk in summer, and worsted in winter; those of the people were generally of wool, and blue and gray mixed. Women dressed in wide bonnets, sometimes of straw, and sometimes of silk; the gowns were of silk, muslin, gingham, etc., generally close and short-waisted, the breast and shoulders being covered by a full muslin kerchief. Girls ornamented themselves with a large white vandyke. On the whole, the dress of both men and women has greatly changed. —S. G. Goodrich.

HABITS AND MANNERS OF THE DUTCH.

In all parts of the continent of Europe, with the exception of Holland, there is so much in common in the modes of living, that in going from Paris to Naples, the traveller recognizes but little difference in all the ordinary modes of living. But the moment the precincts of Holland are entered, the difference is quite marked. The combination of dykes and canals, straight rows of trees, gardens which overspread the landscape, laid out with mathematical precision, and the wings of the windmills, which are swinging in every breeze, gives to everything a different aspect from that which is met with anywhere else. Extreme cleanliness in all that appertains to the dwellings, barns and stables, is a very striking characteristic; it gives a degree of freshness to everything, which is very pleasant to the stranger who has just arrived from Italy. Saturday morning is the time when a universal cleaning takes place. The doors and windows of the houses are thrown wide open on this day, and the bustle that is going on within is a caution to all intruders to keep their distance, or run the risk of being saluted with the mop or the brush, or the spouting water which issues from a small engine, which is almost universally used to clean the sidewalks, the walls, and the windows. As soon as this is all over, the doors and windows are closed again, and the house is shut up for another week. The drawing-rooms of the dwellings are seldom entered, except upon great occasions, such as a wedding, or an annual party. In some parts of Holland, the visitor is expected to take off his shoes previous to entering a house; and, in all cases, he is expected to clean them thoroughly—a requirement which should be regarded in all countries. But notwithstanding all this carefulness about everything that pertains to their residences, the persons of some of the lower classes give evidence that their personal habits are not more tidy than is observed among the same classes in England, France or Germany. One of the things essential to the comforts of a Dutch lady is a foot-stove filled with hot embers of turf or charcoal, which she not only constantly uses at home, but has it carried about with her wherever she goes—whether to a concert, to church, or a social visit. Hundreds of these stoves are to be seen piled up in the aisles of churches. When sickness occurs in a family, a paper is stuck up daily upon the front door, on which is written the state of the invalid's health, drawn up by the doctor, which gives information to friends coming to make inquiries, without disturbing the family. In some parts of Holland, families in which a birth occurs, enjoy peculiar privileges. For a certain number of days, nothing which is calculated to disturb the mother is allowed to approach the house. It is protected from legal executions, no bailiff being allowed to approach it; no soldiers can be billeted on the family, and when a company of troops pass by the house, the music ceases, and they pass with the silence of a funeral train. The servants are extremely neat and tidy in their appearance, and are faithful and attentive to their employers. They enjoy many privileges peculiar to their class; the family arrangements are so conducted as to allow them to attend church on the Sabbath, which is a privilege they esteem highly, and avail themselves of as a matter of principle, and often with much conscientious regard. When a servant girl is hired, she always stipulates for a certain number of holidays, to attend a sort of Dutch Carnival, which is called Kermis (meaning wake, or fair), which are of frequent occurrence. They swarm at these festivals with their sweethearts; and if a damsel is so unfortunate as not to have one, she hires one for the occasion—which is not at all uncommon—substantiating the saying, that "everything has its price."—Correspondence Christian Witness.

STATE HOUSE, HARRISBURG, PENN.

RESERVOIR, HARRISBURG, PENN.

ANCIENT AND MODERN WATER WORKS AND TUNNELS.

We are liable to forget the great works of the past, in our admiration of those of the present age; hence it is a good thing sometimes to recall what the old engineers have accomplished, as a healthful stimulant to excite our modern engineers to greater efforts. The old Roman aqueducts for supplying that city with water, in the days of its glory, when compared with the greatest of modern works of this kind, dwarf them into insignificance. Rome had one aqueduct, Aqua Apia, ten miles long, all underground; another, Anio Vetus, forty-three miles, and nearly all underground; also; another, Aqua Marcia, fifty miles long, and the Anio Nevus, fifty miles long, with arches 109 feet in height. There were also four other aqueducts, amounting to nine altogether, for supplying Rome with water by gravitation, for there were no steam engines in those days to pump it up from the adjacent river Tiber for city use, as is now done at Philadelphia, Chicago, Cleveland, and others of our cities. The noblest work of modern engineering for supplying any city with water is, undoubtedly, the Croton Water Works of New York. Its artificial tunnel is carried over valleys, through hills, and over rivers, a distance of forty miles. The work is stupendous, to be sure, for it carries a condensed river from the mountains into the city; but compared to the old Roman water-tunnels, it is not so much to boast of. The city of Montreal has recently finished some great works of engineering for supplying itself with water, in the same manner as the city of Philadelphia, by employing the water power of the river to pump itself up to an elevated reservoir. The water from the St. Lawrence, immediately above the rapids, is conducted by a canal five miles long to a basin, where two large wheels, thirty-six feet in diameter, work force pumps, which drive the water through iron pipes for about three miles, to a double reservoir situated on the mountains behind the city, at a height of 200 feet above the river level. These reservoirs contain 20,000,000 gallons, and were cut out of the solid rock. Thus, from the elevation of 200 feet, the water is conducted through the whole city. Next to the Croton Water Works, the Water Works of Montreal, we understand, are the greatest of the kind on our continent. From present indications, there are a number of cities in the United States which will yet surpass old Rome in extent and population, and which must be supplied with water from distant sources. As no city can be kept clean and healthy without a good supply of water, we tell them to look to old Rome for encouragement and an example. Some great works of tunnelling, or boring through mountains, have, within a few years, been executed in Europe and in our own country, for carrying railroads through them; and the tunnel now boring through the Green Mountains, three miles long, is considered to be the most expensive work of the kind ever attempted by our engineers. But we have only begun to execute works of this kind, and we require to be stimulated. The Alleghenies, the Rocky Mountains, and other mountains, have yet to be tunneled to make pathways through them for the "iron steed." Look at what the old Romans did. They cut a tunnel as part of a drain for Lake Fucinus, and it was bored one mile through a mountain of hard cornelian. It was in the form of an arch, nine feet wide, and nineteen feet high. There was no gunpowder then to assist in blasting; all the work of cutting was executed inch by inch by steady labor with the pick, wedge and chisel. Considering the amount of labor required for this work, our engineers have much to imitate them.—Scientific American.

AUCTION AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

The Constantinople correspondent of the Liverpool Albion, writes:—"An exceedingly curious illustration of the life and doings of a wealthy pacha has lately been exhibited in the case of Halil Pacha, brother-in-law to the Sultan, who died at a good old age, leaving an immense fortune, and a sale of his effects is now in progress. The deceased pacha was originally a slave, but rose to the highest honors and emoluments, and seems to have been more fortunate than many of his cotemporaries, in escaping the bowstring. The sale takes place in a comparatively modern residence on the Asiatic side of the Bosphorus, built close to the edge of the water, like most of the Turkish palaces, and it attracts a large number of pachas and others anxious to possess themselves of a portion of the valuable diamonds, jewelry, curiosities, etc. The quantity of diamonds exhibited is something marvellous, and they are of great intrinsic value; while the luxury of the apartments, gilded and furnished in the modern French style, with a large central billiard-room and billiard-table in it, evinces more European tastes than one would expect to see here. Hundreds of Turks, Armenians and Jews are squatted on the floor of the billiard-room, smoking their pipes, and bidding against each other. In the drawing-room, which opens with folding-doors off the billiard-room, are seated many pachas and dignitaries of high rank, also with their favorite chelouks, the things for sale being handed round to them. The presiding genius seems to be the family priest, squatted on a dais at one end of the billiard-room; and the auctioneer, a venerable, though active Turk, with a long beard, capers about, making occasional jokes, which have an evident effect even on the solemn faces around him. The sale has lasted many weeks, and will continue some time longer. The proceeds, I believe, are to be divided among the late Halil Pacha's acknowledged children, with subsidies to his numerous other progeny and establishment of ladies, who occupy another house he possessed on the adjoining heights; but of course none of them were visible at the sale. If one may judge from the luxurious habits of many pachas, the state they keep up, their retinue of horses, servants, etc., together with the anxiety evinced at this sale to possess themselves of valuable diamonds, jewelry, etc., there must be a great deal of wealth and spare money among them."—Liverpool Mercury.

SWINGING FESTIVALS IN INDIA.

As a ceremony was to take place on the 11th of April, in the Circular Road, which is distant from Calcutta about two miles, some other gentlemen and I, who were desirous to see it, drove in that direction, and the whole line of road leading to the place was crowded with natives of every caste and shape of color, wending their way thither to see the degrading spectacle, and dressed up in the most gaudy and fantastic manner possible. Great numbers of the women and children had large brass rings about four inches in diameter through their noses, also rings round their ankles by way of ornament. The spot where the tragic scene was enacted was a large square, surrounded with houses, on the tops of which were seated crowds of Indians of every age, and all more or less excited with an intoxicating compound called "bhanga." In the centre of this square was erected a long pole sixty feet high, at the top of which was another about forty feet long, placed at right angles to the former, working in a socket in the centre, and capable of being whirled round, and to the end was attached a rope. Having waited for ten minutes or so, the infatuated native who was to be swung came in, amid the beating of Indian drums and the shouts of the people. The man had a wild expression of countenance, with his eyes glaring, being under the influence of bhanga, of which he had consumed great quantities during the three previous days to deaden the pain. This unfortunate native had two large iron hooks (not unlike those used by butchers at home for hanging up meat) thrust through his back, three inches apart, and making a wound four inches in length, from which the blood streamed down. This being done, the men tied the rope which was fixed to one of the ends of the horizontal pole to the two hooks in his back, and likewise passed it through a cloth, which was tied slackly round his breast to prevent him falling to the ground should the flesh give way, which it sometimes does. They then pulled down the other end of the pole, which of course raised the one with the man along with it, and then ran round at a great speed for a quarter of an hour. All this time the poor man was suspended in the air by the hooks in his back, and whirling round fifty feet from the ground; and from the manner in which he kicked about his legs, he appeared to be suffering great agony. When he was let down, and the hooks taken out of his back, he was more dead than alive, and the laceration caused by them was frightful. Men who undergo the swinging seldom survive it.—Correspondent London Dispatch.

MISERIES OF A LECTURER.

Rev. Dr. Bethune, in the course of a lecture at Newark, New Jersey, gave an amusing sketch of the miseries of a public lecturer, in which he is reported to have said:—"Then, again, the reporters (whose irate quills he would no sooner provoke than the quills of a hundred fretful porcupines) often made him say very queer things. Once, when he stated that he was not by birth, but only ecclesiastically a Dutchman, the reporter made him an ecclesiastical deduction. Another time he spoke of the devil as sowing tares, and he was astonished the next morning to read that he had mentioned the devil sowing trees. Another occasion he was made to say that the patriarch Abraham taught Ceroops arithmetic! Nevertheless, his experience of life had taught him three important practical rules—1st, Never contradict a woman; 2d, Never challenge the bill of a hotel-keeper; 3d, Never quarrel with an editor. Then again, it was often annoying to see one's name posted on placards in ludicrous proximity with those of negro minstrels, and all sorts of other connexions, and especially so when the bills have become torn and partially overlaid by newer ones, so as to read something like this:—"Jullien's grand operatic troupe will this evening give a magnificent performance—by Horace Greeley, Esq. Highest cash paid for rags—by Hon. Rufus Choate."

COURT HOUSE, HARRISBURG, PENN.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

POETS' DREAMS.

BY BELL BRAMBLE.*

Poets' dreams, like dews from heaven,
Shed they o'er the soul their spell;
Making thoughts of love and beauty,
Whispering ever, "All is well!"
Poets' dreams are wreathing ever
Round their brows undying flowers:
Flowers whose bloom and fragrance never Lose their charm in darkness hours.

Poets' dreams come fresh from heaven,
Shedding light and love divine;
Chasing shadows, flinging incense
O'er the heart's sad inmost shrine.
Ever come they music-laden,
Soothing sweetness to their tone,
And their heart-beating measure
Finds an echo in our own.

Poets' dreams, with blithesome gladness,
Gild with rays of heaven-caught light;
On their wings no tinge of sadness
Dims their hues as rainbow bright.
Hovering round the poet's pathway,
Luring with their antique wiles,
From each sorrow chasing away
Oloom and care, and hripping smiles.

Poets' dreams like these come swelling
O'er my soul like wavelets bright:
Every dark distrust dispelling,
Ever beaming, hopeful, bright.
Like some fountain gushing ever
From its source—no grief's alloy
Ever mars the poet's visions,
Hope and love their fount of joy.

* Mrs. J. D. Baldwin.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE AVALANCHE.

A TALE OF THE CARBONARI.

BY J. GRAFTON ALLEN.

"AWAY, away! Fly for your lives. The gens-d'armes are already after you."

So the fugitives mounted their horses hurriedly, and fled like the wind. A few friends stood looking after them from the piazza of a country villa. About a mile away lay Milan, the rising sun just coloring the spires of its churches, and the innumerable curved pinnacles of its Duomo. All round, far away on every side, extended the wide plains of Lombardy. To the north they were bounded by lofty, inaccessible, frozen heights—the snow-crowned, the everlasting Alps! The road went north, and towards those lofty mountains the fugitives fled. There were three. There was an aged man, in whose veins the blood had not yet been chilled by the cold hand of time. His form was erect and his face noble. There was a young man of strong frame and fine, resolute countenance, and between the two rode a fair young girl, of extreme beauty.

It is not necessary to tell the story of the old Count Alonzo Di Velletri and his daughter Laura. Sufficient it is to say that they belonged to the ill-fated Carbonari, whose plot had just been discovered. The old man and his daughter were denounced, together with many more, among whom was young Henri, Count de Santana. But Milan was not far from the mountains—the road was open—Switzerland was the land of the free!

Behind them no pursuers were visible to them, but they well knew that they were followed. Two hours after they had left the villa, a company of gens-d'armes fled from Milan in pursuit of them. The villagers stared at the gentlemen and the fair young girl who rode so furiously; but there were none who interfered. "They ride for a sick friend," said some. "They fly from death," said others.

The gens-d'armes followed closely behind, and at every village asked after the fugitives. At every station they changed their horses for fresh ones, who kept up an undiminished speed. True, their horses were but of the common breed, and the steeds of the count were noble Arabians, but the constant freshness of the pursuers would prove more than a match for the over-ridden horses of the count, even though they were of the purest blood.

They had ridden for hours in silence and without rest. The last look which they took behind them showed at a glance many miles of the road but no pursuers.

"Laura," said the young Count de Santana, "are you not almost weary to death?"

"O, no. I can ride for many hours more," said the young girl, courageously.

"I wish we could turn into these fields on either side," said the old count, "for Laura's sake. She must be very weary."

"But we cannot," said Santana.

"We cannot. These wide, level plains would discover us at once to our pursuers. There is no chance for us but straight forward."

"Yes, yes. The Alps," said Santana.

"Yes, the Alps," said all.

On and on fled the noble steeds, still bearing bravely up although destitute of rest for many hours.

"Our horses are not tired yet," said the old count. "They are good for many a mile."

But still he looked anxiously behind him.

"Alas!" said Laura, "our pursuers, who cannot be far away, will have fresh horses constantly. Ours must fail at last."

"But if we only can be carried to the Alps, all will be well."

"God grant that we may get there!" exclaimed the girl.

"Yes, dear Laura," said her father, "once among the mountains, and we are safe; for we can turn aside in a thousand ways, and elude discovery as well as pursuit."

"Ah!" cried Santana, at the lapse of another hour, "see—far ahead—see, something sparkles and glitters!"

"Lago Maggiore!" cried the old count, in delight.

"Is it the lake? O, joy; we are near it then!"

There before them, but yet many miles away, lay the lake, its waters sparkling and glistening in the rays of the warm mid-day sun. Beyond lay the mountains, much nearer than at morning, for very many of the miles that lay between Milan and the lofty Alps had been passed over by the noble steeds. But they now began to show signs of weariness. They had gone far—they had ridden fast. Foam covered their mouths, and their skins were reeking with sweat. Their pace was much less light and active than at first. They labored more heavily; yet still they went at a rapid rate, and there were no pursuers visible. Two hours more and the wearied travellers were riding along the shores of Lake Maggiore. Already the level plains were far behind them, and hills arose on the borders of the lake. They galloped wildly through the streets of Aruzzo; they rushed past the shore where the Isola Madre and Isola Bella rise from the transparent wave; they reached a rising ground.

Santana was the first to look around. One glance drove the blood to his heart. He turned pale as death. The others glanced immediately afterwards. They saw all. Their pursuers were visible. They were but four miles behind. In the first moment of discovery not a word was spoken. They looked at one another in silent consternation. Yes, there behind them, their pursuers followed swiftly and closely; armed, numerous, unwearied, they were close upon the tracks of their feeble, unarmed and tired victims. With a simultaneous impulse they urged their wearied horses onward at a faster pace. The Alps were now not far away. There they rose, their snowy crests ascending higher and higher the farther back they ran, until they seemed to mingle with the white clouds of the overhanging sky.

"Alas!" cried the old man, "if we could but get there!"

On they went, hopefully, though half despairing. The aged Velletri looked at his daughter with an aching heart. Santana, too, casting many a fevered glance behind him, seemed forever counting the chances of escape.

It was late in the afternoon, and the sun was near the end of his course when they went on among the mountains. The road went more steeply than before—the horses grew more slow and uncertain in their pace. Hark! at a turn in the road, apparently but a short distance behind them, what a thunder tramp of rushing horsemen! It is the sound of their pursuers.

"The frontier is yet four miles away!" cried Santana, with a look of agonizing suspense. "They will be up to us before three. We are unarmed. O, if I had but a gun—but one pistol—I should at least have a struggle for my life!"

"We have no chance whatever of resisting!" cried Velletri, whipping up his horse.

"No use—no use!" said Santana. "My horse cannot do it."

His horse staggered. He lashed the poor beast furiously. Useless; the horse had nobly done his duty; still true to his master, he struggled to obey and go forward, but only to fail. He fell headlong to the earth and lay motionless. Santana leaped from him. Velletri groaned.

"We are lost!" cried Santana. "Fly, fly, Velletri! Fly Laura! I will keep them back for a time. Use well what time is left. You may yet escape."

"No, no; let me stay—me. They will not, cannot harm me! I am innocent. Take my horse and fly. I will wait," cried Laura.

"No, children!" cried Velletri, interrupting them; "you speak thoughtlessly. We can fly no further. We must leave our horses. Let us climb the mountains. See—look up yonder; we can find refuge there."

He pointed to a steep declivity, on the summit of which there was a projecting crag. It lay five hundred feet above them. Instantly he leaped from his horse, and Laura, too, dismounted. Then, as though the time was too precious for words, he led the way, leaving Santana to assist his daughter. Then the fugitives began their toilsome ascent.

The way lay through deep and thawing snow. It was the month of March, and all the snow was rapidly melting. All around, amid the solemn silence, they heard the sound of falling avalanches. Trembling at the fearful noises which boded no good to them, they hurried onward. They ascended two hundred feet, and then reached the foot of the declivity which they had noticed. There was a wall of rock rising precipitously for nearly a hundred feet, and then the steep declivity went back at an angle of forty-five degrees for three hundred feet more. Here the snow lay, a tremendous, accumulated mass full forty feet in depth. Its white face shone terribly upon them as they walked underneath and saw the water trickling in innumerable torrents, and the vast mass about to fall upon them. It seemed as though the touch of a child's hand might send the whole downward in resistless fury.

"Haste—haste! O, what a fearful journey. Here lies our only pathway though!" cried Velletri.

There was no answer as they all pressed forward more quickly. It took not long to pass beyond the shelving rock. Then they turned upwards to reach the top of the declivity. The snow was very deep where they walked. In some places rocks projected, affording a foothold, in others there were deep interstices. On the right lay the smooth expanse of snow which covered the declivity.

They ascended quickly, and soon Laura's limbs failed her. The long ride had weakened her; she trembled and sunk, after a vain attempt to go forward.

Not a word was spoken. Their excitement was too strong—their feeling too deep. Velletri turned with an agonizing look at his daughter fell, but Santana raised her in his arms and rushed up with fitful exertions the remainder of their way. They reached the summit. Panting, and almost fainting with the dreadful toil of the ascent, they turned with a common impulse to look down.

"Lost, lost!"

A choking sensation came to each. They had not seen nor heard their pursuers, in the excitement of the ascent, but their pursuers had seen them! They had quietly dismounted and had reached the foot of the mountain. They were following their tracks. They saw how little hope was left.

"Almighty God!" cried Velletri, raising his eyes to heaven, "Protector of the innocent, help us, for we can no longer help ourselves!"

And lo! even as though in answer to the solemn prayer, they saw the vast mass of snow slowly tremble. A lightning thought darted to the mind of each. The thunder of falling avalanches sounded all around. The vibrations of their fall had loosened this. It seemed suspended but by a thread. Even as the children of Israel looked back upon the pursuing Egyptians, so now did the three fugitives look back upon their foes. And they again cried unto the Lord. Even as they cried again, their foes were visible. They came on quickly. They were at the path which went under the declivity. They looked up and saw their prey.

"Ha, ha! Ecco la!" cried all.

They rushed on. Aiming their guns at their cowering victims, they fired a thundering volley. The echoes spread far and wide. The soldiers rushed under the declivity; and the three fugitives held their breath in awe—in horror. For the echoes of that discharge or its strong vibrations had shaken the treacherous snow. It trembled—it moved all in a mass! O, Heavens! all in a mass! Millions upon millions of tons, it moved onward—downward!

Hark! a hollow sound, then a deeper report, then a rush as of an army; and then, with a long, loud, deafening roar, a roar like loudest thunder, the whole mass descended with irresistible fury downward, sheer downward, upon the heads of the doomed wretches beneath. And as the echoes rolled around amid the Alpine caves, there was mingled with the thunder the roar of the avalanche, the smothered shrieks of the overwhelmed pursuers!

All was over. The rescued ones sang a song of triumph and of gratitude. Their pursuers' horses were on the road and these soon carried them over the frontiers to liberty and happiness.

DESOLATION OF PALESTINE.

In Palestine you are nearly as much in the wilderness as in Arabia; as to inhabitants, they are precisely the things which do not exist, for all you can tell, except in the towns and villages you pass through. You ride on day after day, and you rise over each hill, and sink into each valley, and except an occasional solitary traveller with his servant and his muleteer, or a Turkish officer with his party, rarely does a moving object appear upon the landscape. No cattle are on the land, and no passengers on the highways. The loneliness strikes you more like that of the desert, for it seems unnatural, because here there should be life, and there is none. Sometimes you may make out at a distance on the hillside a single figure, a man on a donkey. It is the only moving thing you can detect all around. From Jerusalem to Beyrout you scarcely light on one single scene of rural industry—not one single scene of life that can be compared with those on the Arab pastures from the top of Jabel el Sufar to the wells of el Mileh. There in places, the country was full of people and children, and flocks and herds—a rejoicing picture of pastoral existence in all its wealth; while here, in the country of village, and towns, and villages, the whole land seemed to lie under a spell.—Leuth's Wanderer in Arabia.

VENTILATION.

Sitting-rooms, school-rooms, sleeping-rooms—every place occupied by human beings, should be well ventilated. In a school-room, for example, thirty feet square and eight feet high, there are 7200 cubic feet of air. Such a room will seat sixty pupils, and allowing seven cubic feet of air per minute to each person—the least allowed by any physiologist—all will be vitiated in less than eighteen minutes. And as all the blood in the human system traverses the whole breathing surface of the lungs in about two and a half minutes, every one who breathes such an impure atmosphere for two and a half minutes, has every particle of his blood acted on by the vitiated air, making it less vital, less capable of repairing waste, and of carrying on the functions of life. And the longer such air is breathed the more impure does it become, and the more corrupt the blood, and the more surely does it lay the foundation for disease and death.—Medical Examiner.

ONE DOLLAR.

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar!

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 71,600 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

[Written for Baillo's Pictorial.]

DEATH.

BY STEEL.

Only an angel,
Whose strains, low and deep,
Gently, peacefully
Waft us to sleep.

Only a floweret,
With thorns, it is true;
Gasp it—'tis struggling,
And beautiful, too.

Only a messenger
Sent from His throne,
Calling his children,
Like prodigals, home.

Only a slumber,
Dreamless and sweet,
Ere the awaking
To bliss most complete.

Only the portal
That leadeth to life;
Only cessation
Of earth's angry strife.

[Written for Baillo's Pictorial.]

THE HOLIDAY OF POVERTY.

BY WILLIAM O. EATON.

"MOTHER, how many years is it since last Christmas?" inquired Bobby Gray, a youth of about six years, of his widowed mother, who was busy "footing" a pair of stockings for his little pedals.

"Only one," said she, with a sigh.

The morrow was to be that festive day, and the poor woman reflected upon the times when it never came round without witnessing comfort and plenty in her abode.

"I don't remember it," said Bobby. "Do you, Thomas?"

"I guess I do," said his brother, proud of his memory and his superior knowledge,—he being about nine. "I remember the turkey Mr. Bates sent us, and the things for the plum pudding Mrs. Johnson gave me, and the pies Deacon Snow sent over. Aint it most time for them to be here this year, mother?"

"Perhaps they'll forget us this year, child," said the widow. "But we must not be selfish. We must think how thankful we ought to be to God, who never forgets us, and who has given us this home to keep warm in, and keeps us from starving, as so many do."

"But it won't be anything like Christmas if they don't send any good things," said Thomas, with a disappointed look. "O how I wish we were rich. I wish I had a sled or a pair of skates, like the Readman boys; they have such fun on the ice—and all I can do is to slide!"

"It would be better to wish for a pair of boots," said Mrs. Gray, looking at the worn-out shoes upon the boy's feet. "Your toes are out, now."

"I wouldn't mind that, if I had a pair of skates," said Thomas, trying to conceal his great toes, which were looking out of the shoes to see if there was likely to be any change in the condition of the family. "Do you suppose, mother, you'll ever be rich enough to buy me a pair of skates?"

"And me, too!" exclaimed Bobby, eagerly.

"Me, too, want skates!" cried out Nannie, a little girl of four years, the youngest of the family, engaged in pulling to pieces a rag doll.

"Perhaps you will all go skating, one of these days," said the widow, smiling; and the idea set the two boys laughing, and little Nannie, too, and then their mother; and they sat down to their meagre breakfast with as cheerful faces as if they had everything heart could wish.

A dry loaf, a few herrings, a little milk and some weak tea constituted the family feast, which they devoured with good appetites, notwithstanding the tattered table-cloth, the broken crockery, the rusty knives and pewter spoons. Hunger and humility made them minor affairs to the widow, and what cared youth for better?

"Shall we have butter, to-morrow?" asked Thomas, his thoughts absorbed in the excitements of Christmas Day.

"Yes, do have butter, and molasses!" added Bobby, suddenly forgetting his breakfast in the thought of such luxuries.

"And canny, too, ma!" insisted Nannie, shaking her head very wisely, while her dirty face and torn frock made her look like a little gipsy.

"Hush, children!" replied their mother, scarcely able to suppress her tears, as she thought how little they vainly asked for and how happy that little would make them. "I will do the best I can, but we must not expect too much."

Too much! She had known far better days than these, with a kind companion and protector, now gone forever; had lived in a larger and more comfortable tenement than this mere hovel, with but two rooms, many of the windows of which were stuffed with rags to keep out the biting wind, and whose walls and floors were rickety with age. Too much!

"How little," thought she, as she surveyed the innocent and anxious faces of her ill clad children, unable to satisfy their simple wishes, "how little from the abundance of our neighbors would be amazing delight to them. But I must divert their thoughts from what they cannot have."

"Mother," said Thomas. "Mr. Sleeveboard, I forgot to tell you, says he thinks he can't pay you so much for making the green jackets as he did. He says he must pay two cents less on each jacket."

"Did he find any fault with the making?"

"No, ma'am; but he said it was getting cold weather now, and it cost him more to live, and fuel was so expensive, too, that he couldn't afford to give so much as he had given."

"He ought to have thought it was more expensive for me to live, too," said Mrs. Gray, sadly.

"That's what a man said, in the store, and told him that if he wished to make up for extra expense he should make it out of his customers, who could afford it; but Mr. Sleeveboard said it did not cost us much of anything to live, and we could get our fuel for nothing. And then I told him that wasn't much, for I had to go nearly a mile to Squire Jenkins's woods and get what brush we burnt, and that it was very hard work; but he made believe he didn't hear me, and I came away, but he called me back and told me not to forget about the two cents! I wish you could have seen the turkeys and chickens and ducks he'd been buying for to-morrow! I had almost a good mind to ask him for one for you, but I thought of the two cents, and it kind of choked me up."

"I am glad you did not ask him—you mustn't beg, Thomas, of anybody," said the widow, her heart chilled by the boy's narrative, "if you can avoid it," she added, suddenly pondering upon the long and dreary winter before them. "We will try to keep from it as hard as we can."

"Mrs. Prawl had to go to the almshouse yesterday," said Thomas. "They said she had been expecting her son home from sea, with money; but a week ago she heard he was drowned, and so she fell sick and couldn't work."

"Poor woman!" sighed Mrs. Gray.

She knew well how to sympathize with Mrs. Prawl, for she had herself lost a son, her eldest, at sea, many years before. The death of her husband, her heart chilled by the boy's narrative, of her lot, until now, though relying upon God, she felt fearful apprehensions of the future, if sickness should also come upon her.

A sudden gust of wind rattling the panes, and the ticking of snow-flakes against them, caused the poor family to look out upon the frozen road and the leafless fields with various emotions.

"We are going to have a snow-storm!"

"Are we?" exclaimed Thomas; and the children rushed joyously to the windows, to watch the first flakes of the season driving through the air. "Then there will be good coasting. O, how I wish we had a sled, so that I and Bobby could coast all day to-morrow! Wouldn't there be fun?"

"Couldn't you buy one, mother?" asked the thoughtless Bobby, accustomed to the idea that she could accomplish almost anything. "One would be enough for both of us, and I could ride behind. O, do!"

"And me ride, too!" cried little Nannie, running to her mother's knee and pleading with her tiny hands and earnest eyes, joined by Bobby.

Thomas stayed at the window. He felt it was impossible to be so blest.

"Couldn't you borrow one, Thomas?"

"The boys would all be wanting theirs themselves. I might try to make one, but we haven't any boards nor nails."

Anxious to do something to make the morrow pass happily with them, their kind mother bethought herself of an old worn-out copper tea-kettle covered with dust in a corner of the room.

"Has any boy got an old sled that you could get cheap?"

"Dimmy Hartshorn has got a new one and an old one. But he's so stingy he wouldn't let me have the old one without I paid for it."

"Well, take the kettle and sell it, and see if you can get the old sled for the money; and then, if it snows enough, you and Bobby can have a good time on Christmas day."

"And me, too!" said the jealous Nannie, tugging at her mother's knees.

"Well, we will see. There, Nannie—look at Thomas!"

Thomas was already out of doors with the old tea-kettle, running up the frozen road as fast as his legs could carry him, that he might complete the coveted bargain before school-time; while the widow, not the least interested of them all, sat down to her work, eager to learn the result.

Bobby and Nannie busied themselves in drawing uncouth figures on the frosted panes—youthful hope making joy in the midst of destitution. Those frosted figures! How often does hope draw cheering images like to them upon the frosted heart of sorrow—too soon, like them, to be dispelled by the light of truth which melts them into tears!

"Thomas is coming back!" exclaimed Bobby, after a while.

"Tommy tummin back!" repeated Nannie.

"Has he got the sled?" asked their mother.

"I don't see it," said Bobby, vainly trying to see what could not be seen.

The experiment had proved a failure. Thomas soon entered, crying, with the tea-kettle.

"Jiminy Hartshorn has split his old sled up, and when I tried to sell the tea-kettle, they told me I had stolen it!"

"I wouldn't mind, Thomas. I'll try some other plan to make you enjoy Christmas."

"I wouldn't have cared so much about the sled," said Thomas, the tears still standing in his eyes, "if it hadn't been for the boys at the shop."

"What did they say to you?"

"When they saw I couldn't sell the tea-kettle, and knew what I brought it for, they set up a shout and called me 'thief,' and 'pedler,' and took my tea-kettle and kicked it about, and pelted me with snow-balls and asked me what I asked for boys—because my knee was torn—and I felt so ashamed because my clothes were so bad, that I couldn't do anything, but came off as fast as ever I could!" And the poor boy burst into tears again.

The widow pressed her boy to her aching heart, without a word, and Bobby, as if some unspeakable calamity had overwhelmed them all, was silent too; but little Nannie ran up to offer comfort by hugging Thomas, and said:

"Don't cry, Tommy—ma give you apple!"

"You must not mind those unfriendly creatures, Thomas," said Mrs. Gray; "they will never be happy, nor loved, with such dispositions. I will make you a new suit out of your poor father's clothes, and then you will look as well as any of them, and better, too, my dear boy. I have kept them a great while because they were the last he ever wore, but it will be better to put them to some good use."

"No, mother," interrupted the boy, observing how she trembled as she spoke; "I'd rather you would keep them safe, and mend these clothes as well as you can. It will be too bad to eat up father's nice clothes. I don't care for the boys. I want to be ashamed any more!"

"That's like your father—my dear, dear boy!" sobbed Mrs. Gray, as she bent over him. "You are a noble child, and you will be rewarded for it. But you shall have the clothes."

It was now time for school, and the two brothers took their books and went off, watching wistfully such people as they passed, bearing home substantial signs of the approach of Christmas day.

While Nannie was busy with such broken toys as were in her possession, the widow knelt and prayed that the many trials and privations of her humble household might be lessened or converted to their ultimate good; and she prayed, too, for those whose calloused and selfish natures were careless or mindless of the poor and destitute, and entreated Heaven that she might be spared long enough to see her children well provided for the future, and to strengthen her heart and limbs for the hard and tedious toils it was hers to undergo. The incidents of the morning caused her to pray longer than she was wont, so much so that little Nannie, noticing that she did not answer when she called attention to her playthings, left them and ceased prattling, and went and knelt by her side, bowing her little head upon a chair, in imitation of her mother.

The distance to the school-house was so great that the boys never returned till school was over for the day; and as they went home this day, they heard the other children boasting gleefully of the great preparations their parents had made for to-morrow, the great Christmas day! of heavy turkeys, plump geese and wild fowl, of well-filled store-rooms and dairies, countless pies of all kinds, and dainty "turn-overs" made especially for themselves—till the mouths of Thomas and Bobby watered at the recital, and they hastened their trudging homeward through the snow, wondering if their mother had received any presents during the day, and if so, what they were!

But they, poor things! were doomed to utter disappointment once more. Nothing had come. The neighbors had forgotten or cared not for the poor family this year, and with sorrowful eyes they warmed themselves at the barren hearth, and thought of the next day, and the rich feasts and joyful sports of their schoolmates.

"I wish Christmas would never come again, mother!" murmured Thomas, as they retired for the night. "Everybody else will be enjoying themselves, and we can't. It's too aggravating!"

"Fie! Thomas; you mustn't be selfish. We must be glad and thankful that we have a home, poor as it is, and are not obliged to be in the almshouse, like Mrs. Prawl."

The widow had worked hard during the day, and the sleep of honest labor and a peaceful conscience was sweet and sound and dreamless to her that night. She awoke with the first faint glimpse of morning, the children still slumbering, and as she looked towards the window, she saw the figure of a man, apparently asleep in a chair, between her and the light! Astonished, alarmed, she uttered an exclamation of fear, as she half arose in bed to assure herself she was not dreaming. The sound startled the strange figure, who sprang to his feet, looking towards her, but not advancing.

"Who's there? Who is it?" exclaimed the widow, fearfully, and her terror increased, she was about giving vent in a scream, when such an outcry was prevented by the magic word of—

"Mother," issuing from the stranger's lips. "It is I—it is Edward! I came after midnight, but I would not wake you."

He sprang forward as he spoke, and with a wild cry of joy, his mother clasped him in her arms. It was a long embrace—long as his exile, sweet as his "return!" And the children, awakened by the noise, united in a cry of fear, till pacified and re-assured by their mother.

The sun was up two hours ere Edward Gray had explained the various causes of his long absence. On his return, through the blunders of his mother's neighbors in another town, he had found it impossible to obtain any trace of her. All efforts to that effect, on succeeding returns, had been as fruitless, until accident disclosed what he so long had sought.

"I am captain now, mother. I have been provident, thanks to your early teachings, and thanks be to God, I have enough means to enable me to assure you that you shall want no more."

And the assurance was a truthful one, so happily made on that holy day of rejoicing, more delightful to that family than it had ever been before. And to them its every return now teaches that they shall never fail of their reward who persevere and trust in God.

It is much easier to think right without doing right, than to do right without thinking right. Just thoughts may, and woefully often do, fail of producing just deeds; but just deeds are sure to beget just thoughts.—Gleanings at Truth.

FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE.

In compliance with the request of many of our friends, we present on this page a fine likeness of Francis A. Durivage, Esq., our associate editor of the Pictorial. It was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry, from a photograph by Masury, Silsbee & Case, and engraved by Mr. Pierce. Mr. Durivage, so well and agreeably known to our readers, is the eldest son of the late Francis S. Durivage, formerly a merchant of this city, but for many years known as a teacher of painting and modern languages in Boston. His mother, a sister of the Hon. Edward Everett, is still living. The subject of our sketch was born in Boston, April 7, 1814, and gave evidence of literary and artistic ability at a very early age. When he entered the Boston Latin School, he was already familiar with the best English authors, and had a grammatical acquaintance with the French language. During his school career, he maintained high rank in his class, and carried off several prizes, among others the gold medal awarded for the best English poem. Long before leaving school, he commenced writing for the Boston press, and his poems were frequently delivered by his schoolmates at public exhibitions without their author's name being known. After leaving the Latin School, he was fitted by private tuition to enter college in an advance class; but though circumstances prevented the realization of this plan, he continued, as even at the present day, to be a laborious student. When but sixteen years of age, he had charge of a literary magazine entitled the "Amateur," established by the late Frederick S. Hill, to which O. W. Holmes, Park Benjamin and others were contributors, both in prose and poetry. At the same time, Mr. Durivage was writing much for the Boston and New York papers; sensitively shrinking from notoriety, however, he did not affix his name to his articles for years, though their popularity and success were remarkable. He has been the anonymous author of several dramatic pieces, one of which, written in connection with a New York literateur, was played many nights in succession at Mitchell's Olympic Theatre. Two or three of his pieces, also unacknowledged, were played at the Boston Museum, when first established. He was for years a regular contributor to the "New York Mirror," when published in quarto form, and edited by his friend Epes Sargent, Esq., also contributing to the "Knickerbocker," and other literary journals. In 1837 and '38, he established a school in this city, which was quite successful; but he soon abandoned the laborious profession of a teacher, to accept a profitable situation at the State House, under the late Simon Borden, then engaged on the State survey of Massachusetts. To Mr. Durivage was assigned the task of preparing for the engravers the draught of the State map, a laborious piece of penmanship, covering a sheet six feet by four in area, crowded with delicate lettering and topographical details. This work was executed in a most masterly manner, the drawing being a facsimile of the finest engraving. At this time, Mr. Durivage hesitated between literature and art, being strongly biased to the latter, and being a fine amateur draughtsman and colorist; indeed some of the earliest architectural drawings of our first volumes of the Pictorial are from his pencil. At this period, he accepted a tempting offer in his favorite field of journalism, and was for many years connected with a daily paper, writing its leading articles, and the dramatic and literary criticisms, paragraphs, etc. Mr. Durivage stands very high as a lyrical poet, his pieces evincing in a remarkable degree grace and melody, and his poems, if collected, would form a volume which would place him in an eminent position among American poets. His literary ventures have proved very successful. In connection with Mr. Burnham, he published a volume entitled "Stray Subjects," a few years since, in which were embraced his humorous contributions to the "New York Spirit of the Times," which had a prodigious sale, forming one of Carey & Hart's series of "Humorous American Writers." In 1849, in association with Mr. William S. Chase, he translated "Lamartine's History of the Revolution of 1848," published by Phillips & Sampson, which had a large sale. This version is remarkable for its fidelity and the elegance of its diction, and is a standard work with scholars: it also elicited the warm thanks of M. de Lamartine. In 1853, Mr. Durivage published a collection of his romantic and humorous tales and sketches, chiefly contributed to our own papers, "The Flag of our Union" and "Ballou's Pictorial," under the title of "Life Scenes," which was also highly successful. Mr. Durivage has been for some years connected with the Boston Custom House, where he still holds a responsible position, honorably maintained by his attention to his duties, and by courtesy to the merchants with whom he is brought in contact, giving a striking proof that the culture of letters and art does not necessarily unfit a man for the active duties of life. His editorial association with ourself is of several years' standing, and for a long period he has written only for the "Flag" and "Pictorial." We doubt if there is another man in the country of his age who has produced and printed so much matter. The great secret of his universal success is the fact that he gives his whole soul to whatever he undertakes, and always does his best. We have ever found him a choice companion, a firm and consistent friend, frank, true and unselfish, and are glad of this opportunity to speak of him as we feel. Mr. Durivage is married, and has a very interesting family, presenting the most agreeable phase of domestic happiness.

FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ESQ.

CITY OF GENEVA, SWITZERLAND.

The beautiful engraving below, with its fine effects of light and shade, is an accurate representation of the renowned old city of Geneva, as seen from the lovely lake on the shores of which it stands. It is quite a picturesque place, with its massive blocks of houses, its towers and church spires, while the mingled beauty and boldness of the scenery that surrounds it, the rare combination of mountain and water, invests it with a peculiar charm. It is the most populous city of Switzerland, although the capital of one of the smallest cantons. It is built upon two hills divided by the river Rhone as it issues from the lake. The river forms an island within the city, which is built over and connected with the other parts by bridges. The buildings are not elegant, as if the inhabitants thought it were a waste of time and money to attempt imposing architecture surrounded by scenery of such matchless grandeur and beauty. One portion of the town stands much lower than the other, and this lower part is the theatre of the greatest commercial activity. The streets are narrow and the houses high, many of them with projecting eaves supported by wooden pillars. The church of St. Peters, the most prominent object in our view, is not very striking externally, but its interior is a fine and well-preserved specimen of the Gothic architecture of the 11th century. The Museum, founded by General Rath, contains many works by native artists. The geological collections of Laussure, the first man who ascended Mount Blanc, "the monarch of mountains," the fossil plants of Brogniart and De Candolle, and M. Necker's valuable collections, are deposited in the Museum of Natural History. The Promenade de la Treille, a broad walk planted with trees, just above the cathedral, is a favorite resort. The Botanical Gardens are valuable and well kept. From some points of the ramparts, the buildings on the west, rising in amphitheatrical form, and crowned by the cathedral towers, have a fine effect, and the views in other directions are enchanting or imposing. On the west are the stern Jura mountains, to the south and east appear numerous lofty elevations, while Mount Blanc towers in the distance, seeming from its huge bulk to be near at hand, though fifty miles away. Geneva was one of the scenes of Calvin's arduous labors, and here he founded a seminary for the education of young men in the Protestant faith. He founded the library attached to the college which stands behind the cathedral, and contains about 40,000 volumes. There are many valuable autograph letters in this collection. Geneva has given birth to many eminent persons. Jean Jacques Rousseau was born here. M. Necker, the father of Madame de Stael, was a Genevese, and in Switzerland that lady passed a portion of her life when exiled from France by the first Napoleon. Geneva is noted, among other things, as being the chief seat of the watch manufacture of Switzerland. As early as the 17th century, some workmen had constructed wooden clocks with weights, taking for their model the parish clock which was placed in the church of Locle, in the year 1630. The idea of using springs had not at that time been entertained. Towards the close of that century, a Swiss mountaineer, returning from a long voyage, brought with him the first watch his countrymen had ever seen, and confided it to a skillful workman, named Richard, to be repaired. Richard did his work well, and after a thorough examination of the works, undertook the task of making a watch himself. In so doing, he had to surmount great difficulties, for he was obliged to contrive and manufacture tools to accomplish his purpose. He succeeded, however, and his example was followed by several others of his countrymen. In this manner, watchmaking, which has proved such a lucrative branch of business, was established. It is only about eighty years since a few merchants began to collect small parcels of watches to sell again in foreign countries. The success which attended this venture led to the increase of the manufacture. Musical boxes and jewelry also contribute to the commercial prosperity of Geneva; for the production of which, in prosperous years, 75,000 ounces of gold, 5000 marks of silver and precious stones to the value of 1,000,000 francs are said to be used. The articles manufactured all receive government inspection, so important is it to maintain the mechanical reputation of the city. Geneva always attracts a large number of travellers, particularly Americans, during the fine season; and artists of all countries are always to be found in the vicinity sketching the varied and unrivalled scenery of the environs, attractions in themselves.

VIEW OF GENEVA, FROM THE LAKE.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

SPLINTERS.

.... Why is a gunsmith's shop like a chicken-pie? Because it contains fowliu'-pieces (fowl-in-pieces).

STEADY PURPOSES.

MIND AND MATTER.—Brilliant ideas are like shirt-buttons—they are always off when we are in a hurry.

MARRIAGES.

DEATHS.

TERMS:—INVARIABLE IN ADVANCE.

|                             |        |
|-----------------------------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year..... | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers, " " " "..... | 10 00  |
| 10 " " " " " " " ".....     | 20 00  |

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis.

*— One copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL and one copy of THE FLAG of our Union, when taken together by one person, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 WATER STREET, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

HEAVEN.

BY C. G. WILKES.

There is a land of pure and holy rest,
Where reigns eternal day;
A chosen land for those whom God has blest,
And called from earth away;
For those who have fulfilled their mission here,
When earth's last tie is riven,
And life departs, bright angels hover near,
And wait the soul to heaven.

It is a land unknown to grief and care,
Unknown to death and sin;
Sorrow nor grief can ever enter there,
Where all is joy within.
When the dark journey of this life is o'er,
And twilight fades at even,
The weary pilgrim, wanderer now no more,
Finds love and home in heaven.

Jesus has said, "Ask, and ye shall receive,
And never thirst again;"
That they who in his holy name believe,
Shall never seek in vain.
When this poor dust turns to its mother earth,
And yields the spirit given,
The soul shall find in that immortal birth,
Eternal rest in heaven.

DETERMINATION

A quiet smile played round his lips,
As the eddies and dimples of the tide
Play round the bows of ships
That steadily at anchor ride.
And with a voice that was full of glee,
He answered, "Ere long we will launch
A vessel as goodly, and strong, and staunch,
As ever weathered a wintry sea."—LONGFELLOW

A RETROSPECT.

I have lost forever
The paradise of young and happy thoughts,
And now stand, in the middle of my life,
Looking back through my tears—ne'er to return.—ALEX. SMITH.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

We passed a very pleasant half hour, the other day, in the gallery of the "Boston Art Club," in Bedford Street, and we advise our city friends to go and do likewise. And we trust the example will be followed, not by mere "flâneurs," but by some of our solid men, who have elegant establishments, and the means of gracing them with works of art. They will find pictures there by Wight, Champney, Griggs, Frost and Gay, that would grace any drawing-room or private gallery. We were particularly struck with the landscapes of Frost. They are true to nature, rich and deep in color, with most felicitous atmospheric effects. Our young landscapists are working in the right direction. The influence of the pre-Raphaelite school is visible in their careful studies of nature. Painting in the field is much more common than heretofore. Artists are not satisfied with crude pencil sketches, to be afterwards worked up with conventional color—many of them now finish in the field. We have abundance of artistic talent among us, which only requires the genial sun of patronage to produce abundant fruit. Before dismissing Art from this week's "gossip," we must briefly notice John Faed's fine painting, "Shakespeare and his Contemporaries," lately exhibited at Wiggins's, 19 Tremont Street. It is a finely drawn, well characterized, and rich-colored picture. Excluding the frame and the surroundings, we were carried back into the Elizabethan era, and actually "assisted," as the French say, at the "feast of reason and the flow of soul" at the old Mermaid Club. We stand before Shakespeare and his friends face to face, forgetting for a while business, stocks, politics, murder, mishaps, the weather, and all the trials and tribulations—all the movement and irritation of the 19th century. The central figure of the group is painted with great grace and effect. The rich costumes of the day afford every desirable accuracy, and are admirably handled. The engraving from this masterpiece is worthy of the original. From pictures to railroads is an abrupt transition; but we must relate a "story of the rail," which happened the other day. There is a stopping-place on the Fitchburg road between Porter's and Wellington Hills, known as "Hill's Crossing." Well, the other day, just before reaching it, the conductor called out, as usual, "Hill's Crossing!"—"What did you say?" asked a tall Western man, in a bearskin cap, jumping to his feet. "Hill's Crossing!"—"Well, let him cross," said the Wolverine. "It's his own lookout, if he gets run over!"—"Squire Jakes, of Montpellier, was a hard case. He was inordinately fond of money—in fact, he worshipped it. A few days before his death, he was sitting up in his arm-chair, looking very poorly, when a neighbor happened in to see him. "How do you find yourself, Squire?" asked the sympathizing friend. "Very poorly. I'm as weak as a baby—haint got no strength left. My folks prop me up in this here arm-chair, but it don't make me feel no better. The doctors tell me I can't never get over it, and I believe them. Why, Mister Jones, if you was to lay a silver dollar now between my feet, I really don't think I'd have strength to pick it up."—"By George!" said neighbor Jones, "I wouldn't risk a half dollar—no, nor a sixpence, either; you'd be sure to have it!" Rather an unfeeling remark, perhaps, under the circumstances—but it was true. A very clever and valuable paper is the "Waltham Sentinel." It is conducted on the true principle which ought to govern suburban journals—that is, it confines itself to the interests of the town—to researches into its antiquities, its statistics, etc.; and the articles on these subjects are written with great care and spirit. We hope our Waltham friends will sustain it. It has now entered on its second volume. It is very handsomely printed, and not of too great a size for preservation. A great many of our farmers are turning their attention to the cultivation of cranberries. From five-eighths of an acre of upland, in West Danvers, Mr. Elias Needham sold, last year, 57 bushels of cranberries, which, with 14 bushels of apples raised on the same land, brought him in $440. Who will say that fruit-raisers have not as good a chance to make money as merchants and traders? The New York Picayune publishes a receipt for opening oysters with a razor. When travelling, we have been favored with the use of razors which seemed to have been employed for the above purpose. The best cosmetic in the world is temperance; and the best recipe for whitening the hands—honesty. People remember whatever they take an interest in. A miser never forgets his debtors, but cannot possibly remember the poor. It is understood that Mr. Wise, the aeronaut, at his next ascension proposes to let down a Broadway belle, instead of the ordinary parachute. We predict a total failure. In the present inflated condition of skirts, a lady would go up instead of going down. We publish the following at the request of a friend, who is a monomaniac on the subject of puns:—A lunatic pauper was lately discovered with his foot in a mill-wheel out West. When extricated from his perilous position, and asked how he had come there, he answered, with an insouciant smile, that he was trying how it felt to travel in cog. . . . The Boston Transcript lately announced a "Lecture by Winter." Now the winter referred to, was not the "winter of our discontent," which will be made "glorious summer" one of these days, but Mr. William Winter—no relation of Jack Frost, but one of our most promising young literateurs. . . . The member of our legislature who proposed raising peat from seed, was probably an amateur agriculturist, and had heard of raising tenpenny nails out West, by planting crowbars. . . . A wasp's nest usually contains 12,000 or 16,000 cells. Isn't the story a "sell" itself? It seems rather "fishy." . . . The emperor of France has a revenue of thirty-two millions of francs, and the poor fellow finds it hard to make both ends meet with that income; so that the "pinching shoe" is felt in high, as well as low stations—at least, so his minister, Mr. Fould, tells the Parisians. A Yankee would not be so apt to be foiled. . . . Once in a while we see in an English paper a hearty admission of superiority on the part of Americans. The London Times lately said, that the principal hotel in Chicago was a grander establishment than any in the great British metropolis. The author of "Dore" tells us that the English hotels do not keep up with the times—they are managed the same way they were a century ago. . . . The spread of the Bible is an encouraging feature of the age. The Rev. Dr. Dowbig, of New York, in his address at the anniversary of the Philadelphia Bible Society, stated that more than ten times as many Bibles have been printed and issued in the last fifty years, than had ever been issued in the whole world previous to that time. . . . Emerson does not speak very flatteringly of the religion of England. He says:—"The doctrine of the Old Testament is the religion of England. The first leaf of the New Testament it does not open. It believes in a Providence which does not treat with levity a pound sterling. They are neither Transcendentalists nor Christians. They put up no Socratic prayer—much less any saintly prayer for the queen's mind. They ask neither for light nor right, but say bluntly, 'grant her in health and wealth long to live.' . . . The implication of women in some of the recent murder cases is a sad social feature. If a virtuous woman is but little lower than an angel, the woman who falls is a fit associate for fiends. . . . Some cases of garroting in New York are not followed by fatal consequences. Friend Fuller, of the Mirror, is responsible for the following case:—"As a gentleman was about leaving a house in the fashionable quarter of the city, where he had been spending the evening, a pair of white arms were thrown around his neck, and his lips were stifled. The suddenness of the attack deprived him of all power of resistance. As usual, no policeman was to be seen." Against such an attack, what weapons are available? Retaliation seems justifiable in such a case. . . . The Keokuk (Iowa) Post gives the instance of a young man who located in that city some time since without a shilling, and in ninety days was worth $8000. Such cases, it states, are quite common. Such rapid accumulation of wealth is, of course, exceptional. But almost all our rich men commenced life with little or nothing. . . . A celebrated D. D. was assaulted by a street robber, lately, in New York, and politely requested to "stand and deliver." The clergyman, quite after the manner of the world, drew from the folds of his shawl a pistol, at sight of which the thief inconspicuously dispersed. Parsons, as well as publicans and sinners, must show pluck under such circumstances. The non-resistant principle is suicide in case of a highway attack. . . . It is not improbable that New York city will overtake London in population in about fifty years. . . . It is said Miss Hutton, an American lady, residing in Paris, might have married Count de Moray, with his fifty-three years and twenty-three millions, had she chosen. But the young belle probably thought, with Cardinal Richelieu, "Bah! the mate for beauty is a man, and not a money-chest." . . . The great French dramatist, Molière, was the unsparring enemy of physicians. Sganarelle, in the "Festin de Pierre," when disguised as a doctor, undertakes to prove the virtues of "emetic wine" in the following manner:—"A poor fellow had been lying at the point of death for several days, given up by his physicians, but unable to give up the ghost. An emetic was administered, and he died instantly! . . . Drawing is now, as it should be, an indispensable branch of education. Winckelman says:—Aristotle tells us that the Greeks taught their children the art of drawing, with a view to enable them to judge, with discernment and taste, of those bodily proportions that constitute true beauty. . . . The legislature of Maine has passed resolves in opposition to the repeal of the fishing bounties by Congress. It will be remembered that a Washington orator styled the recipients of those bounties, the "codfish aristocracy." This same "codfish aristocracy" is a very hard-working class, and gets along by hook and crook. . . . Holders of Spanish coins now pay their charity dues in that depreciated currency, thus saving twenty per cent. . . . Crows are great destroyers of corn—cates and effect. . . . We know not whom to credit with the following affecting narrative:—A printer, who was recently "flung" by his sweetheart, went to the office and tried to commit suicide with the "shooting-stick," but the thing wouldn't go off. The "devil" wished to pacify him, and told him to peep into the sanctum, where the editor was writing duns to delinquent subscribers. He says that picture of despair "reconciled him to his fate." . . . Four millions of dollars have been expended in searching for Sir John Franklin, yet his faithful wife does not yet give him up. Such a woman is worthy of so heroic an adventurer. How bravely she has borne up against that "hope deferred, which maketh the heart sick!" . . . A waggish newspaper publishes the marriage of F. Plummer Hobson, Esq., to a daughter of Governor Wise, of Virginia, under the caption of "Hobson's Choice." Another waggish newspaper says: "Well, Hobson's choice was a Wise one." When Governor Wise himself was married, a waggish friend pointed out his example to a confirmed old bachelor, and, quoting Scripture, bade him "Go and do like-Wise." . . . The reason why Madame Rachel's house in Paris was so liked lately is a curious one. The staircase was built before crinolines; and as the ladies could not get in to look at it, there were no bidders. Perhaps Rachel is anxious to sell for the same reason. . . . The estimated value of the property of the late Joshua Sears, of this city, is $1,000,000. He gave away large sums in charity during his life. . . . We pity the poor Dutchman, who took his bag of Spanish quarters to the Niagara County Bank, and was told by the teller that they were only received for twenty cents each. The poor man exclaimed, with a pitiful expression of countenance, "I save 'em because de bills break; and now, by gracious, de silver break, too!" . . . The captain-general of Cuba has given permission to "all persons" to land coodles in Cuba; so that henceforth the trade in those wretched individuals will be unrestricted. . . . It is estimated that the number of persons afflicted by insanity in the United States, at this time, reaches the large figure of 25,000. In this estimate, the "morally insane" are not included.

A bell warbles the more mellifluous in the air when the sound of the stroke is over, and when another swims out from underneath it, and pants upon the element that gave it birth. In like manner the recollection of a thing is frequently more pleasing than the actuality; what is harsh is dropped in the space between.—Landor.

The righteous man has a stronger tower than the sinner lacks. He is fit to battle with solitude and fearful darkness; an unseen light shines in upon his soul—an unseen hand sustains him. The darkness is no darkness to him, for the Sun of righteousness is nigh.—Charles Reade.

Choice Miscellany.

VAGABONDISM IN THE OLDEN TIME.

For an able-bodied man to be caught a third time begging, was held a crime deserving of death, and the sentence was intended on fit occasions to be executed. The poor man's advantages, which I have estimated at so high a rate, were not purchased without drawbacks. He might not change his master at his will, nor wander from place to place; he might not keep his children at home unless he could answer for their time. If out of employment, preferring to be idle, he might be demanded for work by any master of the "craft" to which he belonged, and compelled to work whether he would or no. If caught begging once, being neither aged nor infirm, he was whipped at the cart's tail. If caught a second time, his ear was slit, or bored through with a hot iron. If caught a third time, and thereby proved to be of no use upon this earth, but to live upon it only to his own hurt, and that of others, he suffered death as a felon. So the law of England remained for sixty years. First drawn by Henry, it continued unrepented all through the reigns of Edward and Mary—subsisting, therefore, with the deliberate approval of both of the great parties between whom the country was divided. Reconsidered under Elizabeth, the same law was again formally passed; and it was, therefore, the expressed conviction of the English nation, that it was better for a man not to live at all, than to live a profitless and worthless life. The vagabond was a sore spot upon the commonwealth, to be healed by wholesome discipline, if the gangrene was not incurable; to be cut with the knife, if the milder treatment of the cart-whip failed to be of profit.—Froude's History of England.

LAMARTINE'S OPINION OF WOMEN.

The following, from one of his late works, will give our readers a pleasant introduction to the writings of this distinguished Frenchman:—"Woman, with weaker passions than man, is superior to him by the soul. The Gauls attributed to her an additional sense—the divine sense. They were right. Nature has given to women painful but heavenly gifts, which distinguish them, and often raise them above human nature—compassion and enthusiasm. By compassion, they devote themselves; by enthusiasm, they exalt themselves. What more does heroism require? They have more heart, and more imagination than men. Enthusiasm springs from the imagination, and self-sacrifice from the heart. Women are, therefore, more naturally heroic than men. All nations have in their annals some of those miracles of patriotism, of which woman is the instrument in the hands of God. When all is desperate in a national cause, we need not despair while there remains a spark of resistance in a woman's heart, whether she is called Judith, Clelia, Joan of Arc, Vittoria Colona, in Italy, or Charlotte Corday in our own day. God forbid that I compare those I cite! Judith and Charlotte Corday sacrificed themselves, but their sacrifices did not recoil at crime. Their inspiration was heroic, but their heroism mistook its aim; it took the poignard of the assassin, instead of the sword of the hero. Joan of Arc used only the sword of defence; she was not merely inspired by heroism, she was inspired by God."

FREEZING TO DEATH.

To be frozen to death, many would consider a frightful torture, from their own experience of the effects of cold. But here we fall into the usual error of supposing the suffering will increase with the energy of the agent, which could only be the case if sensibility remained the same. Intense cold brings on speedy sleep, which fascinates the senses, and fairly beguiles men out of their lives. A most curious example of the seductive power of cold is found in the adventures of the botanical party, who, in Cook's first voyage, were caught in a snow storm on Terra del Fuego. Dr. Solander, by birth a Swede, and well acquainted with the destructive effects of a rigorous climate, admonished the company, in defiance of lassitude, to keep moving on. "Whoever," said he, "sits down, will sleep; and whoever sleeps, will perish." The doctor spoke as a sage, but he felt as a man. In spite of the remonstrances of those whom he had instructed and alarmed, he was the first to lie down and die. The same warning was repeated a thousand times in the retreat from Moscow. Alison, the historian, to try the experiment, sat down in his garden at night when the thermometer had fallen four degrees below zero; and so quickly did the drowsiness come stealing on, that he wondered how a soul of Napoleon's unhappy band had been able to resist the treacherous influence.—London Quarterly.

THE DEATH OF CHILDREN.

The old and weather-beaten tree, upon whose branches the winds and storms of many winters have fallen, changing its verdant green and freshness to an almost perpetual sere and yellow leaf, and hanging the limbs with festoons of moss, like the gray hairs of some venerable man, may, like the aged veteran, fall and pass away; and it is but the lot of mortals—they were "born to die." But the young and thrifty tree, with its upright waving branches covered with bright flowers, promising a golden harvest—when we see the tornado sweep it away in an instant, or when the forked lightnings curl around it, and it is blackened and dead, we are startled, and we cry, "It was too young—too beautiful to die!" And thus, when the old man dies, full of years and honors, our sorrow is not so startling, because age has prepared us for it. But the young, for whom we anticipate many years of happiness; on whom the parent leans, looking forward through a long vista of hopeful, happy years—when death comes and tears these away, the heart is pierced. It feels an agony unutterable, and the parent will mourn, and will not be comforted, because they are not.—California Farmer.

WHITE TEETH.

The famous Dr. Nicholas Sanderson, although entirely blind, being one day in company, remarked of a lady who had just left the room, and who was wholly unknown to him, that she had very white teeth. The company were anxious to learn how he had made the discovery; for it happened to be true. "I can think of no motive," said the professor, "for her laughing incessantly, but that of showing her teeth." Dr. Sanderson was blind from infancy, but became eminent as a classical scholar and mathematician, and occupied for many years the chair of mathematics in Cambridge University, England. He judged philosophically, and from his observation of human nature, in the case of the lady's teeth; but he possessed in a high degree the sense of feeling and hearing. He could distinguish true from counterfeit Roman medals by the touch. He could tell, by some effect of the air upon his person, when light clouds were passing over the disc of the sun. When he entered a room, he could judge of the size of it, by the sound of his footsteps.—Spectator.

Editorial Mixture.

The town of Westfield, Mass., has voted $5000 as a permanent fund, to comply with the terms of the bequest of the late Stephen Harrison, for the establishment of an agricultural branch to Westfield Academy. — The capital stock of the manufacturing companies in Lowell, is $13,900,000. — At the Isle of Shoals it has been colder this past winter than ever known before, and the weather acted disastrously upon the small fishes that seek the shallow waters. Cunnere and the like have been washed upon the shore dead, in cart-loads. — Accounts from Salt Lake state that Brigham Young is fast declining towards the grave. — If the cost of railways were distributed equally among the people, those of the United States would amount to a tax of thirty dollars for each man, woman and child. — In Louisville, Ky., lately, a divorce was granted a gentleman named Collier, who is eighty years of age. — Not long since, Mrs. Polly Noyes, engaged in nursing a sick man in Salisbury, Vt., inhaled, by accident, the odor arising from an uncorked bottle of strychnine, and in a few hours after died. — Twenty-five casks of porter froze and exploded on the Grand Trunk Railway during the cold season lately. — It is stated in the Richmond Enquirer that the Hon. Edward Everett has already placed in the hands of trustees $12,000 at 7 per cent. interest, and $500 at 6 per cent. interest—the proceeds of his oration—for the benefit of the Mount Vernon fund. — The Vermont State Fair is to be held at Montpelier, on the 8th, 9th, 10th and 11th of September next. The Society have raised the premiums on all neat stock. — The artesian well now being bored at Augusta, Ga., has reached a depth of nearly one hundred feet. For the last forty-five feet, the boring has been effected through gold-bearing quartz. — The damage to steamboats by the recent freshet in Ohio is estimated at $160,000. About thirty boats were more or less injured. — The Typographical Society of Philadelphia has taken preliminary measures for the establishment of an asylum for superannuated printers and the widows and orphans of deceased printers. — There are 459 harbors on the Atlantic coast of the United States. — The military committee of both houses have agreed that it is proper to add ten dollars a month to the cadets at West Point—now twenty-four dollars. — Our small-foot American belles need only go to Russia to add a rose-leaf to their full cup of conquest. The Russian nobility are as sensitive as Lord Byron to the aristocracy of small feet. No person can be well-born (they say with the Arabs), unless water will flow beneath the arch of the instep, with the foot standing bare on the ground. — The expenditures of the city schools of Detroit last year were $25,354. — A dog was caught at Pawtucket, the other night, in the act of stealing hens. He had evidently been trained for the business, and pursued it with great skill, seizing the fowls by the neck, and carrying them to his employer, who waited a short distance off. — Sir Henry Hallford, in his account of the deaths of eminent persons, says he saw a prescription once, in which a portion of the human skull was ordered, in a powder, to Sir Nicholas Throckmorton. — A workman in a brewery in St. Louis, named Brown, fell head foremost into a kettle of boiling liquor, not long since, and died in great agony. — The British returns of silver and gold sent to the East, principally to China, in six years, from 1850 to 1856, inclusive, is $176,000,000, of which $153,585,000 was in silver. Let no one ask, hereafter, what becomes of the silver. — No less than ten bridges are already built, projected, or in process of construction across the Mississippi River, at various points above St. Louis. — An eminent ship-builder in New York has contracted with a company of land-holders in California, for the construction of two mammoth steamships, each of 7000 tons, designed for the conveyance of 3000 passengers, to accomplish the trip via the Isthmus, in fifteen days. — It is said that of the entire trade of Africa, which is believed to amount to the annual sum of one hundred millions of dollars, Great Britain enjoys from the west coast alone full twenty-five millions, while the trade of the United States with the entire continent is only a little more than three millions of dollars.

GREAT SHOOTING.—A correspondent, "Spy-glass," tells us of some tall duck-shooting in our bay during the last winter, by Mr. Belcher, of Winthrop, a renowned sportsman of these parts. He had a gunning-boat, dressed up and disguised with ice cakes, in which, perfectly concealed, he approached the air-holes where the ducks fed, making awful cunnage among them with his unerring gun. He killed at one shot sixteen black ducks (the wildest of the wild), recovering thirteen of them. We should like to know if any correspondent of "Porter's Spirit" can match this!

BIRDS OF PREY.—Since the fact was published that the Lowell factory girls have nearly a million and a quarter of dollars in the Savings' Banks, thousands of nice young men have started for Spindledom, all ready to make disinterested proposals for hearts and hands.

CLEANLINESS.—Count Rumford thought that no person scrupulously attentive to cleanliness could ever be a consummate villain. So that all we have to do for the morals of New York or Boston, is to establish gratuitous baths in those great cities.

A SOUR REMEDY.—Three table-spoonful of lemon juice per diem, it is said, will effect a cure for rheumatism, in, we don't know what time.

SPIRITUALISM.—Isn't it strange that none of the "spirits" have proclaimed the authors of some of the late secret murders?

Wayside Gatherings.

Liquid manuring having been very successful in 1856, in the practice of some farmers in England, the system will be greatly extended during the next season.

The Erie Gazette says a petition is in circulation, asking Congress to appropriate $20,000 towards the erection of a monument to the memory of Commodore Oliver Hazard Perry, in the Erie Cemetery.

In the case of Taylor vs. Taylor, at Fredericksburg, Va., Judge John Robertson, the counsel for the plaintiff, made a speech which occupied five days! What must have been the feelings of the judge!

A man in Weymouth had his store blown up the other day by the explosion of a stick of wood stolen from the woodpile of a tenant of his, a poor widow. He then turned the woman out of doors!

The Newburn, N. C., Transcript says that within ten or twelve miles of that city, on the north side of the Neuse, bears, catamounts and wild-cats exist in such numbers that it is impossible to raise hogs or sheep.

The New York Evangelist heads one of its columns "Sunny Side." This column contains eighteen items, all relating to presents to pastors, during the recent holidays, amounting in the aggregate to ten thousand dollars.

The Postmaster General has authorized one of his assistants to say that it is not the duty of a postmaster to place postage-stamps upon circulars and other transient printed matter deposited for mailing in his office. This must be done by the sender.

The Boston Corn Exchange have voted to discontinue the practice of using eighths and sixteenths of a dollar in their reckoning when making sales of flour, etc., and will hereafter employ only the decimal currency.

The Dayton, Ohio, Gazette, relating the freezing to death of 125 hogs at a railroad depot in that city, describes their features as "being stiffened in the last expression of suffering in which the frosty king of terrors had seized them."

William E. Thompson, formerly commercial editor of the New York Courier and Enquirer, and lately an absconder with moneys fraudulently obtained from various friends, has been overtaken in England, and compelled to fork over $2439 of his stolen funds.

A little son of Horace Stiles, of Waterford, N. Y., who was recently bitten by a dog (which was not mad, and is now living), has died of hydrophobia, which was caused by the bite. Thus it is seen that madness in the animal is not necessary to make the bite fatal.

By a course of brutal treatment, one Odisleuger, in Buckingham county, Iowa, has caused the death of a "little bound boy," an orphan and a Dane by birth. After his death, the inhuman master crowded the body into an old boot box, and was about to bury it in a field near by, when he was arrested for man-slaughter.

Most of the canals in the country are losing their business and depreciating in value. In 1853, the aggregate amount of receipts on the five canals in Ohio was $633,203.20; in 1856, it was $427,813.99; decrease $205,389.21. This decrease has proceeded gradually from year to year, and is likely to go on still further.

There is a farmer in Bethany, Conn., who has not worn a hat, or any other covering on his head, for twenty years, summer or winter, and who says his head is never cold. During the severe weather in the latter part of January, he might have been seen working roads through the snow in that, with thick, warm mittens on his hands, but no covering on his head.

Mr. McKay, son of the district attorney of Wyoming county, N. Y., is in jail at Buffalo, for making and issuing counterfeit coin. The dies used by him, came into his father's possession as a prosecuting officer, on the trial of a man, some time before, for the same offence. His son found them and used them. He is twenty-two years of age.

Mr. Caleb Upham, of Weathersfield, Vt., an old man in his eighty-third year, having had some trouble with a couple of men in the management of his farm, and getting into a dispute with them, said that he would die first, but that he would have his own way a part of the time, and saying these words, dropped dead. He was a highly respectable old man.

A man passing himself off as Dr. Stephenson has been cutting a figure at Petersburg, Va., and was about to marry a member of a respectable and wealthy family, when it was established that he was a penitentiary convict from York, Pa., and had served a full three years term at the weaving business in the East Pennsylvania institution.

An Irish family at Lowell, Mass., applied lately at the mayor's office for relief, and on visiting their dwelling, every indication of squalid poverty appeared, but further examination disclosed nearly a barrel of flour, a barrel of crackers, three-fourths of a ton of coal and half a cord of split wood. The woman of the house would not allow the examination to proceed further, and it was not necessary.

A Mrs. Ross, at Niagara, lately died very suddenly in the night, nobody being in the house at the time but a little grand-daughter, aged three years. The child was unable to open the door, and remained until the next afternoon in solitary companionship with the corpse, which lay stretched upon the floor. She was then discovered by the neighbors who were attracted to the house by her cries.

Curdot, a French engineer, has invented a railroad car brake, consists of a series of brakes acting upon the rails, instead of upon the wheels, in the usual manner. It is stated that he is enabled to check the motion of a train running at the rate of sixty kilometres, or thirty-seven and a half miles per hour, in the distance of four hundred and forty feet, without producing a sensible shock to the passengers in the train.

The self-acting car coupling, by which cars may be connected by merely pushing their buffers together, is a valuable improvement on the old method of connecting. The connection is effected by means of a peculiar hook-shaped bar, weighted at one end, and so made that when the buffers come together, the bar turns slightly upon its side, which allows the hook to enter the buffer, and then resume its first position, thus hooking the cars together—no springs being used.

An affecting incident is related by a Donegal (Ireland) paper. A young boy and his sister, returning homeward, had to cross a mountain. The night was dark and stormy, and they lost their way. Next morning both were found dead from exposure. The boy and girl lay side by side—the latter with her arms around her brother's neck, and her flannel petticoat, removed from her own body, was wrapped round his feet. Thus did the affectionate creature perhaps sacrifice her own life in a vain effort to sustain that of her young brother.

Foreign Items.

Artificial milk is now manufactured quite extensively in France, from bones!

There is a glut of Circassian girls now in the Constantinople market, and the price of handsome ones has come down from $500 to $25.

The texture of the yashmak, or Turkish veil, is now so exquisitely fine, that the two square yards of muslin which compose it, do not weigh more than a single drachm!

Political arrests in Sicily increase in the most deplorable and odious manner, without any discrimination, and even against the opinion of the local authorities.

The China Mail says, that the pirates in and around Canton, and especially in the mien, or entrances to the harbor, have lately become more numerous and daring than ever before experienced.

Advises from Catania, dated January 22, state "that commerce is entirely at a stand; the theatres are abandoned, the clubs are closed, the streets are silent and almost deserted, for nobody is met but agents of the police escorted by military."

The illustrious family of the Foscari, at Venice, has become extinct. A few years ago, two old ladies of the name inhabited a room in the family palace, and the last male scion of the Foscari not long since died as an inferior member of a travelling theatrical company.

Sands of Gold.

.... Who would not be honest, if they knew its sweets?—Charles Reade.

.... A talent is perfected in solitude; a character in the stream of the world—Goth.

.... As wit is too hard for power in council, so power is too hard for wit in action—Wycherly.

.... However small society may be, if it is a human one, jealousy will creep in.—Charles Reade.

.... A man can do without his own approbation in much society, but must make great exertions to gain it when he lives alone.—Sydney Smith.

.... Our hopes, though they never happen, yet are some kind of happiness; as trees, whilst they are growing, please in the prospect.—Wycherly.

.... He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune; for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or mischief.—Bacon.

.... Experience teaches us indulgence; the wisest man is he who doubts his own judgment with regard to the motives which actuate his fellow-men.—Talbot.

.... O, there is nothing holier in this life of ours, than the first consciousness of love—the first fluttering of its silken wings—the first rising sound and breath of that wind which is so soon to sweep through the soul, to purify or to destroy.—Hyperion.

Joker's Budget.

What country in Central America does an African who bores you, resemble? Nienragua. (Nigger-anger!)

If a man's worth depends on his acres, a person with eight decayed teeth should be considered a man of property. Assessors will please notice.

Hear what a cynic says of women. "When they are maids, they are as mild as milk; once make them wives, and they lean their backs against their marriage certificate and defy you."

There are trees so tall in Wisconsin, that it takes two men and a boy to look to the top of them. One looks till he gets tired, and another commences where he left off.

"Any sleighing out your way, Bob?"—"Heaps of it, and plenty more lying against the fence."—"Fond of it?"—"Nothing shorter. Killed five horses last week. If that don't show I'm fond of 'slaying,' I don't know what would!"

"John, how does the thermometer stand?"—"Against the wall, dad."—"I mean, how is the mercury?"—"Guess it's pretty well; it hasn't complained, lately."—"You little rascal, is it colder than yesterday?"—"I really don't know, dad; but I'll go out and feel."

Rev. Dr. Woods, of Andover, was once giving his class some instruction about preaching in such a manner as to gain attraction and applause. "Young gentlemen," said he, "it's all contained in a nut-shell. When you go to preach in the city, take your best coat; when you go to preach in the country, take your best sermon."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

THE FAVORITE WEEKLY MISCELLANEOUS JOURNAL.
DESIGNED FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

This long established and well known weekly paper, after eleven years of unequalled popularity and popularity, has become a "household word" from Maine to California, gladdening the fireside of rich and poor, in town and country, all over the wide extent of the United States. It should be a weekly visitor to every American home, because

It is just such a paper as any father, brother, or friend would introduce to the family circle.

It is printed on the finest satin-surfaced paper, with new type, and in a neat and beautiful style.

It is of the mammoth size, yet contains no advertisements in its eight super royal pages.

It is devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

It is carefully edited by M. M. Ballou, who has sixteen years editorial experience in Boston.

It contains in its large, well filled and deeply interesting pages not one vulgar word or line.

It numbers among its regular contributors the best male and female writers in the country.

It is free, while they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in humanity.

It is acknowledged that the good influence of such a paper in the home circle is almost incalculable.

Its suggestive pages provoke in the young an inquiring spirit, and add to their store of knowledge.

Its columns are free from politics and all jarring topics, its object being to make home happy.

It is for these reasons that it has for years been so popular a favorite throughout the country.

TERMS—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, ..... $2 00
4 subscribers, " " ..... 7 00
10 " " " ..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirteenth copy gratis.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address at the lowest club rate. Sample copies sent when desired.

M. M. BALLOU,
Published every Saturday, by
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

MADAME CLARA NOVELLO.

The fine portrait on this page, is an authentic likeness of Clara Novello, a celebrated soprano singer, appreciated throughout Europe. She was born in England on the 15th of June, 1818, and is the daughter of Mr. Vincent Novello, an organist and musician of no inconsiderable repute, chiefly esteemed, however, on account of his arrangement of Mozart's masses. Before she was six years old she began her studies; and, by the advice of the celebrated Fetis, she was presented, some time later, as a candidate for admission among the pupils of the Academy of Sacred Music, in Paris. The brilliant Choron was then at the head of the establishment. He asked the little girl to sing; she obeyed, and sang, "The Soldier Tired." That was enough for Choron. He waived all the ceremonies of the institution, and received her at once. Clara Novello, still very young, returned to England, and commenced her brilliant career as a concert-singer. This she continued for a considerable time, in England and Ireland, appearing twice in Norwich, at the opening of a Catholic chapel, and at the theatre, during the performance of "Aëis and Galatea." At length the great master of German music, Mendelssohn, hearing of her talents, invited her to make her appearance in Germany; she accepted the proposal; she sang before a critical audience at one of the most fastidious of continental capitals, and her triumph was complete. She was then invited to Russia, and the Russian connoisseurs appreciated her no less highly than the Germans. Returning a second time to England, Malibran and Rubini, the stars of the operatic stage, were interested in her reputation, and counselled her parents, with the most sincere friendliness, to secure for her voice the advantages of an Italian discipline, that she might come forward and grace the Italian stage. To Italy, therefore, she went, and, under the best teachers, made such progress that she soon appeared in the principal theatres in Italy—at Fermo, at Bologna, at Padua and at Rome. Her success was remarkable; her reputation increased every day. As an illustration of this, we may mention that when Rossini produced at Bologna, under the directorship of the celebrated Donizetti, his wondrous work, the "Stabat Mater," he offered to Clara Novello, the homage of asking her to sing it. Many a prima donna in Italy would have felt a glow of pride at receiving from such a master such an invitation.—Two years passed. All Europe had now heard of Clara Novello's performances. She then married, in Italy, the Count Gigliucci, and retired for awhile into private life. But the tempest of 1848 swept over the continent, and after the events of 1849, the Countess Gigliucci was determined, by a concatenation of circumstances, to resume the toils and triumphs of her favorite profession. Once more the London season was graced by her presence; once more the theatres of Rome, Florence, Lisbon, and Madrid, resounded with her praise, which even swelled aloft under the unrivalled roof of the Scala, at Milan. The quality of her voice is admitted to be of the finest character. The utmost art, conjoined with the utmost ease, pervades her intonation. She is devoted to a pure, natural and healthy style, introducing no capricious, showy or eccentric variations, but always sweet and equal, whether when warbling a ballad, or singing some of the difficult pieces of Spohr or Cimarosa. She is well patronized.

MADAME CLARA NOVELLO, THE CELEBRATED ENGLISH SINGER.

THE ISLAND OF NISIDA, ITALY.

This striking island, situated near Naples, is well delineated in our engraving. It is very bold and picturesque, and arrests the eye of the traveller as he is voyaging past it. It is invested with the high charm of historical associations. It was once the property of Lucullus, who connected it by a bridge thrown over arches and piles, with the adjoining rock of the Lazaretto, which is close to his villa at Posilippo, now called the School of Virgil. Here Cicero had an interview with Brutus, who was then on a visit to the son of Lucullus, or, at all events, sojourning in his house. Here, too, the Queen Johanna resided for some time, and from the towers then standing on the heights repulsed the Duke of Gise. On this site, in more modern times, has been erected an "Ergastolo"—a building which, by law, must be upon an island, and to which are confined those who are condemned to imprisonment for life. This place is reserved in an especial manner for priests, who, according to a convention concluded between Gregory XVI and the government of the Two Sicilies in 1834, must be confined in separate prisons. Between Nisida and the Point of Posilippo is a peculiar rock. The Duke of Alba, under Philip IV. of Spain, built a Lazaretto upon it in 1624, and, moreover, founded a little port, by erecting a mole, which defended it from the west. The most recent public work of consequence here was effected by the counsel and under the superintendence of the engineer Giuliano de Fazio. In 1834, upon the ancient Roman piles, he constructed a mole, with approaches; thus enlarging the port, and connecting the Lazaretto with the island. At the extremity is a revolving light. Spite of its vines, and its olives, its figs, its mushroom, and its asparagus, all so celebrated and so dear to the gourmand, it is a melancholy place to look upon. That large whitewashed building on the top strikes even the stranger as a suspicious-looking spot, a place of unknown suffering and woe; whilst the Neapolitan casts a hurried glance at it, and exclaims: "Ecco l'Ergastolo!" The very name has something harsh and menacing, how much more so is the reality? The Lazaretto is noted as one of the worst in the Mediterranean.

WIRE ROPE.

Wire rope is coming into extensive use for the standing rigging of vessels. It is asserted to be only one quarter as bulky as hemp rigging of the same strength, consequently offering much less resistance in sailing by the wind, or in steaming against a gale. It is also but two-thirds as heavy as hemp, and therefore adds materially to the stability of a vessel. It is capable of being set up by turnbuckles, which are far superior to the dead-eyes and lanyards now employed; and it employed for back-stays, and the chains are extended down to meet the copper, a complete lightning-conductor is established on every side of the ship. Hemp is brittle when the tar contained is very old, and extremely juicy in a very hot climate—neither of which evils exist to the same extent in the wire-rope rigging.—Scientific American.

THE ISLAND OF NISIDA, ITALY.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, MARCH 28, 1857.

$3.00 PER ANNUM
6 CENTS SINGLE } VOL. XII., No. 13.—WHOLE No. 304.

CANSO LIGHT, NOVA SCOTIA.

The fine picture on this page was drawn expressly for us on the spot by Mr. Barry, and is remarkable for its striking pictorial and atmospheric effect. The full moon, partially obscured by clouds, irradiates a portion of the heavens, while the broad rays of light from the lofty tower render the objects in its vicinity as distinct almost as by day. On the horizon, a schooner under easy sail is bearing down over the rippling water, while the boatmen on the nearer plane of delineation are hauling in driftwood, the fragments of some nameless wreck. Canso Light is situated on Cranberry Island, the eastern extremity of Nova Scotia. Cape Canso, or St. Andrew's Island, is one of the three composing Nova Scotia. It is low, and covered with stunted fir-trees. The light house is 88 feet high, and contains two fixed lights. The coast scenery of Nova Scotia is quite remarkable. The province forms a narrow peninsula, lying nearly parallel to the main land of New Brunswick, with which it is connected by an isthmus only fifteen miles wide, separating the Bay of Fundy from Northumberland Straits. It is bounded north by the Northumberland Straits, which separate it from Prince Edward Island, northeast by the Gut of Canso, flowing between it and the island of Cape Breton, south and southeast by the Atlantic Ocean, west by the Bay of Fundy, and northwest by New Brunswick. Including Cape Breton, it has an area of 18,746 square miles. The southeast coast is remarkable for its capacious harbors, there being twelve ports capable of receiving ships of the line, and fourteen deep enough for merchantmen, between Halifax and Cape Canso, a distance of a little over one hundred miles. A broad belt of high and unbroken land extends along the Atlantic shores from Cape Canso to Cape Sable. From Briar's Island, at the extremity of Digby Neck, to Capes Slipt and Blomidon, a distance of 130 miles along the Bay of Fundy, extends a ridge of mural precipices, in many places presenting overhanging masses of trap rocks from 100 to 600 feet in height. These frowning crags, and the dense fir forests, are the first objects that meet the mariner's eye as he crosses the Bay of Fundy; and their height serves to protect the interior from the driving fogs of the bay. The most remarkable body of water in Nova Scotia is Mines Bay, the eastern arm of the Bay of Fundy, penetrating sixty miles inland, and terminating in Colequid Bay. The tides here rush in with great impetuosity, and form what is called the bore. At the equinoxes, they have been known to rise from sixty to seventy feet. Nova Scotia was first visited by the Cabots, in 1497, but was not colonized by Europeans till 1604, when De Monts, a Frenchman, with his followers, and some Jesuits, attempted for eight years to form settlements in Port Royal, St. Croix, and other places. They were finally expelled from the country by the English governor and colonists of Virginia, who claimed the country by virtue of Sebastian Cabot's discovery. In 1621, Sir William Alexander received from James I. a grant of the whole country, and prepared to colonize on a grand scale, but his projects were never carried out. In 1634, Cromwell seized upon the country by an armed force, and it remained in possession of the English till 1667, when it was ceded to France by the treaty of Breda. The English, however, from time to time, attacked and harassed the French colonists, until the country was finally ceded to England in 1713. There are many points of interest to the tourist and artist in Nova Scotia, the scene we have illustrated being only one of a number of striking localities. A few weeks back we should have shivered at the contemplation of a seaside sketch; but now, as the spring opens, and the terrors of storms and icebergs have passed away, we can bear to turn to the Atlantic shore, and gaze once more upon old ocean. But a few weeks more, and we shall all be sighing for the seaside, and talking of nothing but watering-places, all our views of enjoyment being ultra-marine. The whole Atlantic coast of North America abounds with striking localities, particularly the northeastern part of it; and those who are blessed with means and leisure, generally divide the warm season between the interior mountain region and the shore, enhancing their pleasures by contrast.

CANSO LIGHT HOUSE, EXTREME POINT OF NOVA SCOTIA.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—OR—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCRIBE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER XLII.—[CONTINUED.]

The alguazils and familiars ranged themselves respectfully upon seeing the king's coach approach. Juan asked who it was, and why those men were chained.

"Some Moors whom we are leading to Valencia,—Moors from Arragon and the two Castiles. But what do you wish, my father? It will be some months before the ordinance of his majesty can be wholly executed."

"But the ordinance of the king did not say they must be chained together two by two, like animals, stripped of their clothes."

"That is true, but it is easier for us to have them chained, and we took away their garments that they might not conceal any weapons or gold."

"That is silly, for does not the edict forbid them upon pain of death to carry anything with them?"

"Yes, señor; but the miscreants are so obstinate—so cunning that they have hid or destroyed all their treasures; we can find nothing of them, and they will be lost to all the world."

"Ah!" exclaimed Juan to himself, "the Count de Lerma did not think of that;" and he smiled.

He had his carriage door opened, and stepped out. The first prisoner he saw was a fine young man whom he remembered to have seen at Don Delascars. The king's confessor advanced towards the poor men who were seated under a large tree. Among them he recognized the poor barber Gongarello. Juan turned to the chief and ordered him to set him free. The man hesitated.

"But, señor, I have express orders from the cardinal count and grand inquisitor."

"And I have orders from the king—from the king himself. Read."

Juan drew from his pocket a parchment, sealed by the royal seal, and signed by the hand of Philip III.; it bore these words:

"You must conform to the orders of the worthy brother Louis Sevilla, our reverend confessor; for such is our good pleasure."
"I, THE KING."

"That is different," said the alguazil, respectfully. "What are your orders?"

"That these poor men be unbound and allowed to walk freely."

Then giving an order to a cavalier to bring him from the carriage a bag of doubloons, he distributed the gold among the poor prisoners, not forgetting the servant of Don Delascar d'Alberique, to whom he gave a double share.

"But, my father," remonstrated the alguazil, "the edict forbids the Moors to carry gold."

"That which belongs to them. This is not theirs; it belongs to the king. Forced by his religion to sanction the decree of banishment, he wishes to soften the severity of it, and it is for that that he sends me. What is your name, sir alguazil?"

"Cardenio de la Tromba."

"Señor Cardenio de la Tromba, I confide to you these brave men. You will conduct them by short stages and with all possible care to Valencia, where I will precede you. If—and something may prevent—I do not get there before you, lodge them in the palace of Delascar d'Alberique, where they will wait my return. Such is the king's order. If, after this, they are maltreated or robbed, it is you who will lose by it."

The alguazil bowed with respect, and the Moors stretched out their hands towards Juan, breaking into joyful cries, while Alhamar-Abouhadjad, Don Delascar's servant, repeated with emotion:

"Yes, brother—brother always. Adieu, señor! You will find us."

As to Gongarello, he had not yet recovered from his stupor. Hearing Juan's voice, he thought some new misfortune had happened to him, and that his friend was a prisoner like himself; but when he heard the young monk speak like a master, and command in the name of the king, when he saw all obey him with respect, he believed him to be his good angel, and threw himself at Juan's feet. Juan raised him, and led him to his carriage and placed him by his side. Juan saluted the Moors with an affectionate smile and gesture, and the carriage rolled away.

During the ride, Gongarello learned all that had befallen his friend since they parted. Towards evening, they stopped at a large hotel, and masters and servants bowed before the confessor to his majesty. As soon as Juan reached his room, he wrote an account of what he had done, and requested to be allowed to retain Gongarello in his service. He stated all he had learned concerning the Moors, and that the measure adopted by the Count de Lerma and Sandoval became more and more disastrous, for the Moors sent into exile, forbidden to take their property, either hid or destroyed it, so that, instead of becoming richer, the kingdom would be almost ruined by the edict. Juan enjoined upon his majesty to abolish the decree of confiscation, and permit the Moors to carry with them all their treasure, and even convert their loaded property into money, upon condition of giving a third to the state. This measure, Juan assured the king, would keep the poor exiles from dying of want and misery, bring blessings instead of curses upon his majesty's head, and fill the coffers of the state with sums that would otherwise be wholly irrevocably lost. He further told Philip that the beautiful countries formerly so rich and fruitful were deserted and barren. The Moors alone excelled in agriculture; the Spaniards had no taste for it, and the rich fields only were laying waste, and implored the king to grant letters of nobility to those of his subjects who excelled in agriculture.

Some days afterwards, to the great astonishment of Spain, and, above all, of the Count de Lerma, two edicts appeared which the king had drawn up himself, without consulting his minister. He had only summoned the council of Castile, which had hastened to register them. By one, the Moors were permitted to carry with them all their treasures and even convert their property into gold, and carry it off with them, on condition of giving up half to the state. The other gave letters of nobility to all who would distinguish themselves in the profession of a farmer.

Happy with having been able in secret to do so much for the alleviation of his brothers, Sevilla continued his way, protecting by his presence, coaxing by his words, the poor exiles whom he met in all parts of the kingdom, sadly directing their steps to the shores of Andalusia. Each injustice, each abuse which he discovered was instantly reported to the king; very often the latter could do nothing. He began to understand how a king, good, but weak, could cause as much evil as a wicked one. He was frightened by the maledictions and hatred which the Count de Lerma had brought down upon his head. He saw clearly the abyss to which he had been led; but undecided, his good nature struggled against his weakness; he had not the courage to draw back. All his courage consisted in stopping; and going no further, he waited the return of Juan.

The latter continued his way, and arrived at Carrasosa, near the extremity of the Sierra Albarracín, which he intended to cross the next day, in order to reach Cuenca and Valencia. The village had been the halting place for a body of troops, and the innkeeper was obliged to levy a contribution upon all his neighbors. At last, a modest repast was set before Juan and the barber, and they were about seating themselves, when they heard a fierce discussion in the next room between the host and a monk. The poor monk was fatigued, and insisted upon having his supper, with energy and ill temper. This the humble innkeeper told Juan.

"Let him enter—let him enter!" cried Juan. "Tell him that I pray him to do me the honor to dine with us."

The monk, obeying the summons of the host, entered and bowed lowly; then raising his head, he threw back his capuchin and exclaimed: "Sevilla!"

"Brother Escobar!" cried Juan.

CHAPTER XLIII.

ESCOBAR AND JUAN SEVILLA.

ESCOBAR—for it was he—contemplated with an astonished and envious eye all the pomp which surrounded Juan: the men of the hotel almost prostrated before him; all the luxuries of the inn at his service. Juan raised himself as he saw Escobar, and said:

"The invitation I extended to an unknown traveller would not, perhaps, be agreeable to Brother Escobar, and I will order half the repast to be placed in my chamber."

"I shall be much grieved to cause you, señor, any trouble." And he added in a low voice: "They who detest each other can sap together; that binds to nothing."

"I detest no one," coldly said Sevilla. "A cover for Brother Escobar!" he added, in a louder voice, while the two enemies seated themselves face to face.

With an uneasy eye, each looked at the other: Escobar because he did not know the intentions of Sevilla, and the latter because he knew his companion only too well. When the dessert was brought in, and they were left alone, the Jesuit priest commenced the attack:

"Ah, well, my brother," said he, in an undertone, and after having contemplated Juan for some time in silence, "what did I predict for you once upon a time? Was I not right when I said to you that only under the dress of a monk could you gain any dignity, riches or honor? By what other road could you have gone so high in so short a time? You refused to believe me; you scorned my advice; more—you have covered me with outrage and hatred,—I, who was the cause of your first good fortune; for without me, señor, permit me to say frankly, you would have been nothing."

Juan, who had kept his eyes lowered, raised them for a moment to the monk's face, and the latter saw in them so much despair and regret that he stopped astounded. All the grief of Juan returned; his breast was oppressed, his cheeks pale, his lips trembled with rage, and in his eyes flashed indignation in the midst of tears; all showed Escobar that he had made a false step in speaking. He stopped, for he was accustomed to read faces, but not hearts.

"Yes," replied Juan, after a bitter pause, "yes, I owe all my suffering, all my grief to you; it is you who have brought me, perhaps, eternal unhappiness. Do not recall it, or in spite of myself you will increase that hatred of which you spoke a few minutes ago."

He spoke and made an effort to recover himself, though a deep groan escaped his pale lips. He remained a few seconds with his head hid in his hands; then, ashamed of having allowed his deep grief to show itself before an enemy, he conquered his feelings, and with a calmness which astonished even Escobar, he said, coldly:

"Speak of other things, my brother. You come from Madrid?"

"Yes."

"What news? How comes it that you have quitted the convent of Alcala, where your presence is so necessary, and come here to this miserable village at the foot of the mountains?"

"I come to reveal a secret to Sandoval y Royas, who is now in Andalusia. I would much rather render you the service than him."

Juan bowed silently.

"Your fortune depends upon that of the cardinal-count."

Sevilla remained silent.

"If he rises, you rise; if he falls, you fall with him. Then, knowing that, you ought to be wholly devoted to him. I can, if you wish, give you the means of wholly confounding his enemies, of silencing all the calumnies. This great service, for which he will pay with all his treasures, I can render him with a single word."

"You?"

"Yes—I."

"It is probably not only for the interest of the minister, but your own."

"That is true, also. The cardinal-count, not content with having obtained the expulsion of the Moors, wishes to drive from the kingdom all the members of the Society of Jesus,—which would be a second fault."

"Or, rather, an expiation of the first fault,—at least, that is my opinion."

"It is not mine; and if the minister consents to renounce that project—if he permits and authorizes our establishment in Spain, I will make you a possessor of a secret which saves him and increases his power. What do you say?"

In pronouncing these words, Escobar looked fixedly at Juan, as if to read his soul, for to him words were nothing.

"To what you propose, there is one great difficulty," coldly replied Juan.

"What?"

"It is that I do not wish to maintain the count in power. On the contrary, I wish to depose him."

"Do you speak truly?" asked Escobar, unable to conceal his surprise.

"I have told him so. It is my sole end and desire." And after a moment of silence, he added, energetically: "Yes—I will overthrow him."

"Perhaps," replied Escobar, "I can aid you. It is all one to me whether I aid you or him."

"You!" cried Juan Sevilla.

"Yes. I come to save him; I am equally ready to destroy him. The two means are equally for my interests; but the second is more agreeable to my taste; I prefer it."

"It is impossible!" cried Sevilla. "The past forbids it. Now as then, as always, there will be hatred between us."

"What matter? I do not speak of friendship, but of alliance. Unite to overturn the Count de Lerma."

"And I wish to overturn him myself alone!" exclaimed Juan.

"Truly?" replied Escobar.

"Yes—I have sworn it, and to execute it I wish neither aid nor ally. I will be alone in the attempt. I cannot accept your offers, Señor Escobar, and I leave you free to choose whether to save or destroy the Count de Lerma."

"So, Señor Sevilla, your last word is then—"

"That all is wholly indifferent to me, provided I do not meet you in the same camp or under the same banner as myself."

He bowed to the reverend father, called Gongarello and retired to his own apartment, leaving Escobar stupefied by the result of the conversation. He was persuaded now that the confessor of the king was more adroit, more impenetrable than himself. "Cursed man," said he, to himself, "whom no one can disarm, deceive or understand!"

Angry with having lost an evening in fighting with an enemy whom he had not been able to conquer, Brother Escobar rose early the next day and left the hotel, without making his adieu to the king's confessor, decided more firmly than ever upon following his first project. He had some hope of Sandoval, who had not studied in the Jesuit convent.

Don Augustin de Mexia was one of the commanders of the troops sent to rout out and slay the Moors who had sought refuge among the mountains. On his way, a young muleteer, hid behind a rock, fired and killed one of the lieutenants. The companions of the murdered man followed the murderer and captured him. He was led before the commander, who asked his name.

"I am called Aben Habaki. I was a workman in the house of the noble Don Delascar d'Alberique; having no work, no country, I went to the mountains to find our chief, Yezid, Don Delascar's son, and I became a soldier. I placed my wife in Barrepo. I went there this morning to see her, and found the village burned, my wife murdered. He who lies dead before you was her murderer. He has paid well for it. I have only one regret."

"What is that?"

"Having been able to kill only him. I should have done better."

"Would you show us whereabouts in the mountains your companions are hid?" asked Don Augustin de Mexia, while the soldiers were building a large fire into which the poor young Moor was to be thrown.

"What would you give me to do that?" eagerly asked the Moor, raising his head.

"What would I give you?—thy life."

The Moor made a movement of joy.

"Listen to me. On condition that you will conduct us to the retreat where your brothers are hid, I will give you your life—only on condition that you will deliver all up to us."

"I consent—I consent!" cried Habaki, quickly. "This very instant we will go. I will lead you there;" and he looked at the fire, which was now burning briskly, with a perceptible shudder.

"Soldiers, to your ranks! forward—march!" cried the captain. And twelve hundred men, with gun carriages and powder wagons, commenced to ascend the mountain slowly and in good order.

Juan, whom we left at Caracosa, wished, the day Escobar left, himself to leave and pursue his onward way, but he received despatches from the king which it was necessary for him to answer. While he wrote, Gongarelló came to him with a frightened air. He related with white and trembling lips the fire and massacre of Barrepo, and the appearance of Don Augustín de Mexía with a body of troops. While he was speaking, a new cry filled the city—a cry which made the hearts of Juan and Gongarelló thrill, for it was: "Allah—Allah! death to the Christians!" This cry overpowered all others. Sevilla rushed down stairs to see what had happened. The good news for him was true. The Moors had routed and cut to pieces the army of Don Augustín de Mexía in the mountains, and followed the retreating men down into the village, to deliver the prisoners taken at Barrepo. At sight of the monk on the hotel steps, a dozen muskets were levelled at his head, and that hour would have been his last had not a Moor stepped forward and exclaimed in a thundering voice:

"Stop! let no one touch that man! let him be respected like Yezid!"

"Yes—yes!" cried many voices in the crowd; "it is he—it is our saviour—it is Juan Sevilla!"

Again Juan was astonished at the effect produced by his name but a short time ago so unknown and obscure. In the first speaker, Juan recognized Alhamar-Abonhadjad, the faithful servant of Don Delascar, whom he had delivered from the power of the alguazil Cardenio de la Tromba. The young Moor came forward, seized Juan's hand, while his lips murmured a blessing. Juan advised him, although victorious, not to remain in the village, for fresh troops were expected every hour. Alhamar told Juan that they came only to get provisions, and would return at nightfall. Juan eagerly declared it to be his intention to go with them, and it was agreed that, early the next morning, Gongarelló, who was familiar with all the mountain paths, should conduct Juan to a certain point where stood three white rocks, and where Alhamar would meet and conduct them to his chief, Yezid.

The next morning, at daybreak, Brother Sevilla left the hotel with Gongarelló, and took his way to the mountains. The air was cool and bracing, and the wind sighed mournfully through the trees. At last they arrived at a little plateau crowned by three white, pointed rocks which shone bright in the early starlight. There Juan and his companions found a large body of men awaiting them. The men rose on their approach and saluted brother Sevilla with respect, and he, following Alhamar, began to descend the other side of the mountain. The road which led to the camp would have been impossible to be followed or discovered by any one, save those accustomed to it.

During the route, Alhamar gave Juan a minute account of their combat and success. One thing made Juan anxious. Don Augustín de Mexía, with fresh troops, had appeared upon the field; the Moors had challenged him, but he accepted not their challenge, but drew off. Juan, who knew him well, knew that by drawing back he did not give up, but had some other more deadly plan on foot. De Mexía was not a man to beat a retreat without a motive, and Juan Sevilla was right.

Talking together, they approached the camp of the Moors, where active watch was kept. The password was given, and a few minutes afterwards, the two brothers were in each other's arms. Juan was moved almost to tears at the sight of his brother, so pale and suffering. Seated side by side they talked, and Juan could scarcely repress a shudder as he heard of the privations and sufferings that the gallant Yezid and his men had gone through with. What a contrast to the place where he had last seen him at Valladolid, in a home almost a palace, surrounded by every luxury, and now hardly having the meanest comforts of life!

Yezid understood his looks, and smiled sadly at the contrast, though his pale face flushed, and his handsome eye flashed with indignation as he told his brother the news he had learned the day previous. Sandoval, feeling sure that all Don Delascar's immense riches must be in his mansion at Valladolid, had gone there to receive them. To his surprise and dismay, he found nothing—no trace of golden treasures, though the house was filled with treasures of art, pictures and statuary. Don d'Alberique and his son alone knew of the subterranean treasure chamber of the Moors, and the queen—the blessed Margaret, faithful to her oath, had carried the secret to the tomb. So the treasures were lost.

Sandoval, after searching every part of the mansion, found out his mistake, and in his rage and disappointment, had razed the house to the ground. Yezid groaned as he thought of the home of his childhood in ashes. Juan disclosed to him his hopes of overturning the haughty Count de Lerma and gaining a revocation of the fatal edict. Yezid listened with joy and surprise.

The next day Juan was to return home. Yezid had agreed to accompany him, and was preparing to leave his tent, when a man, pale and emaciated, came before them, and endeavoring to seize the hands of Yezid and Juan, fell fainting at their feet. That man was Pedralvi.

CHAPTER XLIV.

PEDRALVI'S STORY.

CAREFULLY they carried Pedralvi into the tent, and laid him on Yezid's bed. With sad eyes they looked at the face formerly so handsome and merry, now furrowed by deep lines of care and suffering. When Pedralvi recovered his consciousness, Yezid asked for tidings of his father and sister, whom he placed under his care. Pedralvi covered his face with his hands and wept, then raising his head, he said:

"I can tell you nothing of them; but do not condemn me, my dear young master, until you hear my story. I obeyed you and went on board the San Lunar with my master and Senora Alitea. When a little way from the shore I saw the first mate, and at sight of him I was filled with dread, for I believed I saw a hated man whom I had seen twice before, and who always brought misfortune with him. The first time I saw him was when I was with Juan on the wall of the Golden Sun; the next, I was again with Juan, and he made us prisoners on the road to Toledo."

Juan shuddered, and laid his hand upon his young friend's shoulder, who went on:

"I tried to get rid of the feeling, and had almost succeeded in making myself believe I was mistaken, when Senora Alitea came upon deck to get some air. She leaned on my arm and was conversing cheerfully, when her eyes fell upon the mate. I felt her shudder and falter, and looking at her, saw her face deadly pale and nearly fainting. Making me a sign, I led her back to the cabin. I inquired of her the cause for her uneasiness, and she explained that she thought she recognized in the first mate a mortal enemy—an enemy to herself and to Juan, last seen on the night of the death of the Duke de Santarem, the bandit captain, Josef Baptista Balsiero. Her uneasiness confirmed me in my own fears, which I refrained from telling her; but my part was taken. When Senora had become quiet, I, arming myself with a pair of pistols, went on deck. I found there only the captain; of him I inquired where the mate was. He told me he was in the cabin, cleaning it. I went below and found only the third mate, a mere creature of the first. My manner was undoubtedly menacing, for when Marco saw me he turned pale, and I drew a pistol from my belt, and pointing it at his head, I exclaimed:

"Tell me the truth: the first mate is no other than Josef Baptista Balsiero, the robber who has escaped justice so long!"

"It is true," replied the Maltese, who was a coward.

"What are his designs? Answer immediately, or I fire!"

"He and his companions wish to rob this vessel, which they think contains all the treasures of the d'Alberique family."

"Where is he?"

"The Maltese did not answer, but pointed to an inner cabin where the captain of the vessel, a worthy, honest man, kept his papers. I was going to enter it, when the door opened quickly and a man appeared. I drew the trigger; he fell. It was not Captain Josef Baptista, but one of his men. There were two of them. Profiting by the moment when I was disarmed, the Maltese seized me from behind, while Josef Baptista sprang at my throat. Although only one against two, I had resisted, called for help, and Captain Giampietri came to my aid, when Baptista ran to the foot of the stairs and called to some men who came to help him. In a moment they had seized us, myself and poor Giampietri, and threw us into the sea."

Yezid and Juan uttered a cry of horror.

"For myself I cared little, but I thought of my poor master and young mistress left in their power. When I rose to the surface, the San Lunar was almost out of sight, the poor captain drowned, and myself floating upon the open sea. In my despair, in my delirium, I blasphemed. I wept and shouted in rage. I looked around and saw neither plank, rock, nor any floating thing. I was twenty miles from shore, on the sea, alone with God. In my despair, I vowed to make no effort to save myself, and was slowly sinking, when the sun broke through the clouds. That beautiful light filled my heart with a desire to live, if not for happiness, for revenge. Re-animated by that idea, I began to swim vigorously. For six hours I struggled against the death staring me in the face. At last my strength gave way, my breath came painfully, and I knew nothing more. When I returned to myself I was upon the deck of a vessel. Some countrymen, Moors, surrounded me; women bent tenderly over me, I called Juniaeta, Alitea, but no one answered; I was far from them. I had been picked up by a Spanish vessel on its way to Africa with my poor brothers. And now, though you will scarcely believe me, the death I had escaped was nothing to be compared to the terrors and sufferings I was witness to. Yes—I saw my companions, deprived of air and food, shut up in small, stifled places; I saw the child who dared to weep, the woman who dared to groan, struck with the sword; I saw the husband or father who tried to defend them slain without pity, and his blood spouting over them; I saw young, beautiful girls spared the sword of the murderer for a worse fate. I dare think no longer of the brutal outrages, or my brain will be on fire. I saw all these things, and could not prevent or punish them."

"At last we arrived at Oran. We found there six thousand men, women and children, who had been thrown upon the arid and deserted shore, without food, without arms, and nearly destitute of clothes. The vessels immediately returned. Overcome with fatigue, cold and hunger, we vainly sought for some shelter. We implored Heaven; it was deaf to our cries, and the Arabs of the desert alone answered. Descending from the mountains, the Bedouins pillaged us, as their brothers, the sons of Islam, who asked their protection, and we found them in hearts Spaniards. Ah, that was a frightful night! hearing their cries of joy and blood, seeing the murder of women and children, and having no arms to defend them with but the stones of the shore!"

"The next day, half of our number were dead. Our only hope was to see the sultan of Algiers. How can I tell you the miseries of the march! Every day, every hour almost, some one fell dead. Each night the Bedouins attacked us; we tried to escape them, but it was too easy to track us by the dead. At last we perceived the gates of Algiers; it was towards nightfall, and we could not desert them in the distance. That night the yatağan of the Bedouins slew more than half of the little band. The next day I entered the gates—I entered them alone!"

Pedralvi hid his face in his hands. Yezid and Juan exchanged glances of horror, having listened without interrupting. The Moor continued, after a silence of a few minutes:

"At Algiers it was different; there reigned the true God, and among my brothers, I found help and protection. All the people with whom you had negotiated spoke of you, my master, and of your father. They wished to keep me with them; they offered me a brilliant fate. I refused, for you were here fighting against Spain; I wished to return to you, my dear master. I inquired of all the captains, but nothing had been seen or heard of the San Lunar. No one could give me any tidings of your father, his daughter, or of Juniaeta."

"But to return. Each day brought us the account of new crimes, new sufferings. Captains with overloaded vessels had thrown over part of their baggage; that baggage was our brothers'. I have sworn to God, to the God of our fathers and of the Christians, to slay the prime movers in our misfortunes—the grand inquisitor Sandoval, the archbishop of Valencia, Ribaera and the Count de Lerma. That is my mission; I have no other, and I will fulfil it. After that I shall be content. Allah may then call me to himself!"

"Friend, friend," cried Yezid, seeking to calm him, "thou whom I have always known so good, so generous, this is a delirium—a fever!"

"It is a fever that will never leave me. Captain Giuseppe Campanella came to our shores, he who threw our brothers into the sea, who insulted Zasha-Hakkam, one of the most beautiful women of our race, who killed her father for trying to defend her,—he came and I shipped for a return passage at the risk of being discovered and murdered. We reached these shores in safety, and Captain Giuseppe was on his way to Madrid to give an account of his doings to Lerma and Sandoval, and gain his reward. I rewarded him—I killed him!"

"You killed him?" exclaimed Sevilla.

"Without pity, without remorse, like a dog, or rather like a tiger."

Pedralvi had hardly finished his story, when Alhamar-Abonhadjad presented himself before his general. They had arrested a person of great importance, he believed, from the rich coach and train of mules which accompanied him; but that was all he knew, for the person refused to give his name. This grand personage came from Valencia, and seemed to be going to Madrid. Ignorant of the road, believing himself guarded by the troops of Don Augustín de Mexía, he had pushed boldly forward and fallen into the hands of the Moors. They had seized his papers, and Alhamar handed to Yezid and Juan an immense portfolio. The unknown traveller was led before the general. As he appeared before the opening of the tent, Juan was almost motionless with surprise.

"The grand inquisitor Sandoval!" cried he.

At this name, Pedralvi bounded from the bed like a tiger. The grand inquisitor was deadly pale, and walked with a faltering step, and his eyes bent on the ground.

"See him!" cried Pedralvi. "The God of our fathers approves and blesses my oath, since he leads my victim to me."

And before Yezid could stop him, he sprang upon Sandoval and seized him by his dress.

"Executioner of our brothers, thy arrest is made, and I will execute you!"

With the other hand, and quick as thought, he drew his poignard and struck. But Sevilla, who was behind the inquisitor, threw himself before him and parried the blow with his arm. His blood spouted forth, and Yezid uttered a cry of terror.

"It is nothing," said he, calmly, to his two friends. "I pray you, Pedralvi, to hear me. Do you wish to commit the very crimes for which he should be punished? His death would be a crime—a useless crime; whilst living, he can serve us, first as a hostage. His life shall buy the lives of our brothers, and cause the persecutions of the Inquisition to be suspended. You will consent, dear Pedralvi, to renounce your vengeance?"

"Yes, yes—I will, since you say it is best; but my oath holds good with the others. I do not sign peace, only a treaty; my vengeance will come sooner or later."

Sevilla and Yezid then seated themselves and overlooked the portfolio; the contents of which they read aloud. It contained principally vivid accounts of the horrible crimes committed by the fanatical soldiers and sailors who hastened to send to Sandoval accounts of their zeal. One paper was very important, and that contained a statement signed by Father Jerome and Escobar, freeing the Count de Lerma from the charge of poisoning the queen, and implicating and proving that the Countess Altamira and the Duke d'Uzeda were guilty. Another counselled Sandoval not to attempt to struggle against Sevilla, but make a bold stroke, and on his arrival at Madrid, to order his immediate arrest, who, in spite of the title of confessor to the king, was only a Dominican, and subject as such to the orders of the Inquisition. Once in the dungeons of the Inquisition he would never be heard of, and the king would soon forget him.

[CONCLUDED NEXT WEEK.]

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

The worst ingratitude lies not in the ossified heart of him who commits it; but we find it in the effect it produces on him against whom it was committed. As water containing stony particles incrusts with them the ferns and mosses it drops on, so the human breast hardens under ingratitude, in proportion to its openness, its softness, and its aptitude to receive impressions.—London.

THE RUSSIAN ISCHVOSTCHIK OR CARMAN.

The Petersburg Ischvostchik wears a peculiar low-crowned hat, with the brim turned up liberally at the sides; whereas the Moscow cabby more particularly, a Tom and Jerry hat, with a brim pared closely off, and encircled by a ribbon and three or four buckles—a hat that has some remote resemblance to the genuine Connaught bogtrotter's head covering. Both styles of hat are common, and indifferently worn by the monijks all over Russia, only the low crowned hat being covered with a silk nap, and in some cases with beaver, is the more expensive, and is therefore in more general use in St. Petersburg, the luxurious. Don't believe those, therefore, who endeavor to persuade you of the non-Russianism of St. Petersburg. There is a great deal of eau de cologne consumed there; the commerce in white kid gloves is enormous, and there is a thriving trade in wax candles, pine-apple ices, patent leather boots, Cluquot's champagne, erinoline petticoats, artificial flowers, and other adjuncts to civilization. Grisi and Lablache sing at the Grand Opera; Mademoiselle Cerito dances there; French is habitually spoken in society, and invitations to halls and dinners are sent to you on enamelled cards and in pink billets smelling of musk and millefleurs; but your distinguished Origen may come away from the Affghan ambassador's hall, or the Grand Opera, or the Princess Liagousschikoff's tableaux vivans, your head full of Casta Diva, the Valse a Deux Temps, and the delightful forwardness of Russian civilization; and your Origen will hail an Ischvostchik to convey you to your domicile; and right before you, almost touching you, astride on the splashboard, will sit a genuine right down child of holy Russia, who is (it is of no use mincing the matter) an ignorant, beastly, drunken, idolatrous savage, who is able to drive a horse and to rob, and no more. Woe to those who wear the white kid gloves, and serenely allow the savage to go on in his dirt, in his drunkenness, in his most pitiable joss worship; it is no religion; in his swinish ignorance, not only (it were vain to dwell upon that) of letters, but of things that the very dumb dogs and necessary cats in Christian households seem to know instinctively! Woe to the drinkers of champagne when the day shall come for these wretched creatures to go raving mad instead of silly mandlin on the vitriol brandy whose monopoly brings a yearly revenue of fifty millions of roubles (eight millions sterling) to the paternal government, and when the paternal stick shall avail no more as a panacea. I know nothing more striking in my Russian experience than the sudden plunge from a hot-house of refinement to a cold bath of sheer barbarism. It is as if you left a presidential levee in the White House at Washington, and fell suddenly into an ambuscade of red Indians. Your civilization, your evening dress, and carefully selected stock of pure Parisian French, avail you nothing with the Ischvostchik. He speaks nothing but Russ; he cannot read; he has nothing in common with you—closely shaven (as regards the cheeks and chin) and swathed in the tight sables of European etiquette, as he in his flowing oriental caftan and oriental beard, and more than oriental dirt.

—Household Words.

AMERICAN LADIES.

Mrs. Murray, an Englishwoman, who visited the United States in 1848, pays the following tribute to the pre-eminence of three distinguished American ladies. She says: "I have seen three anointed kings and three inaugurated presidents. I admire the presidents the most. I have seen three queens, and three ladies who have shared the honors of the presidency; and truly among the queens not one could compare with the regal grace of Mrs. Madison, the feminine, distinguished personnel of Mrs. Polk, and the intelligent, lady-like demeanor of Mrs. Adams. Mrs. Polk, were it not for the same defect in the teeth which characterizes Queen Victoria, would be a very handsome woman. Her hair is very black, and her dark eye and complexion give her a touch of the Spanish dames. These American ladies are highly cultivated and perfectly accomplished, and practised in the most delicate and refined usages of distinguished society. Mrs. Polk is very well read, and has much talent for conversation; she is highly popular; her reception of all parties is that of a kind hostess and accomplished gentlewoman. She has excellent taste in dress, and both in the morning and evening, preserves the subdued though elegant costume which characterizes the lady. She is ready at reply, and preserves her position admirably. At a levee, a gentleman remarked, 'Madam, you have a very genteel assemblage to-night.' 'Sir,' replied Mrs. Polk, with perfect good humor, but very significantly, 'I never have seen it otherwise.' One morning I found her reading. 'I have many books presented to me by the authors,' said she, 'and I try to read them all; at present that is impossible; but this evening the author of this book dines with the President, and I would not be so unkind as to appear wholly ignorant and unmindful of his gift.'"—Home Journal.

Never lose an opportunity of seeing anything beautiful. Beauty is God's handwriting—a wayside sacrament; welcome it in every fair face, every fair sky, every fair flower, and thank for it Him, the fountain of all loveliness.

"HARK! HARK! THE LARK."

The beautiful picture on this page was suggested by one of the sweetest songs that Shakspeare ever penned. The design represents a beautiful girl

"Now for the bird up-looking With hand o'er-shaded eye."

watching the flight of the skylark as he pierces the deep blue of heaven and pours his matin notes when almost lost to view. The song we have referred to occurs in Cymbeline, and the "admirable rich words" are sung by Cloten's musicians under Imogen's window. The words of this little lyric are as follows:

"Hark! hark! the lark at heaven's gate sings
And Phoebus 'gins arise,
His steeds to water at those springs
On chaliced flowers that lies;
And winking Mary-buds begin
To ope their golden eyes,
With everything that pretty bio;
My lady sweet, arise,
Arise, arise!"

The skylark, one of the sweetest of songsters, is not found in this country, but attempts have been made to introduce it.

"HARK! HARK! THE LARK!"

RALEIGH'S HISTORY.

Sir Walter Raleigh's History of the World was composed during his imprisonment in the Tower. Only a small portion of the work was published, owing to the following singular circumstance: One afternoon, looking through his window into one of the courts of the Tower, Sir Walter saw two men quarrel, when the one actually murdered the other; and shortly after, two gentlemen, friends to Sir Walter, coming into his room, after expressing what had happened, they disagreed in their manner of relating the story; and Sir Walter, who had seen it himself, concurred that neither was accurate, but related it with another variation. The three eye-witnesses disagreeing about an act so recently committed, put Sir Walter in a rage, when he took up the volumes of manuscript which lay by containing his History of the World, and threw them on a large fire that was in the room, exclaiming that "it was not for him to write the history of the world, if he could not relate what he saw a quarter of an hour before." One of his friends saved two of the volumes from the flames, but the rest were consumed. The world laments that so strange an accident should have mutilated the work of so extraordinary a man.—Granger's Wonderful Magazine.

RAT-CATCHERS OF SAN FRANCISCO.

It has been truly said that one-half of the inhabitants of all large cities know not how the other half live. This fact will apply to San Francisco as forcibly as to any other. Our population is a heterogeneous one, composed of the representatives of every nation on the habitable globe—men of every trade, profession, among us known to the civilized world—and all striving with unabated energy and enterprise to forereach his neighbor in the search after wealth. But of all resorts to which human ingenuity is applied whereby to make an honest livelihood, that of the rat-catchers seems to be the most singular. There exists among us a numerous class of persons whose only vocation consists in catching rats and preparing their skins for exportation. This business is mostly confined to a few Frenchmen, who have in their employ a number of Chinamen well skilled in the art. Night after night they spread death and destruction among the innumerable swarms of these pests that infest our thoroughfares. While the greater portion of our population are asleep, "John Chinaman," like the chiffonniers or rag-pickers (another distinct class of persons we have in our midst), is wide awake and pursues his calling. He is what might be called a professional "ratter," and is as well versed as a Scotch terrier in the most approved method of discovering and of taking them. The wharfs along the water front of the city are nightly frequented by them, but in most cases they seek the isolated places in the outskirts of the city, where the rats fatten on the garbage thrown from the slaughter-houses, to set their traps. These traps are square boxes about two feet long and of the same width, and some eighteen inches deep, and top and bottom constructed of wood and the sides wire net. Each one has several openings on the sides, with the wire inverted, so that when a rat enters, it is almost impossible for him to make his escape by the way he came in. Each Chinaman is provided with two of these traps. When about starting out, he baits them, and then selects a suitable place to set them. After having done this, he retires a short distance to watch his game. If the bait takes well, he does not wait long before the traps are full. If game is not so plenty, he moves on to some other locality, and repeats the same operation. In this manner he proceeds till he has made a good "haul," when he retraces his steps homewards, and deposits his traps in a receptacle provided for the purpose. This place usually consists of a large dry-goods box, with apertures here and there covered with wire. The rats are placed in it, and in the day-time are suffocated by means of charcoal. Each Chinaman, with any kind of good luck, very often succeeds in taking from one to two hundred rats a night. These are sold to the parties who employ them at so much per dozen, who derive considerable profit from the returns of this business. The skins are dried and tied up in small packages of fifty each, ready for exportation. They are sent to Paris, and there manufactured into what are called kid gloves, and returned to us as "Alexandre's best," which may be seen displayed in the windows of our fancy dry-goods stores. Our Chinese residents readily adapt themselves to any kind of industry, however disagreeable, that promises a reward for their labor. The catching of rats cannot be so revolting to them as might be expected, as it is said that the animal, when cooked and served up in Celestial style, forms an important item in their cuisine.—San Francisco Herald.

DUELLING.

A member of the New York Assembly, if we remember rightly, from St. Lawrence county, was challenged by some valiant hotspur for personalities in debate. The challenge was at once accepted; but being the challenged party, he selected broad-swords, and they were to stand opposite to each other, on different sides of the St. Lawrence, where it was about a mile wide! "Surely you cannot be serious!—this is subterfuge, sir!" was the indignant response of the second. "Why," asked the intended victim of the code, whose origin was in Yankee-land, "aint I the challenged party? Haint I a right to choose my weapons and the place?" "Yes, but not such weapons, with such a position. Why not take the gentleman's arm?" "What's that?—pistils?" "Certainly." "Very good; pistils be it. We'll meet on 'Sugar-loaf Hill' (it's all clear on top), at six o'clock to-morrow morning." This was "satisfactory," and in the morning they went as appointed. The terms were, that they were to stand back to back, march forward ten paces, and then turn and fire. The word was given, and they stepped off; but by the time they had taken the last pace they were out of sight of each other, on opposite sides of the conical hill! The challenger's second was furious, and his "principal" rampant. "You are a coward, sir,—a coward!" "Wal, I know that, and so did you, or you wouldn't have challenged me!" was the only answer vouchsafed to the discomfited duellist. In company with his second, he marched down the steep hill which they had toiled up at so unreasonable an hour, not a little chagrined at such an unlooked-for termination, and muttering curses not loud but uncommodiously deep. This was the last "duel" that was (or rather wasn't) fought in St. Lawrence county.—Knickerbocker.

PERSIAN SOLDIERS.

The accompanying picture presents a curious feature in the military organization of the Persians, showing one of the many uses to which that valuable animal, the camel, may be put. We have here a couple of artillerymen, they and their howitzers being mounted on the back of camels. These camels are richly caparisoned, with embroidered saddle-cloths and housings and an infinity of bells. Their heads are surmounted by plumes. A camel-battery on the march or in action must present a singular spectacle. By this means only, however, light artillery could be made efficient in such a rough country as Persia. The recent quarrel with England has caused the Persian government to strain every nerve to increase the efficiency of its troops. For over fifty years the relations of Persia and Great Britain were amicable, and during this period European discipline was introduced among the Persian troops, English officers having been employed to train them. Little did any one then anticipate a rupture in which the military proficiency the English had promoted should be turned against themselves. In modern times the Persians have not been very fortunate in their wars. In the war waged by Feth Ali Shah against Russia, ending in 1813, he lost vast territories on the Caspian Sea, while that of 1828 cost him Erivan and all the country north of the Aras. Few nations have continued so long to play a prominent part in the affairs of the world as Persia. At almost the earliest period of authentic history we find it occupying a conspicuous position.

PERSIAN MOUNTED CANNONIERS.

tion. Cyrus the Great came into possession of the united crowns of Persia and Media and extended his sway over the whole of Western Asia. The army of Xerxes marched into Greece was the greatest the world ever beheld, and its disastrous defeat was the beginning of the decline of the Persian power. Its downfall was accomplished by Alexander the Great 333 years B. C. In the third century of our era it again became famous under Chosroes. A century afterwards it was overrun by the armies of Mohammed. Among the modern rulers of Persia, Ismail Shah and Nadir Shah are the most noted. The latter invaded India, and took Delhi in 1739, obtaining a subsidy estimated at 15,000,000 dollars. The present, or Kajar dynasty, was founded by Aga Mohammed Khan Kajar in 1795, who was murdered in 1797 by his attendants. It remains to be seen whether the modern Persians will prove a match for the disciplined soldiers of Great Britain.

CASTLE OF ISCHIA.

This imposing fortress stands upon a rocky island in the Mediterranean Sea, near Naples. Our picture gives an accurate idea of its bold features, together with the surrounding scenery. The ruins and the foliage in the foreground on the right enhance the effect of the distant view. The island of Ischia, eight miles from Cape Miseno, is seven miles long and four miles broad. Near its centre is San Nicola, or Epomeo, an extinct volcano, rising about two thousand six hundred feet. The island of Ischia produces grapes, olives, and some other kinds of fruit, the soil being fertile.

ISLAND OF ISCHIA, IN THE MEDITERRANEAN.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LOTOS LAND.

BY WILLIE E. PAROR.

I've tasted lotos leaf and flower,
And honey never was more sweet
Upon the lip, or made each hour
Seem lapped in roses at my feet.

I've tasted of the lotos leaf,
And pleasure is my portion now,
And I remember not the grief
That once wrote furrows on my brow.

My heart grew sick with toil and care;
For sorrow, I could scarcely stand;
And to get rid of grim despair
I journeyed into lotos land.

And after tasting lotos flowers,
My load of grief aside was laid,
And underneath the smiling hours
I watched the flowers that never fade.

The sun shines fair in lotos land,
And shadow there is never seen;
Pearls glitter in the snow-white sand,
And idles dot the vales of green.

O, would you thither with me go?
If so, come take me by the hand,
Shut out the world of work, and lo!
In fancy, we're in lotos land.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE TRAPPER'S DAUGHTER.

A LEGEND OF OUR PRAIRIE.

BY MRS. CAROLINE A. SOULE.

"Heigh-ho! what now?"

A light, feathery, but ice-cold particle had gently touched the cheek of the speaker, and roused him from the reverie into which the monotony of the scenery had thrown him. He wiped it off, but as he did so, another settled upon his brow, and looking hastily around, he perceived the air filled with circling snow-flakes. And even as he gazed, they gathered themselves into fleecy-like clouds, shrouding the dim sunlight and whitening the brown prairie.

Here was a dilemma, and Hugh Latimer, brave man as he was, quailed at the prospect before him. He was travelling on what is now known as "the military road," between Fort des Moines and Fort Dodge, but which in those days, when Iowa was yet the home of the red man, was but little better than the wild trail of the savage. Easy to lose in broad daylight, how fearful was the chance of galloping far away from it in a snow-storm, with eight coming rapidly on! And once lost on that ten mile prairie, how difficult, how almost impossible indeed, to recover the path.

What he should do was a puzzling question for the young soldier, and every moment rather grew worse. To go back was madness, for he had not seen a cabin since early morn; to go forward was equally as bad, for he had no means of judging as to the distance between him and the next camping-ground, while to stay where he was, was certain death, for even then he was white with snow, the cold, shrieking winds freezing his limbs, while they drifted the flakes in low, circling ridges all about his path.

Suddenly he seemed to have decided, for putting spurs to his horse, he turned to the westward.

"It is a desperate effort," said he, half to himself and half to his noble steed, "but it is the only one that gives me any promise of seeing to-morrow; and death on the prairie, with a winding-sheet of snow, and the howling of wolves for a dirge!—Good God, it is too terrible! Let me see; the Des Moines cannot be over five miles off, and the timber must be at least a mile and a half broad there. Cheer up, cheer up, then, Charlie," and he hallooed merrily to the horse. "There is half a mile beyond us now; three more and we shall be safe." And then he pleased himself with visions of the camp he would make in those dense old forests.

Faster and thicker came the snow-flakes. The last streak of daylight vanished. Darkness settled over everything. The cold grew intense. The blasts swept over the broad prairie with terrific fierceness, and whole drifts of snow were hurled before them. All sorts of hideous sounds were borne on their wings, too, from the hellish shrieks of the tempest to the yet more fearful voices of the blood-thirsty wolves. Yet still onward, with fanatic speed, dashed the young man. The three miles lengthened it seemed into ten, and yet no sheltering woods broke the wild winds.

"Now, God have mercy on me!" exclaimed he, with passionate emphasis, as the lagging of his horse warned him he had come far from the prairie and was yet far from the river. "My hours are numbered; I've lost my way; all this long while I do believe that I have been riding in a circle; one more trial for my life ere I yield to the palsy which is henuming my very heart."

He again spurred the jaded steed, and then suddenly halted. "It was a northeast wind, I remember, when I left the trail; it is a wild, fickle guide, but all I can trust to." And he wheeled about till the blast blew fiercely into his very eyes, and then carefully turned till he judged he was inclining to the southwest. "And now, Charlie," said he, "I resign myself to you. Go on, and quickly, or a corpse will be your burden."

The faithful creature seemed conscious of the trust, and galloped off with renewed fleetness. A torpor swept over the limbs, ay, over the very heart and mind of the young soldier, and he was fast falling into a fearful sleep, when a cheerful and prolonged neigh from his horse roused within him the love of life, and even as he gathered up his failing strength, Charlie came to a dead pause. Hugh felt rather than saw, that the darkness was thicker immediately before him than elsewhere, and summoning every energy he put forth his hands.

"Blessed Heaven!" exclaimed he, "they are logs; it must be, it is some trapper's cabin." And with new life infused into every vein, he leaped from his horse and went groping around the black object in the deep joy of his half-frozen heart, when he suddenly came upon smooth planks. He knocked with frantic eagerness, and even as he did so, he heard from within the fierce growling of a couple of sentinel dogs. Hushing them with difficulty, the inmate unclosed a small loophole in the rough door and cried, with wild eagerness:

"Father, is it you?"

Never did human voice sound so sweetly to Hugh, and though his lips were so frosted as to be almost stiff, the fresh, beautiful hope that had dawned on his heart warmed them as with the elixir of life, and he answered, in his own rich, mellow tones:

"Not father, but a traveller who has lost his way, and must die ere long in the storm unless he find shelter."

The heavy bars were withdrawn at once, and in an instant the door was swung wide open. But the change from the blackness and cold without to the light and heat within was too sudden for the exhausted limbs and benumbed senses of the young man. The brilliancy of the fire-flash as it sparkled upon his snow-white garments, dazzled his eyes with a painful glare, while the excessive warmth made him faint and sick. He reeled, and but for the sustaining arm of the young girl who had admitted him, he would have fallen to the floor. She led him across the room to a corner, wherein was piled a number of dressed buffalo robes, and having first unbelted the heavy Mackinaw blanket which he had girded about him when the storm commenced, she bade him lie down. He obeyed passively, and when she returned from closing the door, she found him unconscious. Very tenderly did she remove the large fur cap and collar, and withdraw the mittens from his hands and the moccasins and boots from his feet. She then gently bathed his white brow and cheeks, chafed his chilled fingers, and moistened his pallid lips. But it was long ere he recovered, and when at last he opened his eyes, the effort to remember what had happened to him seemed so fatiguing that he closed them at once, and turning wearily over, sank into sleep.

"This will never do," whispered the girl. "He is yet so cold and tired that if he sleeps now he will never awake. I must rouse him. Sit," and she gently lifted his head. The eyelids again unclosed. "Sir, if you love life, rouse yourself from this torpor."

"It grows darker—colder," murmured he. "I've lost my way. The snow shall be my winding-sheet." And again he slept.

Fear lent the girl strength, and taking his hands she forcibly drew him from the couch and towards the blazing hearthstone. The action fully awakened him, and as memory returned, he blessed his young hostess.

"Sit here," said she, and she drew a chair, curiously inwrought with tender saplings and massive grape vines, close to the fire, "and I will make some broth, and when you have eaten of that, you may sleep awhile."

And having seen him seated, she drew out some coals, set a skillet over them, and had soon the breast of a prairie chicken dissolving into a savory soup. Very hard did Hugh strive to keep awake, but in vain; the girlish figure which at first it seemed such bliss to watch, soon blended with the fire-light; then a soft mist seemed to hover over his eyes, and then they closed, and he again slept. The withdrawal of the bars aroused him, and when on turning, he saw the young girl draw a buffalo robe about her and take up a lantern as if about to go out into the storm alone, all his manhood returned, and forgetting that he was shoeless, he started to accompany her.

"Go back," said she, with a gentle firmness. "You are not strong enough yet to withstand these blasts. I only go to stable your horse, and I have two gallant friends for an escort." And she pointed to the dogs. "Go back, you are yet too weak."

And indeed he was, for even as she spoke, he reeled and would have fallen, but that she caught his arm and again seated him. His head drooped at once, and she saw that he had fainted.

"I must go now," said she, "while he is lost to himself, for he is so rash he will insist on braving the storm when he comes to;" and hastily unclosing the door, she hurried out.

A loud, cheerful neigh from the stranger's horse greeted her at once, for the faithful steed stood close to the threshold. Fearlessly she grasped him by the bridle and led him to a small, low shed, thatched with hay, and surrounded on three sides by massive stacks. A little Indian pony and a gentle milch cow were already there, and both greeted her in their own strange tongue, as though she were a welcome visitor. For an instant, she stood with her arm thrown gracefully about the neck of the one, as he bent his head, then gently patted the other, and then fastening the stranger's horse in an empty stall, and throwing down an abundant supply of food for all, she carefully locked the rough door and re-entered the cabin.

Hugh was just recovering from his fainting-fit. A glass of water quickly brought by the untiring hands of his hostess, revived him sufficiently to partake of the delicious broth she had prepared.

"And now," said she, "you may sleep awhile;" and she pointed to the couch of robes. "Presently, I will prepare a heartier supper and then arouse you. After that, you will, I trust, be recruited enough to sleep without danger."

No sooner was Hugh's head pillowed upon the yielding furs, than a delicious slumber stole over him. Eleanor, for such was the young girl's name, watched him till satisfied his sleep was calm and sound, and then seating herself in the chair he had vacated, gave herself up to what seemed painful thoughts. Very pale grew her cheeks, wrinkles furrowed her fair brow, and tears often dimmed the light of her eyes. But when an hour or so had passed, she arose, and piling fresh fuel on to the waning fire, set about preparing her promised supper. An iron tea-kettle was mounted upon a bed of fiery coals, while a bake-kettle took its station beside it. Then with a wooden bowl in one hand and an iron spoon in the other, she went from the meal bag to the milk pan, and was soon stirring up the batter for a golden corn pone. Fairly frothing with lightness, she turned it at length into the pioneer's stove, the ungainly bake-kettle, and putting on the heavy lid, enveloped it in lively cinders and left it to go brown and crisp and deliciously sweet. Then the cheerful sound of the coffee-mill was heard, and ere long the grateful aroma of the distilling draught gently diffused itself through the cabin. A venison ham was taken down from a niche in the corner, and some generous slices were soon broiling over a clear bed of hard wood coals. Then a rude table was drawn out, but the cloth that covered it, which was carefully taken from the bottom of an old chest, was a fine, snowy damask one, from the looms of the old world. The "Queen's Ware" was of the most unhandsome pattern and cheapest style, but the knives were ivory handled and the forks and spoons of solid silver. There was a pitcher of golden cream, a bowl of purest white sugar, a lump of delicately stamped butter, a glass of amber-hued honey, a saucer of preserved strawberries, and another of the delicious yellow plum of the woodland. A cold, roast prairie hen and a venison pastry were added when the smoking viands from the hearth were dished. Then lifting the lid from a rude packing-box, she took thence a china bowl, and filling it with warm water and throwing over her arm a towel, fine and snowy as the linen on the table, she bore it to the couch of the stranger and gently awoke him.

Completely restored to his consciousness by his sound, sweet sleep, Hugh arose, no longer a reeling sick man, but a noble young soldier, whose mission it seemed might be to protect with his stout arm and gallant heart the fair girl who thus far had been his saving angel. And when he had partaken of the delicious repast she had prepared, his strength seemed entirely restored, and he marvelled that he could ever have been so worn and weak as when he tremblingly knocked at that cabin door. And then, too, he leisurely surveyed his young hostess, and a wondering, admiring, almost adoring, glance he cast towards her as she, with quiet gracefulness, gathered up the dishes, rinsed and returned them to their places on a rude shelf and then put away the remnants of the meal. There was the same strange blending of refinement and rudeness in the dress that was seen in the adornings of the table, and yet it was picturesque in the extreme. Her feet were encased in beautifully embroidered moccasins; her dress was a close-fitting habit of rich broadcloth, bordered at the hem and cuffs with the skin of the silver-grey fox, a collar of the same rare fur, surrounding her snow-white neck. But that was fastened at the throat by a delicate spray of gold, while over it hung a chain of the same precious metal, and pendant from that a jewelled cross. A diamond ring and others of plain gold flashed from her fingers, which though somewhat brown and calloused, were yet tapering as a queen's.

But the strange wonderings which the sight of those rich jewels on a maiden in that lonely cabin awakened in the mind of Hugh, were forgotten as often as his glance rested on the exquisite beauty of her countenance. Such dark, eloquent, yet mournfully tender eyes it seemed to him had never before met his; nor ever had he seen a brow so regal, a cheek so "fair, not pale," lips with such delicious curves and such coral hues, nor such a wealth of tresses, dark as midnight, yet soft and rich as untwisted silk.

"What a glorious picture she would make," said fancy to him, while at the same moment his heart spake up and whispered in thrilling tones "what a glorious wife." And then came a fearful spasm; perhaps she was even then the beloved companion of some brave pioneer, and had forsaken all the endearments of civilization for the love of her own fond husband. But no; she had called "father," when first he heard her voice, and there was a certain girlish grace about her which assured him that she yet sustained no dearest relation in life than that of the affectionate child. But how came she there, away out in that prairie cabin, miles from a white man's home? He forbore for a time to question her, but his curiosity at length mastered his politeness, and in gentle, brotherly tones he expressed his surprise at meeting a pale-faced maiden there.

"I wonder not," she said, in reply, "that it seems strange to you. It will seem stranger still when I tell you that I have lived here already four long years, and in all that time seen none but Indian females, and beside yourself only two white men." And she breathed a deep, long sigh.

"But what could have induced you to penetrate thus far into the wilds of the territory?" asked he, involuntarily.

She hesitated a moment, then answered, in a low, sad tone:

"The love I cherish towards an unfortunate father;" and there was an instinctive shrinking in of her soul that made Hugh feel, plainer than words would have told him, that the subject was a painful one.

He adroitly changed the conversation, but listened eagerly while she told him of the wild adventures that had characterized their lonely life, and the many strange and beautiful things that had bordered their pathway. She pictured to him that vast stretch of prairie that surrounded them, and discoursed most eloquently of its green and flowery charms through the spring and summer time, of its golden hues in autumn, when the first light frosts had crisped its waving grass, of its fearful magnificence when the crimson billows of flame surged over it, and of its sullen sea-like grandeur when the white snow was heaped in its hollows and crested in its ridges. Then she told him of the glory of the woodland which lay only a little way to the west of their cabin, and the beauty of the softly flowing Des Moines, whose waters were of a crystal clearness, and whose banks so rich in agates and pearl like shells. Then she sketched the Indian warrior, whose hunting-grounds were as yet all around them, and whose dusky bride had often tarried beside their hearth, teaching her wild-wood arts, and weaving sometimes for her hair a graceful wreath from the silver plumes of the rainbow-colored birds that were ever fluttering in the old tree-tops.

"And do you fancy such companionship? Have you no fears of Indian stratagems and Indian cruelties?" asked Hugh.

A shudder ran over the young girl, and her face grew suddenly very pale, and she looked timidly around ere she replied.

"Until a month ago, I had never known one, for the Indian, if met with kindness, is as much, nay, more, to be depended on than are our brothers. But now, I live in constant terror. My father has offended one of the young chiefs, and the consequence, I feel, will be fatal to him or me, and perhaps to both. My father has realized it too, and since then, until to day, has not ventured out of sight of home. But though he has carefully sought traces of Indian steps, he has in all that time seen none, and so this morning, noting by his keen eye the approach of a fearful storm, he went to his old hunting-hut in the timber. The deer, you know, always rush to the woodland for shelter, and he expected to be able to kill enough to-day to last us through the season. But I feel that he has run a fearful risk."

"And you dared, knowing your red friends were incensed against you, you dared to stay here all alone," exclaimed her listener. "I wonder that you consented to let me in. Did you not fear it might be some Indian in disguise?"

"An Indian could not speak as did you, sir; and if my own senses had misled me, these trusty friends would have proved true;" and she pointed to the dogs. "They can scent an Indian as far as he can one of the pale faces. They are well trained, too. My father received them as a dying gift from the old trapper who lived in this cabin when we came; and he had trained them well, for the country was wilder then than now by much. Would you believe it, though they will bark in their very loudest tones when a white man comes near, they will never breathe a sound if it be an Indian; but if you are awake they will come and stand before you, and look at you with a glance which once seen can never be forgotten; while if you are asleep, they will awaken you in the most cautious way, and warn you of the danger with mute eloquence. O, they are two precious, noble friends." And she patted them fondly. They crunched by her feet afterwards, and burying her little moccasins in their shaggy sides, she bowed her head on her hands and seemed to dream.

Hugh mused for a long time on his strange adventure, and then feeling very weary again, he noiselessly heaped fresh fuel on to the fire and stole off to his couch of buffalo robes. His dreams were at first wild and fearful, then strangely fantastic, and then sadly beautiful; for in every variation of the shifting scene the face of Eleanor, paler, yet lovely and loving, looked up to him with an entreating fondness. Then a dense black cloud covered her kneeling form, and then as it parted, he seemed to be lying on a bed of roses with the cheek of the maiden pressed close to his lips. As he reached out his arms to enshrine her in a fond embrace, he awoke; and lo, with her face close to his own was she of whom he had dreamed. He uttered a cry half of surprise and half of joy. In an instant a warning finger was pressed to his lips and in almost inaudible tones she murmured:

"For your life, breathe not a loud word! Listen! There are Indians about. They surround us, but I cannot guess their mode of attack. Rise and arm yourself, and then creep into the darkest corner. Be careful and make not the least noise, for they are a wary foe. They think me alone. O,"—and she pressed her heart convulsively—"they have doubtless slain my kind father, and would now bear off his daughter to the wigwam of their chief."

Hugh was a gallant fellow. He had won brilliant laurels on the battle-field, and felt the old war-spirit strong within him again as he leaped up and prepared himself to encounter a new foe. He carried a brace of pistols and a double-barrelled fowling-piece; and with a soldier's thoughtfulness, he had immediately after supper withdrawn the damp charges and dried the three before the fire. It was short work for him to reload them now, and beside them a pair which the trapper's daughter handed him. He then unsheathed his hunting-knife and felt its blade to make sure it was keen and polished. And then he looked for a spot where he could amuse himself and arms. A little tent bed occupied one of the recesses which the huge fireplace formed on both its sides, and this was draped with deer skins dressed to a beautiful whiteness. In that he ensconced himself, while Eleanor threw herself on the couch which he had left, feigning sleep, but clutching nervously her pistols.

Hugh's ear was keen, but although the tempest had lulled, and only an occasional wild sob ran around the cabin, he could detect no sounds that told of human foes. After awhile the howl of a wolf was heard. As it died away, he saw the two dogs leave the door, beside which they had stood like petrifications, and advance cautiously to the hearth, and then it seemed to the listener that a dull noise was heard on the roof. It instantly occurred to him that the foe would strive to make their ingress down the chimney, thinking doubtless to find their fair captive alone and asleep and to fether her with but little trouble. Through his loophole, which was a slit in the hangings, he watched, O, how intently, the huge fireplace, whose brands had all burned down to embers. After awhile his heart leaped up with a strange, wild thrill as he saw a moccasined foot appear. The dogs saw it quite as soon as he, and withdrew at once to the side of their mistress. Very cautiously did the Indian descend, but at length he landed safely and noiselessly, too. But no sooner had he shaken and stretched himself out to his usual dimensions, rubbing himself of the cramps with which his descent had tortured him, than the largest of the dogs, without a single warning growl, dashed at his throat, and clenched it with such a convulsive hold that the savage fell with a dull, dead sound. The other dog fastened himself to his knees, and although he struggled violently, yet the surprise was too sudden and the attack too strange and powerful for the victim to make at once a successful resistance.

Hugh felt that his time for action was come, but not wishing to alarm the many who might be outside, he left his retreat with only his knife; but that was soon buried deep in the heart of the red man. There was a quiver of the muscles, a stifled groan, and he lay dead before him. Eleanor sprang from her couch and gazed earnestly at him, and then turning to Hugh, said, quickly:

"It is as I supposed. This is Wa-wa-tu-sa, the friend of Hi was see, the young chief who sought me for a bride. He has thought to enter this way and open the door for him and his other braves. Got back, for they will soon suspect some foul play."

It was as she said. The door was cautiously handled, and then the notes of a bird went whistling around the cabin, and then all was still. But the soldier's ear, made keener by distrust, soon noted the same dull noise on the roof, and as it continued longer than before, he judged correctly that the remaining savages, guessing that something had befallen their spy, were coming in their whole strength upon them. With one of his pistols cocked and pointed through his loophole, he watched intently. It was not long ere a second foe had descended and bent with an amazed look over his prostrate friend. As he lifted up his head, he gave a tremendous whoop; but it was the last sound that ever burst from his lips—a shot from the soldier's pistol entering his heart. Then rushing from his concealment, Hugh stationed himself before the couch of Eleanor, and handing her his pistol, bade her reload it at once.

He had scarcely reached her side ere a third Indian sprang rather than crept down the orifice; but as he straightened himself after the leap, a full charge from the fowling-piece threw him upon the other two, a bloody and soon cold burden. The fourth warrior that descended was not so easily overcome though. It was Hi was see himself, and burning with love for the white girl and rage towards her defender who had slain his best braves, he sprang so suddenly on Hugh that his gun was knocked from his hand, and in an instant he was wrestling with the brawny Indian. The dogs fastened themselves on the legs of the intruder, but their bite, fierce and tense as it was, seemed not to annoy him in the least, and Hugh was fast yielding to the superior physical form of his foe when a pistol shot echoed through the cabin, and he felt his enemy's grasp relax and the warm blood oozing from his breast and dripping over his own hands.

"You have played a brave part," said Hugh, as releasing himself he beheld the Indian reel and finally fall to the floor. "Your Indian lover will never again throw his tomahawk or swing to his belt the gory scalp. Good Heavens, but it is a fearful sight!"

There came a faint whisper from Hi was see. Eleanor went and knelt beside him and wiped away the death-dews which her own hand had started.

"Proud white father," breathed he, "think Indian no good—no fit to have his pale child live in wigwam of chiefs' son. Hi was see say she shall. He make one of skin, white as her face—soft as her cheek—white buffalo robe to sleep on. He love her—he carry her all the days he here on his big heart—like white swan carry little papoose. Proud white father say no—he call Indian dog, and say bad things. Hi was see remember—he wait till good time—he kill old white father—then come for white girl—she kill him—but he love her—hate her white brave though—hate him—love her."

The words were breathed in such broken English that only one used to the Indian could have understood him, and as the last word fell from his lips, he gasped, and the fearful death-spasm finished all.

"My father, my unhappy father!" cried the orphaned girl, "to this—an untimely death in the forest—did thy proud passions bring thee. Alas! I feared thee while living more than I loved thee, yet now that thou art gone, what will become of me—motherless, fatherless, friendless!"

"Nay," said Hugh, earnestly, lending her to a seat, for she was almost fainting, "not friendless. In the far and beautiful East, I have a father, mother and sister, and in memory of your saving kindness to me, they will cherish you as one of their own dear household." And he sat down beside her, and after he had learned her story, he planned their work for the morrow.

There was no time to lose, for Hi was see was son to a powerful Dacotah chief, and a fearful revenge would be taken on them should they be discovered. As soon as it was light enough to see, the horses were saddled and brought by Hugh to the door. A large flat stone, which served as a hearth, was lifted after many efforts, and from a deep hole underneath Eleanor took a couple of money-belts, heavy with gold, and a small casket. Concealing them as well as she could, she took from a packing-box a robe of fur, and enveloping herself in it, told him, with a quivering voice, that she was ready.

"I leave much behind that is of value. There are many solid silver articles in those two boxes, and fine linen and rich clothing; but if I save life, let them go. Alas, they were of but little comfort to me while I owned them!"

Wildly did they gallop away from the bloody cabin, the maiden leading the way through the timber to the Des Moines, for although the prairie track was familiar to her in summer time, she dared not attempt to find it after so fierce a storm. The ice on the river was thick and strong and like hunted deer they sped adown it till they had passed ten miles.

"There is old Ben's cabin," said the maiden, as a thin wreath of smoke was seen lazily curling up through a thicket of wild plum trees. "He is one of the two old trappers whom my father's strange life introduced to me. He will be faithful, I know."

"I was afraid—I feared it most," said he when they had related the tragedy of the night, "but your father was an awful proud one; he brought it all on him. With fair words he might have kept the red skins off and got out of their way. Hat it's no use crying—what's done can't be undone." And the old man busied himself with preparing a woodland breakfast for the couple, saying as he did so: "Heckon you had no appetite this morning. Them red-skins is tarnaal bad corpses."

Then guiding them to the road, he went with them to a cabin ten miles below, and having engaged the trapper who owned it to go with them to the garrison at Fort Des Moines, he hastened back to save, as he said, "all the pretties" that were owned by Eleanor, assuring her that "the tarnaal redskins should never have the finger of them."

By hard riding they reached the fort that night, and Hugh had little difficulty in obtaining from his commander both leave of absence and an escort of soldiers to the Mississippi.

There was much surprise in the old homestead when the son so suddenly returned, and brought, too, such a beautiful stranger. But when their tale was told, the trapper's daughter was taken as once to the hearts of father, mother and sister, and the love Hugh said should be given to her, flowed forth so freely that her young life, so long blighted and sad, became again fresh, joyous and gay. And that its summer was as golden and rich as its spring had been cheerless and poor, you may guess from the fact that the first robe she put on, when she laid aside the black she wore for the dead, was one of the purest white satin, and the first festive gathering she met with, the bright, joyous one that assembled in the old family home to greet her as bride—the bride of her own dear Hugh.

THE UNITY OF THE BIBLE.

As in Beethoven's matchless music there runs one idea, worked out through all the changes of measure and of key, now almost hidden, now breaking out in rich natural melody, whispered in the treble, murmured in the base, dimly suggested in the prelude, but growing clearer and clearer as the work proceeds, winding gradually back until it ends in the key in which it began, and closes in triumphant harmony; so throughout the whole Bible, there runs one great idea—man's ruin by sin, and his redemption by grace; in a word, Jesus Christ, the Saviour. This runs through the Old Testament, that prelude to the New, dimly promised at the fall, and more clearly to Abraham; typified in the ceremonies of the law; all the events of sacred history paving the way for his coming; his descent proved in the genealogies of Luke and Chronicles; spoken of as Shiloh by Jacob, as the Star by Balaam, as the Prophet by Moses; the David of the Psalms; the Redeemer looked for by Job; the Beloved of the Song of Songs. We find him in the sublime strains of the lofty Isaiah; in the writings of the tender Jeremiah; in the mysteries of the contemplative Ezekiel; in the visions of the beloved Daniel; the great idea growing clearer and clearer as the time drew on. Then the full harmony broke out in the song of the angels, "Glory to God in the highest; on earth peace, good-will towards men." And Evangelists and Apostles taking up the theme, the strain closes in the same key in which it began; the devil, who troubles the first paradise, forever excluded from the second; man restored to the favor of God; and Jesus Christ the key-note of the whole.—American Messenger.

WHY THERE IS NO RAIN IN PERU.

In Peru, South America, rain is unknown. The coast of Peru is with a region of perpetual south-east trade winds, and though the Peruvian shores are on the verge of the great South Sea boiler, yet it never rains there. The reason is plain. The south-east trade winds in the Atlantic Ocean first strike the water on the coast of Africa. Traveling to the northwest they blow oblique across the ocean until they reach the coast of Brazil. By this time they are heavily laden with vapor, which they continue to bear along across the continent, depositing it as they go, and supplying with it the sources of the Rio de la Plata and the southern tributaries of the Amazon. Finally they reach the snow-capped Andes, and here is wrung from them the last particle of moisture that a very low temperature can extract. Reaching the summit of that range, they now tumble down as cool and dry winds on the Pacific slopes beyond. Meeting with no evaporating surface, and no temperature colder than that to which they were subjected on the mountain tops, they reach the ocean before they become enured with fresh vapor, and before, therefore, they have any when the Peruvian climate can extract. Thus we see how the top of the Andes becomes the reservoir from which are supplied the rivers of Chili and Peru.—Brunswick Telegraph.

ONE DOLLAR! WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of BalloU's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has been for sixteen years connected with the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 21,600 copies.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year, or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the next copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

LEWISTON, MAINE.

The views on this page, drawn for us by Mr. Champney, represent the new County Buildings, Auburn, Maine, and the Maine State Seminary, Lewiston, designed by G. J. F. Bryant, of this city. Lewiston is situated on the left bank of the Androscoggin River, which is here crossed by a bridge 1700 feet long, and on the line of the Androscoggin and Kennebec Railroad, 33 miles north of Portland. The Androscoggin and Kennebec Railroad communicates with the Atlantic and St. Lawrence Railroad at Leeds, eleven miles above. Lewiston has recently become one of the most important manufacturing towns in the State of Maine, having admirable water power in the Androscoggin, which here has a fall of sixty feet in fifteen rods. The river scenery is here remarkably wild and picturesque, and well worthy the study of artists. About seven hundred acres of land adjoining the falls have been purchased by a company of capitalists, who intend building up a manufacturing city. A dam has been constructed across the river, and a canal sixty feet wide has been dug, extending from above the falls to the mills; and such is the formation of the ground, that the water can be used several times. Four principal corporations are now running about 70,000 spindles, manufacturing coarse cottons, prints, tweeds, satinetts, flannels, etc. Here, also, we find a machine shop 400 feet by 70, and four stories high, with a capacity for one thousand hands. There is another machine shop owned by a private individual for manufacturing steam engines. The manufacturing capital of Lewiston is about $2,000,000. Lewiston has five churches, a bank, a savings institution, a valuable public library, a first class hotel, and a newspaper. The schools are among the best in the State. Below, we present a view of the Maine State Seminary, drawn expressly for the "Pictorial" by Champney. This institution was chartered by the legislature of Maine on the 16th of March, 1855, and is located at Lewiston, Maine. It has received $5000 in money from the State; and whenever "buildings are erected suitable for the accommodation and the purposes of the seminary," and the same shall be "ready to use as a place for the education of youth," it is to receive the scrip of the State in the sum of $10,000. The ten thousand dollars must be kept as a permanent fund, the State paying the interest (six per cent.) semi-annually. Besides the $15,000 donated by the State, the town of Lewiston has given an equal sum, five thousand of which is from the Lewiston Water Power Company. Some ten thousand dollars, also, have been raised by private contributions from various parts of the State. The site embraces twenty acres, costing over $5000. The corner-stone of the centre building, as seen in the engraving, was laid with appropriate exercises on the 26th of June, 1856, and the building is completed outside. It takes the name of "Hathorn Hall," in memory of Deacon Seth Hathorn, of Woolwich, a venerable member of the Free-Will Baptist church, and who has largely contributed for its erection. It is 86 by 50, three stories high. The first story contains a chemical room, philosophical room, laboratory and library room; the second story contains the chapel and two recitation rooms; the third story contains six recitation rooms, and two rooms for literary societies. The two wing buildings are each 147 feet by 44, three stories high above the basement, one for males, the other for females. The dining-room will be in the basement of the ladies' hall. The foundation of the right wing is already laid. The whole is to be built of brick, and is under the direction of a distinguished Boston architect, Mr. G. J. F. Bryant. The Maine State Seminary is designed to be open, like a common academy, for boys and girls of all ages and ranks of scholarship; but, in addition, it will have a regular course of study (probably three years), and will give diplomas to such students as may complete this course. It is hoped by many of its friends that the school will be opened as soon as the fall of 1857. The Maine State Seminary is under the care of the Free-Will Baptist denomination, though it is not a "sectarian school" in any improper sense of the term. Like a large number of the schools of the State, a majority of the trustees are members of a particular Christian denomination. But while a majority of the board of the trustees are Free-Will Baptists, men of other religious faiths are among its warmest and most active friends. By its charter, the institution is purely "literary," and while moral and Christian principles will be taught, all students will be left free in their religious creeds, holding sacred their right to worship God where, and how they please. The board of trustees consists of Rev. Ebenezer Knowlton, President; Rev. Oren B. Cheney, Secretary; Francis Lyford, Esq., Treasurer; Samuel Swanton, Esq., Rev. Nahum Brooks, Auditors. Rev. Oren B. Cheney, General Agent; William R. Frye, Francis Lyford, Abel Chadwick, W. H. Littlefield, E. Knowlton, Alonzo Garcelon, O. B. Cheney, Building Committee. FACULTY.—Rev. Oren B. Cheney, A. M., Principal; George H. Ricker, A. M., John A. Lowell, A. M.—one vacancy. Miss Rachel J. Symonds, Preceptress; Miss Jennie W. Hoyt, Miss Mary R. Cushman. An institution established on so liberal a basis as that we have noticed, cannot fail to attain high eminence, and to exercise a beneficial influence far and wide. The exertions everywhere making to multiply and elevate the character of our schools and academies, show that the descendants of the founders of our republic fully recognize the great truth, that the education of the masses is the palladium of our liberty. But for the early care bestowed on popular education by the wise colonists who peopled this continent, we never should have attained our present political strength and independence. The condition of countries in which the education of the people is neglected, shows the ruinous result of an opposite policy from that which the wisdom of our forefathers established.

NEW COUNTY BUILDINGS, AUBURN, MAINE.

A FLEMISH NUNNERY.

The nuns never lie down, but sleep upright. I went up a narrow, corkscrew, stone staircase into their cells, and saw these extraordinary beds; they consist of a hard and almost cylindrical mattress, stuffed with straw, about three feet long, at right angles to which is fixed an equally hard upright palliase, to support the back. There is no pillow, neither are there sheets, and only one small thin blanket. A basin and ewer of water stood on the ground, and the sleeping habit hung on a peg behind the door. There was no other furniture. A small window opened on to the garden, and the honeysuckle which embowered it, gave something of a cheerful aspect to the denuded little dormitory. They rise at half past four, are only allowed five minutes to wash and dress, and go down to chapel, where they pray and meditate till half past five, when their first mass is said; this is always at a fixed hour, and is followed by one, and sometimes two more. After these they remain in chapel till half past eleven. Their first meal, which they call dinner, is at half past twelve, and consists entirely of herbs, vegetables, rice, eggs, etc. Batter, cheese, milk, and what they call lait battu, they also eat, but not at maigre seasons. Their second and last meal is at seven, and consists of dry bread and the biere du pays. The sisters do everything for themselves—washing, mending, sweeping, scouring, etc. The rule of the lay sisters is slightly less severe in every particular, but even this is ascetic enough to startle most secular persons. The sister who showed us the mysteries of the house was a very pleasant, amiable-looking woman of about thirty-five. She had a peculiarly calm, holy expression of countenance, and expressed herself perfectly buppy in the life of which she had made choice, now about fifteen years since. The discipline they observe, she said, was bon pour l'ame et bon pour le corps aussi. It seems they are removed from house to house, to prevent too great an attachment to one locality. She and another lay sister were sent, a short time ago, on a mission to England—and this was another considerable grievance to her; but she said she kept her trouble to herself, and accepted it as one of the acts of submission to the will of her superior, to which her rule bound her. The first night they arrived in London, when they put up at the hotel, they were shown into the room where the beds were, of course, horizontal. This was a difficulty which had not occurred to them, and they made up their minds to adopt the same position as the rest of the world; but no sooner had they tried it, than they found it impossible to sleep. Accordingly they relinquished the attempt, and taking the mattress off the bedstead, placed it half upright against the wall, and had reason to be perfectly satisfied with the ingenious expedient.—Flemish Interiors.

MARRIAGE IN LAPLAND.

It is death in Lapland to marry a maid without her parents' or friends' consent; therefore, if one bear affection to a young maid, upon breaking thereof to her friends, the fashion is, that a day is appointed for their friends to meet to behold the two young parties run a race together. The maid is allowed in starting the advantage of a third part in the race, so that it is impossible, except she will of herself, that she should be overtaken. If the maid overrun her suitor, the matter is ended; he must never have her, it being penal for the man to renew the offer of marriage. But if the virgin has affection for him, though at first running hard to try the truth of her love, she will pretend some casualty, and a voluntary halt, before the end of the race.—Travels in Lapland.

MAINE STATE SEMINARY, LEWISTON, MAINE.

have enjoyed such a scene! And how, emerging from the waters, after having landed a royal specimen of the monarchs of the river, he would have celebrated his triumph in undying words! The river "Nepisiguit," emptying itself in Bathurst Harbor, is widely known as one of the three most thirst, where there is a good tavern, kept by Mr. James Weatherall, a genuine Yankee, whose willingness to render comfort is plainly seen upon his face. Sportsmen from the States, the Canadas and even Europe will join with us in wishing a "long life and a merry one" to the jolly landlord of the Jenny Lind Hotel. Our third illustration is an accurate delineation of the town of Bathurst, which is situated on the Bay de Chaleur in the British provinces, fifty miles from the Gulf of St. Lawrence. It contains about four thousand inhabitants, and is noted for its ex-

GRAND FALLS ON THE NEPISIGUIT RIVER, NEW BRUNSWICK.

SCENES IN NEW BRUNSWICK.

We have placed on this page some fine engravings from beautiful drawings made in the localities represented by Mr. Barry, taken expressly for the Pictorial. They delineate fresh and unhackneyed scenes, for New Brunswick has rather been neglected by tourists and artists. The second picture represents salmon-fishing in the "Nepisiguit." A sportsman, properly accoutred with high water-proof boots and furnished with rod, line and reel, has made his cast and is engaged in playing the delicious and exhilarating game for this fish which abounds in the New Brunswick waters. How old "Christopher North" of Blackwood, would the delicious "salmon, king of fishes," may be always found. The river at this point descends between high walls of solid rock, over one hundred feet in height, and sweeps with fearful velocity down a rocky bed of millstone for many a league, making the place remarkable for its marvellous beauty, its romance and sublimity. Here the poet and the artist may dwell for weeks, undisturbed in study, from the "least little weedy wild blossom," to the mountain pines, delight in the continuous sound of the noisy water, and obtain unbounded joy from ever changing skies. The place is easily reached, by steamer from Boston to St. John, thence by stage to Chatham, and again by the same conveyance to Ba-ports of lumber, and for its fine millstones. Like most of the towns in the provinces, it is lacking in business excitement. The seven days of the week seem all alike. The houses are small and poorly built, without the slightest regard to architectural taste. The large building on the right of the picture is the steam saw-mill of Ferguson and Co., a branch of a noted Glasgow house. The Roman Catholic Church upon the hilltop, was built for the French residents. A little to the left of this may be seen the old windmill and dwelling-house of the first settler, Mr. Charles Donett. The time-worn edifice crowning the eminence on the left of the picture, is the Presbyterian Church, while under it is shown a portion of the bridge connecting the two sides of the town. The whole picture is an exact delineation of the town as it appears. In our sketches of various localities we aim, in the first place, at accuracy of representation, and afterwards at such pictorial effect as the nature of the scenes will admit. A common fault with drawings of places is, that artists, in aiming at effect are apt to sacrifice truth; we have always carefully avoided this, as we wish to record only faithful transcripts of all localities in our pages, daguerreotypes, as it were, of actual scenes.

CASTING THE FLY FOR SALMON.

BATHURST, ON THE BAY DE CHALEUR, NEWFOUNDLAND.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SONNET UPON AN ANONYMOUS POEM.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Earth, dost thou hide with mould the hand that wrote
This poem, teeming with the muse's fire?
Oblivious, is he thine whose fingers smote
With timid movement such a thrilling lyre?
What was his highest hope—his first desire?
A noble mind, perchance, a soul endued
With heaven-born impulse; elevated higher
Than this cold world with sympathies so rude;
In vain I ask: what boots it to inquire,
Since from the past no echoes e'er return?
The past! Behold the mighty funeral pyre
Of many a noble deed; the fatal urn,
To which our weeping eyes with backward glances turn!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

MRS. WATTS'S DREAM.

BY EMILY R. PAGE.

It is now many years since I was travelling in the great valley of the Mississippi, towards the north; but at the time I am speaking of, railroads were unknown, and so had were the thoroughfares that wheeled vehicles in many places were quite out of the question. So I, like many others, who peddled various kinds of wares, was compelled to make my rounds on a pack-horse, and put up with such accommodations for myself and beast as chance and circumstances furnished.

I can assure you that these were, for the most part, none of the best, as taverns were, like "angels' visits, few and far between," in those days. There were no smart hotels in the backwoods, with bowing landlords, and ready hostlers, and fine waiters, and a comfortable bed, in a room all to yourself. Nothing of the kind. You had to rough it, or go further, and fare worse, perhaps. But spite of such inconveniences, there was a wild charm in that kind of journeying—a sense of independence about it, which one has not the least idea of, in these days of lightning trains, when he is whirled along at the rate of sixty miles an hour, like a mouse in a trap that is tied to the tail of a mad dog. You stopped or started when you pleased, and if you did not go quite so fast as now, you had a better chance of getting safely to your journey's end.

There was another great charm for me in those old travelling times. What could be pleasanter at the end of a long day's travel than to fall in with a set of jolly fellows who made a half-circle round a great wood fire, whose back-log was part of the trunk of a tree felled in the forest by which we were surrounded and shut in, as it were, from all the world, and passed the time in stories that were often varied by personal experiences, which proved that the travelling merchants then were to the full as cute as the smartest Yankee pedler who now practises with his soft sawder on rural simplicity. Some time I will record a few of these revelations, for I am quite sure they would be as interesting as the thunderous literature of Mr. Triptolemus Muff, or the silken sentimentalities of that sweet authoress, "Carrie Cabbage."

Well, on the evening I have specially referred to, I arrived, hungry and tired enough, at old Hans Dohlar's shanty—for it was little better though dignified by the name of tavern. Having attended to my horse, I entered the common room, and joined the ring of guests who were smoking, drinking and talking all at once, in every kind of known language, it seemed; and their appearances were as different as their dialects. There was the meagre, chattering, grimacing Frenchman, the heavy, phlegmatic Dutchman, the German, with great, gray, watery eyes and large meerschaum, the stolid, grave Englishman, the rough, huge-bested backwoodsman, the keen-eyed, hatchet-faced Yankee, the non-descript wanderer, no one knew from where, or to whither, or for what purpose, as well as others who require no particular mention. A heavy storm had driven these guests to the shelter of Hans Dohlar's roof, and as it was impossible to accommodate all of them with beds, or even "shake-downs," it seemed tacitly to be agreed that the night should be passed away as pleasantly as might be, around the fire. So one story after another story was told, songs sung, and rough and ready wit awakened peals of laughter which drowned the howlings of the storm still raging wildly without.

The flow of whiskey at length began to abate, and with it the stream of talk. In fact, most of us were dozing in arm-chairs, when a thundering knock at the door startled us from the enjoyment of our first dreams. Old Hans lifted his great shock-head from the table, and muttering, "Who ter dayfil ish dis?" staggered to the door and unbarred it, when a stalwart young fellow, with a gun in his hand and a wild turkey slung over his shoulder, made his appearance.

"Aeh! mein Gott, ish dis you, Mister Schmidt? Vy rat upon earth brings you our way at dis time o' night?" asked Hans, in astonishment, as the young fellow flung down the bird, placed his gun upon a rack, and then deposited his own person on a vacant seat.

"Fact is," said the youth thus addressed, "I lost myself in the woods, and only found out your place by accident. I had been shooting all day, but without luck, till just before dark, when I managed to kill that turkey, which, however, I should have failed to hit, hadn't Seth Sprowl, down at Barker's hollow, given me a charge or two of the new-fangled patent shot that he's got a little of from over the water."

"New-fangled shot!" exclaimed several voices; "why, what sort of shot is that? Never heard of it, nohow."

"Well, all I know of it is, that it goes straighter to the mark than any other. As to the reason, I can't see that. All I do know is, that I had been shooting all day with this sort," and he exhibited a few shot which lay loose in one of his pockets, "and hit nothing, scarce; but one charge of Seth Sprowl's brought down that fine fellow there, which will make a breakfast for the company, if you'll have it cooked."

"Let me look at the two kinds of shot; I think I can explain the difference between them," said a little weazen-faced, shabbily-dressed, oldish man, who, during the evening, had sat close to the fire, wrapped up, as it were, in his own thoughts—for he seldom spoke or smiled.

He held out his hand as he said this, and the young man dropped into his skinny palm specimens of both kinds of shot.

"Well now, gentlemen," remarked the old fellow, "I have been listening to all your stories for the last few hours, and as I don't want to partake of that turkey without earning my share, if you've no objection, I'll tell you a short story which these little spheres of lead remind me of; and the best of it is, that my story will be a true one, though some of you, I dare say, will doubt it."

So a fresh pitcher of whiskey was provided, and the old fellow, having moistened his lips, commenced:

"You don't believe in dreams, very likely; well, I do, and am going to tell you the story of a very remarkable dream, but for which I should not have been here to-night, and that turkey there which Dame Dohlar is plucking would have been quietly roosting on his perch."

"Guess yer shootin' with the long bow, now," said the Yankee pedler, with a sneer playing on his saffron-faced countenance.

"My name is Watts," went on the little man, heedless of the interruption, and twirling about the little leaden globes in the palm of one hand with the forefinger of the other, pausing now and then in the course of his narrative, as though the perfectly spherical and patent shot were tangible periods and colons, and the common shot, which looked less regular in their shape, were semi-colons and commas, to say nothing of the improved article now and then eliciting notes of admiration,—"my name is Watts, and so was my father's, and my grandfather's before him, and, of course, my grandmother's name was Watts, also." Here two of the patent shot formed themselves into a colon, and a brief pause ensued. The young sportsman interrupted it by exclaiming:

"Watts—Watts! why, that name was on the bag in which Seth Sprowl got me the shot, some of which you have in your hands. If I do not mistake, William Watts was the stamped patente."

"Quite right, sir; you have a quick eye, I see. Well, then, it was William Watts's wife, my grandmother, who dreamed how perfectly round gun-shot were to be made, and by so doing made her husband's fortune."

"I wish to mercy my old woman would take to dreaming in that way!" observed one of the listeners.

"But," continued the old man, "it ruined him in the end, for all that."

"How so?" asked half a dozen voices, and the half dozen heads to which those voices belonged were stretched eagerly in the direction of the story-teller's corner.

"You shall hear," he said. "As I have intimated, Mr. William Watts was my father's father. I never saw him, for he died long before I was born; but I can form a pretty clear idea of him from descriptions and a portrait which used to hang in our parlor at home. He was a short, plump personage, with cunning gray eyes, and like all the other keen Bristol merchants, it used to be said of him that he always slept with one of them open. But the wisest of us sometimes make mistakes in the long run, and so it happened in his case."

"My grandfather was a plumber and shot maker, and it was the latter branch of his business which was the most profitable. At that time, however, shot-making was but a very partially developed art, and consisted in merely letting drops of melted lead fall into a large vessel of water from a height of two or three feet, which caused them suddenly to cool, and retain a rounded shape. But as the metal did not thoroughly solidify before it reached the water, the sudden contact with the latter caused a little indentation on the surface of every shot, exactly at the point where it first touched the liquid. Now, gentlemen, if you will examine the contents of your pouches, you will observe the depression upon every shot; but in these patent ones, the sphere is perfect and unblemished."

Here another shot rolled itself into a period, and during its continuance in this form, Mr. Watts paid his respects to the pitcher.

"But what has all this to do with the dream?"

"Wait a little, and you will see that it has everything to do with it, for if there had been no dream in the case you might have had unreliable shot until this day. Now my grandfather was himself sportsman enough to know that with the shot he manufactured no certainty of aim could be secured; but for the life of him he could not ascertain the reason. He racked his brain day and night for some means of improving the article he made; but to no purpose; and at length repeated disappointments caused him to become so discontented and morose, that his wife had but a poor time of it with him, and sometimes almost wished herself shot—if even with the very inferior article her husband made."

"Now it fortunately happened that my grandmother, who was a remarkably quiet woman, had more philosophy in her little finger than her husband had in his whole composition, and she took it into her head that, as for almost every ill there was a cure, so there might be a remedy for bad shot. This idea having taken possession of her mind, there it remained; and you all know, gentlemen, that if a woman once sets her will upon accomplishing anything, Old Nick himself cannot prevent her. So it was with my ancestress. Like a sensible woman, she determined to use her wits as well as her eyes; and to that end, day after day, she watched the process of shot-making, as she sat by the water-tank, knitting busily away as if for dear life. Her husband noticed, too, that she never knitted with such wonderful rapidity as when she was watching the shining globules of lead as they dropped from the strainer-like square iron pan into the water. But she seldom spoke a word, though her eyes, her brain and her fingers were not a moment unemployed. So matters went on for many months, and as Mr. Watts's business began to fall off, poverty stared him in the face. It was of no use for his wife to encourage him. Rather than make imperfect shot he cared not to make any, and he must soon have gone to ruin had it not been for his wife's dream."

"Now, then, for it," sneered the company.

"One night my grandfather was suddenly roused from comfortable slumber by a vigorous shake of his shoulder, and the twitching off of his nightcap. Rubbing his eyes and God-blessing himself, he sat bolt upright in bed, and perceived with great surprise, for the moon was shining brightly into the chamber, that his usually quiet wife was frantically dancing about the room with a tinder-box in one hand and his working-day breeches in the other, and exclaiming, vehemently, not 'Eureka,' as did Archimedes of old, but 'I've hit it! I've struck the nail on the head! Get up, man alive, before I forget it, and I'll make your fortune!'"

"Hit what? What nail have you struck on the head?" questioned the bewildered Mr. Watts, who sat with his chin on his knees, and his eyes staring out of their sockets with amazement.

"I've dreamed how to make shot without any mark on 'em," shouted Mrs. Watts, as she converted Mr. Watts's breeches into a nightcap, greatly to the indignation of that gentleman, who swore wildly, and fancying his wife's freak would soon be over, laid down and prepared for another snooze.

"But Mrs. Watts had no idea of that sort of thing, and the clothes were dragged off the bed in no time, a light was struck, and half an hour afterwards, the astonished husband being more thoroughly awakened, was told the particulars of his wife's wonderful dream."

"Well, it seems reasonable enough," remarked that gentleman, when his wife had finished her story, 'but the proof of the pudding, Mrs. Watts, lies, you know, in the eating. I don't put much faith in dreams. Besides, I don't see how yours could come true more than other people's.'

"But I do," responded his lady—"I do, and what is more, I'll try it, and you shall help me; so let's go about it at once."

"Mrs. Watts had dreamed that if the drops of melted lead were allowed to fall through the air from a considerable height, so as to get thoroughly hardened before they reached the water, their perfectly spherical form would not be damaged by contact therewith. Now whether the good lady had so unconsciously arrived at this conclusion in the course of her meditations on the subject as to cause her mind to be impressed with it in a dream, it is of no importance to inquire; most probably, however, such was the case; but she was a truthful woman, and to her dying day declared that the idea came to her in a dream, and in no other way."

"The day broke, and my grandmother, all impatience to test the truth of her vision, determined at once to try the experiment. Opposite her house was a church with a lofty tower, which she selected as the most suitable place of operation. The sexton was a neighbor. From him she borrowed the key, and by six o'clock in the morning my grandfather had got his apparatus ready, and with a charcoal-burner, some lead, a bucket of water, and the shot-card, as the implement was called through which the melted lead was poured to form drops, both husband and wife, with great secrecy, repaired to the old church, and locked themselves in. The staircase of the tower was circular, so that a wall of great distance from its summit, formed a most convenient shot-factory, and at the top of it Mr. Watts placed his 'card,' while at its bottom my grandmother stood beside the bucket of water, on the contents of which, before long, so much might depend."

"All was at last ready, and down came the molten shower of glistening metallic drops. Hissing and spluttering, they fell into the water, until all the lead was used, and then, with eager haste, my grandmother plunged her hand into the now warm fluid and drew a quantity of the shot therefrom. Selecting one, she examined it with a microscopic eye, and then another and another were subjected to the same scrutiny. Each and all were ascertained to be faultless in form and sphericity. The great triumph had been achieved; the night vision was a sober reality, and when Mr. Watts came down from his extemporized workshop above, she flung her arms around his neck and exclaimed:

"There, my dear, what do you say to my dream now?"

"What he said in reply, gentlemen, I don't know, but I know what he did. He went off, after breakfast, and applied for a patent, which in due time he secured. He then built a shot-tower in his native city, Bristol, the first in the world, and soon acquiring a large fortune, retired from trade. But his prudent wife died, and with her went his good luck. He commenced building at Clifton a proposed magnificent terrace, on which were to be reared a row of splendid houses. But having sold his patent, he could not get enough ready cash to carry out his intentions, and on the foundations only of his great work he expended every shilling he had in the world. The luckless place is called Watts's folly to this day."

"The end of my poor grandfather was tragical. Having begged a bag of shot from the person to whom he had disposed of his right in the patent, he put a heavy charge into a gun and shot himself through the head. His son, my father, struggled through the world in poverty and neglect, till he died, leaving me penniless, and that, gentlemen, is how it came to pass that I ventured to this country, in hope of bettering my fortune. Now you will understand why it is that I am here, and also how it comes that that wild turkey is browning so nicely before the fire."

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

TO G. M. RUNN.

BY H. C. BACKER.

Thou bearest one, look to Heaven,
Pour thy spirit forth in prayer,
God will give thee, in his wisdom,
Strength thy lonely lot to bear.

Thou he lovest he will chasten,
Dost believe it, stricken one?
Trusting wholly canst thou murmur,
Lord, thy will, not mine, be done?

Then thy station will be blessed
Among the lonely ones of earth;
And beneath this worldly crossness
Thou wilt find the diamond's worth.

Though no more the light of Pleasure
On thy pathway casts her beams,
Thou shalt meet her 'mong the wanderers,
In the shadow-land of dreams.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

FOUND AT LAST!

BY HERBERT LINTON.

THERE was a quiet bridal party at the little church of Ellenthorpe, in England. There was less of the usual congregation than is ordinary on such occasions—and perhaps the few witnesses were aware that there would be less than the usual amount of happiness, where two such opposite natures were binding themselves into one. Into one! Ah, that could never be!

The curate, Mr. Birdstone, lacked his usual energy in repeating the service; and altogether, there seemed to hang a sort of dreary and ominous significance over the portal of that state, which, humanly speaking, lasts until severed by the hand of Death!

The bridegroom was very young—only twenty-one; the bride looked a year or two older. The former was a fine specimen of English youth; strong and well-formed, and with a look of high determination about the lips that spoke of a firm, perhaps a wilful character. Alas for their future happiness! There was too little contrast between the two; the bride having the same traits unmistakably impressed on her countenance, also. She was even haughty in her perfect composure, and showed none of the beautiful timidity, or the leaning dependence, of a bride.

There were whispers in the church from those who were initiated, that Elinor Latham had accepted Marcus Churchill in a moment of disappointment and pique, because another lover had deserted her. For once, there was more truth than poetry in the gossip of a country town; and unhappily, the prophecy of future misery, which some did not scruple to make, was soon to be fulfilled. The young schoolmaster and his pretty but haughty wife soon verified the assertion.

Certain it is, that before the crescent moon which had lighted the bridal pair to their home had waxed and waned, there were angry words spoken; and ere a year had elapsed, the pretty bridal establishment was broken up, the bride had returned to her father's house, and Marcus Churchill was on his way to America.

If there was a struggle in the heart of Elinor, love had no part in it—and she scorned to affect the semblance. She had loved another with all the strength of which her hard and proud nature was capable; and, failing that, she had coldly sacrificed Marcus to a life of disappointment and regret for having loved one so heartless. She exacted the sacrifice, but found too late that it had neither healed the wound in her own heart, nor planted the thorn, as she had wished, in that of another. She did not love Marcus, and had immolated her own happiness upon the broken altar of her ambition. She came back from that sacrifice with only the smoke and ashes clinging to her garments.

But not even for her haughty pride would Marcus have deserted her, had he known that, when he was far away on the shores of a distant land, there was blooming into being a child who would have called him father!—a child whom the mother, in the bitterness of her heart, almost wished had never seen the light, and whose soft smiles and winning caresses brought no delight. In time, Elinor softened towards the child—towards the father—ah, that was not in her nature.

On that distant shore, where the young English schoolmaster had taken up his abode, he heard of this child with a thrill of inexpressible emotion, and ever this thought was present with him. And as he walked the streets of the populous city, his eyes dwelt ever on the groups of little children, loving to fancy which of them might resemble the one whose lip he might never press with a father's kiss.

Years passed, and the cold, hard barrier never grew less. Stately, and withdrawn into herself, Elinor sat in her father's home, with no light upon her heart except that which beamed from Marcus Churchill's child. And even for that there was no rapturous thrill like a mother's passionate love for her child—no agony of apprehension, like a mother's, when she thought of its death. Even to the little Ethel she would wrap herself in a garment of cold reserve, chilling and repulsing the little creature from its birth, and darkening its innocent childhood. Not Marcus himself, afar off, was more oblivious to the caresses of his child than was Elinor; and Ethel was as truly an orphan from her birth, as though both parents were in their graves. The word parent was as meaningless to her as any other of which she did not know the import; and her little heart, yearning as it did in its passionate love for a parent's tenderness, was thrown back upon itself in utter loneliness, and the sadness of desolation. Elinor's care of her child was only cold duty—never broadening into smiles nor praises, but entrenching itself behind a dark, high wall of pride. She had built up this wall, and never suffered a flower to climb over its smooth and polished surface. Perhaps her first fierce battle with life had crushed out all feeling from her heart.

Her parents were both taken sick at once, and they were not long separated. Ethel could only run from one sick bed to another in an agony of grief, which her mother, although scrupulous in care and attention, could neither share nor comprehend. Even when they died, Elinor did not depart from her still and serene repose of manner. She let Ethel shed her tears uncomfited, put away the things which could remind her of the past, and setting herself down in the dull, lonely house, she was again wrapped in the same impenetrable reserve as before.

Not from her did Ethel ever learn the fact that she had a father living. She learned it from her grandfather's pale lips in dying, while, at the same time, he told her not to talk to her mother about it. So Ethel kept the thought of her distant parent in her own heart, ever with a wild imagining of his looks, his words, and all that he might some day be to her. And then she would weep at the thought that her ideal might never grow into a living, breathing reality.

Still, it was an incentive to every good deed—the thought of deserving her father's praise, even if she were debarred from receiving it; and from this thought there grew fruits an hundred fold. Marcus Churchill, therefore, in his mournful isolation from his child, became a better monitor, perhaps, than he might have been in his actual presence. So she grew up, wearing that image in her heart, wondering, without daring to ask, if her mother ever thought of him; and dreaming that a time might come—a time of reconciliation and joy—when her mother's face would wear a more hopeful, more serene aspect.

Time—"that wears out the trace of deepest trouble;"—time—"the awakener, the drier of tears and healer of wounds"—had passed over Elinor's heart in vain. If she was ice in her younger years, she was frozen into marble now—hard, cold and impenetrable. The daily routine of her life was so frigid in its chilling ceremony, and there was such a heartlessness in the mere forms of their household doings—so little of the true life and warmth of home, as it is made by the gushing out of warm, affectionate hearts—that when Ethel, at seventeen, was emancipated from school, where she had endured almost Egyptian bondage, she began to think she was falling into one more odious still—bondage to duty, where love had been all crushed out.

How weary were those years, none but herself could know. Her mother wished no company—permitted none; and Ethel, obedient in principle, but rebelling in her heart, had no chance of diffusing her own affections, any more than Mrs. Churchill herself. For ten years longer the two weary women lived on in solitude and loneliness—Elinor seldom looking beyond the door of her voluntary prison, and Ethel beating the bars of her cage in vain attempts to be free, or to grow content with her captivity.

And where, during all these weary years, was Marcus—the wifeless husband and childless father! When he left England, upon the final separation from his wife, he almost vowed never to see its white cliffs again. There was no malice in his heart towards her, but there was bitterness. He could not deny that she had clouded his young life, and he felt that, to get away from that living death—that utter and hopeless misery of two beings bound together without love—he would fly to the world's farthest bounds. It was like a chain about his neck—this marriage without union—and he resolved to go away forever.

From the deep thinking, worldly teacher, he became, in the course of years, and through much study and application, a deep spiritual teacher. Religion was a part of his nature, and was only developed in a finer and more diffusive sense, when he took upon himself the sacred office of a preacher of the gospel. His doctrinal views were held in check by his intensely practical ones—and the more he learned to worship in the beauty of holiness himself, the more his spiritual nature expanded into pity and sympathy for those who went astray.

If we could but sometimes stand outside of the falseness and superficiality of our daily lives, and come truly into communion with the beauty and freedom of our religion! Breaking away, not from the propensities of life, but from its heartless conventionalities, if we could but stand by the actual truth—the severe and solemn, yet simple and beautiful truths which lie around us, to what complexion of gladness might we come at last! So much of the artificial comes between us and God, that we almost lose sight of the pure and true, which nature and religion are ever unfolding.

So thought Marcus Churchill—and his only aim now was to come into the light of this purity and truth—to lead a pure and simple life, and to die a holy and Christian death.

Sometimes the desire to see his child would overpower almost every other emotion. From the moment when he had received Mr. Latham's letter, stating Ethel's birth, he had not ceased to long and pray for her presence—but this he hardly dared to hope for, because he knew that it could never be, until another life should pass away, and in that passing away only, could she be in freedom to come to him.

All things spoke to him of his child. He heard her voice in every hymn that rose in the vast church where he ministered; he felt her influence upon him everywhere like a good angel, imparting a depth of consolation unknown to hearts not so severely tried as his own.

He wrote to Ethel, enclosing a munificent sum of money and a miniature resemblance of himself. He begged her to write to him out of her own heart, without any reference to others. He wanted to know that name or his name, and he believed that if she wrote herself, he should know her character at once. Her answer came, fraught with a tenderness almost too deep for expression. She implored him to come to England—to let her look upon his face—to hear his voice—to feel for once that she had a father. She was very lonely she said—in fact, alone in the world—no father near, no brother—"not so much as a lover, dear father, and almost thirty years old! So come at once, pray do—and I will meet you at Liverpool."

It was an appeal that could not be resisted, and he went in the next steamer, without waiting to apprise her of his coming, but his heart whispered that, as Ellenthorpe was so near, she would haunt every steamer that arrived. No one was at the landing, however, who answered the description he had made of her in his heart. He proceeded to the station of the railway between Liverpool and Ellenthorpe, and scanned the passengers carefully. He waited until they were nearly all gone, and gave up seeing Ethel for that day.

He turned sick with disappointment, but at that moment he saw a lady cross the floor of the station and seat herself at the window, apparently waiting for a carriage. He saw her start and half rise from her seat, at sight of him. His miniature, then, had been faithful to his look. His heart beat thick and low, and approaching her, he said softly, "Are you my daughter?" The cry which she uttered answered him. It was Ethel herself! Ethel with the look he had so often imagined. Ethel with her subdued but lovely face, mature in its beauty, yet childlike in its expression, like one whom the world hath not spoiled. Ethel, looking, for the first time in her life, upon a father's face, and receiving, for the first time, a father's blessing.

"And your mother, Ethel?"

Ethel burst into tears. "Father," she said, softly, "my mother is dying! She has been wasting away for the last three years, and now she is so near death, that nothing but to see you would have taken me from her side. Will you come to Ellenthorpe, dear father? I do not know as she will see you, now that age and sickness have so often imagined. Ethel with her subdued but lovely face, mature in its beauty, yet childlike in its expression, like one whom the world hath not spoiled. Ethel, looking, for the first time in her life, upon a father's face, and receiving, for the first time, a father's blessing."

Dying! As a man and a Christian, Marcus Churchill felt deeply the import of that word, but the ties which her own hand had rent asunder, rose up before him as a husband, and pity was the deepest sentiment he could feel for one so heartless in her youth—so relentless in her age. He bowed his head and wept.

Not because Elinor was dying, but because of his clouded life, his vanished hopes, his long, solitary years, round which no genial blossom of gladness had ever bloomed—because of his daughter's youth, wasted and crushed beneath an unloving influence—and, perhaps, of the change that was awaiting them all, when they should meet in another world.

It was late when they reached Ellenthorpe; and the unusual flashing of lights across the windows of that well-remembered house, where Marcus had won the haughty bride of his youth, alarmed Ethel. Her father had not the heart to leave her in her agitated state, and he almost carried her into the house which he had resolved not to enter.

Elinor Churchill was dead! It was Ethel's consolation to know that she had not missed her from her side, but passed peacefully from a gentle slumber to the sleep of death.

When the house was still, and they who had bustled in it, all day, had gone, and only the quiet moonlight lay in the rooms, Marcus took Ethel's hand, and persuaded her to retire to her rest. Then he went into the chamber where lay his early bride—now the bride of death. The moonbeams showed the pallid face, without revealing the harsh lines that sickness, and death, and earthly passion leave upon the countenance. Glimping up in its white stillness, as she lay, insensible alike to his reproaches or forgiveness, Marcus bent over it for a moment, and knelt to pray. In that prayer, deep, humble and heartfelt, all human animosity seemed passing away, and a serene peace, such as passeth speech, to come into the heart of the living, kneeling by the dead.

Once more Marcus entered the little church of Ellenthorpe, passing with the funeral train, under the branches of the same trees that swayed above the bridal entrance thirty years ago. Thirty years leave their mark upon the strongest and fairest, and the boy, scarcely above twenty then, could not be recognized in the grave, sad man of fifty. The heart itself may not grow old, but it loses its first perfect trust in humanity, and the billows of time must leave fragments on the shores of our being.

The same curate performed the funeral service, that bestowed the bridal benediction. Marcus sighed to think how little the element of peace had flourished under that benediction! He was looking back into the years that had flown since he last entered this sanctuary. He saw Elinor, decked as a bride, yet wearing almost a scornful look on a brow which might have reflected only sunshine. He remembered her regal dignity of manners, her beauty and her talents—but O, could he forget how she had outraged his loving heart?

Ten days later, they were on the broad bosom of the Atlantic, hastening towards that shore, where, henceforth, that grave maiden should grow almost young and beautiful, under the influence of this new revelation of a father's love, unknown before. And for him—the father—life, which seemed so broken and fragmentary before, has resolved itself into a serenity which sheds itself over their home, and looks calmly and hopefully to the future.

No man has ever stood lower in my estimation for having a patch in his clothes; yet I am sure there is greater anxiety to have fashionable, or at least clean and unpatched clothes, than to have a sound conscience. I sometimes try my acquaintances by some such test as this; who could wear it patch, or two extra seams only, over the knee.—Thornton.

DR. ELISHA KENT KANE.

THE ARCTIC EXPLODER.

The fine head which accompanies this article was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry, his authority being the steel portrait which forms the preface to Dr. Kane's book, published in such splendid style by Childs and Peterson, and heretofore fully noticed in these pages. This narrative of his Arctic adventures has already met with a prodigious sale, and now that the hand which penned and illustrated it is cold in death, it will be yet more eagerly sought as the final monument of his genius and heroism. Dr. Elisha Kent Kane was born in Philadelphia, on the third day of February, 1822. He very early distinguished himself for a love of adventure and science, and while a collegiate student at the university of Virginia, explored the Blue Mountains of that State with a view to the acquisition of geological facts. In 1843 he graduated from the Pennsylvania Medical University, and soon afterwards entered the United States navy as assistant surgeon. He was attached to the first embassy to China as physician, and before returning home travelled extensively in China, the Philippines, Ceylon and the interior of India, and other countries, meeting with many perilous adventures. While in India he descended the crater of the Tael of Luzon, suspended by a bamboo, from a rock above the interior scoria and debris, over two hundred feet. He re-ascended safely, though he immediately encountered another danger, the superstitious fury of the natives, who regarded his exploration as a sacrilegious act only to be expiated by death. Escaping from this peril, he was afterwards attacked by the Ladrones, and again attacked and wounded in Egypt. From Egypt he went to Greece, and then visited Italy, France and England before returning home, in 1846. He was next ordered to the coast of Africa. He here renewed some acquaintances formed in Brazil, and facilities were afforded him for inspecting the whole machinery of the slave trade. Furnished with a pass from Desouza, the great intermediary between the chiefs of the slave districts and the Brazilian slavers, he penetrated the interior, and witnessed scenes which few persons have an opportunity of seeing. He contracted the coast fever, however, and came near dying from it, and was sent home by Commodore Read on the sick list. During the Mexican war, having partially recovered his health, he volunteered his services, and was entrusted with despatches from the president to General Scott, after the latter had marched for the capital. The pathway was beset with dangers, and he was escorted by Col. Dominguez with his famous Spy company. When near Nopalucan, in the vicinity of Puebla they received information that a large body of Mexican troops had been despatched to intercept them, and were but a short distance off, whereupon Dominguez announced his determination to retreat. Dr. Kane, however, by threats of the vengeance of his government, induced Dominguez to advance, and led the charge upon them in person. In the severe skirmish that followed, Dr. Kane was engaged with a Spanish officer, and ran him through the body with his sword, but saved his life after the action by tying up a severed artery. When an attempt was made by Dominguez's company to murder some of the prisoners, Dr. Kane protected them at the risk of his life, receiving a severe lance wound in his thigh, and managed to deliver them safely into the hands of Col. Childs, the American governor at Puebla. Here he passed several days, most kindly cared for by the family of Major Gaona, one of the Mexican party he had been engaged with, and the father of the young man he had wounded in the action. Major Gaona from that time was one of his warmest friends. He was an officer of distinction and had been entrusted with the defence of the castle of San Juan d'Ulloa against the French. After partially recovering from the effects of his wound, Dr. Kane gallantly pushed forward to the capital and delivered his despatches to the commander-in-chief. While in Mexico he ascertained the height of Popocatepetl by barometrical observations. We next find him attached to the United States coast survey. He was in the Gulf of Mexico when, on May 12, 1850, he received orders to join the Grinnell Arctic expedition, then fitting out at New York, under the command of Lieut. De Haven. He was absent about fifteen months on this expedition, serving as surgeon, naturalist and historian. He scarcely allowed himself time to rest, when he again embarked on that expedition to the Arctic regions which resulted in an extended knowledge of the northern coast of Greenland and America, and the verification of the existence of an open polar sea. His narrative of this adventurous voyage will be read as long as the English language endures. The hardships to which he was exposed in this second expedition completed the ruin of his constitution, never very robust, and weakened by wounds and the severe fever contracted in the East. He visited England, where he was received with great distinction, and thence, by the advice of physicians, went successively to St. Thomas and to Cuba. He died in Havana on the 16th of last February, a young man, but crowned with the highest honors. The news of his death was received everywhere with such demonstrations of sorrow as greet only the departure of the true heroes of the world.

DR. ELISHA K. KANE.

COASTING ON BOSTON COMMON.

The spirited picture on this page, drawn expressly for us, represents a locality and a pastime dear to every Boston boy, and will be regarded as an agreeable souvenir of the winter we have just passed through. It was precisely on this spot during the Revolution, that a committee of the boys waited on the British general with a bold complaint of the interference of his troops, then encamped upon the Common, with their winter sports. General Gage admired their Anglo-Saxon pluck and promised that they should not be disturbed, remarking afterwards to one of his officers, "What are we to expect of the fathers, when the sons of rebels exhibit such a spirit?" There may be men living who coasted on the Common during the occupation of Boston by the British troops. At any rate, Young America has not degenerated from the spirit of 1776.

CURIOUS OCCURRENCE.

A short time ago a hunter, who was sporting on the banks of the lake of Wallensted, in Switzerland, discovered the nest of one of those destructive birds, the "lammergayer," a species of vulture; he shot the male, and made his way along a projection of the rock with a view of taking the young birds. He raised his arm, and felt her head in his side. The sportsman, whom the slightest movement must have precipitated to the bottom of the rock, with that coolness and self-possession so peculiar to the mountain huntsman of that country, notwithstanding the pain he experienced, remained unmoved. Having his fowling-piece in his left hand, he placed it against the face of the rock, pointed to the breast of the bird, and with his toe, as they always go barefooted the better to enable them to hold and climb the rocks, he touched the trigger and the piece went off and killed the enemy on the nest. Had the bird been anywhere else, it must have dragged him down along with it. He procured assistance from the neighboring auherge or inn, hard by, and brought the two birds as trophies of his valor away with him. Some of these birds have been known to measure seventeen feet from tip to tip of the wings, and are only equalled in size by the condor of South America.—French Journal.

BOYS COASTING ON BOSTON COMMON.

|                               |        |
|-------------------------------|--------|
| TERMS.—INvariably IN ADVANCE. |        |
| 1 subscriber, one year.....   | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers, " " .....      | 10 00  |
| 10 " " " .....                | 20 00  |

* Any person sending us freer subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the *thirtieth copy gratis.
 ** One copy of BAILLOU'S PICTORIAL, and one copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.
 Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,
 No. 22 Witter Street, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

SPRING.

BY E. H. GOULD.

Spring comes in sweet and soft array,
And throws her mantle o'er the hills:
Breathes on the air a sweet perfume,
And with new life the woodland fills.

The tender blade waves in the sun,
The trembling leaves dance on the tree:
The birds are glad with songs of joy,
And streams go rippling glad and free.

So gladness, come, and o'er our hearts
Thy radiant charms a halo fling;
Bid hope and joy eternal shine,
And love its wealth of pleasure bring.

Let vain regret for pleasures past,
And timid fear of future woe,
(Which rob the present of its joys)
Forever melt like Winter's snow.

BEAUTY.

Even then her presence had the power
To soothe, to warn—nay, even to bless—
If ever bliss could graft its flower
On stem so full of bitterness—
Even then her glorious smile to me
Brought warmth and radiance, if not balm,
Like moonlight on a troubled sea,
Brightening the storm it cannot calm.—MOORE.

A SOFT BREEZE.

Why such a golden eve? The breeze is sent Careful and soft, that not a leaf may fall
Before the serene father of them all
Bows down his summer head below the west.—KEATS.

CHEER UP.

Never so gloomily, man with a muid;
Hope is a better companion than fear;
Providence, ever benignant and kind,
Gives with a smile what we ask with a tear.—LONGFELLOW.

THE FLOWERS AND THE STARS.

Flowers of the sky, ye, too, to age must yield,
Faint as your silken sisters of the field!—DARWIN.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

The Rev. E. M. P. Wells, of "St. Stephen's Mission to the Poor," says, that during the past winter he has seen a large number of American young men, of temperate and correct habits, compelled, for want of work, to ask for a few days' meals, and a few nights' lodgings. A hard winter, like the past, occasioning temporary suspensions of many kinds of business, causes great suffering. . . . Erskine, having successfully managed a case for a large coal company, they gave him a dinner, at which, when called upon for a sentiment, he gave the following:—"Sink your pits, blast your mines, dam your rivers!" The language sounded strangely, but the advice was genuine. . . . The Holroyd Mirror tells of a man who grumbled at buying school-books for his children, and the next minute spent a dollar in treating "the crowd." . . . Recently, in the Court of Sessions, in New York city, Madame Leon, alias Felice Dupres, a lady of wealth and position, was sentenced to six months imprisonment in the penitentiary for shoplifting, a failing for which she has been notorious—another afflicting case of "moral insanity." . . . Keachings, the chief of the Kaw Indians, was buried lately with his horse, that he might be well mounted when he rose from his last sleep. . . . The Transcript says, that Gen. Andrews is "one of the best soldiers enrolled in the Massachusetts militia." . . . Isn't it delightful to dream of the coming of summer? "Shadows, clouds and darkness" may rest upon her path, but still she is coming. We hear her whispers mingled with the bleak and raging winds of the chilling spring-time, and we know she will surely be with us soon. Ah! how does the pale invalid, who longs for her genial kiss, yearn for the first day of June! . . . The other day, we were agreeably surprised by a pleasant call from Banvard, the artist and traveller, and the time passed rapidly as he was chatting about his adventures. His panoramas of the Mississippi and Palestine have yielded him a fortune—and never did the mantle of success descend on worthier shoulders. . . . It has been calculated that 69,106 tons of fertilizing matter are annually wasted in the waters of the Thames, London. How many tons of food that might be made to produce, instead of polluting the stream that washes the great city! . . . Several of the New York omnibus lines have adopted the plan of receiving fares from the passengers when they enter, instead of when they leave. But the fun of the thing is, that when the travelling is in the wretched condition that sometimes exists in the streets of New York, the omnibuses are unable to complete their journeys—but the prepaid fare is not returned. . . . Lucy Eastcott, who has created such a furor by her singing in Great Britain, is an American prima donna, and hails from Springfield, Mass. . . . It is proposed to lay down an electric telegraph between Havana and Key West. Electric telegraphs will soon interweave the whole world in their mesh-work. . . . A white oak leg saved at Wayne, Michigan, lately, made 2225 feet of sound lumber without a knot. This is not a common leg. . . . An Albany taxidermist, Mr. Hurst, has sent Mr. Buchanan a buck's head surmounted by an American eagle, both finely preserved. . . . The squirrels on the Common, and in the Granary Burying-Ground, have stood the winter remarkably well. We have seen them sporting high among the elm-trees, many degrees above zero. . . . The heavy shower, lately, reminded an incorrigible punster of the French Rue of Terror. The wretched man is still at large. . . . The fabrics of whalebone, steel and India rubber, in which our fashionable ladies encase themselves, have been facetiously termed "Eolie-towers!" . . . Our late religious exchanges are filled with interesting accounts of numerous awakenings to grace. The past three months have been very prolific in revivals. . . . When Dr. Johnson was assailed with a torrent of invectives by a Billingsgate fisherman, he retorted by calling her an "individual." It almost broke her heart. That word was not in her vocabulary; and considering it as a most withering invective, she collapsed. The unknown is always terrible to the ignorant. . . . Death by the garrote is said to be the most merciful of all modes of capital punishment. We wonder if the garroters of New York adopted this practice for that reason. . . . Mr. Clay once asked a charming belle what her definition of true politeness was. She replied, "Perfect case." Perfect case is certainly the acme of elegant manners, but it does not follow that the perfectly easy man is perfectly polite. . . . A majority of our papers appear to be in favor of having our police uniformed. One advantage would be, that when a citizen needed the intervention of the police, he could select his man at once. . . . The Vigilance Committee of San Francisco desire, it is said, to have their acts legalized by a retrospective act of the legislature. It was a terrible social state that necessitated the organization of that body; but there have been times on our Atlantic seaboard, when it appeared as if such an association were needed. The question was agitated during the garroting mania in New York. . . . How many monitors we meet with to enforce a realization of the awful fact that in the midst of life we are in death! Recently, Rev. Wm. H. Lovering died in Texas—and while Rev. Stephen Wright was about to perform the funeral service on the following day, he fell down in a fit of apoplexy, and instantly expired. . . . During the Revolutionary war, Benj. Smith, now living at Walpole, in this State, paid one hundred dollars of continental currency for a mug of flip! The continental currency was as much depreciated as the assignats during the French revolution. . . . The prodigious sale of Irving's "Life of Washington" is an encouraging proof of the literary taste of the times. Good books are always sure to find purchasers. . . . There is a story extant, that the Dutch were expelled from an East Indian settlement, because their consul, in enumerating the wonders of Europe, said that in his own country water became a solid body once a year for some time, when men, or even horses, might pass over it without sinking. On hearing this tale, his tropical highness flew into a violent passion, and expelled the official, declaring that after so palpable a falsehood, he could never have anything to do with Europeans. . . . A. M. Pierpont, of Jefferson county, New York, sent $2000 to the Episcopal Church Book Society, and by mistake it was published as $9000. As the best way of remedying the mistake, he sent the society an additional $1000—a novel way, certainly, of correcting a typographical error. . . . Mexico is still, like Turkey, a "sick man," whose dissolution seems inevitable. The wrongs of the Aztecs are avenged by the political sufferings of the descendants of their persecutors. . . . During the past six years, the shipments of silver from England to the East have exceeded one hundred and fifty millions of dollars. . . . Spending of silver, reminds us of a consolatory remark addressed by a Dutch grocer, in New York, to a little girl, whom he forced to take a Spanish quarter. "Only just take dat to Cuba, and dey'll give you twenty-five cents for it." . . . The Boston Herald has discovered a new curiosity for our friend Kimball's museum—a man twenty-five years old who never lost an umbrella. . . . We shall have a very early summer, if the fact of our having mosquitoes and butterflies in February be any prognostic. . . . A coarse-looking German woman, named Anna Meister, pretending to be a heavenly goddess, lately succeeded in forming a congregation of some two hundred members, in Philadelphia, whom she fleeced of money, jewelry, dresses, and whatever she wanted, saying that she exacted them by divine command. The husband of one of her deluded victims had her arrested for fraud. It seems almost incredible that in a city like Philadelphia, two hundred idiots could be found to countenance such an impious, brazen impostor. But the race of fools is never extinct. . . . Chief Justice Shaw, who has been very ill during the greater part of the winter, is now out, enjoying his usual health. . . . The Boston Traveller says of atheism:—"We very much doubt the real honest and total disbelief of anybody in a Providence above us, and a future before us, governed in a greater or less degree by actions here. Atheists, generally, are persons who would distrust anything but ocular or mathematical demonstration; and they mean to say, by their skeptical creed, that the future has not been mathematically demonstrated to them as administered by a Divine Being." . . . George Wilkies Kendall occupies a large plantation in Texas. There he appears to enjoy himself after all his wanderings and adventures. By the way, a new edition of his Santa Fe expedition has just been issued—one of the clearest and most popular books written on this side of the Atlantic. . . . The casting at Munich of the bronze horse for the colossal Washington Monument, is described as a most interesting event. Fifteen hundred tons of metal had to be melted for the purpose. The success of the casting was announced by the master, and received with deafening cheers. . . . The way to be as happy as the nature of things sublimely permits, is to be constantly employed. "I have lived," said Dr. Adam Clarke, "long enough to know that the great secret of human happiness is this—never suffer your energies to stagnate. The old adage of 'too many irons in the fire,' conveys an untruth. You cannot have too many—poker, tongs and all—keep them all going." . . . The Common is beginning to look pleasant, now that the huge granite blocks of ice that disfigured its surface have disappeared. But it is the decomposition of the ice which gives the grass its early emerald green, and keeps it fresh and verdant until late in the fall. So that we mustn't quarrel with the wisdom of our city fathers—who are very respectable fathers, after all—nor with the management of the city forester. . . . The work of building up the dock in the rear of the Boston Custom House, goes bravely on; and before many months, huge granite towers will cover the space where lately the Hingham stationary packet rode out the northeasters brilliantly and proudly. The whole aspect of that part of the city will be changed. . . . Speculators have a "fatal facility" for manufacturing cities on paper. There are towns in the great territories of the West, which, says the New York Times, "have no existence except on paper. Yet the lots are sold at prices as high as good vacant lots in the upper part of the city of New York." . . . A remarkable shower of earth lately caused a great excitement at Quito, South America. Quite a Quito "muss"—not mosquito. . . . A man was lately arraigned for intoxication before our police court, but discharged because he was "how come you so?" on either—and it seems that either is not legally an intoxicating liquor. The defendant went away singing the air from the "Beggars' Opera," "How happy could I be with ether!" . . . A young lady, worth a quarter of a million, lately eloped from a fashionable seminary, in New York, and married the man of her heart. The bride is not quite fifteen, and the bridegroom just double her age—so that when she is sixty, he will be one hundred and twenty. . . . We hate the affected phraseology of some of our poets, with their "wavelets," "beamlets," "cloudlets," "lakelets," etc., and are ready to cry, with Hamlet, "By heaven, I'll make a ghost of him that lets me!" Such phrases are best "let alone." . . . The Transcript says, that Dickens has met with his extraordinary success, because "He is true to nature—kindly and lovingly true. He hates pretension; he laughs at the shams of society, he individualizes character in the true Shaksperian style. And as long as Hamlet, Falstaff and Dogberry are known and quoted, just so long will Little Nell, Sam Weller, Captain Cuttle and Toots be as familiar in our mouths as household words. . . . Rufus Choate lately spoke of Daniel Webster, as "his more than friend," the unfortunate ocean of whose powers never was sounded during his lifetime, and who only needed occasion to have proved himself the world's unsurpassed orator. . . . We enjoyed a pleasant call from Dr. Hayes, the Arctic discoverer, the other day—the tried friend and companion of the lamented Kane. Dr. Hayes is lecturing upon the interesting subject of the expedition.

WAYS OF THE RICH AND GREAT.

Let amusements be as innocent as they may, and let society be as free as it may, from ambition and envy, still, if the life of society were a life of amusement, instead of a life of serious avocations diversified by amusement and society, it will hardly either attain to happiness or inspire respect. And the more it is attempted to make society a pure concentration of charms and delights, the more that will be the failure. Let us resolve that our society shall consist of none but the gay, the brilliant, and the beautiful—that is, we will exclude from it all attentions towards the aged, all forbearance towards the dull, all kindness towards the ungrateful and unattractive—and we shall find that when our social duties and social enjoyments have thus sedulously been set apart, we have let down a sieve into the well instead of a bucket.—Henry Taylor.

Choice Miscellany.

HOW TO SPEAK TO CHILDREN.

It is usual to attempt the management of children either by corporeal punishment, or by rewards addressed to the senses, and by words alone. There is one other means of government, the power and importance of which are seldom regarded—I refer to the human voice. A blow may be inflicted on a child, accompanied with words so uttered, as to counteract entirely its intended effect; or the parent may use language, in the correction of the child, not objectionable in itself, yet spoken in a tone which more than defeats its influence. A few notes, however unskillfully arranged, if uttered in a soft tone, are found to possess a magic influence. Think you that this influence is confined to the cradle? No; it is diffused over every age, and ceases not while the child remains under the parental roof. Is the boy growing rude in manner and boisterous in speech? I know of no instrument so sure to control those tendencies as the gentle tones of a mother. She who speaks to her son harshly, does but give to his conduct the sanction of her own example. She pours oil on the already raging flame. In the pressure of duty, we are liable to utter ourselves hastily to children. Perhaps a threat is expressed in a loud and irritating tone—instead of allaying the passions of the child, it serves directly to increase them. Every fretful expression awakens in him the same spirit which produced it. So does a pleasant voice call up agreeable feelings. Whatever disposition, therefore, we would encourage in a child, the same we should manifest in the tone in which we address it.—New Yorker.

DETERIORATION OF BONE AND MUSCLE.

It is a fact already well known, that we, Americans, especially the sons of New England soil, are deteriorating as a race. Much, of course, is owing to the unnatural habits of life, which our so-called civilization has entailed upon us. But the real reason why the New England race has so rapidly dwindled in animal fibre, is owing to the want of material in the soil to produce muscle and bone. The hard granite soil does not furnish the proper ingredients, mainly limestone, to form the bones; or the richness of materials to form muscle and the softer parts of the body. In Kentucky, Ohio, and Western Vermont, men grow to large size, because of the limestone formation beneath the soil. Parts of families have emigrated from Massachusetts to limestone regions, and the result in the next generation has been a larger bone development in those who left Massachusetts, than in those who remained. Kentucky, Ohio and Iowa will grow great men. The finest figures in the world will be found in the valley of the Mississippi, in a few generations. In-door labor, so unnatural for men, will weaken the vital powers, and stop the growth in large cities; but the great and glorious West, with its broad prairies, will compensate for the growing feebleness of the Eastern States.—Dr. O. W. Holmes.

POWER OF SEA BREAKERS.

From experiments which were made some time since at the Bell Rock and Skerryvore lighthouses, on the coasts of Scotland, it was found that, while the force of the breakers on the side of the German Ocean may be taken at about a ton and a half upon every square foot of surface exposed to them, the Atlantic breakers fall with double that weight, or three tons to the square foot; and thus a surface of only two square yards sustains a blow from a heavy Atlantic breaker equal to about 54 tons. In November, 1824, a heavy gale blew, and blocks of limestone and granite, from two to five tons in weight, were washed about like pebbles at the Plymouth breakwater. About 300 tons of such blocks were borne a distance of 200 feet, and up the inclined plane of the breakwater, carried over it, and scattered in various directions. A block of limestone, seven tons in weight, was in one place washed a distance of 120 feet. Blocks of three tons weight were torn away by a single blow of a breaker, and hurled over into the harbor; and one of two tons, strongly trenailed down upon a jetty, was torn away by an overpowering breaker.—Scientific American.

New Publications.

KATHIE BRANDE. A Fireside History of a Quiet Life. By HOLME LEE, author of "Thorneley Hall," etc. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1857. 12mo. pp. 339.

We are much mistaken if this unpretending story does not find its way to thousands of firesides, and thousands of hearts. An admirable novel. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

THE TRAGEDIES OF EURIPIDES. 2 vols., 12mo. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1857.

Literary prose translation is the only way to deal with classic poetry. This version is by Theodore Alois Buckley, who has added a mass of valuable critical and explanatory notes. The learned and unlearned will alike welcome the appearance of these choice volumes. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

EL GRINGO; or, New Mexico and her People. By W. W. H. DAVIS, late United States Attorney. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1857. 12mo. pp. 432.

A very clever sketch of Mexico and the Mexicans, by one who has had ample opportunity of observation, and the capacity to profit by it. The volume is very neatly printed and illustrated. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

DORE. By a Stroller in Europe. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1857. 12mo. pp. 386.

Dore means "gilded;" and the title implies that the author has penetrated beneath the glittering surface of Europe, and shown us the reality beneath the mask. The book is clever, pungent, dashing, and, above all, readable from beginning to end. A large portion of it is occupied with Paris, and since the "Purple Tint," we have seen nothing more truthfully descriptive of the gay capital of the French nation. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

THE CONSTITUTIONAL TEXT-BOOK. By FERNAN SHEPHERD. Philadelphia: Childs & Peterson. 1857. 1 vol., 12mo.

This familiar and practical exposition of the Constitution of the United States, the foundation stone of our liberties, should find its way to every school, academy and family. For sale by Phillips, Sampson & Co.

LOVE AFTER MARRIAGE, AND OTHER STORIES OF THE HEART. By Mrs. CAROLINE LEE HENTZ. 12mo. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson & Co.

This elegant volume embraces some of Mrs. Hentz's most charming stories. We learn that the book is meeting with a very extensive sale. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

OLIVER TWIST. By CHARLES DICKENS. 2 vols., 12mo. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson.

Who does not remember the profound sensation created by the first appearance of this work—an impression which time has only served to render more profound? In this work, Dickens entered a new field, and masterly portraits of Oliver, Bumble, the Beadle, Fagin and Nancy, form a gallery of originals. Our Philadelphia publisher has issued this work in splendid style, liberally illustrated, uniform with the other productions of the same author. This is the favorite edition of Dickens's works. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

FRANK FORRESTER'S SPORTING SCENES AND CHARACTERS. By HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT. 2 vols., 12mo. Philadelphia: T. B. Peterson.

These sparkling volumes embrace Herbert's best contributions to sporting literature—"The Warwick Woodlands," "My Shooting Box," etc. There is an endless variety of adventure by "Red and Field," the whole written in the elegant, graphic and ringing style for which the author is celebrated. The illustrations from his pencil are well drawn. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

Editorial Melange.

The State Agricultural School of Michigan will go into operation about the middle of April. — Butter was first manufactured by the Scythians and Thracians, and was at first used as an ointment for baths, and as a medicine. — The town of Gardner, Illinois, situated upon the Chicago, Alton and St. Louis railroads, about sixty-eight miles southwest of Chicago, about a year and a half ago consisted of only one building. It is now quite a thriving village, with three stores and a flouring mill, and this spring the inhabitants intend building a good church and schoolhouse, as they are "bound to go ahead." — A child of ten years, calling herself Mary McShea, and who says she has a mother in New Haven, who whips her so that she cannot live at home, has been taken up in Hartford for stealing, and sent to jail for twenty days. — The citizens of Middlebury, Vt., held a meeting a few days since, and offered to raise $100,000 in case the capital should be removed to that place. — It is stated that the Sub-Marine Telegraph Company contemplate extending their line to San Francisco, should they be successful in the first undertaking. — A Bank of Savings in the city of New York, which was organized in 1819, has received in deposits since it commenced business the sum of forty-seven and a half million dollars. — Sir Humphrey Davy said that the greatest discovery he had ever made was when he discovered Michael Faraday—who became his successor at the Royal Institution, and the first chemical philosopher on the globe. — A woman cowhided a schoolmaster, named William Martin, at Greensburgh, Pa., lately, for brutally beating her son with a knotted club. — Rev. J. D. Williams complains that a sermon recently published in a Spiritual paper as received through a medium, from the spirit of "the late brother Turner," was written by him (Williams) several years ago. — Such signs of spring as parasols and full-blown violets are chronicled by the Rochester papers. — It must be a great vexation to liberal, open handed men who are rich, to find their generous designs forestalled by greedy hints from presumptuous advisers. — Two cows have died in Greenwich, R. I., lately, in consequence of licking the paint from newly-painted buildings. — According to the author of "Harry Lorrequer," Sir Walter Scott was not always correct in putting the style of language in the mouths of his characters. Thus, in Guy Rimering he makes a Dutchman sing a German song; and in Quentin Durward, the liege people speak in German, a language of which they are ignorant. — It is said that the Episcopal Society at Great Barrington have voted to erect a new church, at a cost of $14,000. — The lieutenant of the Levant, who led an attack upon Chinese troops at Canton, deserves, at least, to have his name printed correctly. It is George Colvocoressis. He is a Greek by birth, and entered the U. S. navy in 1832, from Vermont. — The Boston Post says that as the credit given clergymen in notices of marriages, notices of deaths should be equally given by physicians. — The Canille cough is getting to be a fashionable complaint among the New York ladies; and Canille eye-water is as abundant as April showers. — Accurate observations, during the recent floods in Illinois, are said to have established the fact that the new grade (six feet or so above low water mark) on Lake Street, Chicago, is the highest ground in the State. It was the Mount Ararat of Illinois during the late deluge. — The new metal aluminum is now being used in the casting of bells. No other metal yields a tone so musically sweet. — A man named Chester, who was detected setting fire to a German hotel in Detroit, a few days since, was fired at and so badly wounded that he has since died. — A North American eagle, caught in Lexington district, S. C., has been purchased by a party of young Virginians, designed as a present for Governor Wise, of Virginia. It is a very beautiful bird, and measured nearly eight feet across the wings. — There are five cases of insanity in the Indiana asylum—two males and three females—put down to the credit of spiritualism. — A Mr. Powers, who had been committed to the jail at Ogdensburg, on a charge of setting fire to a building, discovered a fire in the jail the next night, and saved it; it is presumed thus balancing the account. — Annis Toussant, convicted of poisoning her husband at Quebec, Canada, has been sentenced to be hanged on the 3d of next April. — In Illinois, during the last two years, one hundred and forty-seven convicts have been pardoned, of whom sixteen had been sentenced for murder, and nine for assault with intent to kill. — George Stacey, who was acquitted on the charge of murdering the sisters of Abner Kneeland, in Gardner, two years ago, is now in a New York prison for burglary.

A GOOD MOVE.—A bill has been introduced into the New York legislature which provides that from and after July 4, 1857, the books in the library of a physician, clergyman, lawyer and author, and the books in the library of a family or student, or in the possession of any one who is a professional man, and who obtains his living by writing, shall be exempt from levy on execution to an amount not exceeding $500 in value.

GRATITUDE.—The other day, a German at St. Louis lifted a lady across a deep mud puddle. She, however, did not thank him for the gallantry, but complained of him for insulting her, and he was fined one hundred dollars. Probably he will remember her, and if he should see her drowning, would not be likely to "take the liberty" of saving her.

TRUE ENOUGH.—In speaking of horses "bailing up" upon the snow in winter, Willis quaintly remarks: "A horse is never so uncomfortable and dangerous as when shod with four cannon balls."

Wayside Gatherings.

The "big black bear," killed in Pittsfield, Mass., proves on a closer inspection to be a big black dog.

The crop of the Philadelphia ice companies this season amounted to 120,500 tons.

The New York military companies are making preparations to celebrate the anniversary of the battle of Lexington.

A lad in Trenton, N. J., threw a stone at another lad, hitting him on the head, and he died in a few hours in consequence.

The spinal marrow of an ox or cow, applied every four hours for two days to felons on the fingers, has been attended with the most satisfactory results.

John Boynton, Esq., of Templeton, Mass., has donated to his native town, Mason, N. H., the magnificent sum of $10,000, the income of which is to be applied to the support of common schools.

Hon. A. J. Donelson, who was a candidate for the Vice Presidency, was robbed on the steamboat Daniel Boone, from Nashville, of a draft on New Orleans of four thousand dollars, and a gold watch.

The citizens of Mobile are making efforts to procure funds to erect a monument over the remains of Maj. Gen. Gaines, which now lie in the old graveyard in that city, without inscription or stone to mark their resting-place.

A man took his son to an inquest. "Look at the body," he said; "that wretched creature came to his death through drinking. Remember that, my son." Then he added, with severely a pause: "Waiter, bring me a glass of brandy and water—hot."

The new Odd Fellows' Hall at Dubuque, Iowa, fell in last month, in consequence of the accumulation of ice and snow upon the top of it. S. S. Fass and wife, who were in the building, were instantly killed. Loss $10,000.

The Supreme Court of Ohio has just decided that James Simmons, who murdered two members of his father's family, shall be hanged. Simmons was tried and convicted for the offence ten years ago, but owing to some informality was never sentenced.

Some of the farmers in Oregon appear to give much attention to tobacco. The San Francisco, Cal., Globe says that some very fine specimens of the plant from the farm of James Magill, near Oregon City, were recently exhibited in the office of that paper.

The frigate for the emperor of Russia, which the war between that country and England stopped from progressing in this country, is to be now built at New York, by Webb, the shipbuilder. The ship will be a three-decker of the largest class, and be supplied with engines of great power.

There appears to have been quite a mania for divorce in Pennsylvania last winter. An application was made to the Legislature, by a man who wanted to be divorced from his wife because she was an intolerable shrew, after having endured her persecutions for thirty years.

The starvation of a child is a strange and revolting sort of capital to trade upon; yet a woman in New York was detected in having furnished her child, so that it exhibited a sufficient degree of voracity to excite the commiseration of street passers-by. What a wretch, and what a commentary on street begging!

Surprise parties to poor people are coming into vogue. A short time since, the kind people of Newburyport surprised a poor woman with their generous company, a barrel of flour and other substantial comforts. In Dover, a widow was visited and forty dollars left with her. What could be more beautiful!

A man announces in New York that he has discovered a process of liquifying quartz, by which the least particle of gold can be abstracted, and then of hardening it, so as to afford a new material for building, and for the various purposes to which stone and marble can be applied. This is a very tough story.

The Academy of Natural Sciences, of Philadelphia, have memorialized Congress to give to the world a report upon the animal and vegetable life of Japan, Kamtschatka and Behring's Straits, materials for which have been collected by the recent expeditions to those countries, but which have not yet been given to the scientific world.

A Prussian physician has lately invented and applied a new method of introducing constant galvanic currents into the nerves and muscles of patients, whereby cases of palsy of every kind, apoplexy, atrophy of the muscles, and of the spinal marrow—some of them from ten to twenty years' standing—have been, it is said, entirely cured in a few minutes.

In Philadelphia, a man entered one of the grammar schools and carried off a set of furs belonging to one of the female teachers, notwithstanding she was sitting in the room at the time. A child attempted to give an alarm, but the thief threatened to kill her. The lady was paralyzed with fear, and the thief carried off the booty unmolested.

A grocer in Newark, N. J., gave a customer seven Spanish shillings in change for a dollar, she having traded a shilling. The next day she traded six shillings' worth, but the grocer refused to accept the Spanish money in payment. The customer's husband came, a quarrel ensued, followed by a lawsuit, and the grocer will be fined for assault and battery, besides losing his 75 cents.

Mr. Headley, the State Librarian of Connecticut, is getting out a copy of the New Haven Colony Records. Great pains have been taken to make the copy accurate in every letter, a perfect fac-simile, in abbreviations, spelling and grammar, of the original records. New type has been cast expressly for some of the fac-similes of this work. The proofs undergo repeated readings and comparisons.

A boy named Denny recently awaited, on horseback, at a crossing of the Vermont Central Railroad, for a train to pass, in order to accustom the horse to the sight of the cars; but as the engine approached, the frightened animal sprang forward, was struck by the car and knocked down the embankment, while the boy safely alighted on a platform car and immediately demanded to be "put ashore, as he had not paid his fare."

The lady of one of the Chicago railroad kings recently gave, at the Tremont House, in that city, a donation party for the poor. The charity-box was at the end of the hall, amid the festivities of one of the gayest of dancing parties. It told its own story. People were passing to and fro near it, and no one knew who gave and who did not give. There were no solicitations from any one in the room. Upon opening the box, it contained $875, all given in secret.

A man named Finney, in the city of Syracuse, N. Y., a short time since, while vomiting, forced one of his eyes completely out of its socket, so that it hung down upon his cheek. The ball was allowed to remain in that position several days, until it finally swelled to an enormous size, and the humors of the eye being intercepted, it actually began to mortify. A physician was called in, who succeeded in forcing the eye to its place, but the sight had gone forever.

Foreign Items.

Dr. John, a distinguished astronomer and mathematician, has just died at Leipzig.

A curious phenomenon has recently been observed in Greece. The lake of Copas has been dried up. An immense tract of fertile land is thus rendered available.

The emperor of Austria has decided on granting a general amnesty to all political offenders in the empire. It is said that the emperor of Russia will do the same with regard to his exiled Polish subjects.

The professorship of Old German, at the University of Berlin, left vacant by the death of Prof. Von der Hagen, has been offered, we are told by the German journals, to the eminent Old German scholar, Prof. Wilhelm Waacknagel, of Halle.

A big blast recently took place at the Holyhead (England) Harbor Quarry, by which about 120,000 tons of stone were brought down and broken into masses. The charge, which was in four chambers, consisted of 160,000 pounds of powder, and was fired by means of a voltaic battery.

A meeting of between five and ten thousand of the laboring classes of London was lately held to consider their present distressed condition. It was stated that twenty-five thousand of the building trade alone, in that city, are out of work; and that the total number of unemployed persons in that great metropolis would probably reach a quarter of a million.

Sands of Gold.

.... Light seems the natural enemy of evil deeds.—Charles Reade.

.... The pitying tears and fond smiles of woman are like the showers and sunshine of spring.—John Paul.

.... There are two things to which we never grow accustomed—the ravages of time, and the injustice of our fellow-men.—Talleyrand.

.... Believe your friend honest to make him so, if he be not so; since, if you distrust him, you make his falsehood a piece of justice.—Wycherly.

.... A contemplative life has more the appearance of a life of piety than any other; but it is the divine plan to bring faith into activity and exercise.—Frid.

.... A loving friend's rebuke sinks into the heart, and convinces the judgment; an enemy's, or stranger's rebuke is ineffective, and irritates, not converts.—Charles Reade.

.... We require four things for woman—that virtue dwell in her heart, that modesty play on her brow, that sweetness flow from her lips, and industry occupy her hands.—Chinese Maxim.

.... We increase our losses ourselves, and club with fortune to undo us, when with them we lose our patience, too; as infants, that being robbed of some of their baubles, throw away the rest in childish anger.—Wycherly.

Joker's Budget.

Snow-flakes fall so large in Oregon, that the ladies put handles to them and use them for parasols.

What particular facilities had the ancient Egyptians for the manufacture of Kossuth hats? Darkness that was felt.

A popular preacher received so many pairs of slippers from the female part of his congregation, that he got to fancy himself a centipede.

"Wake up and pay for your lodgings," said the deacon, as he nudged a sleepy gentleman, with the contribution box, one Sunday not long since.

A young lady scolding her lean for not sending her the pair of new shoes he promised her, writes in a postscript as follows:—"P. S. Them shuz ort to be on hand."

"Figures wont lie, will they?" muttered a seedy gentleman, holding on to a lamp-post. "Well, perhaps they wont lie, but I see a figure that wont stand any how."

Rowland Hill rode a good deal, and by exercise preserved vigorous health. When asked by a medical friend what physician and apothecary he employed, to be always so well, replied:—"My physician has always been a horse, and my apothecary an ass."

The Count de Grasse being wounded in the knee by a musket-ball, the surgeons made many incisions. Losing patience at last, he asked them why they cut and carved so cruelly. "We seek for the ball," said they. "Why did you not speak before," said the count, "I have it in my pocket."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.
THE FAVORITE WEEKLY MISCELLANEOUS JOURNAL.
DESIGNED FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

This long established and well known weekly paper, after eleven years of unequalled prosperity and popularity, has become a "household word" from Maine to California, gladdening the bosom of rich and poor, in town and country, all over the wide extent of the United States. It should be a weekly visitor to every American home, because

It is just such a paper as any father, brother, or friend would introduce to the family circle.

It is printed on the finest satin-surfaced paper, with new type, and in a neat and beautiful style.

It is of the mammoth size, yet contains no advertisements in its eight super royal pages.

It is devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

It is carefully edited by M. M. Ballou, who has sixteen years of editorial experience in Boston.

It contains in its large, well filled and deeply interesting pages not one vulgar word or line.

It numbers among its regular contributors the best male and female writers in the country.

Its tales, while they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in humanity.

It is acknowledged that the good influence of such a paper in the home circle is almost incalculable.

Its suggestive pages provoke in the young an inquiring spirit, and add to their store of knowledge.

Its columns are free from politics and all jarring topics, its object being to make home happy.

It is for these reasons that it has for years been so popular a favorite throughout the country.

TERMS.—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

1 subscriber, one year, ..... $2 00

4 subscribers, " " ..... 7 00

10 " " " ..... 15 00

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the Forten's copy gratis.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address at the lowest club rate. Sample copies sent when desired.

Published every Saturday, by M. M. BALLOU,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

CHINESE OPIUM-EATING.

One of the streets of Canton is wholly occupied by shops for the sale of opium. One of the objects at this place that I had the curiosity to visit, was the opium-smoker in his heaven; and certainly it is a fearful sight, although not so degrading to the eye as the drunkard from spirits, lowered to the level of the brute and wallowing in his filth. The idiot smile and deathlike stupor of the opium debauchee, however, has something far more awful to the gaze than the bestiality of the latter. The rooms where they sit and smoke are surrounded by wooden couches, with places to rest the head upon, and generally the side room is devoted to gambling. The pipe is a reed of about an inch in diameter, and the aperture in the bowl for the admission of the opium is not larger than a pin's head. The drug is prepared with some kind of conserve, and a very small portion is sufficient to charge it, one or two whiffs being the utmost that can be inhaled from a single pipe, and the smoke is taken into the lungs as from the hookah in India. On a beginner, one or two pipes will have an effect, but an old stager will continue smoking for hours. At the head of each man's couch is placed a small lamp, as fire must be held to the drug during the process of inhaling; and from the difficulty of filling and properly lighting the pipe, there is generally a person who waits upon the smoker to perform the office. A few days of this fearful luxury, when taken to excess, will give a pallid and haggard look to the face; and a few months, or even weeks, will change the strong and healthy man into an idiot skeleton. The pain they suffer when deprived of the drug, after long habit, no language can explain; and it is only when to a certain degree under its influence that their faculties are alive. In the houses devoted to their ruin, these infatuated people may be seen at nine o'clock in the evening in all the different stages. Some entering half distracted to feed the craving appetite they had been obliged to subdue during the day; and others laughing and talking wildly under the effects of a first pipe; whilst the couches around are filled with their different occupants, who lie languid, with an idiot smile upon their countenance, too much under the influence of the drug to care for passing events, and fast merging to the wished-for consummation. The last scene in this tragic play is generally a room in the rear of the building, a species of dead-house, where lie stretched those who have passed into a state of bliss the opium-eater so madly seeks—an emblem of the long sleep to which he is blindly hurrying.—Clive.

BRAZIL.

The physical resources of Brazil are very great. Her forests abound in the richest cabinet woods. Rose-wood is so common that some planters make pig-pens of it! The floors of the houses would take a polish, being made of a kind of mahogany. The rose-wood is a mimosa, of the tribe of sensitive plants, and there are whole forests in Brazil which go to sleep at sundown and awake with the birds in the morning! Many varieties of the palm are found; the magnificent Victoria Regia spreads its enormous petals; the mountain sides are covered with trees bearing the most brilliant blossoms, and overgrown with parasites and air-plants. The vanilla and other aromatic plants scent the air; valuable drugs and dye-woods abound; bright plumed birds flit from tree to tree; gold, silver, copper, rubies, sapphires and diamonds exist in large quantities. Yet agriculture is so profitable that the value of a year's crop of coffee was greater than 80 years' yield of diamonds. In 1852, the value of the coffee crop was five million pounds sterling. Brazil is mostly intertropical, yet differs from most tropical countries. Its climate is delicious and salubrious—no sweeping monsoon, no scorching sirocco, no burning deserts, no earthquakes, as in Spanish South America. Copious showers refresh the air, and the land is full of rivers, cataracts and sparkling streams. The Amazon waters a district as large as two-thirds of Europe. No epidemics occurred here until 1850, when the cholera broke out, and then out of a population of 7,000,000, only a few thousand died. The reason for this fertility of soil and salubrity of climate, is found in the trade winds, which impel the clouds against the tops of the high mountains which form the western boundary of Brazil, and cause them to distill rain. The general elevation of the country contributes to its coolness. The warmest month is February, which corresponds to August with us.—Rev. J. C. Fletcher.

THE CHOLERA.

Dr. Balfour, an able surgeon at Madras, has just published a curious volume of reports on cholera. He started some years ago, a theory that there were many places absolutely exempt from the scourge, and investigation has confirmed his opinion. In Madras alone there are very many villages which have never felt the visitation, though surrounded by infected districts. Minute lists are supplied, and each place separately examined. Places well-drained are comparatively free from the ravages of the cholera.

FRIGHTFUL DEATH BY A LION.

On Friday morning, the 13th of June, several wagons, forming part of the second division of the command, left Mooi River Dorp for the lager at Mariko. They rode the first evening as far as Riet Spruit, a noted place for lions. Mr. Philip Van Coller and his brother wishing to proceed, inspanned their wagons about midnight, although they were strongly advised by their companions not to ride before morning. They had scarcely ridden an hour when the oxen were suddenly frightened. Philip Van Coller jumped off his wagon and endeavored to turn them, but not succeeding in doing so, sprang upon the wagon trap, from which he must have been immediately dragged by a large lion with such force as to break one of the trap rims. He was heard to cry out for help twice, but in the confusion of the moment was not missed, his brother Adolphe being busy at the time on horseback, endeavoring to stop the oxen, which were going at a fearful rate through the field. With much difficulty he succeeded in doing so, and then returned to look for his missing brother, whose body he found about daybreak, and the lion crouching about twelve yards from it. With a feeling of desperation he levelled his gun and fired at

THE DIAMOND ROOM OF THE GREEN VAULT.

The last room exhibited in the royal treasure-house in Dresden is the most magnificent of the eight. This contains the most valuable gems and works of art in the collection of the Saxon kings. The other rooms, with their bronzes and curiously-wrought ivory, with their vast silver gilt wine receivers for the banquet of the electors, and plates and engraved globes of rock crystal, and vases and cups of lapis lazuli, agate, etc.; their cameos, mosaics, and ornaments of amber and pearl, do not equal the last room exhibited. True, all the rooms in this ancient Saxon treasure palace are filled with highly wrought ornaments, and the mirrored walls reflect gems cut into a thousand points; but in the "Diamond" Hall are the crown jewels, the Saxon regalia, the arms and ornaments of the princes, and the chefs d'œuvre of Dinglinger, and other celebrated artists. Here is the electoral sword—an historic relic—and sabres and poniards, and other deadly weapons, whose hilts are set with diamonds and pearls, and rubies, emeralds and sapphires. Here are collars, chains and orders worn by the Saxon princes, as the Garter, Golden Fleece, etc., and many rich and massive chains, in which some story is told in diamond letters. These decorations were presented at royal marriages, or at treaties of peace, or were gifts for chivalric deeds, or prizes won at the tournament. The chain made on the occasion of the marriage of Augustus and Anna has simply a double A in diamonds. The crown jewels are enclosed in a glass case, with six divisions, and in parity and beauty are said to be unrivalled. The effect produced by this vast array of diamonds, sparkling with every rainbow tint, was wonderful. These ornaments are worn on gala days and on state occasions. Among the crown jewels we saw a part of the queen's diamonds. An aigrette, composed of six hundred and sixty diamonds, was most beautiful. It is above price, but at the time of the last war was valued at $500,000. Among the most remarkable of the works of Dinglinger, is the "Court of the Grand Mogul," representing the Emperor Aurengzebe, surrounded by his nobles, who bring him tributary gifts. Within a small space, one hundred and thirty-eight figures are represented. The platform is of silver, and the throne of pure gold, enamelled. Diamonds, pearls, emeralds and rubies glitter there. Elephants, camels and horses are richly caparisoned, dogs are prepared for the chase, and the spreading plumage of the pea-fowl is formed of precious stones. The artist got his information of this Eastern presentation-scene from travellers, from history, and from a drawing made in India, and he has spared no labor to make every figure expressive, and to represent in the court pageant the nobles, officers, and ambassadors in truthful costumes and with oriental etiquette. This work is much admired by artists and amateurs. "Thorwaldsen greatly rejoiced when even he came to see it," said the director. This celebrated work employed Dinglinger and his family, and fourteen workmen, eight years, and he received for it fifty-eight thousand dollars. The Green Vault, or in German parlance, Das Grüne Gewölbe, is considered the richest treasure-house possessed by an European monarch. It has been the pride of Saxon princes, and Augustus the Strong employed his leisure time in curious works to adorn it. In visiting this suite of rooms and examining its wonders, we were impressed with the skill and perseverance of the Germans. So elaborate and intricate were many of these productions—such rare and rich toys. But in viewing this array of costly treasure, one is tempted to ask, Cui bono?—Correspondent Boston Traveller.

POST-OFFICE AT ALBANO.

The well-drawn picture on this page is essentially Italian in all its features. The crumbling archway speaks of the hoary past. The post-office window is amply protected by strong iron bars, so that no brigand or highway robber could by any possibility make an irruption on the treasures of the "man of letters," who, spectacles on nose, is waiting on the shaven monk at the grating. A second priest of more advanced age, is watching the domestic group at the left, a mother with her baby and half grown up daughter, in the picturesque costume of the Italian peasants. The post-office window is surmounted with the papal arms, the triple tiara and keys of St. Peter, Albano being one of the pontifical states. It is situated on the Via Appiana, about fourteen miles southeast of Rome. Its site is that of Pompey's Villa, and it is world-renowned for the beauty of its scenery and the salubrity of its air. It comprises the ruins of Domitian's Palace and a Pretorium, with a Villa Prince Barberina, and other modern edifices. It has a valuable museum of antiquities. In the summer season it is a favorite resort of the Roman nobility, and few strangers visit the Eternal City without passing at least a day at Albano. Formerly, a visit to Rome gave a man special distinction as a traveller, and a lady who had visited it was quite a Foësse. But with the increased facilities for travel, the number of American visitors in Rome and its environs may always be reckoned by thousands, and the city is always crowded during the great church festivals.

THE POST-OFFICE AT ALBANO, ITALY.

the animal. The aim was good, and as the ball passed right through its head, it fell down on the spot. On coming nearer to his brother's body, the poor man was sadly shocked at its mutilated condition, the lion having carried it a long distance, and then devoured the greater portion of it. The remains were hastily conveyed to town, and upwards of eighty persons attended the funeral. Poor Philip Van Coller left a widow and several children to deplore their loss and his melancholy end.—We have since learned that previous to the oxen being frightened, the lion first attacked, without any provocation, Adolphe Van Coller and three other men who were riding on horseback in front of the wagon. Having, unfortunately, no guns with them, they jumped off their horses and stood between them and the lion. The lion, however, appeared more anxious to attack them than the horses, on which they shouted and threw their hats at him, and afterwards fired the grass, when he left them and went to the wagon. The surrounding country being all occupied, the lions appear to have concentrated themselves at this spot, where they are extremely bold, and often attack the natives whenever they are found off their guard. A constant vigilance is necessary against these savage beasts.—Cape of Good Hope paper.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 4, 1857.

$1 00 PER ANNUM. { VOL. XII. No. 14.—WHOLE No. 302.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

MISS MATILDA HERON,

THE AMERICAN TRAGEDIENNE, AS "CAMILLE."

The fine full length portrait on this page was drawn expressly for us by Barry, from an ambrotype by Brady, of New York, and engraved by Tarbell, in his best style. It represents Miss Heron in the character of "Camille," in her own version of young Dumas's play, in which she fairly took the New York public, and the New York critics, by storm, and raised herself at once to the very highest professional rank. Miss Heron passed her childhood in Philadelphia, where her parents reside, and where she received a strictly domestic and religious education. Her first manifestation of genius was a fondness for music; but this was soon overpowered by an uncontrollable inclination for the drama. We are told that her early recitations surprised her acquaintances, they exhibited so extraordinary an aptitude for the stage. To her friend, Mr. Richings, an actor of great merit and great experience, she studied the principal character. She returned to this country, and, after playing in Philadelphia, Baltimore and Washington, appeared in Pittsburg, Buffalo, Cincinnati, Louisville and St. Louis. In the latter city, she was eminently successful, and her play of "Camille" was repeated fifteen times to overflowing houses. On the 24th of January, 1856, she appeared at Wallack's Theatre. "The play selected for the occasion, 'Camille,'" says the New York Times, "was a trying one. It has been done to death by able and indifferent artists. All its emotions have been canvassed, its sentiments abused, its morals condemned. There was nothing to hope for from the play; the majority of the audience merely went to see the new actress in a scene or two, and then leave. The result was magical. The most blues remained to the end, and the calmest became enthusiastic. To account for this satisfactorily, we can make use of none but the most uncritical language. We can only say that Miss Heron is a superb artist, who holds the traditions of the stage in the palm of her hand, and strangles them when they strive to impede the free exercise of her genius. To speak deliberately of her character of the unfortunate heroine, requires more head and less heart than can be readily summoned to the task. Imagine a dear friend in Camille's situation; picture to yourself the saddest, tenderest, pitifullest woe; abandon yourself to the sublimed agonies of a broken heart; open all the generous fountains of sympathy in your nature—and you will understand some of the chords which are swept by the potent hand of Miss Matilda Heron. Most unhesitatingly we assert that a finer performance has never been seen in New York. If any one dares to contradict us, we will say that a finer performance has never been seen in the world." The New York Tribune, famous for the impartiality and excellence of its theatrical criticisms, told the same story. "From the moment she entered as Camille," says the Tribune, "from the play of that name translated afresh from the French, she, in theatrical parlance, 'filled the stage.' She exuded the electricity of genius. All the teaching, all the preaching—and all the swearing—cannot elevate the commonplace gift into that ineffable something called genius, which, too, is farthest from description when words are plentiful to portray it. Miss Heron had nothing to do at first but to enter superbly and well dressed, cough and eat a lozengue, say a few saucy words to a bore of a nobleman present. But there was about her a halo of individuality, a brilliancy of vitality, which convinced every one present able to distinguish glances from glories, that the palpitating actuality of perceptive genius was before them. And Miss Heron claimed the stage for the first act; and, the curtain down, was shouted for until she appeared before it. And so with the second; and so with the last. She is prodigal of touches of nature. There is the marvellous electrical link between thought; the appreciation of the infinite, and its symbolism of action. She is finely dowered as to figure. Bust full, capable of holding the tragic pulsation of a big heart; for here is no contortion, no starved, no mean nature. A finely-formed arm, an exquisite hand, and a good tread on the stage. Her face expressive; so much so, that you forget the architecture of her nose, or the cut of her mouth. Her eye is vastly sympathetic. Her voice is good, and capable of some emendation in its pitch. Miss Heron may be pronounced a great artist. Her depth of expression sometimes surpasses Rachel in female intensity of love. There is no use of blinking comparisons when they will rise up. The last—the phthisical scene of measureless desolations and short-lived ecstasies—was as noble a piece of acting as we desire to see. The house rose in tumultuous applause." We may add that the New York Herald, the New York Albion, and the accomplished critic of the "Courrier des Etats-Unis," Baron Regis de Trobriand, were equal-laudatory in their remarks; and in this they echoed the sentiment of the public, which ranks Miss Heron as the first of living artistes. "The ideal veneration with which Miss Heron regards the histrionic art," says the Home Journal, "leads some to suppose her visionary. . . . She considers herself one of the instruments, in this money-getting age, of inducing some to turn aside an hour, and quietly, with retrospective glance, to cast an eye to the East, and see the ancients before the telegraph, gunpowder, or charitable institutions were invented. Those actors in the grand drama of life passed off the stage thousands of years ago; but a truthful pictorial and histrionic view of their passions and emotions—their life and sayings—may be so portrayed, as to evolve great moral truths, and moral lessons may be deduced from both their virtues and their vices." A remarkable element of Miss Heron's success is her literary ability. It is rare that an actress possesses the qualities of a dramatist. Even Fanny Kemble failed as such. But Miss Heron's adaptation of "La Dame aux Camellias," and "Medea," shows that she can write as well as act. We hope soon to record this lady's success in Boston, where we are anxious to see her

Tarbell co

MATILDA HERON, THE TRAGEDIENNE.

[Translated from the French for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SPANISH MOOR:

—OR—

THE CONVENT OF ALCALA.

A STORY OF THE THRONE, THE ALTAR AND THE FOREST.

BY EUGENE SCIENCE.

[CONCLUDED.]

CHAPTER XLV.

THE RETURN TO MADRID.

AFTER finishing these readings, Juan rose and expressed it to be his duty to return immediately to Madrid, to endeavor to stop, if possible, the persecutions going on. He enjoined upon Yezid to avoid a combat, and keep hid in a place of safety; for he surely would be rescued. Then turning to Pedralvi, he said:

"Brother, I leave this man," pointing to Sandoval, "in your care, and I charge you to defend him. By thy brother, by Junia-ta, by the blood of thy masters, I wish you to promise to watch and guard him; guard him from harm, and from escape, also. I go to gain tidings of Don Delascar, his daughter and your be- trothed Junia-ta; but I will not go one step, Pedralvi, till you have promised me to protect this man, your enemy and mine."

The Moor hesitated a few seconds. He was a prey to a violent conflict. Finally triumphing over himself, he cried:

"Go! I swear—I swear—to protect him who massacred our brothers,—he whom I have sworn to slay! And you," said he, turning to Sandoval, "cease trembling, cowardly monster. You are now in greater safety here than in the midst of the palace of the Inquisition."

"Good!" said Sevilla. "I go without fear, for I know a Moor never broke his oath."

Sevilla, accompanied by his faithful friend and servant, Gongarello, travelled night and day till he reached Madrid. He stopped only at Valencia, to gain tidings of the Duchess de Santarem. The Vera Cruz, a royal vessel, had seen the San Lucar, dismasted and deserted, and returned. Juan ordered the vessel to be sent again, and if the duchess was not found, to search till they captured Captain Josef Baptista. Another vessel was fitted out, though much against the will of the viceroy. The San Fernando was got in readiness, and before Juan left Valencia, it had gone on its mission.

On his way, Juan heard of no news concerning Yezid, and feeling sure that he was safe for a time, he pushed on in all haste to Madrid. He arrived there in the middle of the night, and knowing he could not disturb the king, he retired to the hotel of Santarem, there to gain a few hours of repose. It was scarcely day-break, when Gongarello aroused him with the startling news that the hall was full of men, alguazils and familiars of the Inquisition. Juan rose in haste and went to the door. Spinello, a creature of Sandoval's, and declared enemy of Sevilla, presented himself before him, showing him in a neighboring room a group of alguazils, and cried joyfully and triumphantly:

"Senor Brother Louis Sevilla, monk of the order of Saint Dominica, in the name of his excellency the grand inquisitor Bernard y Roys de Sandoval, I arrest you!"

"I am ready to follow you," replied Sevilla; and he stepped into the ante-chamber.

Spinello made an imperative sign, and the brigade advanced a step.

"One moment," said Sevilla. "I demand to see the order for my arrest."

Spinello showed a parchment which Sandoval had sent eight days before.

"The orders of the Inquisition and of the grand inquisitor should be executed in twenty-four hours," said Juan.

Spinello showed the date; it was the afternoon before. The date had been left in blank, and in a private letter, Sandoval had ordered his agent to fill it out upon the arrival of Sevilla. Juan looked at it carefully, and declared to Spinello that it could not have been signed by Sandoval, for he had been for eight days in the hands of the Moors in the mountains of Albarracui. The men looked astounded.

"This order," he went on to say, "is, therefore, valueless. I have with me an act which is signed by the hand of the king." Showing it to the chief of the alguazils, he added: "That order commands you to obey my commands as those of his majesty himself, and I order you in the name of the king to arrest instantly Senor Spinello and his two attendants, as guilty towards the grand inquisitor and Inquisition of fraud."

The brave alguazil did not hesitate to obey. Spinello stammered an excuse, but with a wave of his hand, Juan ordered the men to lead him away.

Juan immediately went to the palace, but was refused admittance. The Count de Avila showed him a letter signed by the king, forbidding any one to be admitted but the Count de Lerma. Mortified at being repulsed before all, Juan quickly left the palace. He did not stop to deliberate; he only knew that if the king had only dared, he would have given him permission to enter; but he understood fully that in his absence the Count de Lerma had resumed his power.

Juan went to the queen's apartments, by the secret door by which none could prevent his entrance. He passed through the oratory and into the secret passage where he had found Altea, and arrived without any obstacle at the ante-chamber of the king. There he found Latorre, the king's valet, always in his place, always devoted to the interests of the Duke d'Uzede and Countess Altamira. Latorre refused to allow him to enter. Juan had no hope. The confessor of the king could not struggle with the valet, who was very large and strong. No matter; he had no time to lose in reflection, and with a rapid movement he sprang towards the king's cabinet. Latorre seized him by one arm, but with the other Sevilla knocked loudly at the door. In vain the zealous valet wished to hold him. The intrepid monk cried out:

"Sire—sire, it is one of your faithful servitors who returns to you!"

No answer.

"It is I—it is Sevilla!"

He heard steps in the cabinet.

"I wish to speak to you on the most important affairs, upon the safety of your kingdom; I wish to speak to you of the Duchess de Santarem."

The door flew open and the king appeared.

"I am saved!" cried Juan, and sprang into the apartment of the king, and closed the door on Latorre, who felt that he was lost.

The king welcomed Sevilla with joy, and disclosed to him how frightened he had been, how he hated and feared the duke, who, since Juan's absence, had been more insolent than ever. The king trembled and shuddered when Sevilla told him of all the misery which had been caused by the edict, and the curses heaped upon his own and upon Lerma's head. Juan proposed to overthrow him; but the weak monarch dared not do it. Finally he wrote, under the dictation of Sevilla, these words:

"Senor the cardinal-duke will leave Madrid to-day, and retire to any place which it will please him to choose. I, THE KING."

Philip was astounded to find it so easily finished. Again he wrote, under Juan's dictation:

"Senor the Duke d'Uzede will take this day the title of prime minister, and exercise its functions. I, THE KING."

Happy at having it done, the king charged Juan to give the two decrees to the count and duke, and with a joyful face went to hunt. He had scarcely gone, when the Count de Lerma was announced. He entered with great haughtiness, and a shade of anxiety passed over his face when he saw Sevilla, whom he saluted proudly. He asked for the king, and Juan coldly told him he had gone to the chase. In calm, measured tones, Sevilla recalled to him the day when Don Delascar d'Alberique came to him to endeavor to save his brothers,—recalled to him his broken word; he reminded him, also, of what he had declared, which this day was accomplished, and he handed the Count de Lerma, the proud cardinal-count, his dismissal.

While Lerma sat stupefied, the Duke d'Uzede craved admittance, but was refused. This proved to the cardinal-count who was his successor. The Count de Lerma, forgetting his rank, his dignity, threw himself at the feet of the confessor and begged to be retained. Sevilla, blushing for him, raised him, and the count recovered himself. One thing more before he left: he swore he was innocent of any participation in the death of the queen, and begged Sevilla to at least clear his character from that stain. That Juan promised faithfully, and comforted the cardinal-count by telling him he had proofs of his innocence, which should be laid before the king.

"Well," exclaimed the count, rising, "for that I forgive every-thing—every one, even my son!"

He left by the door leading into the council-chamber, and the Duke d'Uzede entered by the opposite door. The latter saluted respectfully the confessor, who remained seated. Juan recalled to the duke the first time he had presented himself to him, a stranger, and bringing proofs of his birth. The duke grew deadly pale, and in a hesitating voice exclaimed:

"Alas! every day I have repented that step. The voice of nature was strong, but I would not obey it then in my pride; but now I can resist its claims no longer. I must cry: my son—my son!"

Saying this, the duke extended his arms towards Sevilla, who, with a pale face, stepped back.

"The first cry of nature should have been listened to. You did not wish to be father to the poor Juan, but you wish to be to the Brother Louis Sevilla, confessor to the king. Whatever blood flows in my veins, he only is my father who opened his arms to me in adversity, who received an unknown youth into his heart, and saved him from misery; who, when I was without an asylum, said: 'My son!' My father is Don Delascar d'Alberique, the exile!"

The duke turned pale as he listened. Juan, controlling the emotion which the thought of his father called up, in a low voice disclosed to the Duke d'Uzede what Father Jerome and Escobar had written—a writing which freed the Count de Lerma from all blame, but condemned Uzede and the Countess Altamira as being the cause of the death of the queen. The duke looked at Sevilla with fear mingled with awe. Who was this man, who from a wanderer had risen so high in power, and who held the lives of so many in his hands?

"The countess is alone guilty, I know; but the crime has been committed. You know of it; you are an accomplice, and if I show this writing to the king, you are lost; you will be obliged to give up rank, honors and even your life. Now I will sustain you in the king's favor if you rise higher, if you will counsel him to revoke the edict for the expulsion of the Moors, which edict will be the ruin of Spain. I wish to efface it; I wish to make every trace of it disappear. If you second me freely in this project, I will cause you to be appointed prime minister—if not, you shall fall!"

The duke trembled with surprise and joy.

"I promise you—I promise it!" cried Uzede, with transport. "I will listen to you; I will be advised by you. I will be the arm, but you shall be the head."

"It is well," coldly said Sevilla. "You are prime minister." And he gave him the ordinance signed by the king.

The duke could scarcely believe his eyes. He left the palace, radiant, joyful, and without any remorse.

Some hours afterwards, the king returned. Sevilla recounted to him all that had passed,—the last prayer of the Count de Lerma. Then, without speaking to him of the Duke d'Uzede, he disclosed to him the deeds of the Countess Altamira. The king listened with horror. He remembered how he had been influenced by the countess; but with his customary weakness, he feared to do anything, because she was of noble family. Juan advised him to simply send her from the kingdom. This he did, and in the afternoon the haughty Countess Altamira received a note similar to that of the Count de Lerma, and she, too, took the road from Madrid. This note was not only signed by the king, but by the Duke d'Uzede, also. It was the first act of his authority as prime minister.

The Count de Lerma set out for his residence; and on his second day's journey, received a message and present from the king. The present was the stag killed by his majesty; the letter he opened with a trembling hand; then having read it, he pressed it to his lips, while with eyes full of tears, he cried:

"I thank thee, Sevilla; thou hast kept thy word!"

This missive contained only a few words:

"Sevilla has given me proofs of your innocence, which I no longer doubt. You carry with you into your retreat the esteem and friendship of your sovereign."

While these things were taking place at Madrid, other events of equal importance were happening elsewhere. Yezid d'Alberique, among the mountains, had kept out of sight and tried to avoid any conflict with his enemies, but that at last became impossible. Hunger, cruel hunger began to reduce the troops; hemmed in on all sides, they could get no food. He knew not whether to make a sortie and fall before the enemy's guns, or remain to die of starvation.

One night, feeling very anxious, he remained watching before the tent, and he saw, wending their way among the rocks, long lines of soldiers. Fearing a nocturnal attack, he summoned his men; but soon the soldiers appeared, and their leader bore a flag of truce. What was their astonishment, when the soldiers approached, to see that they bore provisions! The leader was a Moor who had, many years ago, received baptism, but who was a Moor, at heart. Filing before Yezid, the men laid down beef and sacks of corn. Eagerly Yezid demanded who sent him; but the old man only replied:

"I can say nothing; my master forbade me; he only commanded me to ascend the mountains to meet you, and before my departure to request you to break this marshal's baton which I carry. When I am gone, you are to break and burn it;" and bowing respectfully, the old man turned, and the troops departed as silently as they came.

Yezid broke the baton, which was hollow, and contained a paper:

"My good and old vassals:—Receive a present sent by an old friend. However strong you may seem in your present position, hasten to leave it; in twenty-four hours you will be attacked and hemmed in on all sides."

Yezid recognized the writing, and he hesitated not to follow the advice, for it was given by a Spaniard, Don Fernand d'Albayda. Yezid called one of his aids, a Moor brought up on the mountains, and who knew every crag. On the right was Don Augustin de Mexia and his troops; on the left, Don Fernand d'Albayda and his men; and behind and before him the mountain was impossible to ascend or descend. His aid, Cogia Hassan, declared that there was only an impracticable precipice in front, but behind was a very difficult path by which they might descend, but not with their wives and children or baggage. But he told of a large grotto which would accommodate a million men, where the women and children and ammunition carriages could be placed in safety. Before day dawned, they were placed there, with all the provisions and ammunition, and Yezid and his men had left their old camping ground.

CHAPTER XLVI.

THE GROTTO DEL TORRENTO.

THE next day, the fierce Don Augustin de Mexia, with his men, arrived at the deserted camp. No trace of the Moors could be found. Like wild animals they sought for any trace of their enemies, but discovered none. While they were debating what to do, a savory smell assailed their nostrils and a smoke curled up from their very feet. Curbing every cry of joy, de Mexia knelt upon the ground and listened. Beneath them they heard, under ground, the noise made by many people speaking and moving. Here, then, was where the Moors were hid! Parties set out to search for an opening; none could be found, so skilfully had Yezid and his companions concealed the entrance. Again baffled, their fury knew no bounds. The torrent raged by with a sullen, defiant roar.

Suddenly, de Mexia gave an order. All was activity. The Moors in the grotto believed themselves safe, and were striving to become calm and hopeful, when suddenly they heard the roar of the torrent; a minute more and they felt the water rush into the cave. Their enemies had dug a hole in the grotto and forced the water upon them. Their fate was sealed. Vainly they strove to escape; no outlet offered them; they could only die. With fearful velocity the water filled the cave. Every crag was lined with wretched human beings.

Sandoval, in his despair, knelt and prayed to be separated from the cursed heretics, not to be destroyed with them. Pedralvi, with burning eyes, looked at him, but remained faithful to his oath. The water still rose. Pedralvi looked around him; not a sigh or groan, and the water covered with dead bodies. This vast cavern, called since the Grotto del Tormento (grotto of the torment), was more appalling to Pedralvi than the vast ocean. Looking up, he saw the light of day. Climbing painfully, Pedralvi reached the opening and was once more in the open air. Below him he saw the white tents of the Spanish army. This sight filled him with rage. He looked at the grotto with one last horrified glance. The water had risen to the opening. Many bodies floated in sight, and among others was the grand inquisitor. Half crazy with despair, Pedralvi seized the body of the hated Sandoval, and approaching the edge of the rocks, hurled him down into the camp beneath, then turned and ran down the side of the mountain.

We will now return to Juan. He was in the palace, gazing from the windows, thinking deeply. He had just heard of the death of Sandoval. Pedralvi had failed in his oath, for he had vowed to protect him from his enemies. Juan was thinking of this, when he heard in the street the sounds of a guitar, and looking, saw several Bohemians dancing in the street. The song and motions of one, the foremost, reminded him of the scene when he was imprisoned among the mountains of Toledo. He felt sure the singer was Pedralvi. He hastened into the street, and making an almost imperceptible sign, he walked on. He soon found that the Bohemian followed him. When they reached a solitary place, Pedralvi approached Juan, who, remembering the broken oath, received him with a severe air.

Pedralvi in a few words related the scene in the fatal grotto. Juan could scarcely repress a cry of rage and horror. Pedralvi went on to say that, weakened by fatigue and hunger, Yezid and his troops had given themselves up to Don Fernand d'Albayda, who had sent them away in vessels. This act Ribera, who, since the death of Sandoval, had become grand inquisitor, had censured and had taken Yezid prisoner. Alitea had been found by the San Fernando, but under pain of death the viceroy of Valencia had been compelled to keep silence and give her up to Ribera. Both Yezid and Alitea were now in the prison of the Inquisition; Yezid was condemned for heading the insurrection, and Alitea for instigating the burning of the convent of the Annunciades, which had been reduced to ashes the previous night, though the news had not yet reached Madrid. The Duke d'Uzeda, breaking his word to Juan, now that he was really prime minister, had aided in this. Juan stood almost speechless. Pedralvi had told all this in a rapid, low voice, and as he finished he handed Juan a letter, saying:

"Don Fernand has kept this, and endeavored vainly to send it to you, and he prays that it may not be too late."

Promising to watch for any sign, or bring him any news he might hear, Pedralvi left.

With a swift step, Juan returned to his chamber. On the way he deliberated upon what course to take. He knew full well that Yezid was guilty and that all his hopes were gone, for the king had, since all hopes of Alitea were gone, relapsed into his former state of weakness and indecision, and that he could not and would not fight against ecclesiastical authority. He saw clearly that if Yezid and Alitea were rescued, it must be by stealth, by stratagem, and he set about devising some means. Reaching his chamber, he opened the note. The first was from Don Fernand, with these words:

"A few days before Alitea left these shores, she sent me the enclosed note, with injunctions to give it to you when she was gone. I have been unable to do so, but I hope it is not too late."

"FERNAND D'ALBAYDA."

The next note which Juan opened with trembling hands, contained an account of her resolve to give herself up to the king and death. To her confessor she explained all, begging him to think of her as guiltless. She gave herself up to serve her brothers. There were traces of tears on the paper, and the note ended with these words:

"In one hour I shall be no more—shall be gone from this dreary, sad world; but I cannot go without disclosing to you the secret of my life—a secret which can harm none, and may make you pity Alitea. Listen to me: I love you—yes, I love you! I do not blush to say this, for when you receive this avowal, I shall be no more. You are a minister of heaven, forbidden to marry, but you became one to save me, and I owe it to myself and to you to tell you that dearer than any one in this world are you to me. I have struggled with the weakness, the wickedness, but I have failed to conquer. I go now. Forgive me. I am going to my death."

"YOUR ALITEA."

Who can paint the despair, joy and rage of Juan! His love surged over him like a wave. He must save her or perish. His resolve was taken. As a member of the Inquisition, with a bleeding, aching heart, he attended the trial of the two beings held dearest on earth. Their doom was sealed. In two days they were to be burned as heretics in the market-place of Madrid.

One prisoner of the Inquisition would aid him, and that one was Captain Josef Baptista Balseiro. On the evening of the day when the sentence of death was passed, Juan descended to the dungeon and entered the captain's cell. At sight of him, the captain uttered a despairing cry. Sevilla placed before him paper, pen and ink, while in a menacing tone he commanded him to write. Sevilla dictated:

"My dear and worthy companions:—To-morrow I am to be conducted to the funeral pile, and my only hope is in you. You who fear neither God nor Satan can alone aid and deliver me. It is only necessary to enter the city disguised as citizens, and to-morrow attack the procession which will be composed only of monks, alguazils and familiars of the Inquisition. As, in spite of the friendship which binds us together, you are not men to work for nothing, the bearer, who has my confidence, will give you beforehand a piaster (about two dollars) apiece, and as much more the evening after the expedition."

"Are you serious?" cried the captain.

"Sign," coldly said Juan.

And the bandit signed boldly—Josef Baptista Balseiro, captain of the San Lúcar. Juan then sealed the letter and placed it before the lieutenant to direct. He firmly directed it: "To Senor Barbasto, lieutenant, in the gorges of Savora, in the environs of Pampeluna."

Without listening to the captain, Juan went out. That note Pedralvi carried to Barbasto. A note to the same effect Gongarello carried to Don Fernand d'Albayda. The day before the auto-da-fe, the Countess Altamira was privately summoned to appear before the sacred tribunal.

The day for the procession arrived, gloomy and dull. Not a ray of sunlight; the sky was hid by heavy clouds, and the rain fell in torrents. This was a circumstance favorable to Sevilla and his friends. During the night, the funeral piles had been erected in the public square. The fire was already lighted. All the bells in Pampeluna pealed forth. Sevilla, though filled with agony, was sustained and animated by the dangers around him. He was determined to save Yezid and Alitea, or die with them.

The procession began to move. The archbishop and grand inquisitor headed the band, dressed in full pontifical pomp. Behind him came monks bearing crosses and candles. Behind them came the two prisoners, whose faces and figures it was impossible to recognize, for they were hid by cloaks and the san-benito or cap. The procession was terminated by a body of alguazils and familiars of the office, armed with muskets and spears. Suddenly a band of citizens placed themselves in the way. Ribera furiously ordered them to move, but they valiantly stood their ground. The familiars struck with their wooden halberds the foremost peasant and threw him down, and another was ready to fire. He instantly sprang up and shouted: "To arms, my friends! They fire upon the citizens of Pampeluna!" This cry was repeated on all sides. It was Pedralvi who shouted: "Let us defend our rights! let us defend our charters!"

Repeating the cry loudly, the citizens on all sides fell upon the procession, and the market-place was soon a scene of great confusion. The alguazils and familiars of the Inquisition were frightened and fled in all directions. The haughty prelate shouted: "Strike—strike! Death to the heretics!"

But there were none to obey him. In the confusion, Pedralvi, followed by a band of devoted followers, ran to Yezid and Alitea, threw over them colored mantles, and bore them beyond the city gates, where Don Fernand awaited them with fleet horses. The archbishop at last fled to some place of safety. No sooner were Pedralvi and his friends gone, than the cries lessened, or rather changed into a cry for vengeance. The people, ever changeable, now clamored for the auto-da-fe, which a moment before they had wished to be given up. The people grew absolutely furious for some excitement. The burning of the convent of Annunciades had awakened in them a thirst for blood and fire.

Ribera, who returned at nightfall to the palace of the Inquisition, was frightened by the multitude assembled at the gates, demanding the prisoners. In great consternation he learned that the prisoners had escaped. In his anxiety, he gave up the power of the grand inquisitor to Juan Sevilla, who instantly called together the tribunal. There in that dark hall, with the people clamorous for blood outside, Captain Josef Baptista Balseiro and the Countess Altamira were tried and condemned, and the next day expiated their crimes in the market-place of Pampeluna.

Juan waited for nothing but their conviction. With a beating heart he hastened to the city gates, where Pedralvi awaited him, and conducted him to a vessel which lay by the shore. On board he found Yezid and Alitea safe. Don Fernand and his beautiful wife Carmina were then resolved to leave with their loved friends the land of their birth, but which, alas! had brought them only pain and suffering. Alitea, worn out with the fatigue and danger she had undergone, was in the cabin. As soon as Juan came on board, the vessel weighed anchor, and flew onward before a firm breeze.

Juan, with a beating heart, descended into the cabin. Alitea raised her head as he entered, and a beautiful blush spread over her face as she exclaimed:

"Thank God, Juan, you are saved!"

With a faltering step he approached and knelt before her.

"Alitea, listen to me: I vowed myself to God for your sake, and through all suffering I have kept them faithfully, using my power for the good of my brothers. But I have found the God of the Christians betrayed by those who profess to believe his righteous mandates. This vessel contains all I love or care for in this world. If I leave Spain and abjure my vows, is there no reward to be hoped for, O my God?" he exclaimed, earnestly, almost despairingly. "For the suffering of a whole life, is there no relief—not even for a few years?"

"Juan—Juan!" cried Alitea, "say again that you will abjure thy vows. Let me hear you swear it—not by the God of the Christians, but she shuddered, "but by the God of our fathers."

"Allah, hear me! I abjure my vows, but faithful to thee always!"

He had scarcely finished speaking, when Alitea fell upon his neck. These two faithful, suffering hearts were rewarded at last. In leaving Don Delacour's house, the subterranean passage had not been touched, and before embarking, Pedralvi and a few trusty fellows had in the night explored the cavern, and the ship which bore them to the hospitable shores of England bore vast treasures there, too.

Once on these shores, two weddings were celebrated—Juan and Alitea, Junata and Pedralvi. Overwhelmed with riches, they lived happily together. No regret for their country, the scene of so many dangers and sufferings, ever came to cloud their peace.

Ribera and the Duke d'Uzeda never could forget the unknown monk who foiled them in all their designs. Every endeavor to find him was made, but their search was useless, and one at least of the two men, the ungrateful son and traitor, carried his fear of the upright, truthful monk to his grave.

THE END.

[Back numbers of Ballou's Pictorial, containing the previous chapters of this story, can be had at our office of publication, or at any of the periodical depots.]

PHILANTHROPY OF COMMON LIFE.

There are those who, with a kind of noble but mistaken aspiration, are asking for a life which shall, in its form and outward course, be more spiritual and divine than that which they are obliged to live. They think that if they could devote themselves entirely to what are called the labors of philanthropy, to visiting the poor and sick, that would be well and worthy—and so it would be. They think that if it could be inscribed on their tombstone that they had visited a million souls of disease, and carried balm and soothing to them, that would be a glorious record—and so it would be. But let me tell you that the million occasions will come—ay, in the ordinary paths of life, in your houses and by your fire-sides—wherein you may act as nobly as if all your life long you visited beds of sickness and pain. Yes, I say, the million occasions will come, varying every hour, in which you may restrain your passions, subdue your hearts to gentleness and patience, resign your own interest to another's advantage, speak words of kindness and wisdom, raise the fallen, and cheer the fainting and sick in spirit, and soften and assuage the weariness and bitterness of the mortal lot. These cannot indeed be written on your tomb, for they are not one series of specific actions, like those of what is technically denominated philanthropy. But in them, I say, you may discharge offices not less glorious for yourselves than the self-denials of the far-famed Sisters of Charity, or than the labors of Howard or Oberlin. They shall not be written on your tomb; but they are written deep in the hearts of men—of friends, of children, of kindred all around you.—Oreille Dorey.

CANINE SAGACITY.

We have read many dog stories illustrative of an instinct that well nigh deserves the name of reason. We give another: A large Newfoundland dog belonged to the captain of a ship engaged in the trade between Nova Scotia and Greenock. On one occasion, the captain brought from Halifax a beautiful cat, which formed a particular acquaintance with Rover; and these two animals, of such different natures, were almost inseparable during the passage. On arriving at Greenock, the cat was presented by the captain to a lady of his acquaintance, who resided nearly half a mile from the quay, in whose family she remained for several weeks, and was occasionally visited by her friend and fellow-passenger, Rover, who seemed not a little displeased at the separation which had taken place between them. On the day, however, when the ship was to leave the port for another voyage, the usual bustle on board gave Rover a hint of what was going on, and he decided on his course of conduct without delay. He jumped on shore, made his last visit to puss, seized her in his teeth, much to her astonishment, and carried her through the streets to the quay, just as the ship was about hauling off. He made a spring, cleared the gunwale, and fairly shipped his feline friend in good order and well-conditioned, in and upon the good ship Nancy, of Greenock, and then ran to his master, wagging his tail, as if entreating that she might remain on board.—New York Sunday Dispatch.

SEBASTOPOL.

Mr. Gowen, who was at Sebastopol in November last, gives us some interesting particulars from that now famous city. The Russian government are engaged in rebuilding it. Before the siege, it was quite a populous place, containing, it is supposed, about sixty thousand persons. When Mr. Gowen was there, there were about six thousand people in the place. Several thousand laborers were then engaged upon the works, and the number was to be largely increased. The old city was famous for its narrow streets, like Boston; the new city will be built in squares, like Philadelphia. It is also said that there are restrictions against the erection of wooden buildings. The forts about the city, according to the examinations of Mr. Gowen, are only about half destroyed. Of the immensity of the warlike material scattered with so much profusion about this celebrated spot, some idea may be formed from the fact that the Russians have already gathered over sixteen thousand tons of shot and shell, and yet they are still so thickly scattered around, that it is impossible to tread without touching them. There are, however, no dead bodies to be seen, they having been all carefully buried.—Traveller.

FIRST EFFECTS OF HEARING RESTORED.

It is amusing to watch the movements and to note the expressions of astonishment of some of those patients who are suddenly restored to acute hearing. This is most remarkable when the deafness has existed for years. The patients look around for an explanation of the unusual sounds they hear, and then the very movement of looking round rustles the dress; hearing the noise of which, they become quite bewildered. They cannot be brought to believe that the sounds they hear are natural. The noises in the streets are at first terrific. A diverting case occurred in a short and remarkable corpulent old gentleman, residing somewhere at Pimlico. He related that on leaving the house in which his hearing had been restored, he bore it pretty well, until he got into Piccadilly, when the noise of the omnibuses (every one of which he thought would be upon him) so frightened him that he started off in a run, and never stopped until he got into Green Park.—London paper.

SLANG PHRASES.

The Philadelphia North American has found a slang phrase in the pure and dignified pages of Prescott. It says:—"In describing the effect of a forced march, he uses the expression 'the horses' feet were used up,' which is pure slang, but which conveys his meaning better, probably, than any other form of words he could have chosen. In fact, it fitted so naturally in its place, and seemed so apropos, that our attention was only called to it by an 'O, Prescott!' pencilled in the margin by some hypercritical gentleman who had taken umbrage at it."

EXTRAORDINARY CASE OF MESMERISM.

A young woman in Galashiels, eighteen years old, was seized twenty-three weeks ago with a severe bilious fever, which left her very weak and prostrate. Dr. Tweedie resolved to try the effects of mesmerism. (Chloroform had been used previously with only partial success.) Accordingly, after some trials, he succeeded in throwing her into the magnetic slumber. The poor girl had previously to this completely lost the power of speaking and hearing, and could only make herself understood by writing. She then fell into a kind of trance, in which she remained perfectly unconscious for several weeks, except at the will of the mesmeric operator, who gradually began to acquire an extraordinary influence over the state both of her mind and body. We shall briefly describe what we were witnesses to the other day. On entering with the doctor, the patient, who had been left in the magnetic sleep, immediately woke up, and was aware of his presence. The eyes were open and looked natural enough, while the color of the face was quite fresh and rather healthy looking. She saw the mesmerist, but no one else in the room, and no object which did not belong to or was under the influence of the operator. At this moment she was both deaf and dumb. The power of speech was first restored by passes and points on the larynx, and afterwards the deafness was removed in about five minutes, by the same process, the patient manifesting intense pain, and slightly convulsed as the senses were being restored. She now spoke freely and heard the voice of the mesmerist. He proceeded to excite various parts of the body, commencing with the under joint of the little finger. Upon this she declared she heard air vocal music. The next finger was touched, when she heard counter, and so on until the whole four fingers were excited, when she said she heard a full orchestra of male and female voices performing the several parts of air, counter, tenor and base. On being asked, she even repeated the words she thought she heard sung, although she did so with some reluctance. The upper joints were next irritated, when the same effects were produced, only the music was instrumental. Various other experiments were shown us. The elbow being irritated produced a fit of laughing. The heel gave a disposition to dance, and corresponding visions. The shoulder joint produced the idea of flowers of great variety, but none of which the patient could name. This inability to name or distinguish external or natural objects was most remarkable, both with regard to external and visionary objects. She did not know her own name, could not see a watch, unless it was the operator's, or had been magnetized by him, and even then did not know its name or use. Further experiments were tried; to the knee joint, which produced frightful images of dogs; cheek-bone, of a hen and eggs; ankles, rabbits; bridge of nose, of birds, also evidently of a frightful kind, as the vision ended in screaming and terror. The moment the excitation was withdrawn from a particular part, the object fled, and not the slightest recollection of it remained on the mind of the patient. Of these extraordinary phenomena, we can pretend to give no explanation. They are evidently seated in the depths of human nature and constitution, which mesmerists are only now investigating. We merely publish what we have seen, and we think it is our duty as a journalist to make such a remarkable case known, in order that Dr. Gregory, or some experienced mesmerist, may make the above the subject of investigation.—Border (Scotland) Advertiser.

THE TYROLEAN MINSTREL.

The engraving on this page is from a picture drawn from the life, and represents one of those itinerant Tyrolean minstrels who roam over the whole continent of Europe, and sometimes find their way to this country, making melody and money wherever they go. The instrument on which he is playing is not very unlike a guitar in principle, but yields a greater volume of sound. He is solacing himself, while playing, with the inevitable pipe. The Tyrolese are remarkable for their musical aptitude. They possess a quick ear, and many of them have very fine voices. Vocal music is a favorite exercise with them, and the singing of whole families in the open air, in the mountains, produces a wonderfully fine effect. The Tyrolese are a brave, free-hearted race, and, like most mountaineers, ardently attached to their native country. If the Tyrolean sometimes wanders thousands of miles from his birthplace, it is only that he may obtain the means of making his home more comfortable, and of passing the remainder of his days in quiet amidst his dearly-loved hills and valleys. With this attachment to their home, there is also the will to defend it from encroachment and invasion. If Switzerland has her Tell, the Tyrol can point with pride to her Andreas Hofer, a true patriot of modern days, who roused his countrymen to arms, and amidst their stern native passes, compelled the French invaders to respect the prowess of a people nerved to desperation by the outrages of foreign foes. History has enshrined the name of Andreas Hofer, the Tell of the Tyrol, and his fame is preserved in many a mountain song. A favorite theme with these itinerant Tyrolean minstrels is the "Death of Hofer."

REMARKABLE FOUNTAIN IN FLORIDA.

Taking a narrow path, I crossed through some dense under-wood, and all at once I stood on the banks of Wakulla Spring. There was a basin of water one hundred yards in diameter, almost circular. The thick bushes were growing almost to the water's edge, and bowing their heads under its unruffled surface. I stepped into a skiff and pushed off. Some immense fishes attracted my attention, and I seized a spear to strike them. The boatman laughed, and asked me how far below the surface I supposed they were? I answered about four feet. He assured me that they were at least twenty feet from me, and it was so. The water is of the most marvellous transparency. I dropped an ordinary pin in the water, forty feet deep, and saw its head with perfect distinctness as it lay on the bottom. As we approached the centre, I noticed a jagged, grayish limestone rock beneath us, pierced with holes; through these holes one seemed to look into unfathomable depths. The boat moved slowly on, and now we hung trembling over the edge of the sunken cliff, and far below it lies a dark, yawning, unfathomable abyss. From its gorge comes pouring forth, with immense velocity, a living river. Pushing on just

THE SOCIETY OF POISONERS.

A writer in the London Medical Times discloses a state of society in the empire of Brazil that is startling, and which, if his statements are reliable, betray a knowledge of the subtleties of chemical science among a semi-savage people unprecedented in the annals of the Borgias. He says:—"Every practitioner in Brazil knows that under the name of feitico (a Portuguese-African word, embracing the idea of charms, philters, poison, when administered in certain forms), poisoning is frequently practised, and so expert are its administrators that diseases of many varieties are simulated, and every possible gradation of time may be occupied by the poison to produce its effect, so that the victim of feitico may apparently succumb to a lingering marasmus or a violent colic. Such art, and the dexterity with which it is practised, imply an appropriate education, and the possession of much and exact traditional knowledge, by the negroes; and it will be more easily accredited that it is so, when it is known that in some parts of Brazil (and I speak with special reference to the interior of the province of San Paulo, where I now reside), there exists among the slave population a secret fraternity, analogous to the society of Thugs of India, who also consider it a discharge of a religious obligation to murder annually a certain number of persons—chosen, however, always from among the blacks themselves, and rarely or never from the families of their masters. In this society there are several grades; and the fitness of the aspirants to become acquainted with the more esoteric doctrines is supposed to be tested by the ability with which they cause one or more deaths—often their own nearest relatives being selected, the better to prove their firmness. Here, however, poison has replaced the cord of the Thug. A not unfrequent mode of administering it is by a pinch of snuff; and there is one most authentic case of death in this way produced on the intended assassin himself, which occurred in the centre of this province. Mesmerism, which is practised by the adepts, also, it is supposed by some well qualified to judge, enters much into their means of exhausting vitality. It is a singular fact that many, dying lingeringly, will often pertinaciously assert that such a one of their fellow-slaves is murdering them, alleging as a reason that nightly they dreamed of him, and the subsequent confession of the accused not unfrequently justifies the accusation. May we not explain this by the supposition that a partial reminiscence is left of the mesmeric processes to which, during sleep, they are subjected?"—New York Dispatch.

GEORGE IV.

But what of London in 1824? King George IV. was then on the throne, and though he was shy of showing himself in public, I chanced to see him several times, and once to advantage—at Ascot races. This was a royal course, and brought together an immense crowd of the nobility and gentry, as well as an abundant gathering of gamblers and blacklegs. For more than an hour his majesty stood in the pavilion, surrounded by the Duke of Wellington, the Duke of York, the Marquis of Anglesea, and other persons of note. He was a large over-fat man, of a rather sour and discontented countenance. All the arts of the toilet could not conceal the wrinkles of age, and the marks of dissipation and dilapidation. His lips were sharp, his eyes grayish blue, his wig chestnut brown. His cheeks hung down pendulously, and his whole face seemed pallid, bloated and flabby. His coat was a blue surtout, buttoned tight over his breast; his cravat, a huge black stock, scarcely sufficient to conceal his enormous, undulating jewel. On his left breast was a glittering star. He wore a common hat, the brim a little broader than the fashion. But for the star, and the respect paid to him, he might have passed only as an over-dressed and rather sour old rake. I noticed that his coat sat

THE ITALIAN MUSICIAN.

beyond its mouth, I dropped a ten-cent piece into the water, which is there one hundred and ninety feet in depth, and I clearly saw it shining on the bottom. This seems incredible. I think the water possesses a magnifying power. I am confident that the piece could not be so plainly seen from the top of the tower one hundred and ninety feet high. We rowed on towards the north side, and suddenly we perceived the water, the fish which were darting hither and thither, the long flexible roots, and the wide, luxuriant grasses on the bottom, all arrayed in the most brilliant prismatic hues. The gentle swell occasioned by the boat gave to the whole an undulating motion. Death-like stillness reigned around, and a more fairy-like scene I never before beheld. So great is the quantity of water here poured forth, that it forms a river of itself large enough to float flatboats laden with cotton. The planter who lives here has thus transported his cotton to Saint Mark's. Near the fountain we saw some of the remains of a mastodon which had been taken from it. The triangular bone below the knee measured six inches on each side. The Indian name of the fountain, Wakulla, means "The Mystery." It is said that the Spanish discoverers sprang into it with almost frantic joy, supposing they had discovered the long-sought "Fons Juventutis," or Fountain of Youth, which should rejuvenate them again.—Putnam's Magazine.

very close and smooth, and was told that he was trussed and braced by stays to keep his flesh in place and shape. He was a dandy to the last. The wrinkles of his coat, after it was on, were cut out by the tailor, and drawn up with a needle. He had the gout and walked badly. I imagine there were few among the thousands gathered to the spectacle who were really less happy than his majesty—the monarch of the three kingdoms.—S. G. Goodrich's Reminiscences.

STRONG BELIEVERS.

Luther was a tower of strength, because his whole trust was in the Lord. Baxter was a burning flame, because he lived hard by the mercy seat, whereon the glory dwelt between the cherubim. Whitfield was "the voice of one crying in the wilderness," because like John, his cry was, "Behold the Lamb of God!" Chalmers foamed like a cataract, because the deep rapids came rushing down upon him from the everlasting mountains. Hall's words were molten in the furnace where his faith was tried with fire. These were great preachers, because they were strong believers, because they loved the truth, kept their heart with diligence, and walked in the light of heaven. There is no age in which such preachers would not have power.—Eclectic Review.

FLOATING ICEBERGS.

SARGENT'S "ARCTIC ADVENTURE."

The extensive perusal of Dr. Kane's fascinating volumes has excited a general desire in the public mind to know more of the history of Arctic adventure and exploration. Curiosity is awakened as to the previous parts of a history, of which Dr. Kane's book is the sequel. The want has been met, and the demand well supplied in the appearance of an elegant duodecimo volume, of some five hundred pages, published by Messrs. Phillips, Sampson & Co., of Boston, and bearing the following title: "Arctic Adventure by sea and land, from the earliest date to the last expeditions, English and American, in search of Sir John Franklin; with maps and engravings. Edited by Epes Sargent." After giving a full and clear account of the adventures and discoveries of the earliest Arctic navigators—of Cabot, Froisher, Davis, Barentz, Hudson, Baffin, and himself in giving animation and interest to his book. How extraordinary is it, that in the course of these searches for Sir John Franklin, the great geographical problem of the last three centuries, the existence of a northwest passage, should have been solved, and the event have excited little or no interest either in Europe or the United States! But Captain McClure, though he did not find Franklin, found what Franklin had been sent out to find—a northwest passage. Taking the Pacific route, and sailing through Behring's Strait, McClure sailed to within thirty miles of where Parry wintered when he entered Barrow's Strait from Baffin's Bay on the opposite side of the continent! Although prevented by the ice from pushing his way through, McClure satisfied himself of the practicability of the passage in favorable seasons. One of the most extraordinary incidents in the whole course of Arctic

Messrs. Childs & Peterson, of several of the admirable wood-cuts in their publication, to illustrate the text. This adds largely to the interest of the book. But there are many fine wood-cuts illustrative of other portions of the book, and of these we present some spirited specimens, for which we are indebted to Phillips, Sampson & Co., the Boston publishers of Sargent's "Arctic Adventure." These illustrations may be briefly explained. The first engraving represents a ship among floating icebergs in Baffin's Bay. An interesting description of the formation of these large and their detachment from stupendous glaciers is given in Mr. Sargent's work. The second engraving represents Parry's men cutting a way for the ship through a large "floe." To effect this arduous operation, "the seamen marked with boarding pikes two parallel lines, at the distance of somewhat more than the breadth of the larger ship. They sawed, in the first place, along the path tracked out, and then by cross sawings detached large pieces, which were separated diagonally in order to be floated out; and sometimes boat sails were fastened to them to take advantage of a favorable breeze." The third illustration represents the sledging party over the ice under Captain Austin in search of Franklin. To facilitate movement, sails and kites were attached, and when the record of Christian fortitude, heroic endurance, and courage, which renders it, in a moral respect, a most useful and salutary work, and it is a deeply interesting and suggestive history, that both young and old will read with profit. The wood engravings, of which we give specimens, are neat and appropriate; and two good maps make the illustrative portion of the volume as perfect as could be wished. A feature in this work that renders it more valuable than any similar history published in this country is the clear and succinct account of the land explorations and discoveries, as well as of those by sea. It is not so generally known as it ought to be, that before he sailed on his last fatal expedition, Sir John Franklin had twice penetrated through those desolate portions of North America extending from the Hudson's Bay Company's posts to the Arctic shores. On the first of these expeditions, he and his men passed through the most remarkable sufferings, and narrowly escaped death by starvation. The second expedition was better managed and more successful. The adventures of Captain Back in his celebrated land journey, of Richardson and Rae, Simpson and Dease, and several others, give, in connection with the explorations by sea, a variety and interest to this volume, which we have rarely found in similar narratives. While wind was favorable, these did good service. The fourth engraving represents the situation of the Terror in Back's remarkable voyage, one of the most interesting and memorable in the whole collection. The Terror is, in technical phrase, "nipped" by the ice, and her prospects of getting out do not seem to be particularly encouraging; but by the occurrence of one of those sudden and inexplicable "breakings-up," familiar to Arctic voyagers, she is all at once set free, and, after many perils, enabled to make her way home, subsequently to take part in Franklin's last ill-fated expedition. We cannot dismiss Mr. Sargent's timely and interesting book without commending it warmly to adoption into every "family library" and public library in the land. It contains the path of some thirty expensive volumes, many of them never re-published in this country. It conveys much geographical and scientific information of universal interest. It presents a we write, we hear of new expeditions to be fitted out the present spring by the British government. It is proposed to send one by the way of Behring's Strait, one by Baffin's Bay and Barrow's Strait, and one overland. Of course, there is little hope that Sir John Franklin yet survives. He would now be, if still alive, upwards of seventy years of age. But it is conjectured that some of the crew may be found living among the Esquimaux, or that ruins may be discovered, containing records of the movements of the ill-fated navigator or his officers and men. In view of these anticipated explorations, as well as of the interest connected with the name of the lamented Dr. Kane, this timely work by Mr. Sargent will be eagerly sought for. It is such a work as will find a permanent place in many a select library, as one of those volumes which are entertaining and instructive.

SLEDGING WITH SAILS.

SAWING A CHANNEL.

others,—the editor enters upon the track of the voyagers of the present century—of Buchan, Ross, Parry, Beechey, Lyon, Back, Franklin—in search of a northwest passage, and gives, not mere abstracts, but glowing, interesting narratives of the bold and remarkable explorations of these contemporaneous explorers. The land explorations of Franklin, Richardson, Back, Rae, Simpson, Dease, and others, are also narrated, succinctly but comprehensively, in their chronological order; and in this a void is supplied which exists in every other work on Arctic exploration. But without these, it will be found that the great Arctic drama is incomplete. We are glad to see that Mr. Sargent has given to these difficult land expeditions their proper prominence. Franklin's voyage in the Erebus and Terror, the mystery of which is as yet unrevealed, closes the list of voyages in search of a northwest passage; and we now enter upon the expeditions by sea and land in search of Franklin himself, and to this portion of the volume there is a remarkable dramatic unity and interest. The adventures of Ross, Kellett, McClure, Ingfield, Collinson, Austin, Richardson, Rae, De Haven, Kane,—the private explorations of Kennedy, Penny, and others,—the romantic story of Bellot, the young Frenchman, afford material which Mr. Sargent has amply availed adventure is the unexpected meeting of McClure with Lieutenant Pym. Imagine a man who had made his way from Behring's Strait, and, after penetrating almost to the point reached by Parry, had there been frozen hopelessly in, suddenly encountering, while walking on the ice, a friend from home, who had come from vessels that had entered Barrow's Strait by way of Baffin's Bay! Had an angel of light suddenly descended, the spectacle could hardly have been more startling. The scene is described in a graphic manner in Mr. Sargent's pages. As McClure's book is just out of the press in England, and is not likely to be republished in this country, we are glad to see that Mr. Sargent has given the very pith and marrow of it in his copious narrative. Every detail of interest is preserved. McClure's voyage is incomparably the most important in its results, and one of the most interesting in its character, of any of the present century in this direction; and the value of the present work is much enhanced by the judicious use of the materials it presents. The American expeditions come in for their fair proportion of attention. An excellent account of the first Grinnell expedition is given; and, in the narrative of Dr. Kane's expedition, the editor has been able to avail himself, through the liberality of the Philadelphia publishers,

THE TERROR NIPPED.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

ALONE....TO

BY MRS. FANNY E. BARBOUR.

Apart from thee, dear one, my soul
Is filled with strange unrest;
I find no peace—a haunting voice,
My constant spirit guest,
Whispers with mournful tone,
“Thou art alone!—alone!”

Night draws her veil of radiant stars
Above her lustrous brow,
And voices born of night alone
Are murmuring soft and low,
“O, weary sleepers, rest!
The night for you is best.”

Day dawns in beauty rare, and earth
Flings off the night's embrace;
While from her altars perfumes rise
To meet the sun's glad face.
He brings no joy to me,
Beloved, afar from thee.

O, rich and rare the treasured gems
The past enshrines for me;
Not all the wealth of Ind could buy
My loving thoughts of thee.
Thou hast been true, beloved,
Thy faith long years have proved.

Memory, true artist, o'er the years
Her magic colors spreads;
And though those days are gone for ever
Old Past to Present weals.
With quickening pulse, I see
What was—and what must be.

What must be! yet the future hides
The coming we or weal:
This only know—I, that for thee,
I only love can feel
So love I thee alone;
So lovest thou me, dear one!

Beloved! dearest! All fond names
My heart applies to thee;
Yet not one name of all I know,
Tells what thou art to me.
My trust, my faith, my own
For aye!—I'm not alone!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF A LAWYER.

BY WILLIAM B. OLIVER.

I BELIEVE that I started in life under the auspices of my father's aunt Deborah—a maiden lady of sixty-four, who, in place of the father and mother whom I never saw, alternately petted and scolded me as long as she was able. I escaped from both when I was eleven years old by running away; and although she sent me innumerable messages, when she discovered my whereabouts, to return to her, and he sent to school and fitted for college, I undutifully refused ever to go near her again.

I had “hired out” with a small farmer to do his “chores” for my board and clothes, and I staid there three years; at the end of which time my roving propensities moved me to run off from him. I had made all my arrangements, and was even mounted on the top of the Reading stage, when who should come into the tavern-yard but the farmer.

“Where are you going, boy?” he called out, in a hard and severe tone.

“To Boston, sir.”

“To Boston!”

I cannot describe the manner in which he said this; but it woke up all the memories of floggings which left scars “got, I have not time to tell you now,” any more than the immortal Fushos had. He was a coarse, profane man, and he launched out into a strain of abuse which would have made my blood chill if I had been afraid of him, and bade me get down instantly and go home.

“Thank you, sir,” I said, “I am engaged to somebody else.”

At this moment the stage started. He ordered the driver to stop and let me down; but he drove on, and I am almost ashamed to record that I made a significant gesture, with my thumb and finger upon my very decent Roman nose, and calling out “Good-by, sir—you shall hear of me some day,” I went off in the exultant triumph of freedom.

I was delighted with the fine prospect which I enjoyed in my elevated seat. The driver was very kind to me, refusing to take my money for the whole journey, and offering to find me a stopping-place in the city.

At that time there was a very old house in Howard Street, now demolished, in which a Mr. Jones kept boarders for a number of years. Here he stopped the stage for me to get down.

“What shall I do, driver?” said I.

“Just rig that hell, my lad,” he answered, “and somebody will come and let you in.”

I looked up to the top of the door.

“I don't see any bell, sir,” I said, timidly.

The man burst into a broad laugh.

“Pull that knob, greeny!” he said, at last; and straightway I pulled it again and again, until Mr. Jones, a queer looking old fellow, with one leg, and a dilapidated eye, came to the door, and ooked daggers out of the remaining orb of vision, upon the luckless wight who had broken his bell wire.

“Let that youngster stay with you and Ma'am Jones till I come up to supper,” said the still laughing driver—and I staid.

Ma'am Jones was a lady that would have made a fine companion for Daniel Lambert. Sheltered beneath her capacious wing, I could bid defiance to little Mr. Jones, who dared not attack anything which his wife might take a fancy for petting. The old lady liked me very much; and this knowledge, together with the daily sight of my friend, the driver, kept me contented and happy through the winter. I scoured knives, and performed quite a series of similar dignified labors every morning; but when boys of my own age were round, I sometimes thought, while looking at their good and respectable clothing, that it would not have been a very bad plan for me to have accepted Anat Deborah's offer of sending me to college.

An opportunity offering to go to sea, I prepared to go, despite the entreaties, and even tears, of the fat landlady. When she found me determined, she provided me with everything needful for the voyage, hugged me to her capacious heart, and bade me godspeed. Jones, who was so angry because I staid there, was still more so when I went away; and in his wife's absence, taunted me with my new clothes, which he more than half suspected came from her, although they passed as the stage-driver's gift.

The servants all assembled to see me go away, and their hearty “Good-by, Sam!” “A safe return to you, old fellow!” was probably more sincere than nine-tenths of the good wishes that have been spoken to me since that time.

I shall say very little about my sea-life. It did not answer my expectations at all. I never passed a day without intolerable seasickness, and being a slight, delicate boy, the captain advised me as a friend to stay in future upon the land. Going on shore, the mate stepped forward and shook my hand, saying:

“Well, Sam, you have killed a sailor, after all.”

I did not then know the meaning of this phrase; but when I got back to the old house in Howard Street, my friend, the driver, repeated it, and from him I got the explanation of the term.

I could not go back to the kitchen work again after my voyage, so I looked out diligently for some employment. An advertisement in the paper for a printer's boy caught my eye, and I applied and was received. Here I was quite happy. I made myself a favorite in the office, and fortunately succeeded in learning the business so that my services would always command a fair remuneration.

At twenty-one I married Susan Russell, the daughter of my employer. I am thus brief in recording this, because by no alchemy whatever could I convert our old-fashioned and matter-of-fact liking for each other, and subsequent union, into anything like romance. The whole might be compressed in a single sentence. I liked her, and married her when I found that she also liked me.

My description of our new home would be quite as brief. We took two rooms, furnished them comfortably, and Susan kept them shining like silver the whole year round. If ever I enjoyed true, real, unremitted happiness, without care or anxiety or fear for the future, it was in those days. What peace we enjoyed! Our two eldest children were born here, and then our limits seemed too small; but it was real pain to both of us to move from the snug abode which had been the scene of so many calm and peaceful hours.

We removed to a cottage in the suburbs of Boston; not those miniature cities which now rise up beside the venerable Trimountain, but a small and obscure village, since risen to the size and importance it deserves. About the time that we removed, and were quietly settled, a very important law case was on the docket, and when it came on we were very busy printing the reports of the trial as it progressed. I became intensely absorbed in it; not so much from sympathy with the parties concerned as from a feeling that, were I acquainted with the technicalities of the law, I could seize upon very many points of importance which I believed the prisoner's counsel had overlooked altogether. This idea grew stronger and stronger upon my mind. I had access to law books which were in my employer's sanctum, and I pored over them sometimes all night long.

Mr. Russell had been bred to the law, but had relinquished his profession for that of an editor, some years before the birth of my wife. I frankly stated to him my wishes in regard to fitting myself for the bar. He first laughed at, then seriously tried to dissuade me from attempting it. Opposition only strengthened my purpose, and I entered the office of an eminent lawyer, who overlooked my deficiencies in some respects, in consideration, as he was pleased to term it, of the talent and acumen which my replies to his questions displayed.

I now wrote for the journal I had been accustomed to print, and with such secrecy that Mr. Russell did not find out who his new contributor was. He would often wonder, in my presence, who it could be, and ascribed to him a degree of talent and brilliancy of expression such as I had hardly hoped to deserve. He often, too, imputed my articles to — and —, then the two leading writers of the day, and expressed his opinion that they would not remain incog. a great while. This flattery pleased me, but I did not allow my vanity to lead me into betraying myself. Through a third party, I received a larger compensation for my labors, certainly, than I should have done had my wise father-in-law mistrusted who his correspondent.

I studied hard, and had at length the inexpressible satisfaction of being admitted to the Suffolk bar. I took an office with another young lawyer, in order to reduce our expenses, and waited anxiously for the first brief that should be offered.

Poor Susan! My heart aches at the remembrance of certain privations to which, with angel sweetness, she submitted at this period, in order that I might appear respectable. My contributions to various literary journals barely gave us the means of sustenance; and I had so nearly offended Mr. Russell by slighting his advice that I dared not apply to him for assistance.

One day, in passing from our suburban residence to the city, I met my old landlady, fat Mrs. Jones. She looked at me hard, and I returned it. There was no mistaking that good honest countenance and expressive form, even when draped as it was in the deepest mourning. A widow's ample veil hung over the back of her head and nearly swept the street. The recognition was mutual, and the old lady's raptures at finding me were almost too strong for outdoor exhibition. She told me of poor Jones's death, and of their removing to the country when the old house in Howard Street was torn down.

“And now,” she said, plaintively, “I am alone in the world.”

“Come and live with me,” were my first words. “You gave me a home when I was a lone child.”

I stepped, for the thought pressed back upon me that I was poor and unable even to maintain my own family. A strange smile flitted over the face of my friend, while she inquired my situation. I told her, and described my wife and children. She said:

“I will go to you. I can help your wife enough to pay for my board.”

I was almost dismayed at what I had done, when I considered the immense appetite which I had inconsiderately offered to supply, and which I well remembered of old. But I clung to my bargain, and begged her to come immediately.

“You will find us in rather close quarters,” I said, “but you shall come and be welcome.”

We agreed that she should be there the following Monday, and I went home to Susan, whom I met with rather an embarrassed air. She looked at the matter more philosophically than I had expected, and prepared her best chamber for Mrs. Jones's reception, heroically carrying in many little conveniences of which we had no duplicates. My relation of Mrs. Jones's former kindness to me, and my description of her present lonely and widowed state, made Susan shed tears. She promised to do everything in her power for the forlorn woman whom she thought would now be thrown upon me for maintenance and upon herself for companionship.

Mrs. Jones arrived on Monday morning, carpet-bag in hand, and followed by a handcart, bearing her old-fashioned and somewhat dilapidated hair trunk. We received her kindly, and she seemed pleased and happy when she sat down to Susan's simple but excellent dinner. The children were attentive, and kept passing the food near to the new guest.

A fortnight passed away, and we began to feel that we could scarcely do without Mrs. Jones. She was invaluable as an assistant to Susan, and in marketing for us her services were beyond all praise. We gave her our slender purse every morning, as she thought she could do better with it than we could; and it was perfectly amazing to see the loads of provision and the superior quality of the same which she obtained. Susan and I began to think that we had been grievously cheated in our former purchases. So, when our wardrobe imperatively called for additions, Mrs. Jones would go out with the money for a sixpenny print, and return with something really handsome and valuable for my wife, and a nice remnant for the little Kitty, and then would sit down and make them both up with all the skill of an experienced mantua maker.

Susan handed me some bills, one day, that she said were left there by a collector, including one for our rent, and one for the last suit of clothes which I had been unwillingly forced to buy in order to keep up a respectable appearance. My countenance fell some degrees, I fancy, for I had no money to pay them. Mrs. Jones was bustling round the dinner table, and she said, rather sadly, that she felt that she ought not to be living upon us, and perhaps she had better go away.

“Never, my good friend!” said I, and “Never!” echoed Susy.

I assured her that I would not listen to her leaving us—that I trusted very soon to get business, and that come what would she should share our last loaf. The good old soul hugged us both at once, and then settling her cap and wiping her eyes, she went quietly back to her work. After dinner she went out, but we reiterated our injunctions that she should not seek another home as long as she could put up with ours.

I called round in the evening at the various places from whence I had received the bills. To my utter surprise, the answer was that they had all been settled. I inquired by whom, but no one could recollect. They were all cancelled on the various books. I was thoroughly amazed, for I knew no one but Mr. Russell who could do it for me, and hardly believed it of him. Susy was as surprised as myself, but she rather inclined to the belief that it was her father, so I quietly let her indulge in her pleasant belief.

We got through the summer, but the winter was coming on, and I actually trembled at its approach. Industrious as I was—prudent as Susy had ever been—we could not hope to win through the cold season without both suffering and toil, and with debt superadded.

I had been at the office all day, on one gloomy time in November, anxiously debating whether I should not go back to printing again. I considered all the whys and wherefores, counted the costs again and again, and by the most careful arithmetic I could not find that the change would benefit me a single son. I was toiling unremittingly now, and I should have to do so if I returned to printing, and with scarcely so much success as now. I became heartily discouraged at the prospect before me. Had I been alone in the world I could patiently have borne it. Suffering and privation brought no terrors to me individually, but the thought of those who were dear to me at home unmanned me. And darker the prospect, the more I shrunk from allowing Mrs. Jones to feel that she was a burden upon us. No—come what might, the good old soul should not be removed from the circle in which she seemed to have placed all her happiness. She should live with us as long as she lived, at all, and if we were reduced to beggary, why, we would beg for her too.

I started up and paced the office with an impatient step. It may seem strange that a strong, healthy man should be so powerless as I was to procure a living for my family; but so it was. It was growing dusk, and I felt it was near my time to go home. I had intended sending some fuel to my house, but I was disappointed in some money that a certain publisher of a daily paper was owing me, and I now dreaded that there was darkness on the hearth at home. I was just locking up, when a boy came up to me with a folded paper. I read it under the lamp post. It ran thus:

"Come to No. — Tremont Road, at six o'clock."

I saw no alternative but to do as I was asked. The boy was gone, so I could make no excuse; and I walked over the damp leaves that lay crushed upon the sidewalk, which the November blast had shaken that very hour from the trees. I went over the ground rapidly, for I wanted to learn the errand and be away.

I rang at the number designated. It was a good brick house, with substantial granite steps, a well-lighted vestibule with glass doors, and I could see that the whole front was well supplied with gas. I heard little feet scampering through the hall, but as the doors were of grooved glass I could see nothing.

A servant came to the door, and waited on me to a handsome drawing-room, with plain but new and good furniture. I waited in curious speculation for some minutes. There had been no plate upon the door, so I could not even tell the name of the person wishing to see me. I was standing before the chimney-piece examining a picture, when a little child ran into the room. It was so like little Kitty that I would have called her so had not the pretty embroidered robe and silk apron looked so different from our children's plain clothes. But another little head was peeping in at the open door, and that was like little Charley, only for the scarlet frock and neat gutters; and then the two made a long rush across the floor and ran into my arms, while slowly and majestically, sweeping along in her ample crapes and bombazines, came portly Mrs. Jones, and behind her, Susy, smiling and blushing like the dawn. I think I had a womanly feeling come upon me just then. I felt a sort of faintness, and I passed my hand across my eyes to be sure that I was awake. Susy laid her hand on my shoulder.

"You owe it to our kind friend here," she whispered. "She has been trying you deeply."

"Trying me?" I said, aloud.

"Yes, my good friend," said Mrs. Jones, herself. "I was rich, and had no one about me but selfish and interested people who all wanted my money. I have long owned this house, and lived in it when I met you first; but a thought, suggested by your invitation to go to you, induced me to try whether you would keep me if I had happened to be poor, and I am abundantly satisfied with the result. We made money at that old house in Howard Street, which no one but ourselves ever knew of, and I always intended to find you out and make you my heir. I had, however, rather that you would enjoy my property while I can have the pleasure of seeing you; so I invite you to return my visit. You will find a handsome office, well fitted up for you in Court Street, when you go down town to-morrow morning. The boy who will wait on you has the key of the door, but here are the keys of your desk and library."

I declare to you, reader, the generosity of this woman unmanned me more than the disconsolate thoughts which had haunted me the whole afternoon. It seemed too good to believe, and when we walked out to the dining-room, and sat down to a supper at which no exposure was spared, I could only look from one to the other and wonder if I was in a dream.

I took possession of my grand office the next day. Briefs poured in upon me, for who will not require the services of a rich lawyer, and who wants those of a poor one? I rose rapidly, and am still standing in high places. I speak it with reverence, I owe it all to a woman.

We bought the cottage with its little garden, and we go there in summer and play poverty there again for a few of the hottest weeks. We have four children now, and Mrs. Jones pets them all. She is now trying to have me seek out my old Aunt Deborah, and perhaps I will. The old farmer, too, I intend now that he shall "hear from me."

LITTLE ANGEL'S FEAST IN CHILI.

When a child dies not exceeding three or four years of age, its parents do not lament or grieve for it, which they would consider heresy. As soon as the child commences to suffer the agonies of death, its parents make preparations for feasting it. The day of its death they kill the fatted calf, and all the turkeys and fowls there are in the house. They also buy a barrel of Mosto wine, hire singers and dancers, and spread the report that Don So-and-so will celebrate the Little Angel. When the child is dead, it is decked with flowers of all kinds, its face is smeared with crimson, and it is then seated on a table to preside and authorize the feast. The Little Angel I saw was adorned just as I have described it; moreover, that the child may appear alive, they place two small sticks between the eyelids, the eyes remaining thus forcibly open. At the arrival of the singers, revellers, and dancers, the feast commences, and very soon it is converted into the most furious, licentious, and unbounded carousal. The parents encourage and stimulate the revels; and the more the father drinks and encourages the company, so much more glory will the Little Angel enjoy in heaven. The parents do not give this feast with the sole object of celebrating and increasing the glory of their Little Angel. The carousal helps them to sell their beef, cazuela, chanchito, arrollando, cider, and the Mosto; and after twenty-four hours find that they have made a clear profit of twenty or thirty dollars.—Your in Chili.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

THE SAILOR BOY'S HOME.

BY THOMAS FAYUN, JR.

Hail, home of my boyhood, my beautiful home!
Thou wilt rise up before me whenever I roam—
The heavenly stormy tempest, the waves' angry roar,
I cannot tell the bright vision I see elsewhere.

Our noble ship glides o'er the rolling blue tide;
Where the navies of earth in their majesty ride;
Their mightiest grandeur my eye cannot see,
For aught else save my vision is nothing to me.

The clouds of the sunset, with purple and gold,
Will change their thin vapors to fancy's bright mould,
And fantasy, loosed, will fill up the scene
With images strange as the brain's wildest dream.

I see in the drama the home of my youth,
Resplendently lovely, as gems-drops of truth.
O, could some kind fairy invest me with wings,
I'd fly to that region where such pleasure springs.

When the battling elements rise in their wrath,
And through the dark canopy thunders crash,
When the night-howl'ing tempest envelopes the shrouds,
And drives the mad vessel through gathering clouds—

Then vivid as lightning the picture will rise,
Proportioned in beauty to greet my glad eyes—
The home of my boyhood, my beautiful home,
It will rise up before me wherever I roam.

(Written for Ballou's Pictorial.)

A FRONTIER REMINISCENCE.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITTS.

Most Americans, if the characteristic can be confined to any particular nation, have a fondness for old battle-fields and relics of ancient wars. It is certainly a commendable spirit which leads us to fields where our ancestors have fought for privileges which are bequeathed to us, and since we have no unjust wars recorded in our history, I see not why this spirit of affection for scenes of wars long past should not be encouraged. The following incident, although well known to the inhabitants of the section of country where it occurred, is unknown to many who take an interest in everything pertaining to our wars; no excuse, therefore, is needed for its relation.

Probably no river of its length, or of three times its length, has witnessed more warlike scenes than the Niagara. Upon its banks were fought the battles of Chippewa and Lundy's Lane and Fort Erie, in the war of 1812; and its waters reflected at that time the conflagration of numerous villages. Many dark and mysterious tales of savage ferocity are told by survivors of that period, but more terrible are those which are buried forever with the dead. Tradition has given us many of them, among which is the one I am about to relate, which might well be called the frontier tragedy.

The banks of the river above the cataract are almost entirely level with the water, but below it they are tall, steep, and craggy. About three miles below the falls is a locality which has received the appropriate name of the Devil's Hole. It is an immense chasm, yawning from the river to the highway, and forming a frightful looking pit, well suited to its name. Upon the sides the bank takes the form of an enormous perpendicular wall, probably two hundred feet in height. The whole aspect of the place is one of horror, and the waters of the river rush wildly past as if anxious to escape quickly from a place fraught with the associations of this remarkable Devil's Hole.

It was upon a pleasant morning during the old French war that a company of British and colonial troops were on the march just below this locality. They were several hundred in number, and were accompanied by heavy army wagons. They presented a fine martial appearance: their polished gun-barrels and bayonets reflected the rays of the sun, and their regimentals shone with brilliant light. So, at least, thought an Indian as he cautiously peered out from behind the trunk of a huge oak and admired the warlike array. He once half raised a long musket which he carried, as his eye fell upon the officer on horseback at the front, but he dropped his hand, and having hastily glanced at the cumbersome provision wagons in the rear, he disappeared as noiselessly as he had come. But all unconscious of the proximity of any foe, the troops marched on, inspired by the music of life and drum. Several horsemen rode in the rear, one of whom was mounted on a powerful mare, which showed restiveness at the slow pace which her rider compelled her to take. The individual mounted upon her was named Stedman, and was in charge of the wagons. But one other claims our especial attention—the drummer boy, who plied his sticks with a will and stepped as quickly as his comrades to the lively tune which the captain had ordered to be played. And still they marched on, the drum and fife playing, unknown to them, their funeral march.

They had now reached the spot described before, and the light of the sun was shut out from their view by the tall trees which lined the path. Their shadows fell into the dismal pit and rendered it still more darksome. The woods formed a complete semi-circle round the gulf, and just beyond ran a little creek. The men pressed hastily forward to obtain a draught of its waters, little thinking that they would ever reach it. Suddenly a tremendous roar was heard, fires flashed from the woods and half of the troop fell in their tracks. Stunned, bewildered and confused, the remainder huddled together, or sought safety behind the wagons. From behind the trees issued scores of hideously painted savages, howling their dreadful war-whoop and brandishing their tomahawks. Frightful indeed was the massacre which followed. The Indians flew from one victim to another, and the deadly hatchet blow was hardly given before the scalping-knife performed its work. Amid the general rout the captain of the troop endeavored to rally and lead on his men, but he soon fell and each man looked only for his own preservation. So sudden, indeed, had been the onset, and with the usual savage counting the ambush had been laid in a place where the victims were exposed to a murderous cross-fire before they came to closer work, that but few shots were fired by the troops.

And now commenced a horrible scene. The Indians, but one or two of whom had fallen under the scattering volley of the troop, closed round the few that remained alive, and drove them right towards the cliff. Not a blow was given by them except to urge their victims on. Steadily they pursued them, allowing not one to escape, till they reached the cliff; then the cries of their enemies were lost in the depths of the Devil's Hole. Here might be seen a poor wretch endeavoring to delay his doom by grasping the edge of the rock; soon a blow from the remorseless hatchet loosened his hold, and his mangled corpse lay at the bottom of the pit. Mercilessly they persevered till every foe was still in death.

But not yet every one. Two escaped from the general slaughter. The one, Stedman, was mounted, as we observed, upon a powerful mare. After the deadly volley was given by the savages, an Indian rushed upon him and seized the reins. Not losing his presence of mind for an instant, he cut the reins and giving the savage a severe blow with his sword he drove spurs into his horse and was borne swiftly away, unharmed by the shower of bullets which whistled past him. A curious story in relation to his escape is that the Indians believed him to be proof against their bullets, and that his horse was enchanted; and being impressed with the strangeness of his escape, made him a grant of all the land for a considerable width which he traversed in his flight.

The other escapee is the most marvellous ever recorded. It was made by the drummer before mentioned. He escaped the bullets of the Indians and the tomahawks, and was forced with the rest to the edge of the cliff. Here he was seized by a muscular savage and thrown bodily over. He fell almost to the bottom, and was almost miraculously caught by the straps of his drum in a large tree. Safe and uninjured, he could hear the yells and groans far above him, and see the bodies falling past him. He descended the tree, and with much danger and difficulty made his way to Fort Niagara, and announced the news of the ambush and the destruction of the troops.

The bodies of those slain by the rifle and tomahawk were thrown into the creek; its waters were dyed blood red, and it has since received the name of Bloody Run. The great pit of the Devil's Hole still yawns as if expecting more victims, and the place retains so much of its primeval wildness that the visitor almost expects to hear the war-whoop sounded by ambushed savages as of yore. But no other sounds wake the stillness than the rattling of passing wheels and the hoarse murmur of the river, which —hears no sound

Save his own dashing.

AN OLD FORT.

In Florida, the old fort formerly called St. Marks, but since the purchase from Spain, Fort Marion, is constructed of coquina stone. The following is an interesting description of it: This fort is just a century old, having been built in 1756. It cost immense sums of money, and is strong enough to have withstood, in its time, several formidable sieges. It is, probably, the most stupendous, and, certainly, the most interesting piece of masonry in the United States. It contains dungeons which are said to have witnessed scenes of inquisitorial atrocity, and whose floors have been stained by the bloody tyrannies of a dark and cruel age. There are, also, a chapel and numerous guard rooms for the accommodation of soldiers within its massive walls. The whole is surrounded by a moat, which was formerly crossed by two ancient drawbridges. Modelled after the old feudal forms of defence, each bastion is crowned by a turret for sentinels, and has an air of antiquity, bordering on the romantic, as well as being exceedingly picturesque. Over the main entrance is engraved, in solid rock, the arms of Spain, and an inscription in Spanish, which informs the stranger that the fortress was finished in 1756, when Ferdinand VI. ruled the dominions of the mother country. Don Alonzo Fernandez de Heredia was governor and commander-in-chief, and the engineer of construction was Don Pedro de Brazas y Garay. It is said that, in 1819, when Florida was purchased by the United States, many of the old Spanish records, that alone could shed light upon the obscurity of the early history of this region, were conveyed in secrecy away to Cuba.—New York Dispatch.

ONE DOLLAR. — WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years' experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 72,300 copies.

Any person ordering one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us each subscriber and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

U. S. MAN-OF-WAR MAKING THE ISLE OF ST. PAULS, INDIAN OCEAN.

THE ISLAND OF ST. PAULS, INDIAN OCEAN.

The views and map on this page, illustrating a very singular island in the Indian Ocean, were drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Hill, from original drawings made on the spot by Lieut. George H. Preble, U. S. N., and kindly placed at our disposal. The first of the engravings represents a United States man-of-war under full sail, making the island, and the last a remarkable basin within the island, a spot truly extraordinary in its character. The following description, furnished us by Lieut. Preble, taken in connection with the elegant map and drawings, will give our readers a perfect idea of this curious place: Saint Pauls is the southernmost of two islets in the Indian Ocean, distant from each other, north and south, about fifty-five miles, but situated on the same meridian. They were named by Vlaming, the Dutch navigator, in 1697, who called the northern island Amsterdam. Saint Pauls may be seen in clear weather twenty leagues (forty miles). It extends eight or ten miles northwest and southeast, and is about five miles in breadth, having a level aspect and sloping down at each extremity when bearing to the northeast. On the east side there is an inlet to a circular basin through which the sea ebbs and flows over a causeway at its entrance. A headland stands at each side of this entrance, and a rock ninety feet high, called "Nine-pin Rock" from its shape, stands at a small distance from the shore on the north side. There is not a shrub on the island, coarse grass and reeds being the only verdure seen, and a sort of turf composed by the decayed fibres of the grass and reeds and burnt very much. The basin is undoubtedly the crater of an extinct volcano. Its circumference at the water's edge is 2980 yards, or nearly one and three quarter miles. Taking the perpendicular height of the surrounding sides at 700 feet, and the angle of their inclination at 65° the circumference of the crater will be two miles and 160 yards. The depth of water, 20 fathoms or 180 feet, added to the average height, 700 feet, will make the whole depth of the crater 880 feet, and it is a pretty regular ellipsis. The entrance to this basin is only twenty-four yards wide, and is formed between two narrow causeways or ridges of rock that runs out from two peaks, which terminate the sides of the crater, one on each side. That on the right is 743 feet high, and at its foot on the causeway there is a hot spring, where the thermometer in the winter rises to 212° Fahrenheit—a heat sufficient to boil the fish caught within the basin. Seiners who have resided on the island state the weather to be fine in summer but stormy in winter. Whirlwinds sometimes tear the water from the surface of the crater, and the torrents of rain which burst over the hills, pour down them, forming deep ravines. Strong westerly gales prevail near these islands in the winter months, with thick hazy weather. In 1793, fire was seen to issue from various crevices during the night, showing that the volcanic furnaces were only slumbering, but not then extinct. In their geographical position these islands are almost uniquely isolated. The nearest land to them—the small island of "Romeiros dor Castilhano"—being full 600 miles to the northward, while Kerguelan's land, their nearest southern neighbor, is 800 miles distant, and the Cape of Good Hope over fifty degrees of longitude to the westward and Cape Leuwc, the southwestern cape of Australia, as much as thirty-seven degrees of longitude to the eastward of them. With the exception, perhaps, of the Bermudas and St. Helena, those twin sisters of the Indian Ocean, St. Pauls and Amsterdam are believed to be the most isolated spots on the face of the globe. I have been informed that St. Pauls has been recently colonized by a few French fishermen from the Isle of Bourbon. All ships from the United States, England or Europe, after passing the Cape of Storms, now called the Cape of Good Hope, if bound to China, steer to make either St. Pauls or Amsterdam, and having passed their position, haul up for Achein head, or the Straits of Sanda. They also lie upon the regular track to Australia. Important as an accurate knowledge of their position must be, it is rather singular that until quite recently they should have been put down on most charts in longitude 77° 54' east of Greenwich—a position near thirty miles to the eastward of their true place, as appears from the latest French survey, and the observations of other navigators, which place them in 77° 24' east. Captain Blackwood, in his survey, states the longitude of Nine-pin Rock (which is in point of fact the easternmost extremity of the harbor of St. Pauls) 77° 37' east of Greenwich, and its latitude 38° 45' south. To complete this description I send you the narrative of a person who landed on St. Pauls in 1842, and who communicated his impressions to the Boston Daily Advertiser. "Made the island of St. Pauls Saturday, Dec. 24, 1842, 5 o'clock, A. M. Came up with it at 9 o'clock. Left the ship with four men and pulled in for the shore, provided with lines, a carbine, compass and thermometer. When within three-quarters of a mile of the land, saw an immense number of fish near the surface of the water. But being very anxious to examine some boiling springs said to be on the island, we pulled in without catching any, presuming they would wait till we came out. On the right hand, previous to our entering the basin, we saw a rock, the most perfect resemblance to a sugar loaf, standing at a short distance to the eastward. The entrance is about thirty yards wide. As we went over the bar, being apprehensive the boat might ground, I kept one man sounding with the boat-hook; the least depth of water was a fathom; the bottom was rocky and covered with kelp weed. On the rocks were some small sea-gulls, something like those we have, but smaller, and with red beaks. This basin is a perfect inverted cone, about one mile in diameter, with banks from 500 to 600 feet high, rising from the water at an angle of 45°. There is no doubt of its volcanic origin, and that the basin now filled with water was the crater of an extinct volcano. The east part of the island appears to have sunk, taking with it about

ISLE OF ST. PAULS, INDIAN OCEAN.

REMARKABLE BASIN IN THE ISLAND OF ST. PAUL'S.

one-eighth of the crater; this convulsion admitted the water, and now enables us to enter. On the breakwater at the entrance, we saw steam or smoke; on landing, discovered that it proceeded from some boiling springs issuing from crevices of the rocks, about two yards from the water of the basin, and from six inches to a foot above its level at high tide. The thermometer stood at 65 degrees in the air; on immersion in one of the springs, it went up to 160 degrees, which was the extent of the scale of the instrument. I was not able, therefore, to get the temperature in this way. Seeing the fish in the water of the basin close to the spring, I attempted to kill one with my fowling-piece, on discharging which, an immense quantity of steam issued from the springs. From this circumstance I became satisfied that there was a connection between the spring and the basin. Scattered around the spring is a mineral resembling iron ore. I sent two of the men with the boat to catch a fish that we might boil it in the spring. While they were thus engaged, I climbed up the crater, taking one of the men with me; I had not gone far when my attention was called to something jumping in the grass, which proved to be a penguin; it was very tame and easily secured. One of the men now came and informed me that the fish was cooked, having been in the water ten minutes. On tasting it, I found it was perfectly cooked, and of very fine flavor. We found no fresh water on the island. Judging from the appearance of the island before landing, I should say it was 500 feet high throughout. Some idea of the quantity of fish may be formed from the fact that one of the men spared one in two feet of water. In the centre of the basin the temperature of the water was 69 degrees, of the water 91 degrees, showing that the spring has little effect in heating the water of the basin. It being now half past eleven o'clock, I concluded to go out and catch some fish. In eleven fathoms water four men caught in a short time, about seventy fish, averaging ten pounds each."

FEMALE COLLEGIATE INSTITUTE, WORCESTER, MASS.

The accompanying engraving is from a drawing made for us by Mr. Kilburn, and represents the new and elegant building of the Female Collegiate Institute at Worcester, Mass. It stands on a high hill, and may be seen for many miles. When the trees planted around it shall have grown up, the situation will be very pleasant. This Institute was incorporated by the Legislature of Massachusetts in 1854. The location in Worcester was determined in July, 1855. Central in its position, communicating by railroad with every section, with a prospect of a large increase in its endowment, this institution draws to itself the interest of a large circle. It is a public institution. There will be a regular course of study, embracing a period of four years, as in our older universities. There will be, for the present, a preparatory department, specially designed to qualify young ladies to pursue the studies of the regular course. The requisites for pursuing the regular course will be a thorough acquaintance with English, Latin and Greek Grammar, Cæsar's Commentaries, Sallust, and the Æneid of Virgil, Latin Prosody, Latin composition, Jacob's Greek Reader, or an equivalent, and Algebra, so far as to be able to solve equations of the second degree. Young ladies who have arrived at the age of fourteen years, may pursue a preparatory course of study, subject to all the general regulations and enjoy all the privileges of the institution. Persons of suitable age and acquisitions will be permitted to select such English studies of the regular course as they may desire to pursue, not less than one year. They will be required to recite with the regular classes at least twice a day, and will be entitled, on leaving the institution, to a certificate of their respective attainments. From a pamphlet now before us, we find the following list of members of the corporation:—T. F. Caldwell, D. D., President; J. E. Taylor, D. M. Crane, Jones Rudd, A. Gule, Wm. Heath, J. M. Rockwood, J. C. Foster, Wm. H. Jameson, Levi Boutwell, Hon. Henry Chapin, Wm. H. Harris, Esq.; E. A. Cummings, Secretary; Francis Wayland, Jr., Esq., Treasurer. A religious but not sectarian element enters largely into the plan of the institution. As an educational establishment, it will furnish young ladies with the same amount and character of learning that is supplied to the other sex in our colleges. One element entering into the plan of this institution, we learn from a circular of the board, is its accessibility to persons possessed of but moderate pecuniary means. It is obvious to thoughtful observers, that no one class of society has ever embraced all the native talent in the community; that there is material in society hitherto in a great measure neglected, which, if cultivated, would leave its beneficent traces upon the age; and that, for enterprises demanding hardihood and endurance, none have done more hitherto than those who were inured to the bread of toil. The problem proposed is, to furnish advantages for female education such as the rich cannot afford to dispense with, and yet make them accessible to the comparatively poor. The only solution to such a problem, as yet, has been found in the creation of endowments for education. By this means many of our colleges, in past years, have been able to bring their necessary expenses within the sum of one-half or of one-third of the expense incurred at unendowed female schools. This is the method now proposed for solving the problem of a greatly improved education for females, at a greatly reduced price. It is by no means assumed that we are destitute of excellent seminaries for ladies, where an advanced course of study may be pursued and a ripe scholarship acquired. But it is felt to be a serious evil, that these facilities are afforded at so costly a rate as to remove them from the great mass of those who would gladly enjoy them. It is certain that an increased number of females are, every year, turning their attention to the advantages of what may be termed a liberal education. But with existing provisions to meet this great demand of the times, the worthy aspirations of multitudes must be checked and crushed. The highest standard of education attainable by females, is altogether too expensive to be reached under present arrangements, by more than a mere fraction of the large number whose laudable ambition can hardly be restrained from pursuing the inviting paths of knowledge open to a few, and but a few, comparatively, of the more favored ones. Hitherto, with only here and there an exception, the way has not been opened, in the liberal culture of the female mind, for "the rich and poor to meet together." Much has been done to this effect in the education of young men. Colleges and institutions in connection with the several professions, have been amply endowed, so that the poorest may share with the richest, in the advantages of the highest schools. In this manner the sons of the church have been cared for, while the daughters of the church have been forgotten. Christian benevolence has often flowed freely, in providing for the education of young men for the ministry, and for other useful callings, but how seldom have the claims of the other sex been acknowledged in the benefactions of the Christian public, for the endowment of schools of an equally high character in respect to scholarship, to be acquired at an equally low rate. And then, how few are the endowed scholarships for females, as compared with those which have been established for the benefit of a class of persons who by no means aspire to be regarded as the "weaker sex." Such injustice might be looked for in any land, rather than our own, where the doctrine of social and civil equality is so loudly proclaimed, and the highest distinctions in society may be reached from the humblest circumstances in life.

THE FEMALE COLLEGE, AT WORCESTER, MASS.

VIEW OF UNION DEPOT, TROY, NEW YORK.

We present a view of one of the finest railroad station buildings in the United States. It is the grand connecting terminus of several roads leading to every part of the country. The New York Central, the Rensselaer and Saratoga, the Troy and Greenbush, the Troy and Boston, the Troy and Albany, the Hudson River, the New York, Harlem, Albany and Troy, connect beneath its stupendous roof. The west side of the building consists of four suites of rooms, each suite consisting of a baggage-room, which is sub-divided, a gentlemen's room, ticket office, wash room, ladies' reception room, ladies' drawing and toilet room, and a passage to carriages. The suites of rooms are under the separate control of the Hudson River Railroad, the New York Central, the Troy and Boston, and the Rensselaer and Saratoga roads. Trains leave the station daily, the arrivals the same. There are two tracks through the building. Connected with the east side is a turn-table, and wood and water apartments. The length of the building is four hundred and four feet, its width two hundred and forty feet, and it is seventy feet in height. In the principal tower are ample refreshment rooms. The end towers have offices for railroad business. A telegraph office and a news depot is connected with the building. The building is owned by the Union Railroad Company, whose road extends from end to end of the city, each of the other roads paying for use of track and depot. The whole is under the charge of Mr. A. McCoy, superintendent, who is ever on hand to direct affairs in a manner which has rendered this station popular with the travelling community. The engraving is by Mr. Goodrich, an artist of Troy, and is a fine specimen of workmanship. Troy is favorably situated for commerce. It was incorporated as a village in 1801, and received a city charter in 1816. The population in 1855 was about 50,000.

UNION RAILROAD DEPOT, TROY, NEW YORK.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

JOY HATH ITS BURDEN.

BY BLANCHÉ D'ARBOIS.

The autumn sky is bright and fair,
Of sapphire blaze and golden light;
Dim, pearly clouds are floating there,
Like angels' dreamy robes of white,
The lofty tree-tops, crowned with gold,
Emit beneath translucent light;
While ruby garlands, climbing bold,
Suspend their gems at arrowy height.

Th' aspiring vines are nodding proud,
Their serpent coils the forest bind;
And grapes in purple clusters crowd,
Th' aroma scattered on the wind.
The forest birds—a gleesome throng—
All joyous fly from spray to spray;
Descending with a silvery song,
The limpid wave pursues its way.

And scattered o'er the gorgeous wood,
Are autumn's glorious fairy bowers—
With Jewelled Cup, and Cardinal's Hood,
And Asters' white and purple showers:
The Salidago's golden smile,
The deadly Nightshade's gorgeous dye;
While ever round them float the while,
The humming-bird and butterfly.

Th' elixir breath of ambient air
Inspires and thrills my feelings so,
I scarce can beauty's burden bear—
Pleasure 's akin to woe!
My heart is all with joy o'erpressed,
The load weighs down my spirit so:
I own 'tis not in darkest hours
We feel a load like woe.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE DEMON OF THE STEEPLE.

BY CHARLES W. MORGAN.

I was seated on a little bench, shaded from the sun, gazing in admiration at the grand cathedral. I looked in wonder at its massive columns and heavy arches, and running my eye upward contemplated in silent amazement its mighty, far-reaching spire, which, losing itself almost in the clouds, is an object of astonishment to all who look upon it. The burning sun was casting its brightest rays upon the golden symbol upon its far distant top, until it glowed like a cross of flame, pointing the way to a happier, better land.

As I bent my eyes upon it, towering so many, many feet above me, I remembered how, long years before, when as a child I had gazed on it as it blazed in the noonday sun, I had often wished that I might stand upon it, and as I, in my childish innocence imagined, overlook the world, for to me it had seemed that an object so high, as I thought among the stars, must command a view of the whole universe. Although since then years of travel had placed me on points hundreds of times as lofty, still as I kept my eyes fixed on it, and recalled the wish of my youth, the desire again came back to me to place myself there and overlook, if not all creation, at least the city and surrounding country. But I was not aware that there existed any means of reaching its apex, or if there were such facilities that travellers were ever allowed to use them, and so I supposed that I must content myself with imagining the view, instead of realizing it.

While these thoughts were passing through my mind, a movement near me attracted my attention, and looking in the direction of the sound, I saw that a lady had seated herself upon the bench quite near me and was likewise contemplating the golden cross. As I looked at her, she withdrew her attention from it and fixed her eyes on me. Large, liquid, melting eyes were they, whose effect was heightened by as beautiful a countenance as ever my sight beheld. She appeared young—not above twenty—clad in black, with curls like the raven's wing falling over her shoulders. For perhaps a quarter of a minute she looked at me in silence, then she said, in that soft, mild, indescribable voice which is so beautiful a thing in a woman:

"You would like to stand upon the cross—is it not so?"

How she had divined my wish I could not imagine, but I answered:

"Such was indeed my desire."

"I should be happy to show you the way," she said, with a sweet smile.

"And I should be but too happy to visit it under your guidance, were it not for the trouble that I should occasion you."

"The trouble is nothing, for it is my business, and I shall claim a reward for my services."

"What might it be?" I asked.

"I will tell you when we have arrived at the top," was the reply. "But come, let us hasten, for in two hours the cathedral will be closed, and the way is long and tiresome."

She arose and I followed her, wondering that I had never before seen or heard of her, and thanking my good stars that I had so angelic a guide.

We entered the cathedral, and commenced ascending a broad oaken staircase. This we followed for some time, my guide talking pleasantly all the while. Finally we halted, and she drew from her pocket a little lantern which she lighted, and we began to ascend what would otherwise have been a dark spiral, which wound up through the smaller portion of the spire. For a long, long time we went on—the stairs growing narrower and narrower—until, after reaching a part which presented but room for the passage of one at a time, and proceeding so for a dozen steps, she suddenly threw open a little door; a stream of light poured in upon us, and we found ourselves walking out on one of the arms of the cross. Although from below it had appeared not much larger than a good sized cross which a lady would hang upon her neck-lace, yet we found upon reaching it that the narrowest part of the platform—that is to say the thickness of the cross—was some six or eight feet, thus affording us a very secure resting-place.

When I stood upon it, I did not regret the labor which it had cost me to reach it. Away down beneath us stretched the mighty city, like a map, its loftiest buildings appearing like patches upon a cloth and its moving men and women as mere specks. Beyond the city limits, stretched far away the green plains and valleys, sprinkled over with ponds and rivers, which gleamed in the sun like spots and ribbons of silver, while afar off a dusky line of mountains framed in the picture. For a long while I feasted my eyes upon it, while my beautiful chaperon pointed out to me spots of interest and renown.

Finally I concluded to descend, and then remembering what my guide had said to me in regard to a recompense, I asked her what it should be. Raising herself to her full height, throwing back from her shoulders her jetty hair, and fixing full upon me her beautiful eyes, she said, in tones as melodious as a flute:

"A kiss!"

In the course of my life I have passed through many strange scenes and listened to many strange requests, but never before had I heard a more curious one than this. A young and lovely woman to put herself to all the trouble which she had done, and then to demand as payment—a kiss!

What could it mean? Were kisses then so scarce as to be thus ardently bought, or was there some hidden meaning in her reply, or did my ears deceive me? It must be the latter, thought I, and to be certain I repeated my request. The answer was the same:

"A kiss!"

Here was something which I could not solve; but if I was not able to understand it, I could at least make the required payment. What man in my situation, with all the incentives which I have before spoken of, would have hesitated a moment? I at least did not. Stepping towards her, I placed my arms about her neck and bent my head to bestow the wished-for boon. The moment I had done so I repeated, for passing her arms around me just above my hips, with the strength of a Hercules she raised me from the platform, and with two steps had reached the edge. I struggled, but in vain. In another instant, grasping me still in her arms, she had thrown herself from the dizzy height. Down, down we sped. My senses reeled, my breath forsook me, and with a force like a thunderbolt we struck the pavement, and were crushed to a bleeding, shapeless, quivering mass.

"Such," said my friend Gustave, "was the dream which last night sweetened my sleep. I am tired now, but to-morrow evening I will tell you the story which caused it, and which I had been reading in an old German book before retiring to rest. Good-night."

DESERT OF SINAI.

It is a just remark of Chevalier Bunsen, that Egypt has, properly speaking, no history. History was born on that night when Moses led forth his people from Goshen. Most fully is this felt as the traveller emerges from the valley of the Nile, the study of the Egyptian monuments, and finds himself on the broad track of the desert. In those monuments, magnificent and instructive as they are, he sees great things, and mighty deeds—the father, the son, and the children—the sacrifices, the conquests, the coronations. But there is no beginning, middle, and end of a moral progress, or even of a mournful decline. In the desert, on the contrary, the moment the green fields of Egypt recede from our view, still more when we reach the Red Sea, the further and further we advance into the desert and the mountains, we feel that everything henceforward is continuous; that there is a sustained and protracted interest, increasing more and more till it reaches its highest point in Palestine, in Jerusalem, in Calvary, and in Olivet. And in the desert of Sinai this interest is enhanced by the fact that there it stands alone. Over all the other great scenes of human history—Palestine itself, Egypt, Greece, and Italy—successive rides of great recollections have rolled, each to a certain extent obliterating the traces of the former. But in the peninsula of Sinai there is nothing to interfere from the effect of that single event. The Exodus is the one only stream of history that has passed through this wonderful region—a history which has for its background the whole magnificence of Egypt, and for its distant horizon the forms, as yet unborn, of Judaism, of Mohammedanism, of Christianity.—Portfolio.

THE MODEL STATE.

Maine being the "daughter of Massachusetts," and inheriting much of her institutions and habits, we may well take pride in the enviable position of our mother State. And certainly, if there be one State in the Union in advance of the rest in the cultivation of those great elements which tend at once to material prosperity, individual efficiency and moral and social elevation, that State is Massachusetts. Much of the credit is due to inherited advantages of situation and sagacious ancestry—but much more is owing to the persistent and energetic efforts of her citizens to elevate their community. Not an instrument of improvement is suffered to rust in idleness, but all—schools, literature, associations, lectures, presses, pulpits, everything—are kept in ceaseless activity, if not constant improvement. But her schools are, perhaps, her most cherished blessings. The twentieth report of the Board of Education, and the report of its secretary, George S. Boutwell, recently published, show that the impulse given to common school education by Horace Mann, is even now on the increase. Four normal schools—a greater number than in any other State—have been established, containing 322 scholars. The appropriations for the last year amounted to $13,000. The teachers educated in them are in constant and increasing demand, and they are gradually but surely elevating the standard of teaching in the State. Is it not time that Maine also took this step for the benefit of our teachers and schools?—Portland Advertiser.

THE VALUE OF SCIENTIFIC MEN.

To many, the scientific men of a nation seem but drones, without practical utility, trying all sorts of impracticable experiments in their laboratories, mixing acids and alkalies, and talking learnedly on subjects far removed from practical life, but doing nothing for mankind. Solomon tells us, too, of a poor wise man who delivered a city, yet no man remembered him. If there is one sign of these times more hopeful than another, it is that scientific men are, as a class, more honored than at any former period of the world's history. James Watt, who discovered the steam engine, has enabled England, with a population of twenty-five millions, to do the work that as many hundred millions of men could not have done without. It is thus that science has created the fabulous wealth of that monarchy. She is doing the same at this moment for our own country. Who can tell the value to this nation of the life of such a man? Fulton, with his steamboats, or even above him, our own glorious old Franklin, who wrested the lightning from heaven, and the sword from the hands of tyrants! Doubtless many a man, who boasted of his own great practical business powers, smiled, if in passing he marked him, with kite and key demonstrating, in this our own city, the identity of lightning and electricity, and laying the foundation thus for those electrical telegraphs now ready to convey tidings from continent to continent round the globe in an instant. Who can calculate the value of such a man as Professor Morse to the country and to the world? The scientific man, then, is of value to the community just in proportion to the amount of labor he saves to other men while producing similar results. Liebig has increased the production of all the farms in England, by applying the principles of analytic chemistry to soils, manures, and agricultural results generally—he has been worth millions of bushels of wheat already to Europe. The scientific medical men of the country have lengthened the average of life several years. The same is true of mental science. He who has a better knowledge of those laws which enable a man at once to distinguish truth from error, can write a book which will save thousands from some popular mistake, or from years of laborious thought, enabling men to form just conclusions without delay. His empire is over the mind of man. Nor is science less valuable even in matters of religion. Moral science is but a branch of this. M. Guizot, in Paris, is at this moment urging the establishment of scientific theology in that city. Natural religion is, of all sciences, the most delightful, the most practical, and the most useful. It corrects a thousand political blunders, and is, in effect, the basis of all true legislation.—Philadelphia Ledger.

MUSICAL TALENT AND MUSICAL GENIUS.

These are, of course, very different things, though it would be futile pedantry to pretend to draw the line between the two in all cases. The higher developments of talent and the lower developments of genius melt into each other imperceptibly. But there is an affluence about the musical faculty in Italy and Germany which forever distinguishes their musical developments from ours. Marie Antoinette one day asked Sacchini if Garat, a famous singer, was a good musician? "No, madam," replied the maestro, "he is music itself." These are unfamiliar names to the general reader of to-day, but Rubini is familiar enough. It is said of this truly great singer—who seized the most delicate shade of a composer's thought, and executed the most complicated passages without hesitancy; who gave orchestras and conductors less trouble than any man that ever sang in public, because his power of adaptation was so great, and the movement of his genius so swift and intuitive—that he could scarcely read a note of music. And this, in Italy, has not been a rare phenomenon. Anansi, who was Lablache's tutor at Naples, absolutely did not know a single note by book, and his pupils, when they wanted his instructions concerning a particular passage, had to sing it over to him till he had learnt it by heart! Davide the younger, Pasta, and others of smaller gift and fame, were in nearly the same predicament. Take the facts for what they point to, an amazing affluence of musical genius; it yet does not follow, necessarily, that these artists would not have been better for a due proportion of science. And it is the reproach of the English drawing-room that the majority of young ladies, who strum the piano and harp, do not know anything of a piece of music till they have played it. Mysterious contentment of ignorance! Pardonable to the splendid self-consciousness of Italian genius; disgraceful to the lazy mediocrity of British faculty. A musical performer, professional or not, should read notes like letters, and find them quite as intelligible in their combinations.—Doston Transcript.

THE OSTRICH.

The cry of the ostrich so greatly resembles that of a lion as occasionally to deceive even the natives. It is usually heard early in the morning, and at times also at night. The strength of the ostrich is enormous. A single blow from its gigantic feet (it always strikes forward) is sufficient to prostrate, nay, to kill many beasts of prey, such as the hyena, the wild hog, the jackal, and others. The ostrich is exceedingly swift of foot, under ordinary circumstances outrunning the fleetest horse. "What time she lifteth up herself on high, she scorneth the horse and his rider." On special occasions, and for a short distance, its speed is truly marvellous, perhaps not less than a mile in half a minute. Its feet appear hardly to touch the ground, and the length between each stride is not unfrequently twelve to fourteen feet. Indeed, if we are to credit the testimony of Mr. Adamson, who says he witnessed the fact in Senegal, such is the rapidity and muscular power of the ostrich, that even with two men mounted on his back, he will outstrip an English horse in speed! The ostrich, moreover, is long-winded, if I may use the expression; so that it is a work of time to exhaust the bird. The food of the ostrich, in its wild state, consists of seeds, tops, and various shrubs and other plants; but it is often difficult to conceive how it can manage to live at all, for one not unfrequently meets with it in regions apparently destitute of vegetation of any kind.—Anderson's Africa.

THE HUMAN RACE.

Dr. Hitchcock, the eminent geologist, said in a discourse delivered by him in Albany, that geological science places man among the most recent of created things. We find the surface of the earth (says Dr. H.) composed, to the depth of some eight or ten miles, of rocks. These rocks are full of the remains of animals and plants. Thirty thousand species of them, which differ from any living species, have been discovered, yet no human remains are found among them, until the loose soil—alluvium—is reached, which soil is universally acknowledged to be of recent origin. The remains of other animals are found several thousand feet below the surface, while the fossil remains of man have never been found so low as one hundred feet below the surface. But, if man had been in existence when these other animals lived, his remains would also have been found there; for his bones are of the same structure as theirs, consequently no less likely to resist destruction.—Christian Advocate.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

A SCOTTISH TALE OF THE BORDER.

BY MRS. J. D. BALDWIN.

ON the memorable 24th of July, 1745, Charles Edward, with but seven followers, landed at Loch Luncart, where he was speedily joined by the brave and powerful chiefs, Lochiel, Murray, Gordon, Keppoch, Elcho, and the Glen Berrier house of Douglas, with their retainers. Apprised of his landing, the Lowland general, Sir John Cope, at the head of a considerable army, marched against them; but just as the hostile armies met, the Lowlanders, who had shown great determination to hew down every Highlander who would presume to venture near Stirling fortress, fled ignominiously at sight of a small detachment of Lochiel's Highlanders, levelling their cross-bows at them. As they knew that the forces of Gordon and Murray were too near Edinburgh for them to dream of refuge there, Cope's gallant army galloped furiously through the city, nor slackened rein till they had prudently placed twenty miles between them and Stirling. This cowardly flight of the organized troops served but to set the example to the city guards, who, inexperienced in military duties, showed, as did a struggling body of militia, by their irresolute looks, that, should the Gordon banner hover in sight, they would not hesitate to follow Cope's example,—fling their muskets down and betake them to flight.

The confusion and horror reigning through the militia ranks were not likely, it may well be imagined, to allay the fears of the inhabitants, who with consternation in their countenances, fled for safety to the town hall, where the city magistrates and public functionaries were consulting as to the feasibility of at once opening the city gates to the Highlanders, or endeavoring to protect them to the utmost of their ability. Soon the assembled worthies were thrown into consternation by a score of burghers, who, hearing the clatter of hoofs on the pavement of the High Street, fled, shouting:

"They hae come! The Pretender an' a' the Kilties! an' we'll a' be kilt, an' Embro sacked! Och, gude sirs—surrender!"

At this piece of startling intelligence, the council, as may be supposed, were all thrown into the most lively dismay—especially as on looking from a window they descried one of their so dreaded foes urging a mettlesome charger to his utmost speed. Their panic, however, was dispelled by considering, first, that he came alone, and next, that he carried a white flag of truce in his hand. Of fine proportions, the young adjutant of Charles Edward appeared to be about twenty-four years of age. Towering in his stature above the bystanders who gathered round, as much as his noble cast of features and erect military mien were distinguishable above their less intellectual countenances, the young Colin Campbell arrived at the town hall. Springing from his pouting steed, he proceeded at once to the senate chamber, but was stopped at the door by one of the town police, who laconically observed:

"Ye canna just go in the noo," offering at the same time to be the bearer of his despatches to the magistrates.

Without further parley the young adjutant handed him a letter directed to the council, and while it was being read, occupied himself with leisurely walking up and down the hall. Huddled closely together as if for mutual protection, our worthy burghers eyed the young chief suspiciously, ever and anon making some whispered remark, as certain points in his equipment apprised them of his rank and Highland clan. His dress, rich and simple, consisted of the national tartan plaid carefully folded across the breast, displaying the green uniform of the Jacobite house of Glen Berrier, while the Campbell's crest was cut on its massive silver buttons. A richly-wrought dirk was suspended from one side of his belt, while in the other were stuck a pair of costly mounted pistols. A dusky heron's plume was looped in his blue bonnet, while the baughty crest of Glen Berrier's lordly line was blazoned on the light targe or shield that hung suspended from his shoulder.

Doubtless the requirements set forth in the letter by the Stuart, gave high offence to our council fathers, for soon murmurs of defiance against the Pretender assailed our young hero from within, while profiting by the fact of his being alone, two valorous dragoons, eager for fame, rushed upon him, hopeful to secure the noble prisoner. Well aware, however, from the stealthy looks cast at him from time to time by the two worthies, of what he might expect if taken, he made a bound, fleet as the wild deer of his native Ben Berrier, and forcing his way through the gaping throng on the steps, vaulted lightly into the saddle before any one there ventured to oppose. Drawing its glittering scimitar from its sheath, he flung it gleaming in the sun's rays in a circle round his plumed head, and shouting the Campbell's war-cry of defiance, put spurs to his horse, retraced his way through High Street with the swiftness of the lance-fly, and was out of the reach of pursuit before any one thought of it as practicable.

Difficult would it be to portray the consternation of the city fathers during the remainder of that day, or how tumultuously many a Jacobite heart throbbled during the night that followed,— suffice it that while the worthy council still deliberated with closed doors on the line of conduct advisable to adopt towards the Bruce, the gallant Lochiel put a sudden terminus to their indecision by entering Edinburgh at the head of his clan. Dire was the alarm depicted on each countenance as the burghers ran hither and thither through the streets, when the rampant lion of Scotland on her royal standard was once more unfurled to the breeze by the gallant Marquis of Tullyardine, and Charles Edward, mounted on a richly caparisoned charger, halted beneath its weltering folds, as thousands on their bended knees took the oath of allegiance.

A month had passed, and the prince, now Lord of Edinburgh, gave a sumptuous banquet in the ancestral home of the Stuart's kingly race—the palace of his fathers—Holyrood. Armed the grace and loveliness gathered there, none shone fairer than the young Isabel Seaton, who, though the daughter of a Lowland baronet, yet graced the palace as the niece of Lady Ogilby, one of the Stuart's staunchest adherents. Our young adjutant became enamored of this, the last and loveliest of the so long hated house of Seaton. The young people once introduced, met frequently after at Lady Ogilby's. But alas for their dream of hope and happiness! the shrill pipe was with its pibroch clang already summoning the clans to arms.

On a moonlit October evening, the now plighted lovers met in an adjacent park, at that time a fashionable drive and promenade, adjoining the grounds of Holyrood; but now the crowds had dispersed, and Isabel Seaton and Colin Campbell had come there to swear fidelity and part—she for her father's baronial mansion in the city—he for the rude camp at Duddingston.

"Alas, dear Colin, this must I fear be long kept a secret from my father, opposed as he is to the Jacobite cause."

"And why, Isabel? You will accompany your aunt to London, and once the bride of Colin Campbell, you will be among the foremost, as well as the loveliest, of the bright throng who will grace St. James's when the Stuart's banner floats once more above its palace and from the keep of London's Tower, where for ages it floated before. Trust me, Isabel, the fair countess of Glen Berrier's earl will be readily forgiven by her Seaton relatives."

Thus reasoned our young adjutant,—or rather, when did ever youthful lover reason! Alas for his bright dreams! the seion of the Stuart's royal race was doomed to exile—never more to ascend the throne of his fathers.

The pibroch's shrill note had summoned each its own clan,—the warlike troops who had slept over night on the ground, disturbed by the clamor, each soldier placed himself under his chief's banner, preparatory to setting forth to the gathering. At the word of command, the living mass was set in motion—plaid's fluttered and pennons streamed on the morning breeze, each bearing its chief's cognizance, making, with the waving plumes and rich habiliments of the officers, one of the most soul-stirring spectacles imaginable.

The march of a feudal army must have been an imposing sight, since, though devoid of the splendor of embroidery that a later period has given to the uniforms of the officers, still their cognizances were emblazoned on their banners and shields, while the richest dyes that the looms of France and Italy could produce, supplied the gorgeous trappings of the horses, whose housings outvied the knights' scarfs fluttering in every variety of tint on the breeze.

A beautiful sight was that battle array, as the prince's army passed proudly on towards Duddingston, for right brilliantly had war decked his rugged front with these necessities, hiding beneath crest and tinsel the murderous purpose that would else have affrighted the hearts of men. At the first encounter of the opposing forces, the Highlanders, albeit unused to the science of war, yet backed by their hardy training and independent habits, as well as sustained by their individual bravery, fell with such fury on the English that they again took refuge in flight. Again at Preston Moor and Falkirk, the prince's army were triumphantly victorious. And now a fear almost equal to that felt for his safety arose in the thoughts of Isabel Seaton, whenever the name of Colin Campbell was mentioned.

"When Charles Edward mounts the English throne, the young hero of every battle will be assuredly made a duke or a marquis, and then who may say if Campbell of Glen Berrier would care to wed with Lord Seaton's daughter?" she would say to Lady Ogilby, who less sanguine in the cause of the prince, would counsel her to wait the issue of events, ere giving way to despondency.

And well that she thus counselled. L'homme propos, Dieu dispose. Shortly after, the Highlanders, although opposed by a force greatly exceeding their own, beleaguered and took Carlisle, and penetrating on further into England, each breast beating high with hope soon to make good their entry into London, and place the royal standard of Scotland on its palaces and towers. But alas for their aspirations!—all laid low on Culloden's fatal field!

Gallantly they fought and fell—the Highland "riders of Fitz-James, stout old Glengurly, gallant Gordon, brave Lochiel,—but through the drizzling mist and rain they could not see their foe. Cumberland's cannon poured an incessant volley on the devoted, defenceless Camerons. Of Charles Edward himself, different accounts have been given. One (Scott) says that seeing his brave Highlanders cut to pieces, he gave the order to retreat, when Lord Elcho, grasping his rein, prayed him to remain, urging that it was better to perish in the melee than be shot like flying deer; but finding remonstrance useless, he said he "hoped to never see his face again;" returning to join the wreck, the remnant of the glorious array that had ranged themselves under his standard in Gleninmar's valley, swearing to conquer for the Bruce or die.

The other account, as given by Charles Edward himself, at Versailles, on the anniversary of Culloden, was, that noting the gloom on the old earl's brow, he took the muster roll from Lord Lewis, whom he despatched to the gallant Marquis of Tullyardine, and riding up to the Highland chief, said:

"Elcho, never look so gloomy; what avails a saddened brow? Heart, man, heart! We need it badly,—never as much as now!"

But alas for his hopes of England's crown!—when the black volume sundered, there, beneath the deadly battery of Cumberland, lay lord and vassal, chieftain and yeoman, all mangled together, heaped rank upon rank, on the gore-sprinkled heather,—and his tried and trusty Camerons, for the first time appalled at the sight of the superior strength of their assailants, yet with a devotion the Southrons never knew, refusing to yield, the whole Highland army was cut to pieces.

On Culloden's gory field, wounded on the battle's marge, where he had borne him as the youthful embosomed spirit of the fight, Colin Campbell had the good fortune to escape falling into the hands of the English. Tracked by Cumberland's bloodhounds, a prize set upon his head, he still, though through dangers and difficulties, conducted his prince to his father's Highland castle, not one among the sturdy peasantry of Scotland so base as to betray Charles Edward or the young chief of Glen Berrier's clan to the hated Southrons.

Many a time during the six months intervening between the disastrous battle of Culloden and Charles Edward's escape to Versailles, when tracked by Cumberland's soldiery the two took shelter in a cavern, where the blinding hail and sleet beat in their faces for hours, the only hope that re-animating the Campbell's drooping courage was that of his Isabel's truth. At last Charles Edward, aided by the old earl of Glen Berrier, escaped to France, and then the hardy iron frame of the young Highlander, that had seemed before wound up for the performance of some sacred duty, gave way, and he lay down on a sick couch, tossed by fever and anxiety, to be roused again to energy and action by the intelligence which reached him in his far off Highland home, of her approaching marriage with the Lowland commander of the English forces in Scotland, Sir Salisbury Norfolk; and though his father represented the danger to which he would be exposed in a city where he was well known, and implored him to quit Scotland for France, the old earl failed to dissuade, the more, because a report had reached them that the English government was about to proclaim an act of oblivion over all the past; and now our young adjutant resolved to revisit Edinburgh at all hazards.

Arrived at the Scottish capital, he proceeded at once to the residence of his cousin, the Earl of Breckinridge, and from him learned that Isabel Seaton was to be married that very night to Sir Salisbury Norfolk. His kinsman, the Earl of Breckinridge, was among the invited guests to the bridal, and though he, too, earnestly endeavored to dissuade him from his resolve to be present, fearing lest his recognition by any of the anti-Jacobite relatives of the bride might produce fatal results, he nevertheless seemed so determined, that the earl consented to permit him to accompany his family to the residence of Lord Seaton. Arrived there, the brilliant spectacle that our hero met, so long debarred from such splendors, was, together with his own tumultuous feelings, overpowering. Still, with his accustomed gallantry he offered his escort to his fair cousins, who noted with some surprise that he exchanged a hurried word or two with his trusty retainer, Allan Blane, who, to their mystification, was habited in the Moira livery and mounted on a splendid charger, holding a fleet and spirited jennet, caparisoned for a lady, by the bride.

Passing through the crowd at once to the decorated saloons above, no time or opportunity was given to speak of the occurrence, and once in the great reception-room where the guests awaited the coming of the bridal party, the young adjutant seemed so pre-occupied, restless and disturbed, that they forebore to question him. Soon the object of his search appeared, but no longer the sparkling, radiant Isabel Seaton of former days. Pale, very pale, was she, appearing to take no interest in what was passing around,—the sweet playfulness of her once artless, captivating graces was all gone. Watching an opportunity, young Campbell was soon by her side. A light, unseen pressure of her hand—a word in her ear, unheard by any there, and the pale cheek glowed bright and rosy as she bade her wondering bridesmaids follow, while she went to meet a dear and long-separated friend.

With much of her old captivating liveliness she led them on towards the grand entrance, none dreaming in the pale-faced officer who walked by her side, of recognizing the youthful chief who a few months before, in his national costume, had swept into a hostile city alone, and shouting his wild cry of defiance, had passed like a meteor from their sight.

For Isabel, it required all her presence of mind, all the resolution of her nature summoned to her aid, to bear her through. Pale and red by turns, her heart beat fluttering and faint as she reached the door. But a strong arm was thrown round her, and before a kinsman could stay or prevent, she was borne with arrowy speed down the broad steps and placed in the saddle; Allan Blane hung a tartan plaid over her white gown, while Colin Campbell vaulted on his own superb charger. Her mettlesome jennet had borne her far away ere her aflighted bridesmaids, returning from the hall, told that their cousin Isabel had gone off with a young officer whom none of them remembered to have ever seen before. Some there were who remembered an erect military figure passing out by her side; they all had noted his noble bearing and haughty cast of countenance, while none save Lady Ogilby thought of the eagle-eyed young warrior, whom the Seaton's all supposed had perished at Culloden.

Passing through Carlisle gate, above which were set the heads of many valiant chiefs, men of mighty names, distinguished by rank, birth and fortune, who had espoused the Jacobite cause and had met the death of traitors, Isabel shuddered and pleaded—

"O, faster—slacken not, dear Colin—faster yet, for my sake!"

But he calmed her fears, as bidding her banish all further anxiety, he added:

"They will have fleet steeds who overtake us now, Isabel!"

A month later, and Glen Berrier's earl announced to his retainers, while bonfires blazed on every crag and shouts ascended from every glen and wild defile for many miles around, that their young chief and his Lowland bride had arrived safely in France, joining the prince at Versailles.

The love of dress which springs from pure, grateful and impersonal delight in beautiful things, is very different from that which nourishes the mildew of vanity, or in any way interferes with earnest performance in life.

DERASTUS CLAPP, ESQ.

The portrait on this page was drawn expressly for our Pictorial, by Mr. Barry, from a photograph by Haywood, and is an excellent likeness of one of our most respectable fellow-citizens, whose services as a member of the police department for many years have earned him an honorable reputation in the community in which he lives, and rendered his name a terror to evil-doers. Mr. Clapp was born in Claremont, N. H., in the year 1792, but has resided in Boston since 1810. He was married in 1818, and is the father of an interesting family. He has been connected with the police for twenty-nine years, and an idea of the value of his services may be formed from the fact that he has sent a hundred and thirty-eight offenders, of his own arresting, to the State prison, and several hundreds to the house of correction, not one of whom has been unjustly dealt with. During the period referred to, Mr. Clapp has recovered many thousands of dollars of stolen money, and goods of great value. Many of those sentenced were for the offences of making and uttering counterfeit money, a most dangerous crime in a mercantile community. Mr. Clapp is now in the employ of the city as a constable, in a special and responsible department, and probably feels relieved, after so many years' hard and trying service as a detective officer, to leave the business in younger hands, though he is still ready to serve, with his experience and tact, in cases of emergency. We do not think that such services as Mr. Clapp has rendered are apt to be properly appreciated, though in his case, as we before remarked, he has succeeded in winning the respect and esteem of his fellow-citizens. Strictly honorable in all his dealings, governed by a high sense of duty and moral and religious responsibility, he is withal a kind-hearted and modest man, and while the rigid enemy of crime, full of pity and compassion for the erring. His life, if fully written out, would prove an interesting and instructive one. It would abound with proofs of extraordinary sagacity and judgment, of great reasoning and great executive power. The limited space at our disposal only permits us to record one or two instances illustrative of Mr. Clapp's mode of doing business, which occur to us as we write. About the year 1842 several hotels in this city were robbed in the night-time. On learning the fact, Mr. Clapp called at the hotels where these offences had been committed, and on examining the registers, found on each two names written in the same hand writing. Though the names were changed at different hotels, the penmanship was the same, and on each night when these names were recorded, a robbery had been committed. Our detective then gave notice to all the hotels, if two young men should apply for lodgings to accommodate them and send for him. The next night, about midnight, he was sent for to the New England House, and on his arrival recognized the same handwriting on the register as at the other hotels. The two lodgers occupied a room on the upper story, which has a long hall on each side of the bedrooms. He then procured a large clothes' horse, and hung sheets and other articles on it, forming a screen at one side of the room, behind which he and the porter of the house enconced themselves in ambush, and waited until daylight, when a lodger went down stairs, and the two young men came out of a bedroom and entered that vacated. Mr. Clapp suffered them to return to their own room, come out and enter two other rooms successively in the same manner. While in the last room, Mr. Clapp entered and arrested them. They had taken small sums of money from the rooms entered, and were found supplied with various tools to carry on their nefarious trade. Both men were sentenced to the State prison. The year previous Mr. Clapp had arrested two other culprits at Commercial Coffee House in the same way, and subsequently a man who carried on the same business in genteel boarding-houses, where he engaged lodgings for the purpose of preying on the inmates. In December, 1845, two forged bank checks to the amount of $1250, were presented at the Shawmut Bank in this city and paid. Mr. Clapp obtained information that two young men had suddenly left respectable boarding-houses in Somerset Street, and that one of them had paid an old debt of $25 with a $100 bill on the Shawmut Bank. Mr. Clapp, with an assistant, traced them to the Providence Depot, and thence to New York, and to Congress Hall, Philadelphia. Here he discovered that the two young men had left twenty minutes previous with their baggage. The hackman who had driven them away, at first refused to divulge their whereabouts, but finally revealed the place. Mr. Clapp went to the house, but not finding them in, took possession of their baggage, while his assistant was left in a livery stable near by to watch their return. In a short time two young men drove up to the stable in a buggy, answering to the description of the forgers, and were arrested on their alighting. They were taken on to Boston, and were identified. One of them was a mere lad of seventeen. The elder of the two was sentenced to the State prison for five years and the lad for two years. The former was arrested at the Winthrop House last summer and carried to Philadelphia on a charge of forgery, but escaped conviction. The lad reformed. About $300 was recovered for the bank. Subsequent inquiry revealed the fact that the counting-rooms of the merchants whose names had been forged had been broken open and a leaf of blank checks and also cancelled checks stolen. Implements were also found in the forger's room in Somerset Street for tracing and copying the names on the cancelled checks. We remember some time since conversing with Mr. Clapp on matters relating to his business, when he made the following striking remark: "Thieves are generally superstitious, and believe in lucky and unlucky days, but I have found by experience that an all-wise Providence has more to do with overreaching them in their career of crime than they are willing to admit."

DERASTUS CLAPP, ESQ.

THE HALT IN THE DESERT.

The characteristic landscape on this page represents a halt of travelling Arabs at one of those green oases, which here and there gem the sea of sand, as green islets here and there gem the expanse of ocean. To some of these the Orientals give fanciful names, as the "Diamond of the Desert," the "Coronet of the Waste," etc. Hard by a little village rears its walls and domes beneath the grateful shade of the plummy palm trees. The patient camels in the foreground are sipping with luxurious deliberation, the bright and cooling waters of the pool. The Arab with his long lance, is motioning an attendant to fill him a cup from the same source, while the latter is about removing the curiously shaped water-skin from his "Jerusalem pony," to lay in a supply of the delicious element against the long journey that yet lies before them. A group of Arabs, in their long flowing costume, are taking a little relaxation after a hard ride, in a grave stroll in the environs of the fountain. The approach to an oasis on a desert journey is hailed with as much rapture as the sight of land after a long sea voyage. The camels scent the moisture; the horses prick up their ears and snort joyously; the fatigue of the march is forgotten, and the whole party moves forward with renewed activity. Sometimes they are doomed to disappointment, for the treacherous mirage occasionally puts on the semblance of a fountain in the dreariest and driest part of the ocean of sand.

HISTORY OF CHINA IN BRIEF.

China is the most populous and ancient empire in the world. It is 1390 miles long and 1030 wide. Population from 300,000,000 to 360,000,000. The capital is Peking, with 1,000,000 inhabitants; next, Nankin, 1,000,000; and Canton, 1,000,000. China produces tea, 50,000,000 pounds of which are annually exported from Canton, the only place which foreigners are allowed to visit. Silk, cotton, rice, gold, silver, and all the necessities of life, are found in China. The arts and manufactures, in many branches, are in high perfection, but stationary, as improvements are now prohibited. The government is a despotic monarchy. Revenue, $200,000,000; army, 800,000 men. The religion is similar to Buddhism, the chief god being Foh. The Chinese inculcate the morality of Confucius, their great philosopher, who was born 550 B. C. The great wall and canal of China are among the mightiest works ever achieved by man. The foreign commerce of China amounts to some $40,000,000 annually, the whole of which is transacted with appointed agents, called "Hong merchants." Foreigners are allowed to live at certain stations, or "factories," below Canton. The chief trade is with England. The first American ship reached China in 1784; now the annual average of the United States' ships visiting China is 32. The revenue derived from foreign commerce by the emperor varies from $4,000,000 to $6,000,000. According to Mr. Duna, the opium smuggled into China, amounted to $20,000,000 annually for several years past, much of which was paid in specie, which found its way to London.—N. Y. Sunday Dispatch.

THE HALT IN THE DESERT.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL.

THE CHEAPEST WEEKLY PAPER IN THE WORLD.

MATURIN M. BALLOU, EDITOR AND PROPRIETOR.

FRANCIS A. DUHIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

M. D.—James Shirley, the English dramatist, lost all his property by the fire of London, in 1666; and both he and his wife were affected by the calamitous event, that they died of grief and terror within twenty-four hours of each other, on the 25th of October, and were buried in the same grave.

J. H. W., Utica.—We are now fully supplied with volume nine. Thank you.

J. H. L., Lowell.—Name answer as above.

T. W. M.—Flora Temple "trotted" a mile in 224 1/2; Lexington "ran" four miles in 1:10 3/4. No one believes the story that "Flying Childers" ran a mile in a minute. We do not know the quickest time made by a man in running; nor do we profess to be authority in sporting matters. A line to "Porter's Spirit," New York, would be satisfactorily answered.

B. S.—We are too fully supplied to make room for any new contributors.

J. J. Rousseau.—The department of business you refer to is already overstocked in this city.

W. M., Jr., Kenton, Cuyahoga county, Ohio.—If you will write to the publisher, Alex. Moore, Court Square, he will give you the desired information.

W. S.—The story of Hipp Van Winkle was founded on a German legend, but Irving's treatment of the theme made it entirely original.

J. U. V.—Charles Edward, the Pretender, so beautifully depicted in Scott's "Waverley," died at Rome, in 1788. The close of his life was disgraced by habitual intemperance.

ANDER.—Spiders usually have eight eyes placed on the top of the head.

TRAVELLER.—In the reign of Charles II., of England, the stage-coach which went from London to Oxford, required two days, though the distance is only fifty-eight miles.

STRUTS.—In Greece, generally, young persons were buried at break of day, or early morning twilight. The corpse was placed on a bier—or, if the deceased had been a warrior, on a large shield—and the bearers carried it on their shoulders. The procession was commonly on horseback, or in chariots; it was a token of higher respect when all went on foot.

J. V., Medford.—One of the great peculiarities of Socrates was, that he confined the attention of his pupils chiefly to moral science.

M. C. S.—Gilbert Stuart, the great American portrait painter, was born in Newport, R. I., in 1755. A daughter, Miss Jane Stuart, is now painting portraits in this city.

A. A.—The tun of Heidelberg, Germany, preserved in the vaults of the castle, is the largest wine cask in the world—its capacity being 300 hogsheads.

INVALENS.—Those who are much exposed to bright fires, as blacksmiths, glass-blowers, etc., are considered by the authorities as not subject to loss of sight from catarrh.

ANDER.—An atmospheric railway is in operation near Paris, from Nanterre to St. Germain—a distance of five miles.

ARTISAN.—Jonas Hanway, who died in 1793, was the first man who carried an umbrella in England.

P. P.—The reason assigned for the prevalence of a blue color in the sky is, that the blue rays are reflected more copiously than any of the others.

O. C.—Lewis Cass emigrated to Ohio, in 1792. He was educated at Exeter Academy, and was a classmate of Daniel Webster.

ARCHITECT, Concord, N. H.—The Fitchburg Railroad depot, in this city, is 306 feet in length, and 90 feet in width.

STUDENT.—No continuous subject can be said to run through the Koran, each chapter being in the form of a separate revelation, or treating of a peculiar matter in faith, morals or law.

THE JEWELLED TALISMAN:

—OR—

THE PURITAN AND CAVALIER.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

We shall commence in the next number of our "Pictorial" a choice and beautifully written story, especially contributed by Mrs. ORNE for our columns. It is a deeply entertaining and elegantly written production, and will delight our army of readers.

ISRAELITES.—The number of Jews in the United States exceeds a quarter of a million.

SPLINTERS.

.... An unknown disease, called for the sake of a name the brain fever, has committed great ravages near Syracuse, N. Y.

.... The postage on letters to France will be fifteen cents per quarter ounce, and doubled every additional quarter ounce.

.... An eminent merchant of this city lately presented his check for a thousand dollars to the Mercantile Library.

.... The N. Y. Churchman censures Indians for fanning themselves in warm weather during the period of divine service.

.... They are about establishing two new professorships in the Divinity School of Harvard University.

.... Henry Clay's comprehensive idea of education was this, "Learn your boy to shoot, to swim, and to tell the truth."

.... The young Prince of Wales has taken to hunting. He exhibits good English pluck and rides like a centaur.

.... "Model farming" does not appear to pay in Ireland, the model farmers being heavily out of pocket.

.... Look out for great times in Paris next May, when the emperor of Russia will pay a visit to his dear French friends.

.... The Vienna post-office authorities exclude rigorously some of the best papers in Europe, including the London Daily News.

.... Not to love Béranger is to disdain France; not to be touched by his verse is to be neither man nor woman.

.... Seven is the number of perfection, because it contains three and four, the triangle and the square by which all things are gauged.

.... David Hill has presented the skeleton of his famous horse Black Hawk to the Boston Veterinary College.

.... The splendid theatre in Santiago, Chili, is nearly completed. It will be one of the finest in the world.

.... A party of hunters claim to have discovered another wild woman in the mountains six miles south of Linden, Alabama.

.... Seventy years ago was a very hard winter, and the people of Nantucket had to pay fifty dollars a cord for wood.

.... Street-sweeping machines are now in operation in Cincinnati; we don't allude to ladies' dresses.

.... Mollie Jennings lately died in Pittsylvania county, Va., at the age of one hundred and seven years.

.... Old Thomas Decker, a contemporary with Shakespeare, writes "we ne'er are angels till our passions die."

.... What did the allied nations of Europe exile Napoleon the First for? In order to give him Elba room.

.... Thackeray is so busily and profitably employed with lecturing that he has postponed the publication of his novel.

ALL'S NOT GOLD THAT GLITTERS.

We were reading the other day the story of a very sharp rogue who left France, his native country, for his country's good, and, somewhere in the East, found another rogue who had stolen a priceless diamond from his master, who dreaded detection, and was ready to get rid of his ill-gotten booty for a comparatively trifling sum. Of course, the first rogue eagerly snapped at the bargain, parted with all his money and with everything he could sell, to satisfy the thief, and returned to Paris, satisfied that he had made his fortune. He was in despair when the first jeweller he applied to assured him that he could hardly afford to give him twenty-five cents for his bit of glass, although it was a very fine specimen.

Now we laugh at the idea of a sharper being so cleverly taken in, but the rogue was not much worse than the rest of the world. With daily recurring proofs that "all that glitters is not gold," ninety-nine hundredths of men and women still persist in trusting to appearances. A man is taken up for stealing, and even hardened and experienced police reporters record with marvelling comment that "he was fashionably dressed." They are actually astonished that there are rogues in broadcloth. "The dress makes not the monk," says an old French proverb; and every nation has its store of proverbial warnings against deceptive appearances, but still the world is no wiser for all that. And still biographers will write of their lowly-sprung heroes, "born of poor but honest parents."

"Poor but honest!" Ay, we are still the dupes of the external; we still suffer our eyes to cheat us. We believe almost any story that comes from the lips of a man who has a fashionable tailor for his patron or victim. We still believe that virtue is necessarily resident in superlative broadcloth, in velvet, in satin or in moire antique. If a cup is treble gilt, we are ready to swear it is made of the purest virgin gold, though the material may be the basest copper. For aught we can see, people are just as fond of being cheated now-days as in the times of Butler, and just as ready to run after "wild women," and "no-haired horses," and "Feejee mermaids," or any other monstrosity, as in the days of Shakespeare. Only the other day, a vulgar woman, who made a profession of divinity, attracted quite a respectable congregation in Philadelphia, and it was only a few years since that Matthias, the false prophet, flourished. And has not Mormonism founded an empire in the West? We must humble ourselves in view of the rampant success of every glittering, gilded humbug.

STEREOTYPED SAYINGS.

A good thing never dies—is never worn out. Scraps of eloquence are handed down from generation to generation, and are attributed successively to a series of great men, being fresh and good as new whenever they turn up. Cambroge, who headed the imperial guard at Waterloo, is reported to have said, when summoned to lay down his arms, "The guard dies—it does not surrender,"—a very pretty and pithy speech. The next time it turned up in history it was attributed to General Taylor in reply to an invitation on the part of Santa Anna to capitulate. So also on the bloody field of Buena Vista, according to the reporters, Old Zack, when asked by Santa Anna to give up his arms, replied, "Come and take them!"—a remark made under similar circumstances by a Spartan gentleman centuries before. Taylor was as brave as any Spartan, and it was a libel on the straight-forward old soldier to accuse him of cribbing all the smart sayings made by or invented for all his predecessors in arms. But there is a vitality in such speeches that will always "keep them before the public."

THE END OF THE WORLD.—We believe the world will last several years to come, but a couple of European astronomers are at loggerheads about the effect of a comet which is to come into collision with the earth on the 13th of June next. One says it will burn us up, and the other that we shall go through it without scorching a feather. However, in a few weeks we shall see, as Father Ritchie used to say in French.

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.—There are many of our distant readers and subscribers who have never seen a copy of our popular weekly journal, as above. If any one desires a sample, full of choice original reading, they have only to drop us a line to that effect, and a copy will be sent by return of mail, free of charge.

NEW YORK QUARANTINE.—The removal of the Quarantine from Staten Island meets with many opponents, chiefly on the ground of the expense of a change. We should think no one would reckon the cost after the sad experience of last summer.

WOMAN'S RIGHTS.—A young lady, whose father is quite well off, lately visited Louisville with a load of wood, sold it, pocketed the cash, and drove her team home, singing, "Pop goes the weasel!"

ANOTHER.—Two Indians of Louisville, who have had a difficulty with each other, talk of settling it with "pistols and coffee for two."

A HOLLOW FOUNDATION.—Abingdon, Va., is built over a huge cave, a new entrance to which, thirty feet deep, was opened by a late thaw.

LEAP YEAR.—Leap year was quite successful in England, showing a large increase in the number of marriages.

CHINA COAL.—Coal is so cheap in China that they ship it to San Francisco.

DOCTORS AND DOCTORING.

How we abuse the medical fraternity when we are well! How superciliously we glance at the red and blue and yellow jars in the apothecary's windows, and sneer at the leeches that cling to the sides of the great glass bottles! How sportively we allude to the partnership between the M. D. and the funeral undertaker! And yet how instantly do our choice anecdotes from Le Sage and Moliere, our allusions to Dr. Sangrado and Siganarelle vanish from our memory the moment that a bodily ailment lays us at the mercy of allopathy, homoeopathy, hydropathy, or whatever genteel mode of assassination we select! With what veneration do we then regard the gold spectacles of the silver-haired practitioner, or the flourishing whiskers and moustaches of the young disciple of the healing art fresh from the schools of Paris, where perhaps he has been pursuing his studies at the Chateau des Fleurs or the Mabilles! We believe in doctors and doctoring when we cannot do without them. Restored health reproduces our incredulity.

But save us from falling sick in the East. According to Mr. Caspary, and he is confirmed by others conversant with the subject, the Oriental physicians are the greatest quacks in the world. Take the following specimen of their profundity:—An emir, supposed to have the hereditary gift of healing, prescribed for a patient, an upholsterer, lying at death's door with the typhus fever. The next day he called to see his patient and found, to his astonishment, for he had given him up, that he was much better. On inquiring into the particulars, the convalescent told the emir that, being consumed with thirst, he had drank a pailful of the juice of pickled cabbage! "Allah is great!" cried the emir, and down went the fact on his tablets. The doctor was soon after called upon to attend another patient, a dealer in embroidered handkerchiefs, who was ill of the same disease—typhus fever. Of course he prescribed a pailful of pickled cabbage juice. The next day he learned that the sufferer was dead. Whereupon he made the following entry in his books: "Although, in cases of typhus fever, pickled cabbage juice is an efficient remedy, it must in no case be used, unless the patient is an upholsterer." It was evident to the Eastern sage, that his second patient died because it was his misfortune to deal in handkerchiefs instead of sofa coverings.

LARGE GIFT.—It is reported that the emperor of France has bestowed ninety-four thousand dollars on the widow of Mr. Charles Morey, the American who was shot by a sentinel at the debtor's prison in Paris.

NEW ARTICLE OF FOOD.—It is said that a process has been discovered in Germany for removing the bitter taste from horse-chestnuts and rendering them palatable and nutritive.

VESTALI.—"Vestali, the magnificent," has been winning laurels and gold in Havana. She received many splendid presents from her admirers there.

MORMONISM.—Jedediah M. Grant, a leading man among the Mormons, died lately, leaving seven disconsolate widows.

HEAVY IMPORT.—In one month, over eleven millions dollars' worth of dry goods was imported into New York.

MARRIAGES.

In this city, by Rev. Dr. Stow, Mr. Joseph Webb to Miss Margaret Flynn; by Rev. Mr. Gaylord, Mr. John W. Bartlett to Miss Susan C. Rutrick; by Rev. Mr. Sargent, Mr. Wilmoit Wilson to Mrs. Nancy Curby; by Rev. Mr. Chapin, Mr. William W. McField to Miss Mary J. Morris; by Rev. Mr. Stow, Mr. Hans Jenson to Miss Margaret Givens;—At Cambridgeport, by Rev. Mr. Ware, Mr. Frank E. Crane to Miss Sarah F. Whitney;—At Woburn, by Rev. Mr. Hill, Mr. William H. Pattee, of West Cambridge, to Miss Frances H. Grant;—At Lexington, by Rev. Mr. Crafts, Mr. Addison S. Bass, of Boston, to Miss Hannah H. Hoppin, of East Lexington;—At Lynn, by Rev. Mr. Jewell, Mr. Augustus A. Oliver to Miss Abba J. Lewis;—At Salem, by Rev. Mr. Carlton, Mr. William Harrison to Miss Mary Ann McVullen;—At Lowell, by Rev. Dr. Cleveland, Mr. Henry P. Carlee to Miss Mary Abbie Denola;—At Gloucester, by Rev. Mr. Mellen, Mr. David Mackay to Miss Mary White;—At Newburyport, by Rev. Mr. Campbell, Mr. Benjamin A. Thurlow to Miss Mary J. Lattime;—At Salisbury, by Rev. Mr. Mason, Mr. Robert Davidson to Miss Julia Thompson;—At Taunton, by Rev. Mr. Baylies, Mr. Philander D. Chase to Miss Hannah J. Lee;—At Washington, D. C., by Rev. Dr. De Witt, Mr. John Wright, of Boston, to Miss Julia L. Hubbard;—At Cleveland, Ohio, Mr. Simon Murphy, of Boston, to Miss Rosannah Farrell.

DEATHS.

In this city, Mr. Charles E. Goddard, 31, formerly of Hingham, N. H.; Mrs. Sarah A. Stevens, 82; Mrs. Sarah Gray, 91; Mrs. Eliza Smith, 65; Mr. Leonard Doutham, Jr., a member of the senior class of Harvard University, 16; Mr. James C. Rogers, 46, Mrs. Rebecca Denton, 82; at Deer Island, Mr. William E. Bird, 63, formerly of Gloucester;—At South Boston, Mr. Thomas C. Stuart, 24;—At Dorchester, Mr. Jonathan Wheeler, 66;—At Newton Centre, Miss Catherine H. Rolle, 24;—At Quincy, Mr. Charles Hardwick, 86;—At Lynn, Mrs. Sally Rowell, 74;—At Salem, Mr. Isaac Walden, 57;—At North Abington, Mr. David Orritt, 85;—At Haverhill, Mrs. Susan R. Duran, 20;—At North Billerica, Mr. Cyrus Rogers, 57;—At Beverly, Mrs. Louisa Kilham, 71;—At Middleboro', Mr. Charles Swift, 65;—At Gloucester, Mr. James H. Bride, of Lancaster, 34;—At Taunton, Mr. Leonard Kim, 79;—At Worcester, Mr. Luther M. Hunt, 47;—At Springfield, Mr. Joseph Stephens, 82;—At North Dartmouth, Mr. Durfee Trapp, 75;—At New Bedford, Mrs. Mary A. Cook, 44;—At Henniker, N. H., Deacon Oliver Pillsbury, 73;—At Portland, Maine, Mr. Edward Motley, 74, formerly of Boston;—At Freeport, Maine, Dr. John A. Hyde, a native of Rehoboth, Mass., 85;—At Portsmouth, Ohio, Col. Henry F. Baker, of Cincinnati, late of Boston, 69;—At St. Louis, Mo., Mr. William H. Quinn, a native of Boston, 19.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL DRAWING-ROOM COMPANION.

A Record of the beautiful and useful in Art.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE.

|                             |        |
|-----------------------------|--------|
| 1 subscriber, one year..... | $3 00 |
| 4 subscribers " " " " " "   | 10 00  |
| 10 " " " " " " " "          | 20 00  |

Any person sending us twelve subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the thirtieth copy gratis.

* * * One copy of BALLOU'S PICTORIAL, and one copy of THE FLAG OF OUR UNION, when taken together by one person, one year, for $4.

Published every SATURDAY, by
M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

WITHERED LEAVES.

BY E. A. GOULD.

One breath from Autumn's chilly lips,
One touch from his cold, icy hand,
And Spring's sweet beauty, Summer flowers,
Lie faded, withering, o'er the land.

But, in these faded, withered leaves,
We may a twofold lesson read;
The end of all our hopes and aims,
In this poor life of pain and need.

Still more, these have behind them left
The choicest sweets of their best days,
The essence of their noonday pride,
To live and shine with richer rays.

Ay, well for us, when death's cold hand
Has laid us low within the dust,
If generous acts and noble deeds
Still live in hearts we've learned to trust.

MORNING.

Magnificent
The morning rose, in memorable pomp,
Glorious as ever I had beheld—in front,
The sea lay laughing at a distance; near
The solid mountains shone, bright as the clouds,
Grain-flecked, drenched in empyrean light;
And in the meadows and the lower grounds
Was all the sweetness of a common dawn—
Dews, vapors, and the melody of birds,
And laborers going forth to till the fields.—WORDSWORTH.

KINDNESS.

There is a golden chord of sympathy
Fixed in the harp of every human soul,
Which by the breath of kindness when 'tis swept,
Wakes angel melodies in savage hearts;
Induces rose chastisements for treasured wrong,
And melts the ice of hate to streams of love;
Nor aught but kindness that fine chord can touch.—D. K. LEE.

MODESTY.

Modesty's the charm
That coldest hearts can quickest warm;
Which all our best affection gains,
And gaining ever still retains.—J. K. PAULING.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

The streets will soon resound again with the tones of drum and life, and be enlivened with the parades of our fine military companies. During the past season, while "tired of war's alarms," our citizen soldiers have indulged in social pleasures, and, among other fetes, the "Tigers' Ball," in Music Hall, has left many agreeable memories. . . . The utmost respect was paid in Havana to the memory of the lamented Dr. Kane. The captain-general, Coneha, and a brilliant staff, were present at the translation of the remains on shipboard. . . . Dr. Karl Muehler, of Berlin, who began authorship at sixteen, lately died at ninety-four—a proof that a life devoted to the muses may be spun out in a thread of great length. . . . Messrs. Little, Brown & Co. regularly import one thousand copies of the Edinburgh Encyclopedia, the total money value of which, at the completion of the work, will be $111,500, as they are $115 50. . . . "Two perspective painters," says an ingenious writer, "lead us poor, bewitched mortals through the whole theatre of life, and they are Memory and Hope. . . . The New York Picaresque says, that the essence of the correspondence between Secretary Davis and Gen. Scott is, 'you're another.' . . . A dead dog reminds an inveterate joker of a shipwreck—'a bark lost forever.' . . . In New York, they call daggers and revolvers 'street jewelry.' . . . There is nothing like courage in misfortune. Next to faith in God and in his overruling providence, a man's faith in himself is his salvation. . . . Ruffians steal children in New York city for the sake of obtaining the rewards offered. Some of these kidnappers frequently get a hundred dollars for the restoration of a child. We used to think such atrocities were only committed by playwrights and novelists. . . . Benjamin Hardridge is the man who professes to have discovered the means of liquifying quartz rock, so that he extracts every particle of gold at the rate of fifteen tons a day. Truly this is an age of wonders. . . . The stories that the wheat crop has been ruined by the late winter are all moonshine. . . . In France, suffrage is free; but the government agents are the only vote distributors, and you have to take whatever ballot is handed you by these myrmidons of imperial tyranny. . . . The Watchman and Redactor has lately contained some very brilliant letters from a Parisian correspondent. Who is he? He is too fine a writer to remain any longer under the mask and domino of an anonymous writer. . . . We wonder if it is true, as the Post asserts, that a Cape Cod captain has set up as a rival of Agassiz, is lecturing on ichthyology, and illustrates by a dried codfish. . . . The newest foreign prima donna imported to this country is Madame Marietta Gazzinga, who made her first appearance at the fine new opera house in Philadelphia. She is not handsome, but has a powerful and sweet soprano voice. . . . Our opinion of Mrs. MacMahon, the Fifth Avenue actress, is, that if she had appeared as a novice, without extraordinary pretensions, her performances would have been regarded as tolerably good. She has great defects of voice, pronunciation and gesture; but the two latter are remediable—and who can possibly have a worse voice than Macready? It is a gratuitous insult to say positively that she can never make a distinguished actress. We have seen many deplorable "sticks" grow up to eminence and popularity. . . . The first settlement of Abington commenced about the year 1668. Its Indian name was Manasookseag, which signifies "many beavers." . . . For any man to pretend to write nothing but what is absolutely original in thought and expression, the Philadelphia Ledger thinks, would be absurd. An idea is scarcely ever perfected by the man who first conceived it. So it is with mechanical inventions. . . . David C. Broderick, the new senator from California, is a New Yorker by birth, and formerly a very popular member of the New York fire department. . . . Cater, who murdered Warden Tenny, of the Charleston State Prison, has exhibited no sign of remorse or repentance. He is a thoroughly hardened criminal. . . . It is stated that there are six hundred superseded or interdicted priests now in or near Paris, and many of them in a state of destitution. . . . Naples is still in a very uneasy state. If King Bomba is not very careful, before a great while the people will take away his pretty playthings—the crown and sceptre. . . . Isn't it rather singular that mineral waters are only beneficial to the wealthy classes? In all our experience, we never knew a physician to advise a poor man to go to Saratoga, or any other watering-place. . . . The police of the city of Baltimore are now all uniformed. This practice will soon be generally adopted. . . . The fishing business along our coast has commenced briskly. . . . A generous dry goods dealer in New Haven offers to take Spanish quarters at twenty-six cents each, so that benevolence has not entirely deserted this sublunary sphere. . . . The lands occupied by the old Marine Hospital at Chelsea, will be on sale about the 18th of May. It is expected they will yield more than enough to pay for the new hospital. . . . The quantity of maple sugar manufactured this year has been enormous, the season having been particularly favorable. . . . A sloop of about thirty tons, designed and built by convicts, has lately been launched at the penitentiary, Wetumpka, Alabama. . . . Sir David Beard's mother, hearing her son was taken prisoner in India, and chained to another prisoner, replied that she "pitied the man David was chained to." . . . Capital punishment has been restored in Rhode Island. . . . Gas costs but 38 cents per thousand cubic feet in London and Liverpool; here it averages $2 50 per thousand. Can't it be afforded a little cheaper? . . . Dr. Johnson compared plaintiff and defendant in an action at law to two men ducking their heads in buckets, and daring each other to remain longest under water. . . . A man in Michigan has invented a machine for shearing sheep. He is said to be a retired lawyer's clerk. . . . The Catholics are about to erect a new church on Walnut Street, Salem, at a cost of $25,000 or $30,000. The latter sum will build a very handsome edifice. . . . A bill is before the Louisiana legislature allowing a man to take a $8 newspaper at the expense of the State. If it passes, we shall have to increase the edition of our Pictorial. . . . One of the ancient historians, in describing the martyrdom of Michael Servetus, says:—"He was upwards of two hours in the fire, the wood being green, little in quantity, and the wind unfavorable." The small quantity of wood was an added atrocity—bigots who burn, should at least be unsparing of fuel. . . . Mr. Buchanan's niece, Miss Lane, will do the honors of the White House. . . . The English word wig, is derived from the Latin—pilus (a hair). Latin, pilus; Spanish, pelo—thence peluca; French, perruque; Dutch, peruk; English, perwick, perwig, periwig; and, by contraction, wig. . . . Lavater says, "Never make that man your friend who hates music or the laugh of a child." . . . Rossini, the composer, made a vow never to enter a railroad car, and he has kept it. He travels by horse power entirely. . . . Lord Byron observing one day to Rogers that punning was the lowest kind of wit—"Indeed," said Rogers, "it is the foundation." . . . Hood gives this graphic picture of an irritable man:—"He lies like a hedgehog rolled up the wrong way, tormenting himself with his own prickles." . . . What we commonly call a falling star, is believed by the Arabs to be a dart launched by the Almighty at an evil genius; and on beholding one, they exclaim, "May God transfix the enemy of the faith!" . . . Miss Adelaide Phillips is a great pet with Boston folks. Well, she certainly should be, for this is her home. . . . Have you seen the new paper, "The Weekly Novelties?" It's a sprightly little craft. Step into the nearest periodical depot and get a copy for four cents. . . . Mrs. Frances Ann Kemple created a perfect furor by her dramatic readings in Boston. She is unequalled in this line on either side of the Atlantic. . . . Mr. Bland, of New Orleans, has discovered a mode of making hemp from the common cotton stalk, that it is said will enable us to dispense with importations of foreign hemp. If this is true, it is an important matter. . . . Somebody says that there is a decided difference between perseverance and obstinacy. One is a strong will, and the other is a strong wont. . . . An advertisement announces "For sale, an excellent young horse—would suit any timid lady or gentleman, with a long silver tail." . . . The Frenchman eats roast horse, the Chinaman eats roast rat, and the New Zealander eats roast missionary. . . . "Live virtuously, my lord," said Lady Russell, "and you cannot die too soon, nor live too long." . . . There is about twenty-one and a half million dollars in the United States treasury. We forget how many times the country has been "ruined." . . . What is the difference between a cashier and a schoolmaster? One fills the mind, and the other minds the till. . . . The Chinese word for eyelid is eminently beautiful, signifying the cradle of tears. . . . George Peabody, Esq. has given $300,000 to the city of Baltimore, to establish an institute in that city, with the general objects of moral and intellectual culture. . . . You know as well as we do, that owls look wiser than eagles, and many a sheep skin passes for chamois. . . . "If Thalberg makes such music when he is only playing," said a lady, the other day, "what must he do when he sets himself at work?" . . . A house in St. Louis lately received $1000 through the post-office, with the remark that "the sum belonged to them." Ah, "conscience makes cowards of us all!" . . . The experiment of raising tea in South Carolina proves to be a failure. The tea grows well enough; but to pick it, roll it up, and dry it—all of which must be done by hand—can only be done in China, where wages are one dollar a month and board yourself. . . . Mr. Neafie, the favorite American actor, is now playing with distinguished success in New Orleans, where he is a great favorite. . . . The man who "shot at random" did not hit it. He has since lent his rifle to the youth who aimed at immortality. . . . It is a curious fact that Girard College turned out, last year, more lads to follow the business of printing than any other class. Nineteen pupils have taken to the types, and twelve have prepared themselves to become farmers. . . . An exchange says, that restless and crying infants may frequently be relieved and quieted by a draught of cold water. Who knows but this simple agent might profitably supersede both spanking and paregoric? . . . In turning over the pages of one of our exchanges, the Commercial Advertiser, Hawaiian Islands, we see one of our American circus companies announced as playing there, and read the name of William Franklin, the daring rider. . . . The medical attendant of Miss Harriet Martineau, the authoress, writes that she has been unable, in consequence of very severe illness, to go beyond the porch of her house during the last fifteen months. . . . A doctor advertises, in a country paper, that "Whoever uses the Vegetable Compound Universal Anti-Purging Aromatic Pills once, will not have cause to use them again." We rather think they would. . . . A foolish young chap, only nineteen, threw himself into the East River, New York, and was drowned, because a worthless girl jilted him. She was not even respectable. . . . Charles Lamb quaintly remarked, that he was naturally shy of novelties—new books—new faces—new years. He ascribed this feeling to a mental twist, which made it difficult in him to face the perspective. . . . Gambling is a vice that consumes the gambler. It is the first vice of boys at school who gamble for marbles—it is the vice of men who gamble for thousands of dollars. The passion commences with marbles, and ends with bank notes. . . . Cypress Hills cemetery, seven miles from Williamsburg, L. I., equals Greenwood in beauty of natural scenery.

ANECDOTE OF JOHN RANDOLPH.

All who have read the life of this great man will remember the great importance he attached to correct pronunciation. His biographer, Mr. Garland, records the fact of his correcting Dr. Parish twice in his manner of pronouncing words, while the doctor was reading him a short article the day before his death; and that when the doctor hesitated about adopting Mr. Randolph's mode of pronunciation, the dying man exclaimed, in his usual impatient and absolute manner:—"Pass on, sir—pass on; there can be no doubt of it!" This had seemed to me to be slightly colored by the biographer; but the accompanying incident convinced me that it was but "the ruling passion strong in death." When Tazewell was at the zenith of his fame, on one occasion he made a speech at the bar, far surpassing even himself in eloquence. On finishing, Randolph approached him, and complained bitterly, with an oath, that it was fated that nothing human should be perfect. Tazewell, who was receiving impassioned congratulations from his friends, asked Randolph what he meant. His questioner, with all his usual acerbity, indignantly demanded, "Why did you not say 'hor-i-zon,' instead of 'hor-izon'?" Were it not for that barbarism, there would have been one perfect production."—Life Illustrated.

Choice Miscellany.

THE LOST CHILD.

After the taking of the Malakoff, a sergeant of Zouaves conducted, in the absence of officers (they had all fallen from the shot from the ramparts), that which remained of his company through the half ruined streets of Sebastopol. As the Russians, in retreating towards the bridge which joins the two parts of the city, rained bullets from their ranks, the detachment sheltered itself behind a house, which its inhabitants, full of confidence in the defensive Russian forces, had just quitted. A terrible cry was heard on the first story. The sergeant entered, and saw a woman covered with blood, dead, and an infant in her arms. To take the innocent creature—to carry it where the firing came not, this was for our brave sergeant the affair of some seconds. The orphan was confined to the Vivandiers, who took the best of care of him; afterwards he was brought from Sebastopol to Marseilles, then from Marseilles to Paris.

Shortly since, an unknown lady, clothed in mourning, and accompanied by an old man, descended from her carriage at the Barracks Pepiniere. She asked for Sergeant B—; they told her that he was now first lieutenant, and gave her his address. On entering the modest apartment of the officer, the young lady fell fainting on a chair—she saw, playing about the room, the child whom she had lost at Sebastopol. Lieutenant B— related simply his conduct, returned with emotion the child to his mother, asking, as his sole recompense, permission to see and embrace him from time to time. To-day the hotel of the Countess C— is as full of joy as it was sombre with melancholy. The brave lieutenant is received, not as a visitor, but as a benefactor, by the young widow. Perhaps other ties will consecrate that paternity of courage and of disinterestedness.—Evening Gazette.

BOSTON BEFORE AND AFTER THE REVOLUTION.

Long previous to the Revolution in America, I had repeatedly visited Boston. What a strange contrast after an absence of more than thirty years. In 1763, '64 and '65, from sunrise to sunset, on Sundays, no person was permitted to go from house to house, or walk the street, except going to or from a place of worship, without being liable to a fine or exposure in the public stocks. When the old and young people walked out on Long Wharf, to enjoy the cool air on summer evenings, so prim and demure were the young women, that it was jokingly said, before they walked out they were obliged to stand before a looking-glass, to fold their arms properly, and put their mouths in serious plaits, from out of which they were not to be disturbed until their return; and truly, they moved more like automata than animated beings. In 1794, I found a Roman Catholic chapel freely tolerated, and was entertained in a handsome, crowded theatre; two circumstances which if I had ventured to predict when I first knew the place, I should have run some risk of being tarred and feathered. Not a Jew was able to live there some time previous to the Revolution. Now there is an abundance, with every species of accommodation, bad as well as good, equal to any that can be found in the seaports and cities of Europe. In the market, the difference was this—pigeons, that sold at twopence half-penny a dozen, and often given away at the close of the market, sold in 1794 from two shillings and sixpence to three shillings a dozen. Beef and mutton, that I have known sold at three half pence and twopence, were sold from seven pence to ten pence a pound, with every other article of provision in proportion.—Lieut. Harriot's Struggles through Life.

SCIENTIFIC FACTS.

The London Lancet says, that there are a quarter million of persons living in Great Britain constantly under ground in the darkness of mines. The average age of Sheffield workmen is thirty-five years; the average of the dry grinders of needles very much under this figure. The chief disease among tailors is fistula; among bakers, scrofula and skin diseases. The latter may prevent the flour insects and weevils from irritating the skin of their hands by rubbing them with oil. The most dangerous part of the painter's trade is "flattening;" white lead, turpentine and closely-heated rooms generate colic. The remedy is sulphuric acid, cleanliness, tubs of fresh water, and fresh air; and, as an antidote, the more frequent use of white zinc or zinc lead. In the manufacture of lucifer matches, heated or allotropic phosphorus is said to be not so dangerous to the jawbones as ordinary phosphorus.

New Publications.

THE MORAL PHILOSOPHY OF COURTSHIP AND MARRIAGE. Boston: John P. Jewett & Co. 1857.

This work is designed as a companion to the "Physiology of Marriage," by the same author and publishers, and its views are generally sound and valuable.

ARCTIC EXPLORATIONS AND DISCOVERIES OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY. Compiled by S. M. SMUCHER. New York and Auburn: Miller, Orton & Co. 1857. 12mo. pp. 517.

This work gives a succinct account of the various English and American Arctic expeditions to the present time, and embodies many interesting and important facts. For sale by Sanborn, Carter & Bazin.

SCAMPATIAS, FROM GIBEL TURK TO STAMBOUL. By HARRY GRINGO (Lieut. Wise, U. S. N.). New York: Chas. Scribner. 1857. 12mo. pp. 332.

"Los Gringos," and "Tales for the Marines," by the same author, gave him an enviable literary reputation, which will be much increased by the present work. The style of these sketches is racy and brilliant, permeated by a vein of pleasant humor. We have some fine scenery-painting, some vivid historical sketches, and a little dash of antiquarianism. We predict for this pleasant book a success on both sides of the Atlantic. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

AMERICAN GENTLEMEN'S OUTFIT TO POLTENESE AND FASHION. By HENRY LUNETTES. New York: Derby & Jackson. 1857. 12mo. pp. 479.

This is a very peculiar book, and interesting to all who believe that "manners make the man." Its rules for etiquette are illustrated by sketches and anecdotes of distinguished persons. Some of its dicta will excite discussion. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

THE STAR AND THE CLOUD; OR, A Daughter's Love. By A. S. ROE. New York: Derby & Jackson. 1857. 12mo. pp. 410.

A pretty title predisposes the reader in favor of this work, and an acquaintance with its contents amply rewards perusal. It is really a charming story. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

NEW MUSIC.—From Oliver Ditson we have received the "Song of the Brook," from Tennyson's "Maud," "The Blue Bird Schottische," "The Mother," and the "Rose Redowa."

EXAMPLES FROM THE EIGHTEENTH AND NINETEENTH CENTURIES. By Mrs. S. GOSWORTHY. New York: Charles Scribner. 1857. 13mo. pp. 319. These "examples" embrace sixteen well written biographical sketches of the gifted and good of this and the preceding century. It is an admirable book to place in the hands of the young, being both agreeable and instructive. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

Editorial Melange.

The product of maple sugar this year bids fair to be large, as well from the favorable weather as from the high price to which southern sugar has brought it. The farmers are even now making ready for the flow of sap, and it is altogether probable that a greater quantity of sugar will be made than during many years past.—The Pennsylvania Legislature have granted a divorce in a case where the contracting parties, after a mutual hunter, went from a party to a clergyman and got married, thinking it an excellent joke.—John B. Gough, at the close of a lecture delivered by him in Chicago, lately, was presented with a beautiful casket filled with gold coin, and a rich elaborate vase, the whole cost of the testimonial being $500. The presentation was made by Rev. Mr. Curtis, in behalf of "two hundred ladies" of that city.—The Broadway Tabernacle property in New York has been sold at private sale for $122,000 cash. The Society intend to build a new church edifice up town.—By the new coinage bill, as passed, for two years Spanish coins are to be received at the mint at their nominal value, to be paid in the new one cent pieces, made of nickel and copper. The Spanish coins, accordingly, will be worth their full value in cents, and we hope that people will no longer submit to be fleeced out of five cents on every Spanish quarter they have occasion to pay out.—Five men sentenced to the Michigan state prison for life, for the crime of murder, recently made their escape from that institution.—A blind man, led by a dog, while wandering in the streets of Paris, had his dog seized by some one passing; instantly opening his eyes, he gave chase, and overtaking the thief, cudgelled him severely, after which he closed his eyes, and fell to begging again.—It has been decided by a Western court that a clergyman may marry himself. This is a fee-saving process, at all events.—In a late English paper, it is stated that "many prayer-books are now sold in London with a looking-glass inserted in the inner side of the cover, in order that ladies may arrange their hair or admire themselves while using the book at church."—Thirty members of the Massachusetts Legislature were born in New Hampshire.—A reporter of the New York Tribune, who recently visited the witches of that city, found a distinguished clairvoyant who was quite dependent upon leading questions. He accordingly drew out of her by skillful induction this important information:—"Minnesota Territory is a small town situated 911 miles southeast of the Mississippi River; its officers are a chief cook and twenty-three high privates, besides the younger brother of our reporter, who is the mayor of the territory, and whose principal business it is to keep the American flag at half mast, upside down."—It is stated that nine out of ten of losses by mail, so far, have been registered letters, and in no instance has one of them been traced up.—A few days ago, some thief broke into the stable of the Bedford Springs Hotel, and stole the celebrated horse Dick Turpin, belonging to Dr. W. R. Hayden, of Boston. The thief mounted Dick, and rode about a mile, when the horse, thinking the thief had rode far enough, landed him gently on the roadside and returned home.—Ex-Governor Clark, of New York, during his two years' term of office, granted 530 pardons to convicted criminals.—Charles W. Harriger, a handsome, romantic and foolish young man of eighteen, who recently lived at Columbus, Ohio, took a dose of strychnine, because a flirting buck-eye girl wouldn't dance with him at a ball, and died in two hours. He had previously consulted a fortune-teller, who predicted that he would live but a short time.—The assessed value of taxable property in Pennsylvania is $566,810,278, of which $493,862,765 is real estate, and $28,835,945 personal property.—The loss occasioned by the burning of the missionary buildings of the American Presbyterian Board in Canton, during the recent bombardment of that city by the British fleet, is estimated at over $3000, including the individual losses of the missionaries.

LOCKS AT A PREMIUM.—A gentleman at a Ladies' Fair, lately, being solicited to buy something, by a fair creature who kept a table, said he wanted to buy what was not for sale—a lock of her hair. She promptly cut off the coveted curl and received the sum asked for it—a hundred dollars. The purchaser was showing his trophy to a friend. "She rather had you," said the friend; "to my certain knowledge, she only paid eight dollars for the whole wig."

GAME BY WHOLESALE.—Mr. John B. Stanley, a wealthy planter, residing near Newmansville, East Florida, is said to be the most successful hunter in the State. Besides his almost daily presence on his plantation during the last twenty-five years, he has killed at least ten thousand deer, one hundred wolves, sixty panthers and twelve bears.

LIEUT. WISE.—This clever gentleman, author of "Los Gringos," "Scampavias," etc., is winning a harvest of laurels. The Home Journal recently remarked with much truth, that "for the genial and irresistible humor which makes the 'merriest fellow in the world,' we hardly know the equal of the author of 'Scampavias.'"

THE NEST OF REASONS.—A New York paper says that an unfortunate man in that city, who had resolved upon suicide, was deterred from the rash attempt by the fear that Coroner Connelly would hold an inquest over his body.

A GOOD TURN.—The great Rothschild once made the fortune of a young man by taking his arm and promenading the street with him. It established his credit, and he became one of the richest bankers in Europe.

Wayside Gatherings.

A boy named Walter Thompson had his nose nearly bitten off in Woburn, by a savage dog belonging to one Dean, a butcher.

Three million of letters remain unaltered in the dead letter office at Washington, in spite of the system of pre-payment.

A Pacific railroad across South America is talked of in Chili. The proposed line runs from the La Plata River to Valparaiso.

In all the various hospitals in the city of New York, there are said to be now 6000 beds occupied by patients.

The Galveston civilian thinks it still a question whether the camel is equal to native horses, mules and oxen.

The citizens of Jacksonville, Florida, are taking measures to deepen the entrance to St. John's River.

Col. Fremont is in New York, busily engaged in the preparation of the reports of his three last expeditions, for publication, in a popular form.

Joseph R. Stewart, of Gordon county, Ga., recently drew a lottery prize of $15,000, went on a spree, got drunk, lost the money, and died in a fit.

In Bulloch county, Ga., a lady has six sons, each of whom is six feet four and three fourths inches tall. She says the way she drew them out so was by feeding them on the legs of Shanghai chickens.

The legislature of the State of Mississippi refuse to restore the right of citizenship to the absconding defaulter in Canada, Richard Graves. The governor transmitted the application of Graves to the legislature with favorable allusions, but it was rejected.

It is said that the New York Central Railroad Company now pays $10,000 per annum, for the privilege of crossing the Niagara suspension bridge, and this bridge, costing over $500,000, pays an annual dividend of 20 per cent.

Mrs. Purnell has recovered from the Richmond and Petersburg Railroad $6566 for injuries sustained on the road by herself and son; and $900 more for the loss of a slave, killed at the same time.

The president has issued a proclamation ordering the sale of the Indian Trust lands in Kansas, in May and June. 650,000 acres will be sold to the highest bidder, but at less than the appraised value.

The income derived in Great Britain from the consumption of tobacco was, last year upwards of £32,192,943, the duty on which was more than £5,220,000. The return is independent of cigars, which was about £150,000.

A lady, accompanied by a friend from Cincinnati, met her divorced husband in Louisville, Kentucky, and after forcing him to retract alleged slanders, relative to her character, cowed him publicly. The affair created considerable excitement.

A proposition is being agitated in Washington, which has for its end the policy of removing all the Indian tribes except those located immediately on the Arkansas and Texas borders, to Western Minnesota, and there providing for their permanent homes.

Mr. Palmer, the American sculptor, has had an order from London for a duplicate of his "Indian Girl"—the masterpiece of his genius, owned by Senator Fish of New York. The gentleman from whom the order was received is an Englishman, lately in this country.

A master mariner who went to sea four years ago, leaving his wife in Springfield, returned recently to find her married to another man. He had been shipwrecked on a distant coast, and she believed him to be dead. In presence of the two husbands the wife decided to cling to the second.

A bill has been offered in the New York Assembly to incorporate a company, the object of which shall be to erect a bridge over the East River between New York and Brooklyn, in such a manner as not to impede navigation. The toll to be collected shall not exceed that charged by the ferries.

A destitute woman called on a certain family for something to eat. A few dinner remnants were put in her basket, and having a small bag or pillowcase in her hand, she was offered as much corn-meal as would fill it. "No, ma'am!" was her offended reply, "I am poor enough, God knows, but I can't go corn meal; when I come to that, I mean to starve!"

Dr. Samuel Champney of New York city, who held a post mortem examination upon the body of John Elders, lately, cut his fore finger with a scalpel while performing the operation. The poison extended through the arm to his body, and notwithstanding the efforts of the medical fraternity, he died a few days after. He was but thirty years of age.

Messrs. Sotheby and Wilkinson, London auctioneers, have recently obtained high prices for some rare and curious articles. The bronze handle of a Greek vase of fine quality brought £93; a Greek gold earring, £27; a Greek necklace, £30 15s. A Shakspeare cup, said to be the one used by Garrick at the Shaksperian jubilee, has been sold for £50.

The captain of a ship lying at one of the Charlestown wharves, was so severely bitten by a large rat, lately, that he was obliged to call for the assistance of Dr. Whiting, the younger, to stop the blood. The teeth of the loathsome creature penetrated deeply the largest artery of the human body, inflicting a most painful wound.

A Nicaragua correspondent of the New York Times says that since Gen. Walker has been in that country, he has received not far from 5000 men. Of these about 1400 are now living, which makes the whole loss 3600. All concur in saying that the graveyards and pits of Granada contain 1500 of the filibusters; and many place it as high as 2000.

The grave of Patrick Henry is in Milton, N. C. Until recently no stone has marked his resting place, Virginia having promised to erect a monument over it. A plain white slab has recently been erected over it with the following inscription: "To the memory of Patrick Henry, born May 29th, 1736; died June 7th, 1799. His fame is his best epitaph."

The hundred and ten shoelacks who stud the broadways of London in their cheerful Jerseys, yellow, red and blue, have shown the possibility of turning out well. Though six years have not elapsed since this branch of labor was introduced, these boys have, it is said, earned above £7000. Their united earnings for the last financial year amounted to £2270, representing the blacking and polishing of no less than 344,800 pairs of boots.

Four brothers, sons of Mr. Lawson McCloud of Barrington, Ill., were returning from school, when the eldest, aged thirteen, broke through the ice of a slough; the next oldest, aged eleven, went for assistance and also broke through; then the next, aged nine, followed and likewise broke through. The youngest boy then ran for his father, but when he returned all three of the boys were drowned.

Foreign Items.

The emperor of Austria has decided on granting a general and unconditional amnesty to all political offenders in the empire.

Governor Darling, of Newfoundland, has been appointed governor of Jamaica, and Sir Alexander Bannerman governor of Newfoundland.

At last accounts from Naples the king remained shut up at Caserta; the people were gloomily silent. The police formed the only visible executive government.

A madman attacked the Empress Eugenie, lately, but was instantly arrested. No arms were found upon him; he declared that his intention was merely to embrace her.

Troubles are reported between the Shah of Persia and the priesthood; parties are accused of wishing to depose the Shah in favor of Murad, the conqueror of Herat. The powerful tribe of Balases are reported on the eve of an insurrection.

The labors of the royal arsenal at Woolwich, England, have again assumed a warlike appearance. The pyramids of shot and shell are being removed and rolled towards the wharves, which are again covered with guns, wagons, cases of shot, etc.

A correspondent of the Times, writing on the probable dearth of cotton, asserts that this article can be grown in great abundance, and of the finest quality, in the Seychelles Islands, a dependency of Mauritius, but that the cultivation of cotton has been abandoned, owing to the want of labor.

Sands of Gold.

.... Indolence leaves the door of the soul unlocked, and thieves and robbers go in and spoil it of its treasures.—Barclay.

.... Lies, artifice and tricks are as sure a mark of a low and poor spirit, as the passing of false money is of a poor, low purse.—Wycherly.

.... Good is stronger than evil. A single really good man in an ill place, is like a little yeast in a gallon of dough; it can leaven the mass.—Charles Reade.

.... Truth is a sure pledge not impaired, a shield never pierced, a flower that never withers, a state that feareth no fortune, and a port that yields no danger.—Cicero.

.... We reprove our friends' faults more out of pride than love or charity; not so much to correct them, as to make them believe we ourselves are without them.—Wycherly.

.... Most natures are insolvent; cannot satisfy their own wants, have an ambition out of all proportion to their practical force, and so do lean and beg day and night continually.—Emerson.

.... That which we call wit consists much in quickness and tricks, and is so full of lightness that it seldom goes with judgment and solidity; but when they do meet, 'tis commonly in an honest man.—King James I.

.... A warm blundering man does more for the world than a frigid wise one. A man who gets into the habit of inquiring about properties, and expediences, and occasions, often spends his life without doing anything to the purpose.—Cecil.

Joker's Budget.

Life is full of contradictions—but woman takes very good care that we shall never hear the last of it.

She that marries a man because he is a "good match," must not be surprised if he turns out "a Lucifer."

It rained so in Boston, the other day, that all the fishes in the harbor crowded under the bridges to get out of the wet.

"The women of the Revolution—Mothers of statesmen, patriots, warriors!" "The women of the present day—Hoop, hoop, hurrah!"

A person meeting an old man with silver hair, and a very black, bushy beard, asked him "how it happened that his beard was not so gray as the hair on his head?"—"Because," said the old gentleman, "it's twenty years younger!"

It is the height of folly for a half dozen brothers, four uncles, and a gray-headed father, trying to stop a young girl getting married to the man she loves, and who loves her—just as if rope ladders were out of date, and all the horses in the world were spavined!

"No use in my trying to collect that bill, sir," said a collector to his employer, handing the dishonored document to the latter. "Why?"—"The man who should pay it is 'non est,'" replied the collector. "Then take it and collect it, sir. A 'non est' man will not fail to meet his obligations."

THE FLAG OF OUR UNION.

THE FAVORITE WEEKLY MISCELLANEOUS JOURNAL.

DESIGNED FOR THE HOME CIRCLE.

This long established and well known weekly paper, after eleven years of unequalled prosperity and popularity, has become a "household word" from Maine to California, gathering the friends of rich and poor, in town and country, all over the wide extent of the United States. It should be a weekly visitor to every American home, because—

It is just such a paper as any father, brother, or friend would introduce to the family circle.

It is printed on the finest satin-surfaced paper, with new type, and in a neat and beautiful style.

It is of the mammoth size, yet contains no advertisements in its eight super royal pages.

It is devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

It is carefully edited by M. M. Ballou, who has sixteen years of editorial experience in Boston.

It contains in its large, well filled and deeply interesting pages not one vulgar word or line.

It numbers among its regular contributors the best male and female writers in the country.

Its tales, while they absorb the reader, cultivate a taste for all that is good and beautiful in literature.

It is acknowledged that the good influence of such a paper in the home circle is almost incalculable.

Its suggestive pages provoke in the young an inquiring spirit, and add to their store of knowledge.

Its columns are free from politics and all jarring topics, its object being to make home happy.

It is for these reasons that it has for years been so popular a favorite throughout the country.

TERMS:—INVARIABLY IN ADVANCE

1 subscriber, one year.....$2 00

4 subscribers, " ".....7 00

10 " " ".....15 00

Any person sending us three subscribers at the last rate, shall receive the fourth copy gratis.

Any postmaster can receive a copy of the paper to his own address at the lowest club rate. Sample copies sent when desired.

Published every SATURDAY, by M. M. BALLOU,

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

VIEW OF THE FORTRESS AND TOWN OF ALESSANDRIA, IN SARDINIA, ITALY.

FORTRESS OF ALESSANDRIA, ITALY.

We present on this page an accurate view of the fortress of Alessandria, in Sardinia, Italy, to the defences of which the King Victor Emanuel is now making important additions, so as to strengthen and secure Sardinia, now the head-quarters of liberalism in Italy. It will be remembered that the friends of Italian freedom all over the world have been contributing means to purchase cannon for their fortifications, and that subscriptions for this purpose have been opened in Boston, New York, and other American cities. Our picture, rendered doubly valuable from this circumstance, embraces a view of the town as well as the fortress, with the handsome bridge that occupies the middle distance. The spot where Alessandria now stands was occupied in 1168 by a small town called Rovereto, situated near the two rivers Tanaro and Bormida. During the wars of the Guelphs and Ghibelines its strong position attracted the attention of the latter, who surrounded it in 1169 with a mud wall, and called it Alessandria. From the circumstance that straw was mixed with mud to give it sufficient firmness, the people gave it the name of Alessandria della Paglia, which it retains to this day. In 1174, Frederic Barbarossa besieged it with a formidable army, but was obliged to raise the siege after it had lasted seven months. It was subsequently besieged, and changed hands several times. In 1238, the Emperor Frederic II. took and sacked it. In 1278 the Marquis of Montferrat, governor of the Milanese, took possession of it, and surrounded it with brick walls and towers. In 1644 the Spanish commandant, Conde de Sirvella, turned the waters of the Bormida into the moat to increase its strength, and in the following year the fortress received eight ravelins, also surrounded with wet ditches. The present citadel was commenced in 1736, and completed in 1745. On the 12th of October of the same year Alessandria capitulated, and was occupied by the Spanish troops under the orders of the Marquis of Caravaca; this was the last time it was taken after a siege. In 1795 the citadel was given up to the French. It was blockaded by the Russians in 1799, and capitulated on the 1st of Thermidor of that year. It was again taken possession of by the French in 1800, after the memorable battle of Marengo. Generals Marescat and Chasseloup reformed it at a cost of 30,000,000 francs, and rendered it one of the strongest fortresses in Europe; but after the fall of the first empire the Austrians destroyed the whole of the works. The plan which is now to be carried out consists of a bastioned body and four detached forts, one situated on the Bormida, a second on the Tanaro, and the other two to the east and southeast of the place. This fortress, with the aid of Casale on one side and Genoa on the other, will enable a body of from 20,000 to 25,000 men to keep a much larger army in check for many months, until the arrival of succor from other quarters shall relieve it.

THE ÆOLIAN ATTACHMENT.

A correspondent in the National Intelligencer notices the efforts that were made some years ago by O. M. Coleman, the inventor of the Æolian Attachment, to direct attention to it among the musical circles of London, and concludes with the following anecdote: "After Coleman had obtained his European patents, and his invention had attained the highest point in the estimation of the public, he still found a 'lion in the way.' The celebrated Thalberg, then and yet justly regarded as the first pianist in the world, who was then on the continent, had not yet seen or heard the instrument. Many eminent musicians, and especially the piano manufacturers, stood aloof until Thalberg should give his opinion. Coleman felt that the fate of his invention hung upon the fiat of the dreaded Thalberg. It was, 'Wait till Thalberg comes,' and until the very name of Thalberg became hateful. The great master arrived in London at last, and a day was appointed for his examination of the instrument. A large room was selected, into which were admitted a number of the first musical artists. Benedict, a great performer, sat down and played in his best style. Thalberg stood at a distance, with his arms folded and back turned. He listened for a time in that position, and then turned his face towards the instrument. He moved softly across the floor until he stood by the side of Benedict, where he again stopped and listened. An occasional nod of the head was all the emotion he betrayed. Suddenly, while Benedict was in the very midst of a splendid sonata, he laid his hand upon his arm, and, with a not very gentle push, said: 'Get off that stool!' Seating himself, he dashed out in his inimitable style, and continued to play for some time without interruption, electrifying Coleman and the other auditors by an entirely new application of the invention. Suddenly he stopped, and turning to Benedict requested him to get a certain piece of Beethoven's from the library. This was done, and Thalberg played it through. Then, striking his instrument with his hand and pointing to the music, he said: 'This is the very instrument Beethoven had in his mind when he wrote that piece. It has never been played before!' The next day Coleman sold his patent right for a sum that enabled him to take his place among millionaires."

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 11, 1857.

$3 00 PER ANNUM. { VOL. XII., No. 15.—WHOLE No. 303.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA.

We present on this page a very fine and delicately engraved likeness of Francis Joseph, the "boy-emperor of Austria," as Kossuth calls him, and his handsome bride. Francis Joseph Charles, eldest son of the Archduke Francis Charles, ascended the throne, December 2, 1849, on the abdication of his uncle, Ferdinand I. He was born August 18, 1830. On ascending the throne, he made professions of liberal principles, the following passage occurring in his first proclamation:—"We are convinced of the necessity and value of free institutions, and enter with confidence on the path of a prosperous reformation of the monarchy. On the basis of true liberty, on the basis of the equality of the rights of all our people, and the equality of all citizens before the law, and on the basis of their equal participation in the representation and legislation, the country will rise to its ancient grandeur, and will become a wall to shelter many tongues united under the sceptre of our fathers." Those versed in the history of the Austrian sovereigns, took the words at exactly what they were worth—nothing. One of the first acts of the boy-monarch was to close the national representative assembly met at Kremsier; the second, to cancel the ancient constitution of Hungary, and promulgate a charter never realized, and actually withdrawn. Aided by the emperor of Russia, he succeeded in crushing Hungary, while the Lombardo-Venetian kingdom was reduced to submission by the bayonets of Radetsky. In September, 1851, he promulgated the notorious edict, in which he declared his ministers responsible to the throne only. He added, "The cabinet must swear unconditional fidelity, as also the engagement to fulfil all my ordinances and resolutions. It will be its duty to carry out my will concerning all laws and administrative acts, whether considered necessary by the ministers, or authorized by me." The Austrian government is, in fact, a despotism, and the boy-monarch an unmitigated despot. There is no such thing as freedom of opinion within the confines of the empire; the press is subjected to a rigid censorship, and even the books of travellers are strictly examined, for fear the breath of liberty might mingle with the stifling atmosphere of Austria. The whole legislative authority, as we have seen, is vested in the hands of this young man, who exercises supreme control in all the provinces, excepting Hungary and Transylvania. Yet public opinion has, as in Russia, some influence, however its expression may be checked; and a constant tendency on the part of the various states to resume their independence and maintain their respective national distinctions, has the effect of tempering the exercise of this control, and thereby preventing, what has lately been threatened, the dismemberment of the empire. The provincial states, whose business it is to receive and register the laws framed by the emperor on financial matters, and to allocate or apportion the amount of supplies to be distributed to the different districts, meet once a year, or oftener, if necessary. The executive government acts through councils or boards, each having a chancellor, who communicates with the provincial councils and with the cabinet. Hungary and Transylvania have each a separate chancery, and are governed by their own laws; as the Italian states are also. The nobles form a separate order in the state, and are so disproportionately numerous as to make the distinction appear ridiculous—the total number of nobility in the empire being no less than 400,000, or one to every 90 inhabitants. Of these there are 259,648 in Hungary alone, or one for every 20 burglers. The privileges and prerogatives of these last are seriously detrimental to the national interests in various respects. The administration of justice is under the superintendence of the superior ministry of justice, at the head of which are two presidents. It is divided into two senates, one at Vienna, and the other at Verona. All trials are conducted with a great degree of secrecy, and those of criminals are scandalously protracted, years often elapsing before their trials are brought on, and years more before they are concluded. Sentence of death can be passed only after confession, which must have a tendency to defeat the ends of justice. The military force of the empire is composed of a standing army, and an army of reserve. The permanent force in time of peace is 414,000 men, and during war, 639,659. The emperor possesses a great many strong fortifications maintained at a great cost. He also keeps garrisons in Mentz, Párenza, Ferrara and Comacchio. The naval armament at Vienna consists of 6 frigates, 5 corvettes, 7 brigs, 66 smaller vessels, 11 steamers and 9 gun-boats—in all, 104 vessels, mounting 742 guns. The public revenues arise from direct taxes on property, industry and incomes, with personal and Jews' taxes, indirect imposts on tobacco and provisions, a salt monopoly, legacy and stamp duties, post-office and customs dues, and the revenues from the crown domains and mines. These various sources yielded, in 1853, about $125,000,000. The greater proportion were contributed by Bohemia, Gallicia, Illyria, and the German and Italian provinces. Hungary contributes a certain sum voted by the diet, and supports a fixed number of troops; and in Dalmatia, a tithe of the land produce is taken in lieu of taxes. The expenditures of 1853 exceeded the revenues by about thirty millions, the army alone costing fifty-five millions of dollars. The entire population of the empire, in 1850, was set down at 36,514,466. It is one of the most populous of the European monarchies, and comprises 258,000 square miles, or 45,000 more than France. Its greatest length from east to west is about 680 miles, and its greatest breadth from north to south is about 400 miles. And this vast empire, with a population greater than that of the United States, is swayed by a sceptre held in the hands of the boyish young man, whose portrait occupies this page. Austria has passed through more than one important crisis during the present century, and has more than once tottered on the verge of ruin. Her safety at these eventful periods was, perhaps, owing as much to the skilful diplomacy of Prince Metternich as to any other cause. As ambassador to Paris, in 1807, he secured the treaty of Fontainebleau, so favorable to Austria. In 1809, after the battle of Wagram, he became minister of foreign affairs; and when Napoleon had it in his power to crush Austria, it was Metternich who conducted the negotiation which purchased a respite for the empire at the price of an archduchess, completing his work by conducting the second empress of the French to Paris. Though he did this, perhaps his strongest feeling was hatred to France and Napoleon; and when the opportunity occurred, he displayed it. The decided impulse given by Metternich to the policy of Austria in the parley of Dresden and the conferences of Prague, was the signal of Napoleon's downfall. During the stormy times of 1830, when constitutional liberty seemed about to assert its rights all over Europe, Metternich stood firm in opposition to liberal ideas. In 1848, he was forced to resign, but he lived to come back to the capital in state, and to witness the final triumph of his favorite despotic principles. It may be said that Austria owes less to her arms than to her diplomacy, which is most adroitly managed.

THE EMPEROR AND EMPRESS OF AUSTRIA.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE JEWELLED TALISMAN: —OR— THE PURITAN AND CAVALIER.

A TALE OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND IN THE TIME OF CHARLES II.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

CHAPTER I.

THE RESCUE. PLOTTING.

A BOAT, propelled by its only occupant, was fast nearing the shore of a small bay of the Atlantic, indenting the New England coast. The air was fresh, just breaking the surface of the water into ripples, which, catching the brilliance of the slant sunbeams, shone like burnished silver.

On a broad, smooth rock, round which was thrown many a wreath of tangled seaweed—for at the flow of the tide it was buried beneath the waves,—stood Mildred Dacres, who appeared to be waiting for the boat to reach the shore. Though twenty-eight years old, her beauty, instead of fading, had only ripened into fuller splendor. She was above the middling height, and might have appeared too tall, had not her form been of the most perfect symmetry. As she stood with her small French hood shoved back from her brow, from beneath which fell a profusion of golden curls, forming a rich contrast with a crimson mantle thrown carelessly over her shoulders, there was something so graceful and picturesque in her attitude and whole appearance, as to force an involuntary exclamation of surprise from the rough though honest-looking man in the boat.

"If she is handsome, I don't like her," said he, in half-uttered accents. "Talk of black eyes sparklin' and flashin'. If I ever had the fortune to see real lightnin' in a woman's eyes, 'twas in Mildred Dacres', and they are blue as a summer sky. Beshrew me, if I could ever like the girl, and if I could have my wish, she would be on her way back to Old England in the first ship that sails. I had thoughts of runnin' my boat ashore, close to the rock where she's standin', but now I'll keep on a little further."

At this moment, Mildred Dacres waved her handkerchief.

"I'll make believe I don't see her," said he; and carefully averting his face, he pulled still harder for the place where he intended to land.

"Silas—Silas Watkins!" said she, without raising her voice, though in those clear and resonant tones which make themselves heard, while at the same time they carried with them a certain authority which requires some nerve to disobey.

Silas neither looked round nor slackened his speed.

"Silas Watkins," she repeated, still without elevating her voice, "turn your boat this way. I wish you to take me across to Mr. Walworth's."

"Did you speak?" said he, suspending his oars and looking round.

"I did, and as you very well know what I said, I shall not repeat it."

"How should I know, when the wind carried your voice right from me?" said he, at the same time slowly heading the boat towards the rock on which she stood.

"Ply your oars a little more briskly, worthy Silas. The sun is getting low, and the wind begins to be chill."

"It will be for my own convenience as much as for hers," said Silas, in a suppressed voice, as a kind of apology to himself for complying with the request, or rather command.

In a few minutes, the keel of the boat grated on the smooth, hard beach. Mildred sprang lightly into it, and then drew her mantle more closely around her.

"Did you say you wanted to be landed up there?" said Silas, throwing out his hand in the direction of a rocky headland about half a mile distant, which stood out boldly into the bay.

"Yes," she replied, "and the sooner we reach there the better I shall like it." As she spoke, she tossed towards him a piece of silver, which came near falling into the water instead of the boat.

At first he spurned it with his foot, but the next moment he picked it up.

"After all," he thought, putting it into the pocket of his frieze doublet, "it may as well go to buy me a new jacket which I need, as finery which she has more of than she knows what to do with."

The moment Mildred had seated herself, Silas pushed his boat into deep water, and pulled vigorously towards the headland. It had originally been covered with a heavy growth of forest trees, and at the part connected with the main land, a grove of oaks and maples were still standing, having been spared as a shelter to a dwelling-house and the out buildings. The house, which could partly be seen through the trees, its high, peaked gables presenting angles so numerous as to cut the wind in its eye from whatever point of compass it should chance to blow, though only two stories, covered so large a space as to render it sufficiently commodious for the proprietor and his family, and for the entertainment of many a traveller, at a time when there were few wayside inns. The absence of all architectural embellishment evinced the severe taste, or rather, as it might be said, the principles of the owner; for Mr. Walworth, in common with other Puritans of his time, looked upon the adornment of his habitation, no less than of his person, as one of those vanities in which it would be sinful to indulge.

"Do you expect me to wait for you and take you back?" said Silas, after a silence of a few minutes.

"No; I shall spend the night with Alice Dale."

"She would have me think, I suppose," thought Silas, indulging in one of those mental soliloquies which often served to make time pass more lightly, "that it is Alice Dale she is going to see. She can't deceive me. Clarence Harleigh is the lodestone that draws her up to Mr. Walworth's so often. I wish he could see her with my eyes. I do declare, I would about as leave put my hand into a nest of serpents as among those curls of hers that fall over her shoulders and glisten so like gold on her red mantle. They do look beautiful, though, as true as my name is Silas Watkins."

Meanwhile, Mildred sat looking listlessly towards the shore, till having accomplished about two-thirds of the distance to the promontory, they arrived opposite a break of the western hills that formed the bed of a stream which, rushing impetuously forward, emptied into the bay. Suddenly, her gaze became fixed and eager. Unconsciously she bent forward, while her fingers were strained with so nervous a grasp over the edge of the boat that the blood grew purple under the nails. She had caught sight of a young man, she felt certain was Clarence Harleigh, with some one standing near him, who, she was no less sure, was Alice Dale. Without knowing it, the cold, keen light which Silas had spoken to himself about glittered in her eyes, and her lips were drawn in, and so firmly compressed that they looked no thicker than a scarlet line.

"Silas," said she, "turn the boat into the stream. I see Alice Dale yonder, not far from the shore, and will join her and walk with her up to the house."

"The current is so strong and swift it wouldn't be safe," was his answer, "even if there were a possibility of passing the rocky shoal which stretches entirely across it, a little beyond where it enters the bay."

"Even if there were a possibility," she repeated, slowly and mockingly. "If you refuse to do it, it is because you are a coward."

"I am a good swimmer, and— Do you hear that?" said he, breaking off suddenly from what he was going to say.

"I hear the wind," she replied, "which confirms me in my resolution to enter the river, as we can, by so doing, reach land much sooner than if we kept on towards the promontory."

"But the river isn't navigable for the smallest craft. If the wind is high, there will be little or no danger if we keep on. The water is deep, with neither shoals nor swift currents."

"Do you understand, Silas Watkins, that it is my wish to enter the river?"

"Yes, I do," he replied, setting his teeth firmly together, and turning the boat so sharply that it came nigh being upset.

Then, with the full strength of his strong, sinewy arms, he bent to the oars. The boat flew like a sea-gull to the mouth of the river, though there was a head wind. During only the few seconds which had passed since Silas called Mildred's attention to the rising wind, it had increased almost to a hurricane, while a dark, wild-looking cloud, which, when it first appeared above the distant hills, was scarce bigger than a man's hand, had spread itself over the whole of the western heavens.

They were soon so near the mouth of the river as to feel the force of the swift, opposing current. Silas, without speaking, continued to pull steadily at the oars.

"Stop, Silas,—stop!" exclaimed Mildred, for she could now see that the entrance of the river was covered with a sheet of foam, while the vexed waves dashed wildly against a large sharp-crested rock which, standing out boldly from the shore, projected far into the stream.

"It is too late now," said he, in answer to this earnestly-uttered command; and as he spoke, the keel of the boat grated harshly against the point of a sunken rock.

There was no perceptible damage done, and Mildred now, whose fears were excited to the utmost, condescended to entreat Silas to turn back.

"It will be even more dangerous than to go on," said he.

Even as the words left his lips, a gust of wind, stronger and fiercer than any which had preceded it, lifted the boat from the waves and hurled it against the huge projecting rock, as Silas was making an effort to sweep round its base at a safe distance, as if it had been no heavier than the foam bubbles that were dancing around them.

A wild, piercing shriek mingled with the hollow voice of the wind, and then a face, white as the foam which the next moment was drifting over it, was seen amid the floating fragments of the boat. Silas, by the aid of one of the oars, succeeded in obtaining a precarious footing on the partially submerged rocks, round which the tide, lashed into fury, was foaming and raging. A corner of the mantle worn by Mildred was all that now could be seen above the eddying waves. This, with much difficulty, he succeeded in reaching, and commenced cautiously drawing it towards him. To his great joy—for Silas Watkins, though he disliked Mildred, was not a man to bear malevolence against even his enemies,—he found that it still remained wrapped around her. A single handbreadth nearer, and those golden tresses which, as she sat in the boat, had inspired him with feelings so nearly akin to what he would have experienced had they been the shining coils of a serpent, would be within his reach. His hand was ready to grasp them, when the fastenings of the mantle gave way, causing so sudden a recoil as to precipitate him into the boiling waves. The cold white hand of the drowning woman which touched his face as he sunk beneath the water, caused a shiver to run through his frame, as if it had been the hand of death. The next moment, the icy fingers had clutched a portion of his garments, dragging him down and impeding his movements. He made an effort to throw off his saturated doublet, but the hand holding to it with so rigid and convulsive a grasp must, as he saw, be crushed, ere it could be removed by his unaided exertion.

"No, no," said he, shuddering, as the thought crossed his mind, "I can't do that. If I could only get free of this eddy which is whirling us round, I think I could save myself and her, too."

With a strength which desperation can only give, he did get free of it, and then—for he was a good swimmer—he succeeded in stemming the swift current till beyond the rocky shoal. He then struck out for the shore.

"It is of no use; I can never reach land with this weight dragging me down. We must both go, if I try to save her," were the thoughts which passed through his mind, finding after he had gone a short distance that his strength was failing him. He faltered and finally stopped.

"Bear up a little longer; I am coming to your assistance," said a voice from the shore.

The words were instantly succeeded by a plunge, and looking in the direction whence the sounds proceeded, he saw Clarence Harleigh. It was astonishing what new life and vigor were diffused through his frame by the prospect of assistance. It enabled him not only to sustain himself, but to support his companion in peril in such a manner that her face was raised above the water. A minute more, and Harleigh had reached them.

"Give her into my care now," said he.

"You will never reach the shore, without I assist you," said Silas.

"Yes, I can. The distance is short. Take care of yourself."

If less athletic, he had even more nervous energy than Silas; and besides, he knew that after attaining a short distance he would be able to touch the bottom, and still a little further he could plant his feet firmly. With Harleigh's assistance, the locked hand was speedily unclosed, and the next minute, though burthened with his helpless charge—for he was an adroit swimmer,—he was vigorously breasting the waves. Silas, who could now divest himself of his heavy, saturated jacket, overtook them by the time they were beyond deep water. Harleigh now willingly accepted his proffered assistance, for he found that his strength had been tasked beyond what he had anticipated.

"She must be carried to my house," said Silas, when they reached dry land.

By this time the wind had spent its fury, and nothing remained of the black cloud which so suddenly spread itself over the heavens like a funeral pall, save here and there a few floating fragments which had detached themselves from its edges.

The house of Silas Watkins could be seen through the trees, and was only at a short distance. Mrs. Watkins, accompanied by Alice Dale, who had sought shelter there from the violence of the wind, came out to meet them.

"You were too late, and she is dead," said Alice, as she saw the upturned face of Mildred, which, as her head rested against Harleigh's shoulder, was pale and ghastly, those purple shadows that steal so silently over the features of the dead having already gathered round her mouth and under the closed eyes.

Both Silas and his wife had had some experience in such cases, and knew how to proceed according to the most approved methods at that time known. For some time there was no sign of life. They, however, did not grow remiss in their exertions, which were finally rewarded with the promise of success. Two hours afterward, when Harleigh and Alice took leave, though weak, she was in good, even high spirits, and assured them that they might expect to see her soon at Mr. Walworth's.

The next day, a young man by the name of Gilbert Falkland, who for some time had been a member of Mr. Walworth's family, received the subjoined note from Mildred Dacres:

"Early this morning, I sent word to Alice Dale that she might expect to see me half an hour after sunset. Previously to meeting her, I wish to see you, and have some conversation with you. By sunset, or a little before, you will find me at the place where several times we have already met."

Mildred was punctual to the hour she had named. It lacked several minutes of sunset when she reached a small, nearly circular spot, carpeted with smooth, green turf, and walled in on every side by majestic oaks, from whose boughs the wild grape-vine hung in broad festoons, or borne down by their heavy though still unripe clusters of fruit, trailed on the ground. Thus the house, though distant little more than a stone's throw, was completely screened from view.

"Not here yet?" said she, seating herself on a block of granite half imbedded in the soil, and close to one of those living springs so abundant in New England.

The words had only time to leave her lips, when the branches of an oak were thrust aside, and a young man in a hunting-dress entered the enclosure.

"You allowed me to arrive here before you, Gilbert Falkland," said she, with a slight accent of displeasure perceptible in her voice.

"For which I would humbly sue for pardon," he replied, "if I had not already twice sought you here in vain. I had ceased to expect you, when I caught a glimpse of you, just as you entered the glade."

"I hope Clarence Harleigh didn't see me, too."

"No fear of that. He was too deeply engaged in chatting with the fair Alice to have eyes or ears for any one else."

"Gilbert Falkland, haven't you the will and the means of putting an end to this?"

"I certainly have the will."

"And where there's a will, there's a way—so says the old saw."

"With your aid, I shall not despair of finding the means, but

"Thou know'st we work by wit, and not by witchcraft.
And wit depends on dilatory time."

"If my aid is wanting, you shall have it. Yet it appears to me that one so deeply enamored as you are with pretty Alice Dale, would have a spur to his ingenuity in casting about for the means, which would scarcely make him wish for my poor help."

"And is there no spur to the ingenuity of Mildred Dacres? If I am enamored of the pretty Alice Dale, has not the handsome Clarence Harleigh excited your admiration?"

"I admit that I think him a fine specimen of humanity, physically and intellectually, yet after all—"

"You hesitate. Shall I finish the sentence for you?"

"If you will."

"Yet after all, you would say, then, that with all his endowments, moral, mental and personal, his fine estate over the water possesses in your estimation the greater attraction. Am I wrong?"

"I may as well own that you are not, for if we are to assist each other, there should be a fair understanding between us."

"Certainly; it is nothing more than right."

"And now, as you have undertaken to interpret my thoughts and wishes, I will volunteer a similar piece of service in behalf of yourself. If it be my wish to make the Wiltshire estate minister to my comfort and my somewhat expensive tastes, to your desire to win Alice Dale for a wife would be much less ardent, if she had not recently fallen heiress to those broad acres in England, to say nothing of the large tract of land in this country, of which her uncle Walworth gave her a deed her last birthday."

"I confess that you are a good interpreter. The truth is, my father was such a flaming royalist, that, in looking after the fortunes of the king, he forgot to look after his own; the upshot of which is, that his only son and heir—partly owing, as I confess, to certain expensive habits he has contracted,—will soon be very little better than a beggar, unless these same broken fortunes can be repaired by the estate in question, or by some one of equal value. No such narrow scantling, such as goes to dower an earl's daughter, will suffice to cover the rents."

"And a rich heiress isn't found every turn."

"Not in these days—at least not in England, nor among those of English descent; for, zealous and reckless of any injury to himself, as my father was in the cause of Charles II., there were enough to keep him company."

"All we have to do, then, is to assist each other."

"And the first step?"

"It must be one that will cause jealousy and distrust between Harleigh and Alice."

"True, but how to take this first step—that's the question," said Falkland.

"I will help you. You have noticed that she often wears a blue ribbon round her neck?"

"Yes."

"But you may never have seen the jewel which is appended to it."

"No, I never have."

"It would not be likely to happen, for she keeps it scrupulously concealed beneath the folds of her neckerchief, as her uncle, you know, doesn't approve of outward adorning, and should he obtain sight of it, she would, in addition to being severely reproofed, not only be prohibited from wearing it, but obliged to deliver it up to him, that it might no longer be to her a temptation and a stumbling-block."

"Which she would not willingly do, if, as I suspect, it is a love token from Harleigh."

"It is, and this first step we've been speaking of is to obtain possession of it."

"Which will be no easy matter."

"Perhaps not, but leave that to me. And now, if you know, tell me when Harleigh is going to embark for England?"

"In the first vessel that sails from the port of Boston."

"That will be in a week or ten days."

"Yes, somewhere thereabouts."

"And you?"

"I shall remain here several weeks longer, it may be months."

"I thought of trying to obtain possession of this love-token we have been speaking about, to-night. On reflection, however, I think it will be better to do nothing about it till after Harleigh is gone. If Alice should miss it while he is here, an explanation will be sure to take place between them, which may thwart my cunningly devised plan."

"Yes, it will be better for him to be gone, for Alice has a certain way with her which makes it impossible to disbelieve what she says."

"Before long, we will speak together again on the subject. I sent word to Alice that she might expect me a little after sunset, and by this time she is looking for me."

CHAPTER II.

DOUBT AND JEALOUSY.

WHEN Mildred Dacres had arrived within a short distance of the house, Alice saw her and went out to meet her, for she was eager to inquire how she found herself after the frightful accident which came so near proving fatal.

"I have entirely recovered from its effects," was Mildred's answer.

"You don't know how frightened I was," said Alice.

"Were you? Well, you look happy now," and she looked down into the dark eyes, full of the heart's sunshine, which were raised to hers. "You are happy," Mildred went on to say, "and I think I know the cause. Come, Alice, let us walk a little while in this calm twilight, so that you can tell me all about it."

"I have little to tell you, dear Mildred," said Alice, with a smile.

"I know you haven't. All that you can say will not reveal to me more than your looks have done already. You have promised Clarence Harleigh that you will be his wife."

"No, not exactly that. Uncle Walworth says he isn't yet quite prepared to give his consent."

"Why need the stuff old Puritan know anything about it?"

"Mildred!"

"What a world of reproof you sometimes contrive to throw into a single inflection of that sweet voice of yours! Well, I was wrong, and will never again call him a stuff old Puritan as long as I live, since you dislike to hear me."

"Uncle Walworth does what he thinks is just and right, and as he is my guardian, I am bound to respect his wishes."

"If you and Clarence are not betrothed, he has told you that he prefers you above all others. This much I am certain of; it is no use for you to deny it."

"I shall not attempt it, then."

"And in return for the precious boon, you are, doubtless, required to refuse all offers during his absence. If one of England's proudest nobles should sue for your hand, you will consider yourself bound not to listen to his suit."

"I should have no wish to listen to it."

"And you imagine that Harleigh will prove to be insensible to the charms of the lovely and fascinating ladies that give grace and brilliancy to the court of the merry monarch? My sweet Alice, believe no such thing. I know Clarence Harleigh better than you do."

A troubled look stole over the face of Alice, clouding the happy light which had given it that almost magic beauty which springs from the emotions of love and trust when fully awakened into life for the first time. As Mildred stealthily watched the effect of what she had said, her eyes kindled with a cold, yet keen light, such as has inspired Silas Watkins with a feeling of so much distrust and repugnance. At the same time, with a strange contrariety, a soft, seductive smile hovered on her lips. After a few moments' silence, as Alice raised her eyes to Mildred's, she caught a gleam of their cold, glittering light, in such singular contrast with her winning smile.

"I think," said she, "that I know Clarence Harleigh well enough to trust him."

"Time will prove which of us is right," replied Mildred. "Is he absent this evening?"

"No; he is with my uncle, who called to him just as I came out to meet you. Come, Mildred, shall we go in, now?"

"Yes, as well now as any time. I must speak to Harleigh, and request the favor of his taking letters to my English friends. I regret that he is with your uncle, whom I willingly would have avoided, as I am not, as you know, one of his favorites."

"It is your manner of dress, rather than yourself, that he disapproves."

"He may think that his fair niece may wish to imitate me in that respect, and it would be no great matter of wonder if she did. Seriously, Alice, if you would just suffer your bright brown hair to fall in those clustering curls which nature intended, you would look ten times more charming than you do now, especially in Harleigh's eyes. I must say, dear Alice, that when your uncle goes so far as to require your garments to be of the same fashion and sober hue of his wife's, I think you are not bound to yield implicit obedience."

"Gay and brilliant colors would be less becoming to me than to you; and as for Clarence, I think he is bound to tolerate my drab-colored gown, out of deference to my uncle's opinion."

"Prejudice, Alice,—prejudice! Best to call things by their right names."

As Mildred said this, they entered the house. Through the open door they could see that Harleigh still remained in the apartment with Mr. Walworth, though whatever the conversation which had engaged their attention, it had now come to an end. Harleigh stood at a window, with his back turned partly towards them, and was not aware of their proximity; while Mr. Walworth, who sat in a remote part of the room, was too much engaged with his own thoughts to notice that they stood just beyond the threshold.

"He might be mistaken for a statue rather than for one of the living," said Mildred, in a suppressed voice, and looking towards Mr. Walworth. "He moves neither limb nor muscle, and I half suspect, doesn't even wink. As he sits there so silent and motionless, he is a true impersonation of what, in outward semblance, I used to imagine the stern old covenanteders to be when assembled at a conventicle. Look and mark the contrast between his appearance and Harleigh's."

"It certainly could not well be more striking," Alice thought, as her eyes first rested on one and then the other.

Mr. Walworth, though tall and lean, showed marks of no inconsiderable muscular vigor, while certain lines, deeply traced on his countenance, were expressive of mental energy and great firmness of purpose. Being seldom relaxed or brightened with a smile, a stern, almost harsh look had gradually settled upon his features, particularly his brow and round his mouth, which, in reality, were foreign to his character.

Harleigh, on the other hand, whose form was peculiarly fine, and whose whole appearance carried with it an air of true nobility, was a genuine representative of the cavalier, according to its true acceptance, as applied to the noble, brave and accomplished gentleman in the time of Charles I., and not merely the distinctive appellation which it afterwards came to be of the party which favored the cause of royalty, many of whom, by their unsettled mode of life, had contracted habits as little creditable to themselves as the sovereign they professed to serve.

As Alice and Mildred were about to enter the room where Mr.

Walworth and Harleigh were, Gilbert Falkland, as if that moment returned from his hunting expedition, made his appearance at the outer door. Mildred, unobserved by Alice, fell back behind her a little, and said to him quickly.

"I am going to have a little conversation with Harleigh. Remember that, meanwhile, you are to entertain Alice."

This was said in a manner which carried more significance with it than the mere words. Falkland nodded in return, in a way that said, "I understand your meaning."

"Come, Alice," said Mildred, "why should we linger here any longer? Candles will be brought in soon, and it will be best for me to pay my respects to your austere uncle, in case he should condescend to notice me in the twilight. It will sober down these brilliant hues," she added, glancing at her dress.

"As you are naturally timid," said Falkland, with a light laugh, "the veil of twilight will serve to hide your embarrassment."

At the moment she placed her foot on the threshold, Mildred quickly and adroitly removed the fillet worn by Alice, causing the bright tresses which it held in bondage to fall over her shoulders. Alice would have remonstrated, but was prevented by Mildred, who in a playful manner placed her hand over her mouth.

"I am determined," said she, "that Harleigh, before he leaves, shall, for once, have some faint idea of what you would be if permitted to make the best of those advantages which nature has bestowed on you with so lavish a hand."

"Is it, all things considered, exactly politic?" Falkland whispered, so closely to Mildred's ear that she alone could hear him.

"You will see," was her answer, "and you mustn't forget to do as I told you."

Alice, except that she dreaded rebuke from her uncle, was not sorry for what Mildred had done, for, of course, she could not fail to be aware, that well as her pure, transparent complexion and perfect features bore the orical of the plain, almost stiff style of dress she was required to adopt, they would be seen to better advantage partly shaded by her rich brown hair.

After listening to the insinuations of Mildred, respecting Harleigh, Alice felt distrustful of her power over him, and shrank from the idea, on his arrival at England, of his comparing her with the celebrated court beauties, which made her the more anxious to appear to the best advantage.

Harleigh, at their entrance, turned from the window, and was coming forward to meet them, when Mildred, hastening towards him, placed her hand on his arm.

"Permit me," said she, to command your exclusive attention for a few moments. I hear that you are soon going to leave us, and I have a few verbal messages to send to acquaintances, and some letters to my friends."

"Both of which I will undertake with pleasure," he replied.

"With respect to the messages, they will not burden your memory, for being merely complimentary, I will leave it to your own judgment and good taste to phrase them. As for their names, here is a list of them—a somewhat long one, as the candles which have made their appearance very opportunely will enable you to see. But you don't hear what I say."

"Not a word has escaped me."

"I ask pardon, but I thought that your attention appeared to be attracted towards my friend Alice. Doesn't she look charmingly?"

"She always does."

"True, but according to my taste, she looks uncommonly so this evening. I long ago gave up trying to persuade her to give a little more freedom to those magnificent tresses of hers, as I found that all I could say failed to move her."

"And now that you have ceased to persuade, she has done it voluntarily."

"Say, rather, that I was not as eloquent as your friend Falkland."

"You would have me believe that he has been trying his eloquence on the same subject?"

"A simple wish, or even preference, however carelessly expressed, is sometimes eloquent."

"Has Gilbert Falkland presumed to express a wish relative to a subject on which, as I knew her uncle's peculiar opinions and feelings, delicacy constrained me to be silent?"

"Softly, Harleigh,—softly. I see an angry spark in your eye, for which there is not the least occasion. Falkland has, to the best of my knowledge, never expressed any such wish. He said nothing more than that he considered it a much more becoming way of wearing the hair, than to confine it by caps and fillets."

"And so Miss Dale acted upon this hint?"

"I will not say that she did."

"Yet think so!"

"Our thoughts are our own. There is one thing, however, that you and I both know."

"What is it?"

"That Alice Dale is scarcely more than a child, just old enough to be fascinated with a face almost femininely pretty, like Gilbert Falkland's. That true manly beauty, which is in reality more the expression of fine and noble traits of character than any particular complexion or set of features, has little attraction for her, because she is unable to comprehend wherein lies its charm. I don't speak of this as being any disparagement to her, for I love Alice as dearly as I should an own sister. It is the same with all girls of her age. The mind must be formed and the taste cultivated before one is capable of appreciating the kind of beauty to which I allude."

"I have been deceived in her, then."

"Say, rather, that you have been a little bewildered; nor is it in the least strange if you have. Such beauty as hers might cause one less susceptible than yourself, while under the influence of its spells, to overlook such defects as those I have named. But with you it couldn't have lasted long; soon—very soon there must have been an awakening. Look, Harleigh! Falkland is winding one of those soft brown curls of hers round his finger. I should imagine by his looks that he was begging it of her, as a memento of friendship, or, perhaps, love."

"And if she should give it to him, why then—?"

"Why do you break off so abruptly?"

"What I was about to say was of no consequence."

"Harleigh, you mustn't take this too seriously. Don't forget to hear in mind what I have already mentioned, that in years Alice is scarcely more than a child, and that as such she has a claim on your indulgence. This may be only a passing fancy. A week hence she may care nothing for Gilbert Falkland, and my advice is, that you watch her, without appearing to do so."

"I've no great respect for spies, either domestic or political. Their office is as little manly as it is honorable."

"Yet something is due to expediency. Take my advice, Harleigh; be silent, discreet and watchful."

"If it were best."

"Can there be a doubt of it? And let me advise that your treatment of Alice be the same as it always has been."

"Would you have me act the hypocrite as well as the spy?"

"If you can't bring your mind to treat her thus—you may call it by what name you please—all the rest will be of no avail."

"If I undertake to act a part, I will make thorough work of it."

"Otherwise you may as well not undertake it."

Alice, meanwhile, could with difficulty conceal her impatience at being obliged for so long a time to give her attention to Falkland, whom she had always disliked. She, therefore, experienced a sense of relief when the door opened and Mrs. Walworth (Aunt Esther, Alice always called her) entered the room, leading her youngest child by the hand, as it seemed to be the signal for a general movement. Even Mr. Walworth was roused from his thoughtful mood, and changed his attitude, though he had failed to notice the entrance of Mildred Dacres; while, with something approaching a smile, he held out his hand for little Ella to come to him.

The child cast an inquiring, and at the same time, a wistful glance at his face, and she saw that there was light there breaking through the gloom and austerity by which it was so often clouded. She sprang towards him with a light, bounding step, and the next moment she was seated on his knee, with her arms encircling his neck, and her red lips held up for a kiss. The stern Puritan for a few moments lost sight of the self-denying rules which he had prescribed for himself, and gave himself up to the indulgence of receiving and returning the caresses of this dear and cherished child.

Mrs. Walworth, though near her husband's age, looked many years younger. Naturally she was of a cheerful temperament, and she retained much of the youthful bloom which, like the dawn of a bright morning, spread a light and joy around her, which would, at times, guard each avenue as he would, steal into the heart of her stern, ascetic husband. In all this, Alice Dale resembled her, which was but natural, as the father of Alice, who had for a number of years been dead, was Mrs. Walworth's own brother.

She now, before seating herself, placed the candles on a small table which she had drawn forward into the centre of the apartment, and as if by some magnetic attraction, all drew their chairs nearer, leaving the remote corners to the gathering shadows.

By some means, Alice found herself seated next to Harleigh. When she perceived this, her cheeks flushed a little, and she turned partly away, abashed by the consciousness of the half-uttered though well-understood vows which only a half hour since had been interchanged between them. Yet as she did so, her eyes for a moment sought his, for already there was a craving in her heart for the loving glance such as had late rested upon her. She sought for it in vain. His face, so it appeared to her, was studiously averted, which caused what Mildred had said to flash into her mind. Tears started in her eyes, which she with difficulty forced back.

"Harleigh!"

The name was whispered close to his ear. He turned and saw Mildred heading over him.

"Is this the way to make thorough work of the part you are to act?" said she. She then added in a voice loud enough for all to hear: "I hope you won't forget, for this message, which so strangely escaped my memory, is of more importance than all the rest."

"I shall certainly remember," was his reply. "Who could have suspected," he thought to himself when Mildred had left him, "that Alice Dale was a coquette—that she could so well act a part!" And, word for word, he recalled to mind all that had been said during their recent interview.

Harleigh had told Mildred that he would remember, but there must be a little time for him to acquire the necessary composure to appear towards Alice the same as if he had not listened to the insidious representations which had been poured into his ear. Now, his mind was in a state of tumultuous excitement, and to put on a calm exterior, was all that he could well do.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

Before the fifth year how many seeds are sown which future years, and distant ones, mature successively! How much fondness, how much generosity, what hosts of other virtues, courage, constancy, patriotism, spring into the father's heart from the cradle of his child! And does never the fear come over a man that what is most precious to him upon earth is left in careless or perfidious, in unsafe or unworthy hands? Does it never occur to him that he loses a son in each of these five years?—Lambert.

A NOVEL INVENTION.

The "Nautilus" is the name of a new machine, calculated to take the place of the diving bell, with its cumbrous appliances, in all work that has to be transacted under water. A trial was had of it recently at Glen Cove, N. Y., which was apparently very successful. Unlike the antiquated diving bell, it may be held in suspension in mid-water by its own specific gravity, and moved to and fro, from right to left, forward or backward, according to the requirements of the work in progress. Expensive hoisting tackle, and the labor of lifting the bell out of the water, are entirely dispensed with; it quietly does its own work, lifting and lowering under water, with no other assistance from the outward world than a plentiful supply of compressed air, to keep its lungs in play. This is furnished by a small engine on a vessel in attendance, through a tube of India-rubber, lined with coiled wire, and cased in Russian duck. At the will of the operator within, it performs every desired evolution, without exterior assistance. The machine is made of stout boiler iron, and much resembles a vast tea-kettle, without spout or handle, its interior illuminated through little glass plates in the roof. It is about twelve feet in diameter and eight feet deep, and its interior is divided into one large centre apartment for the operators and others, and several smaller chambers for air or water.—Inventor, New York.

PASS OF PIR-I-ZUN, IN THE PERSIAN MOUNTAINS.

GERMAN LEGIONITE MARRIAGES.

The whole of the German Legion has now disappeared from Colchester Camp, and scarcely a servant girl, farm or domestic, remains behind, much to the inconvenience of the inhabitants, who find great difficulty in procuring assistance in their houses, upwards of 300 girls and women "of a certain age" having found husbands in the legion, whom they have accompanied to the Cape. During the rage at Colchester for wiving, some very ludicrous scenes occurred. Three comrades of the legion, in their search for wives, happened to fall in with, and become acquainted with, three young women, sisters; and after a few days of friendly intercourse, the girls were induced to promise to marry each her man, and accompany him to the African wilds, in pursuance of which the whole party, three men and their intendeds, appeared before the chaplain of the corps, a German, with some dozens of other aspirants for matrimonial bonds. The ceremony having been duly performed, the three couples left, but the males returned within a few minutes, and complained that the parson had married each to the wrong girl, not the one he had selected before appearing at the altar. This was a terrible dilemma, which an English clergyman would have found insurmountable; however, the German chaplain got over the obstacle by desiring the men to go away and settle the business among themselves. They accordingly retired, but returned in half an hour, happy, saying they had arranged the matter amicably. Each had the lass originally intended for his wife.—Bee.

PASS OF PIR-I-ZUN, PERSIA.

The continued interest felt in the affairs of Persia warrants us in the belief that the accompanying delineation of the terrific Pir-i-zun Pass, which is a kind of roadway from the sea to the chief city of Fars, formerly the capital of the whole empire, will prove acceptable to all the readers of the Pictorial. A scene so terrific and sublime is one of those rare combinations of romantic elements with which nature sometimes delights to astonish her children. Here we behold mighty precipices beetling over deep abysses, and light bridges spanning most fearful depths. We may yet hear of British marching, under the fire of the mountaineers, along that road over which we see a few native horsemen and footmen passing, over those rocky arches that bridge tumbling torrents, and along that steep path scooped on the flank of the sharp cone of rock that pierces the sky like a needle. The very idea is appalling. Persia, once called Elam, and now only known to the natives under the name of Iran, contains twenty great provinces, the surface of which is extensively varied, some being comparatively level, while others are broken up into a wilderness of ridges and valleys. Upon the whole, it is mountainous, lines upon lines of ranges stretching from the Persian Gulf to the Caspian Sea, and from the banks of the river Tigris to the borders of the great Salt Desert,—ranges which are linked, geographically, with the stupendous Taurus and the Caucasus.

In the south, they are covered with forests; but in the north, they are dreary, bleak and barren. The pass represented in our illustration is one of the gateways opening from the maritime provinces of Persia in the interior. It is upwards of seven miles in length, and winds through the most dismal and shadowy precipices; a perpendicular wall rising in some parts upwards of a thousand feet from the ground—black, craggy, and huge at intervals with masses of dark vegetation. The road winds along the face of the mountain, crossing from side to side, over bridges that seem ready to be blown away by the blasts, that sometimes rush through these mountains. It is, at intervals, so narrow that a camel loaded in the ordinary manner could scarcely go by, while in others it appears as if suspended over bottomless chasms and rifts which terrify the traveller. In one of the precipitous rocks beyond the second bridge from the foreground, is a huge cavern, sometimes used by benighted wayfarers as a place of shelter, and sometimes infested by brigands. Still further, beyond the pass, are situated some beautiful valleys, where scarcely a human habitation is now to be seen. They were once inhabited by a very ancient tribe, which has been almost exterminated for its crimes. The few survivors have taken refuge in the almost inaccessible solitudes about the Pir-i-zun, where they subsist on a wretched kind of bread made from acorns, and thence, sallying forth, haunt the narrow, tortuous, and almost aerial road, thus enhancing its natural terrors, and rendering the traveller's progress extremely uncertain. Supposing a British force were to proceed from Bushire, on the coast, to Shiraz, in the interior of Fars, it would first march about twenty-four miles upon a moderately good highway, and then enter upon a stony tract, traversed by very difficult roads, winding up the sloping valleys to the mountain. About ninety-five or a hundred miles inland, it would enter upon a causeway having a lake of salt water on one side, and dangerous precipices on the other. It would then plunge amid the depths of the great pass of Cotul Dochur, which is, however, scarcely more than an introduction to the mightier pass of Pir-i-zun; but even here it would travel along a lofty road, with only a frail parapet wall as a protection against the abysses beneath, while, after an interval of three miles, Pir-i-zun itself opens its gloomy and stupendous portals, its towering rocks, its wondrously black defiles, its shades of oak forests, and its giddy bridges. Such are the difficulties which constitute the natural defence of Persia against an invasion from the sea. If the inhabitants were as brave and as skilful in the use of matchlocks as their foes, the Afghans, they might hold the region against myriads of assailants. They have built fortresses upon their mountain heights, but their artillery is by no means efficient; and though their cavalry is superb, their infantry is contemptible. Ten thousand regular troops and three thousand royal slaves constitute their standing army, the military strength of the empire consisting mainly in the numerical force and proved valor of the wandering tribes, which always contribute men and arms, in a certain proportion, during a period of war. Two hundred thousand soldiers might, in an extreme case, be collected for the service of the Shah. They receive little pay, but subsist to a great extent on plunder.

PUNJAB BATTERY.

The employment of elephants in oriental warfare adds a strange feature of romance to the movements, the sieges and battles in India. The enormous strength of these docile and intelligent animals, and their peculiar formation and habits, render them invaluable in transporting arms and ammunition from point to point. The fine engraving on the next page, representing a Punjab battery preparing to enter the Darwazai pass into the Kooram valley, will give our readers an exact idea of the way in which these valuable animals are rendered available. The picture is well worth a close examination. In transporting field batteries, the gun, a nine-pounder, or twenty-four pound howitzer, is placed on the first elephant, the carriage on a second, while a third is loaded with the ammunition. One of the elephants in the picture is being loaded with a gun-carriage; his companion already has a howitzer on his back. The kneeling elephant is receiving his load. While his mouth keeps him in position, the gun is hoisted horizontally up an inclined plane, four soldiers aiding its ascent with levers, while half a dozen are pulling on the ropes. Two men on the elephant's back steady and guide it by means of ropes. Another elephant bears a heavy caisson. In the distance, at the base of the precipitous hills, another portion of this formidable battery is seen.

HUGH MILLER, THE GEOLOGIST.

The portrait on this page is an excellent likeness of one of the remarkable men of this century—a genius in the truest sense of the word, whose recent tragical death by his own hand has caused the profoundest grief on both sides of the Atlantic. Hugh Miller was the son of a sea-faring man of Cromarty, a seaport village of Scotland, and was but five years old when his father's vessel was lost in a terrible storm, in company with many others. Being deeply imbued with those superstitious feelings which are still common in Scotland, he always believed that he had a premonition of his father's death, in the appearance of a white arm and hand seen waving through the mist at the moment when the storm was uttering its fiercest breath, and the hapless coasters were going down beneath its fury. Of course, some natural appearance was converted by the heated imagination of the youthful seer into the phantom hand that terrified his vision; but to the day of his death, that livid hand haunted his dreams. The boyhood of Miller passed without any striking premonitions of his future greatness. That he was fond of romances, and fairy tales, and legendary poetry, was by no means remarkable; for such is the taste of early youth, and such reading is common to all the peasantry of Scotland. Indeed the blending of imagination and of sound common sense and shrewdness, the mingled love of poetry and thrift, was ever a striking characteristic of Miller's country. The boy was fond of rambles—what boy is not?—and would pass hours by the shores of the great sea, gathering weeds and shells, and insensibly imbibing the inspiration of nature. He was sent to school, of course, but appears to have made little progress under his teachers. The Latin grammar revolted him, as it has done many a boy before him, and will many a one after him, until some genius invents a method of sugaring this bitter pill. Out of school, his lonely wanderings took him over valley, and plain, and sea-beach; and once, when he penetrated a deep cave by the sea-side, the tide came roaring in, closing up the outlet, and he came near perishing. It was while thus an involuntary prisoner that he made one of his most striking scientific discoveries. The energy of his character took a turn which might easily have conducted him to an ignoble end. He had more than one pugilistic encounter, and one memorable battle with a mulatto boy, in which, when his antagonist was getting the worst, the latter drew his knife on his victor; but before he could use it, young Miller had his own knife in his hand, and sheathed it in the mulatto's thigh, giving him a lesson which he ever afterwards remembered, and showing that he was not a boy to be trifled with. On another occasion, he was detected, with some comrades of his own age, in robbing an orchard, and the menace of legal punishment being held out to him, he fled, and hid himself in an inaccessible cave by the sea-side, armed with an old bayonet and the rusty barrel of a horse pistol. He finally quitted school in disgust at the discipline, and, for a time, seriously entertained thoughts of leading a vagabond existence by himself, after the fashion of Robinson Crusoe. His uncle, however, who acted as his guardian, induced him to commence life as a mason. In this capacity he exhibited more steadiness than his friends had hoped for, working industriously all day, and devoting his evenings to prose and poetical compositions. His raving disposition, however, kept him moving from one spot to another, partly in the hope of bettering his condition, and partly from a love of change. He met with many petty vicissitudes of fortune in his laborious career, sometimes obtaining high wages, and sometimes laboring for a bare pittance. In 1828, he set up as a stone-cutter at Laverghess, with indifferent success, and also published a volume of poems which was severely handled by the critics, and met with no success. But here a forfortunate incident happened to him. He met a beautiful and intelligent young lady, to whom he soon became warmly attached, and whom he married as soon as he obtained a vacant situation in the Cromarty bank. His salary was very small, and with the addition of his wife's earnings as a school-teacher, their income only amounted to about $500 a year. He, however, was able to increase this amount somewhat by writing for magazines, and, while working thus hard, pursued his geological investigations with characteristic ardor. It was while in the Cromarty bank that he identified the famous Pterichthys, or "winged fish," as a fossil of the old red sandstone, a discovery of the highest importance as bearing on the theory of development or transmutation of species. But he earned fame in another sphere, as the advocate of the cause of the adversaries of government, on the question of the great schism in the Kirk of Scotland. A letter on this subject, written by Miller and addressed to Lord Brougham, circulated all over the kingdom, and gave the author such a reputation that the Free Churchmen invited him to take charge of a paper established in their interest, the "Witness," of which he remained the chief editor until the time of his death. In Edinburgh, he published, in succession, his great works, "The Old Red Sandstone," and "Foot-prints of the Creator." The first work gave him a universal reputation—each of his subsequent works enhanced it. The grandeur of his themes, the force with which they are treated, and the purity of their style, will cause them to be read as long as the language in which they are written endures. His "Autobiography" is one of his most agreeable and popular minor productions. His health and mind finally broke down under the pressure of intellectual labor. Book writing, editing, lecturing and scientific study were all pursued together. No human power could endure such a strain. His keen imagination now became morbidly active. His slumbers were brief and peopled with gloomy phantoms. His excessive labor on his last work, "The Testimony of the Rocks," completed his prostration. He, always a courageous man, cowered at the thought of robbers. He kept a perfect armory of weapons at his bed side—revolver, dagger and broadsword. Terrible puns in his head were followed by agonizing spasms and indescribable visions. He felt at times as if a sharp dagger had been driven through his brain. The evening before his death was spent with his family in pleasant social intercourse. After supper, to gratify his children, he read them several humorous pieces, and retired to his room apparently in a tranquil frame of mind. His physician had prescribed some medicine for him, to be taken before retiring to rest; but this he did not touch, as he had an invincible repugnance to drugs. In the morning he was found lying lifeless on the hearth-rug, having shot himself with his revolver, in a paroxysm of insanity. Thus died one of the most distinguished scientific men of this century. His life is an instructive instance of what may be accomplished by energy and perseverance; his death a warning example of the fatal consequences of an over-train of the mental powers. Had he economized his strength, instead of expending it in gigantic efforts to produce a vast amount of work in a short space of time, he might still be living.

HUGH MILLER, THE SCOTCH GEOLOGIST.

A PUNJAUB BATTERY ENTERING THE DURWANZAL PASS.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE WIDOW'S LIGHT.

BY ELIZABETH DOTEN.

He doeth much who loveth much; he doeth much who doeth well.—THOMAS A KEMPIS.

He doeth much who loveth much:
He doeth much who doeth well;
But childlike hearts, and only such,
To love and wisdom shall excel.
Upon a rock beside the sea,
There dwelt a widow poor and old:
No kith or kin on earth had she,
And all her wealth might soon be told.

The sea-gulls on their snowy wings
Swept past her cottage to and fro;
While stately ships, like living things,
All richly freighted passed below.
Full often in the midnight dark,
Amid the wind and water's roar,
Had many a brave and gallant bark
Gone down upon that dangerous shore.

And many an agonizing cry,
When none were near to help or save,
Rose wildly up to God on high,
Above the roar of wind or wave.
There often on that stormy shore
Had many a lifeless form found place,
With anguish far too great for speech
Still pictured on the pallid face.

And often had the widow wept
Such tears as pitying spirits shed,
When down the slippery rocks she crept,
And gazed upon the silent dead.
Then, with the gleanings of her toil,
She trimmed her humble lamp at night,
And rose to keep with midnight oil
The beacon's waning lustre bright.

The widow's light had naught to boast:
Yet there from year to year it shone;
And all along that dangerous coast
To every mariner was known.
And many a grateful heart was stirred
To bless the widow's humble name.
When, ere the breaker's roar was heard,
He saw on high that feeble flame.

And there it shone with steady ray,
Until one night, with quivering breath,
It lit the widow's lonely way
Across the troubled sea of death.
The peace of God abides with such—
For be the talent ne'er so small,
He doeth much who loveth much.
And lives not for himself, but all.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE HEIR'S TRAGEDY:

—OR—

THE TOWER OF DOOM.

BY JOHN ROSS DIX.

CHAPTER I.

THE TOWER.

"NEVER been there before, sir? Bless my heart, then mayhap you have not heard the story about that tower, sir,—and a curious sort of one it is."

No, I had heard no story whatever of the half-ruin which I had visited that morning; and so I informed Mr. Solomon Spiggott, landlord of the "Ring of Bells," which tintrabulary title belonged to one of those quaint, old-fashioned little roadside taverns that flourished when railways were not, and are now known but to the few who like myself are fond of pedestrianizing.

I had, during the last twelve months, been accomplishing the usual European tour, and was now settling down for a fortnight's quiet enjoyment in one of the loveliest portions of the west of England, previous to returning to my native city of Boston. On the morning of the day of which I am speaking, I had been rambling along the sides of that river, down which floated the first steam-vessel that was built for the special purpose of crossing the Atlantic—the Great Western. Plunging into the roads on my right hand, I ascended through tangled and winding paths to a considerable distance, and at length emerged on a grassy upland, some three hundred feet above the surface of the river. From this spot the scene was magnificent, and it embraced almost every requisite which the artist could desire. It was, indeed, a very paradise for painters; but as I have no great liking for prose descriptions of the picturesque, which in nine cases out of ten are prosy enough, I shall leave word-painting to other pens, and only notice one feature in the landscape. This was a singular-looking edifice perched on the very edge of a crag which rose near four hundred feet from the bottom of the gorge through which the Avon flowed to the British Channel. It seemed half dwelling-house, half castle, the latter appearance being given to it by an octagonal tower, which had one window pierced in the stonework near its summit. The house portion seemed to have been erected long after the tower; indeed, it appeared to have been rather stuck on than built to it, without any reference whatever to architectural consistency or suitability to the charming scenery around.

I found on inquiring at the house that on payment of a small fee I could ascend the tower and view the prospect therefrom. Mounting a circular flight of stone stairs, I reached an octagonal apartment, forming what might be called the attic of the structure.

There was no appearance, however, of any other room ever having existed in it. In this chamber was a fire-place, the grate of which had long ago fallen out. Nothing else seemed to indicate that the room had ever been inhabited. A short ladder led to a trapdoor which opened on the roof, where I lingered for some time admiring the surrounding scenery, and then, descending, made the best of my way to "The Ring of Bells."

"Mr. Spiggott," said I, after I had done ample justice to the bacon and eggs which formed my dinner, "you said something a little while ago respecting a story connected with the tower that I visited this morning; now suppose you relate it to me over a bowl of egg flip, of which your good wife is such an excellent brewer."

"With all my heart, sir." And the landlord called to his "Missus" to prepare the beverage, which she proudly did from a "receipt," as she said, which had been in the possession of the "Ring of Bells" from time immemorial.

"Deed, sir," she remarked, as she placed the steaming concoction on the table, "that's the reason why the ringers are painted on one side of our sign and the flip jug on the other."

There was such an evident dignity in her manners as she made that assertion, that I felt as though the said signboard commanded my respect, and regarded it with attention accordingly. It was one of those old, swinging, square-shaped signs so familiar to highway and by-way travellers to the rural districts of England. This particular one was attached to the bough of a noble elm tree which grew in front of the house, and pleasantly protected it from summer's heat and winter's blast. Sign painting in the strict sense of the phrase, is not "high art," and certainly the artist who produced the pictures on Mr. Spiggott's panels was more ambitious in his designs than fortunate in their execution. The "Ring of Bells" was represented by six gentlemen in shirt-sleeves, red, green and yellow waistcoats, many-colored knee-breeches, and hob-nailed shoes, in the act of frantically pulling at ropes connected with the wheels of six bells, which performed somersaults in a transparent belfry. It was a happy thought of the artist to let the bells be visible, for had he not made a section of the tower for that purpose, what with the ropes dangling and twisting over the heads of the ringers and the amazing attitudes of those joy-producing gentlemen, they might easily have been mistaken for hardened culprits in the agonies of strangulation. On the reverse of this great effort of genius was painted a blue jug of foaming flip, beneath which were two tobacco-pipes displayed cross-bones fashion; the name, in gold letters, of Solomon Spiggott, the landlord, and the following verse, which some, "mute, inglorious Milton" had presented to the house in lieu of his score, and which Mrs. Spiggott declared was a "mirrykle," which undoubtedly it was if a miracle means anything very unnatural indeed:

"I sel spiggott do live here
I sell Good brandy, Gin And beer
I Maid My sine A Little Wiler to Let you Know I Sells Good cider."

"Now for the story, Mr. Spiggott," I said, as that gentleman smacked his lips after tossing off a glass of the flip.

"You must know, sir, to begin with, that the tower up yonder is called Cook's Folly."

"An odd name enough," I remarked. "Pray, why did it receive such a one?"

"Ah! that's just it, sir," he went on. "It is an odd name, but the reason of it is odder still. The story might be true, or some cunning chap might have made it up, but leastways, here it is."

"A good many years ago, I'm sure I can't tell exactly how many, but that's neither here nor there, there lived in this neighborhood a rich gentleman named Cook—Squire Maurice Cook, as he was generally called in these parts. Although not over fifty years old, he had been married several times, but each of his wives had died leaving him childless. You may be sure that was a great trouble to him, for he had no end of money, and who to leave it to when he died he didn't know, for he had no near relations, and was of such retired habits that he neither received nor paid visits. Now, sir, I can understand somehow how he felt, for I've scraped up a few pounds myself, and certainly I should like some of my own flesh and blood to leave it to, and bless God—"

Here Mr. Spiggott abruptly broke off in his narrative, and looked archly at Mrs. Spiggott, who was leaning over the little half-door that separated the back parlor from our sitting-room. No sooner, however, did that lady hear the delicate allusion of her husband than she colored like a peony—told Mr. Spiggott that he "ought to be ashamed of himself," and then hurriedly retired into private life. Two or three minutes afterwards, as I glanced casually through an uncurtained window, sure enough, I saw her busy as a bee working on a remarkably small cap, which I fancied threw some light on Mr. Spiggott's passing allusion to the individual to whom he should like to bequeath his property.

"Well, sir," he went on, "after Squire Cook had been for years a widower, and for the third time, a very beautiful young lady came down to the Hartwells, close by, for the benefit of the waters, and so the Squire, who met her frequently walking in Nightingale Valley, fell desperately in love with her. She was more than twenty years younger than himself—but he was very rich, and had a fine estate, and she was very poor, and her face was her only fortune, as the milkmaid in the story says. After a time they married, and greatly to the joy of her husband, before twelve months had elapsed there was every prospect of Mrs. Cook's presenting her husband with that for which he had so long and so ardently wished—one who should inherit his name and wealth."

"Squire Cook had always been of a superstitious turn of mind, and now he became more engaged with mysterious investigations than ever. He had a room fitted up in his house to which he allowed no one whatever to have access. This place he furnished and filled with all sorts of outlandish apparatus, such as globes, telescopes, crucibles, furnaces, and I know not what besides. There would he sit, moping over books with strange characters in them, from dawn until dark, and half the night he stared through telescopes at the moon and stars. As the time approached when his child was expected to be born, he became more and more anxious, and to the old nurse's amazement he promised her a handsome present if she would note exactly the instant of the little stranger's appearance in the world, as it was a matter of utmost importance that he should know it, in order to cast its nativity; and, moreover, he declared that if the child should be a boy he would have a fat ox roasted whole in his park, and present every man in the parish with a guinea and a gallon of strong beer. You may be sure that every one prayed for a boy; and as providence would have it, a boy it was, and all I can say is, I hope, sir, that I may have the same luck."

"There, Sol, do hold your tongue, do," called out Mrs. Spiggott from her private retirement.

At this, Mr. Spiggott archly winked at me, and significantly pointed his right fore-finger in the direction of the parlor, as though he had said, "You see, sir, women will have their say; but she's as pleased as I am for all that."

"As I was saying, sir, it was a boy; and of all the boys that ever were born, there never had been heard tell of such a one as that. Now, poor folk's babies are nothing but common little lumps of original sin, but this was a ready-made angel—none of your common crockery, but real porcelain, at least everybody said so, and of course what every one says must be true. All the women in the neighborhood went wild about it, and from morning till night there was nothing but candle-drinking, for there was not a lady of quality in the neighborhood who did not visit Mrs. Cook when she got well enough to sit up. They poked their fore-fingers into the infant's chubby cheeks, admired its odd little legs, that kept jerking about as though it had swallowed quicksilver, praised its eyes, discovered impossible likenesses, rubbed its unfortunate head with gin to keep it from catching cold, and tortured its intestines with every sort of physic, to which, like all sensible babies, it exhibited the greatest repugnance. In short, the baby was a sovereign for the time being, Mrs. Coospegs, the nurse, being its prime minister, and everybody else, father and mother included, its abject subjects and adorers. It was remarked as a somewhat strange thing that in the midst of this general joy, he, who it might have been imagined would have shared the most in it, became, soon after the birth of his child, moody, irritable, and more than ever inclined to seek the solitude of his study. Occasionally, indeed, he took his child in his arms, but after playing with it for a little time, he would look with unutterable sadness into its face, hastily place it in its nurse's lap, and with a deep frown quit the room. And now, sir," added Mr. Spiggott, "with your permission I'll fill the jug again."

That important operation having been performed, he imbibed a brimming glassfull, took three or four whiffs at his pipe, then gravely laid it beside him in the chimney corner, and proceeded with his story.

CHAPTER II.

THE PROPHECY.

"A GIRL, you know, sir," said Mr. Spiggott, "is never so happy as when she is dressing and undressing her doll, or acting the part of a little mother to it. It seems to be a practice designed for them by Providence against the time when they come to have babies in reality. Well, Mrs. Cook completely made an idol of little Ernest, for so he was named, after a deceased brother of his father, and though her husband was perpetually warning her not to set her heart too much upon the child, every day but seemed to increase her devotion to him. And little wonder that it was so, for he grew and thrived wonderfully, passing through all the usual diseases incident to infancy with scarcely any inconvenience."

"As Mr. Cook became more and more engaged with his astronomical or astrological studies, it naturally followed that his mother was almost his sole companion. In her walks and rides through the beautiful scenery of Clifton he was never absent, and it was during one of the former that an adventure occurred destined to exert a remarkable influence on Ernest's future fortunes."

"In Leigh Woods, a beautiful and extensive belt of forest land which almost encircled the domain of Squire Cook, were very many charming walks, which afforded every variety of sylvan scenery. In one of the numerous glens and dells, named Nightingale Valley, from the number of those birds who frequented it, Mrs. Cook especially delighted to stroll with her little boy, now just seven years of age. That part of the country was then so quiet and peaceable that she never dreamed of needing protection, only the wild deer sprang occasionally across the green-sward, or the hare rustled among the dead leaves of the last autumn. In these walks and talks it was her delight to watch the dawning intelligence of the lad, and to afford him that culture which mothers know so well how to bestow. As yet, though his father was tenderly attached to Ernest, he had not commenced his part of the work of education,—but in all possible ways Mr. Cook was preparing to act as a tutor, for he had secretly made up his mind never to allow his son and heir to receive instruction away from home. It was in vain that Mrs. Cook urged the beneficial influences of a public school. For some reason, which he was either unable or declined to state, the father rigidly adhered to his plan of home tuition."

"One sunny evening in June, as mother and son were loitering in the Nightingale Valley, which I have alluded to, Mrs. Cook was startled by the sudden appearance of a gipsy woman, who, bursting through a light growth of underwood, confronted her in her path and boldly stood before her. Mrs. Cook instinctively grasped her child's hand more firmly, and for a few seconds the lady and gipsy eyed each other keenly, while the little boy clung to his mother's robe, and trembled with fear.

"The gipsy was a splendid specimen of her singular race. In stature she was over the middle height, as erect as a palm tree, and in her motions as graceful also. Over her long, jet black hair, which fell in waves over her neck and shoulders, was fastened a scarlet hood, forming a rich contrast to their glossy luxuriance. Eyes, dark as jet, flashed and glowed beneath superbly arched brows, and her nose had that slightly aquiline formation which gives a characteristic of command to the whole face. Proudly curled the short upper lip, just disclosing teeth as white as the purest of pearls. The chin was finely chiselled, and the whole head set upon a neck as flexible and graceful as that of the giraffe. A rich, olive complexion bespoke the Moorish origin of the stranger, and a brilliantly colored shawl encircling the waist added to her somewhat oriental appearance. For a few minutes neither spoke. The lady was the first to break silence.

"Let me pass," she said, softly but decisively, as she attempted to proceed, drawing her frightened child after her.

"Will not the lovely lady first cross the palm of the poor gipsy?" asked the other, at the same time stretching out her hand.

"Away, woman!" exclaimed Mrs. Cook, scornfully; "if you dare further obstruct my path, on my return to my home these woods shall be scourged and every one of your vagrant tribe be scattered with blood-hound and gun."

"Alas! for poor Zingaree!" said the gipsy, mournfully; and then suddenly snatching the hand of the child, she regarded his soft white palm with flashing eyes. But for a few moments she detained it, then letting it fall, she looked scornfully into the mother's eyes, and exclaimed: "Yes, with hounds and arms you may drive away the Zingarees, but you cannot avoid coming dangers, lady. I have read the book of fate—would you know aught of the secrets which are written on its pages?"

"Legible only to your eyes, you would have me believe," remarked the lady, disdainfully.

"Even so," replied the gipsy, as she lifted her hand and pointed to the stars. "Nor am I the only one who consults yonder eternal oracles. Your husband, too, would fain read their records of the future; but poor is his skill when compared with that of the poor wandering Zingaree."

"Mrs. Cook knew well that her husband occupied much of his time in astrological speculations, but was not a little surprised that the gipsy also should be acquainted with the circumstances. The fact that she was so, somewhat staggered her, and she hastily asked to what coming dangers she had just now referred, at the same time slipping a gold piece into her hand.

"Is it to me or to my child?" asked she, anxiously, after an interval of silence.

"The gipsy glanced from one to the other, and in a low, thrilling voice, answered:

"To both!"

"And the nature of it?" almost gasped Mrs. Cook, whose anxiety respecting her child had overcome all her scruples respecting the fortune-teller.

"That I can only foreshadow—not foretell. I warn, though I cannot prevent."

"Warn—prevent! For the sake of Heaven, give me but some hint of aught dangerous to my child, and gold without stint shall be yours, of which this is but an earnest." And she now placed a broad piece in the brown hand of the singular being before her.

"Your hand, lady," and Mrs. Cook resigned her delicate palm to the sorceress.

"Muttering some unintelligible words, she gazed at it long and anxiously, ever and anon indicating on it with her own forefinger various imaginary lines, circles and angles. At length, after a long pause, she thus spoke:

"For thy son, lady, the perilous seven years of childhood are passed."

"There needs no sorceress to tell me that," almost sneered the lady.

"But," continued the woodland sybil, scarcely heeding her, "before seven years more shall have elapsed, a terrible and a heavy calamity shall befall him; and between his twentieth and twenty-first year his life will hang tremblingly for the balance of fate. Should he pass over his twenty-first birthday his life will be long, prosperous and happy."

"The sorceress was turning away, when the lady caught her arm, and eagerly besought a reply to one other question.

"Name it," said the gipsy.

"From what quarter is this last peril to be expected? In merey, speak, if in your bosom are any womanly sympathies—if you know aught of the earnestness and depth of a mother's love."

"From a quarter whence it is least expected your son may receive a secret and a sadder blow, which it given will assuredly prove his destruction."

"From an enemy?" was the next eager question.

"That I may not reveal. Farewell!" And the gipsy plunging into the copse was seen no more."

CHAPTER III.

THE FULFILMENT.

"But the tower, Mr. Spiggott, the tower," I just hinted to my landlord. "I want you to come to that, for you must know I am fond of legends connected with these particular structures. For instance, I was vastly interested in the mysterious round towers of Ireland; and then there was a tower on the Rhine in which the wicked Bishop Hatto was eaten up alive by rats, and—"

"I'm just coming to our tower, sir," quietly remarked my host, "and you will see presently that all this time I have been, as it were, laying the foundation of it."

"Good," said I. "And Mrs. Spiggott, shall I trouble you to replenish the flip jug?"

And Mr. Spiggott, having, after his draught, taken a few more whiffs apparently for the purpose of arranging his ideas, proceeded as follows:

"You may be certain that as soon as Mrs. Cook got home she made her husband acquainted with all that had transpired in Nightingale Valley. Instead of pooh, poohing it, as she expected, he lent a most attentive ear to her story, and at its conclusion remarked that it was very strange—very strange indeed.

"I, too," he said, "had arrived at the conviction that great dangers threatened our dear son, but my astrological studies failed to indicate the precise period when they were to be expected. To be forewarned is to be forearmed, and we must not fling aside the gipsy's prophecy as valueless."

"And Mr. Cook repaired to his study where for many a day afterwards he made all sorts of wonderful calculations—covered innumerable sheets of paper with crisscrossed diagrams—committed astrological burglaries in the "houses" of almost all the planets, and attended to scarcely any other than zodiacal business. But with all his drawings, he found himself at the end of several years as much in the dark as ever. But he was an enthusiast, and when once on his hobby it was next to impossible to get him off it.

"And so time passed on. Ernest Cook grew in stature and in knowledge, for his father had secured him the best of tutors at home. Six years had elapsed and the gipsy's prophecy was almost forgotten, when a terrible and unlooked-for calamity indeed befell him. This was the sudden and unexpected death of his mother—and a greater trouble he could scarcely have known. Thus was the first part of the gipsy's prediction fulfilled, both as it regarded mother and son. Maurice Cook, as soon as he recovered from the profound grief into which the catastrophe had plunged him, with renewed energy resumed his astrological studies in the wild hope of discovering and warding off the peril which threatened his son's existence when his manhood should dawn.

Besides this, he adopted the most stringent regulations with respect to young Ernest's pursuits and companions—indeed, the poor youth was under as strict surveillance as though he had been a Spanish lady, who was never allowed to be out of the sight of her duenna, instead of the handsome, dashing, mettlesome young fellow that in reality he was. He was forbidden sailing in a boat or swimming lest he should be drowned; he was not permitted to mount a horse lest he should be thrown. Shooting was especially forbidden, and in fact only one danger was overlooked,—he fell, neither into the water nor over a precipice, but what was much pleasanter, though almost as perilous, he fell desperately in love with the daughter of his tutor, who "broke the fall" so adroitly that only his heart was affected thereby. That species of heart disease does not, however, often prove fatal, and so old Maurice Cook rather encouraged the evident fondness of the young people for each other than checked it, because,—short-sighted old gentleman,—he thought the society of the charming little maiden would effectually prevent his son seeking other associations which might be dangerous or even fatal. 'Ah!' he would say to himself, 'let Ernest but safely get over his twenty-first year and then, bidding farewell to his boyish attachment, he will, from the great lottery of society, infallibly draw a prize better suited to his means and position than the daughter of a poor tutor.'

"Four years passed by in this way, and at the end of that period Mr. Cook's friends and neighbors were surprised greatly to find that he was building a tower on a high crag overlooking the Avon, the waters of the British Channel, and the distant mountains of North Wales. Although numberless questions were put to him, he failed to satisfy any one as to his object in building the tower in such an out of the way situation. Day by day it slowly rose, until at last it reached an elevation of nearly one hundred feet. It was completely isolated. There was one door at its base, and but one window near its summit. It was asserted that furniture was conveyed to the tower by night, and that the one chamber it contained was fitted up most luxuriously, but for whom and for what purpose nobody could with any approach to certainty conjecture, though many shrewd guesses were made on the subject.

"Like every one else, young Ernest Cook was utterly ignorant of his father's plans and purposes—in truth, he paid but little attention to the tower at all, so engaged was he in the pursuit of his darling Emily. In a little more than one year more, he thought, his forced constraint would be at an end, and then, careless of gipsy predictions, or indeed of anything else, the world which he panted to see would be no longer a sealed book, and Emily would be entirely his own. One evening, it was that immediately preceding his twentieth birthday, Ernest received a summons from his father to accompany him on a walk to the tower.

"And Emily—may she not go with us this lovely evening? She is all anxiety to see what mysteries you have shut up there."

"Not so, my son. I have that to say which you alone must hear. Go and bid her adieu; but on no account let her leave the house to-night."

"Maurice Cook and his son went forth and speedily reached the foot of the tower. Taking from his pocket a key, the old gentleman unlocked the massive door and entered, his son following. Slowly he led the way up the winding stairs, and when they entered the apartment above, young Cook burst into a paroxysm of delight at the scene which met his glance.

"And for whom may this charming little apartment be intended?" he asked, after he had minutely examined the books, pictures, statues, and the other curious articles of luxury and convenience which were everywhere to be seen.

"For you, my dear son," was the reply.

"My dear, dear father, how kind, how good of you to prepare such a surprise against my birthday. But see; in this alcove is a bed. Why, I declare, one could pass the night here, and fancy on looking from the window that the waking was in paradise!"

"And now, Ernest, be seated, and listen attentively to what I have to say. You have ever been a good and obedient child, and I doubt not that you will never give me cause to say otherwise."

"Ernest assented his father that he should never find him fail in the fulfillment of any filial duty. The old man then tenderly laid his hands on his head, and to the utter consternation of the youth, said:

"Ernest, for you I have built this tower—for you furnished this chamber—and I am now going to leave you in the sole possession of it. Here you will remain until you shall have passed over your twenty-first birthday. Already you know the prediction of the sorceress—a prediction which my astrological researches have amply corroborated. To guard against the possibility of your being destroyed by any secret or open foe, and to prevent any mischance befalling you, I have determined to make this tower your home for the next twelve months."

"O, say not so, father!" almost groaned the agitated young man. "I never, never shall be able to survive such a long captivity; and he burst into a flood of passionate tears.

"But you will not be altogether lonely. Every morning and every evening will I repair to the foot of the tower; and Emily, too, I imagine, will be no infrequent visitor there also. See, in this basket you will daily draw up such provisions and other matters as may be needful for you. So cautious shall I be that nothing hurtful may approach you, that the door below will be built up to-night. I know you will at first feel your confinement irksome, but with books and study the season of danger will speedily pass away, and you yourself will not hail with more delight than your father the morning after you attain your twenty-first year. And now my son, farewell. Since this thing must happen for your good, bear it patiently, as it is the only means I can adopt in order to preserve you to be a solace in my declining years."

"The young man bowed his head in silence; but not for one moment did he rebel against an arrangement which he felt was made from pure love to himself. Soon the old man's step was heard descending the stone staircase. After a time, Ernest knew from peculiar sounds that masons were building up the doorway, and then resigning himself to what he could not avoid, he fell asleep, and woke not until the early sunbeams penetrated the one window of his lofty chamber.

"Day after day dragged slowly along with both father and son, who never failed, however, to see each other twice at least during the twenty-four hours. Every night and morning the basket descended and rose again, filled with food and wine, and at certain times, also, fagots of wood for firing were hoisted up the tower by means of the little windlass. Spite of the want of exercise, the young man's health remained good; indeed, he suffered far less than his parent, who, as the day of his son's liberation grew nearer and nearer, became anxious and irritable to a painful degree. At last, the evening before the twenty-first birthday arrived, and Maurice Cook and Emily stood at the bottom of the tower.

"To-morrow at daybreak, dear Ernest, all fear will be at an end. As soon as the sun rises, I will be here with workmen to break down the stony barrier which keeps you from my arms, and we will return to our home together. Thank God! there is nothing now to cause anxiety. But be careful, Ernest, be careful; and as the night is chilly, I bethink me you had better draw up this last fagot which remains. Let down the rope and I will fasten it thereto."

"Nay, indeed, my father," replied Ernest, "the thought of soon rejoining you will afford me sufficient warmth. I pray you go home, and I will be up with the dawn to escape from my cage."

"But the old man was urgent, so after he had fastened the remaining bundle of fagots to the cord, Ernest drew it up, and the window was closed for the last time.

"Scarcely had the sun risen next morning over the fair woods of Leigh, when Maurice Cook, accompanied by workmen, repaired to the tower in order to liberate his son. The dreaded year of peril had passed away, and his heart beat lightly as he anticipated once more clasping his beloved child in his now aged arms. To his great surprise, however, he observed on drawing near the spot that the easement of Ernest's room was still barred. He shouted aloud but received no reply, and at length, exhausted by his efforts, directed the masonry of the doorway to be broken down, which task was soon accomplished. But still the window remained closed, and an undefined tremor thrilled through the father's heart as he commenced mounting the staircase. All was still as death, and when he arrived at the chamber door not a sound indicated wakefulness or watchfulness within. He paused for a moment, a strange fear creeping over him. Then with one desperate effort he pushed the door open, and with a wild shriek sank on the ground insensible. For on the floor of his chamber lay, stark and cold, the body of his son, who but a few brief hours before he had left full of health and hope. Hearing his shriek, the workmen rushed up from below, and it was then discovered that both Ernest Cook and his father were numbered no longer among the living, for the latter had died of a broken heart.

"In that very last bundle of fagots which the old man had insisted on his son's drawing up, a viper had sought concealment. Warmed by the heat of the room, it had recovered from its torpidity and stung the unfortunate youth in the very last hour of his precautionary imprisonment, thus fulfilling the prophecy of the Gipsy of Nightingale Valley."

CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

Though we have previously given some views of this flourishing and interesting city, yet as there remained several striking points for illustration, we have continued the series in the present number. The drawings were all made expressly for us, on the spot, by Mr. Kilburn, and are as reliable for their accuracy as they are pleasing in pictorial effect. Our first view is of Clark Street Bridge, a very peculiar structure. This bridge swings on a pivot in the centre, and like the Lake Street Bridge, seems to be constantly in motion from the immense amount of passing on the street and the river. Indeed if our artist had introduced all the craft that at times crowd this point, he would have produced a confused mass of shipping. This bridge is a highly ornamental structure.—The second view is taken on Lake Street, one of the principal thoroughfares and business streets of the city. It presents a splendid array of fine, substantial and elegant structures. The principal feature in our view is the Marine Bank building, an imposing pile, very finely proportioned and producing an impressive architectural effect. The bustle and vitality of this street is well characterized and delineated.—The railroad station of the Illinois Central and Michigan Central Railroads is a spacious structure and a noble specimen of architecture. The north part, of which we present a view, is somewhat irregular in detail, but not the less striking in appearance from that very circumstance. This immense building is situated on Water Street, and is the largest building of the kind in the United States. It is five hundred and four feet long, and one hundred and sixty-six and a half feet in width. The principal building is eighty-four feet high, and the roof is a self-supporting arch of thirty-six feet rise. The ticket-office occupies a conspicuous place near the main entrance, and near the spacious and convenient ladies' and gentlemen's waiting-rooms. There are eight tracks laid within the building. As a whole it is a model railway station, being in every respect superior to any in the country.—Our last view presents one among the many grain houses of the city, belonging to the Chicago and Galena Railroad. Its architectural appearance is quite unique, but well adapted to the purpose for which it was built. In the foreground is a primitive ferry-boat which was in use at the time our artist made his sketch.—Chicago has become the greatest grain-market in the world; the receipts for 1854 being 2,946,924 bushels of wheat, 6,745,588 of Indian corn, and 4,024,216 of oats, rye and barley; total, 13,726,728 bushels. Chicago is undoubtedly destined to be the chief commercial emporium of the northwest, a distinction it will owe to its commanding position. It is difficult to believe that less than thirty years ago it was a mere trading-post amidst the wigwams of the red men. But in the history of our country, the marvels of fable are eclipsed by the marvels of reality. The wilderness literally disappears before the coming multitudes; cities spring up as if by magic; forests are obliterated as rapidly as if a whirlwind swept them from the face of the earth. The ingenuity and enterprise of man, aiding the bounties of Providence, will raise this country to a height of splendor and prosperity, the like of which the world never beheld before.

CLARK STREET BRIDGE, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

CIRCASSIAN SLAVES.

Although the slave trade has been nominally abolished in Turkey, and the public mart formally closed to this traffic, yet the practice of buying and selling has not been, nor will it ever be altogether abandoned, because the slave constitutes an essential element in the composition of their domestic institutions. There are two kinds of servitude in every house; one, the ordinary labor of domestic service; the other that of personal attendance; neither of which the free Mussulman women are willing to perform, because they will thereby be more or less brought in contact with men, which is proscribed by the Koran. The slave service, therefore, becomes necessarily indispensable with the Mussulmans, whose houses have hitherto been supplied with Circassian and Nubian slaves, the former being a species of ladies in waiting, and the latter performing the menial services of the household. The average price of the slaves is, according to the tariff at the custom-house, $500 for the white, and $100 for the black. They bring these prices when they arrive fresh from their native lands. Those of the Circassian who are, however, brought into the country in childhood, and carefully educated and trained in accomplishments, attain so rare a style of beauty and delicacy of appearance that they are frequently sold for $6000 or $8000. Though the restrictions upon the trade have forced Turkish families to employ Greek and Armenian women in their houses, yet there is always a demand for slaves. The Armenians having the same institution as the Mussulmans, viz., the harem, their maidens are prevented from free, and they also render their mothers free; an odaluk may be sold alone, but never after she has become a mother. Besides the maids of honor or ladies in waiting, at the palace, are often bestowed in marriage upon pashas and other dignitaries, who thus consider themselves in some sense allied to royalty. One of their number was a slave to Valide Sultan. She was married to Mehmed Bey, the brother of the sultan's brother-in-law, with the idea of ameliorating her condition; but being very ill-treated by her husband, she had a petition written and presented it to her royal patroness, whereupon the valide summoned the husband, and reprimanded him in such a manner that he became exasperated, and having intoxicated himself with racy, or Turkish brandy, rushed into the harem, and plunged his dagger into the breast of the unfortunate wife. Sultan Mahmud lost his favorite wife, and was so much grieved by her death, that he ordered her apartments to be locked up, and that no one should enter them; he only spent some time there every day in solitary meditation upon his lost favorite. There was a slave girl, fourteen or fifteen years old, whose duty was to clean the bath belonging to these apartments. She was so curious to know why these rooms were always locked up, that she one day found herself on an exploring expedition by means of the private staircase. Finding the door open, she ventured to enter the apartment, when, lo! and behold! there was the awful Mahmoud himself. He said—"How dare you venture here—do you not know my express commands?" The terrified girl fell at his majesty's feet and craved pardon. She was so bewitching in this posture, that the sultan not only pardoned her, but invited her to meet him every day in the same place, till at last he ordered that the apartments should be appropriated to her, and she became the Fifth Kadun, and the mother of the present sultan! It is the idea of such honors which induces the Circassians to sell their daughters to Mussulmans.—Oscanyan.

LAKE STREET, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

HAVE A PURPOSE.

Sir E. Bulwer Lytton, in his recent address on the occasion of his installation as Lord Rector of Glasgow University, endeavored to impress upon the minds of the students the value of a definite purpose in life in the following admirable language: "Having once chosen that calling which then becomes your main object in life, cling to it firmly—bring to bear upon it all your energies, all the information you are elsewhere variously collecting. All men are not born with genius, but every man can acquire purpose, and purpose is the backbone and marrow of genius; nay, I can scarcely distinguish one from the other. For what is genius? Is it not an impassioned predilection for some definite art or study, to which the mind converges all its energies, each thought or image that is suggested by nature or learning, solitude or converse, being habitually and involuntarily added to those ideas which are ever returning to the same central point, so that the mind is not less busily applying when it seems to be the most released from application. That is genius and that is purpose, the one makes the great artist or poet, the other the great man of action. And with purpose comes the grand secret of worldly success, which some men call will, but what I would rather call earnestness. If I were asked, from my experience of life, to say what attribute most impressed the minds of others or most commanded fortune, I should say earnestness. * * The earnest man wins way for himself, and earnestness and truth go together. Never affect to be other than you are—either richer or wiser. Never be ashamed to say, 'I do not know.' Men will then believe you when you say, 'I do know.' Never be ashamed to say, whether as applied to time or money, 'I cannot afford it,' 'I cannot afford to waste an hour in the idleness to which you invite me—I cannot afford the guinea you ask me to throw away.' Once establish yourself and your mode of life as what they really are, and your foot is on solid ground, whether for the gradual step onward, or for the sudden spring over a precipice. From these maxims let me deduce another—learn to say 'No' with decision; 'Yes' with caution—'No' with decision whenever it resists temptation; 'Yes' with caution whenever it implies a promise. A promise once given is a bond inviolable. A man is already of consequence in the world when it is known that we can implicitly rely upon him. I have frequently seen in life a person preferred to a long list of applicants, for some important charge which lifts him at once into station and fortune, merely because he has this reputation, that when he says he knows a thing he knows it, and when he says he will do a thing he will do it. Mase, gentlemen, over these maxims; you will find it easy enough to practise them, for when you have added them together the sum total looks very much like—a Scotchman."

DEPOT OF THE ILLINOIS AND THE MICHIGAN CENTRAL RAILROADS.

A DECLINING BRANCH OF COMMERCE.

In one branch of industry foreign competition is unmistakably distancing the makers of this country. We allude to the manufacture of watches. The demand for these useful articles has enormously increased during the last ten years. That increased demand has been mainly met by foreign makers, and not by the trade of our country. It is calculated that during the year 1825, not more than 200,000 watches were made in this country, while we find that the yearly production in the district of Neuchâtel alone is upwards of 1,500,000. Why is it that in this department we are not equal to foreign competition? Mr. John Bennett, of Cheapside, who has been delivering some interesting lectures on "Women and Watchwork," tells us the reason, or rather the reasons, why. The success of the Swiss he attributes in the first place to the superiority of their art education, and in the second place to the employment of women in some descriptions of watch manufacture. The prompter of the reform is anxious that our artisans should be imbued with a higher taste, and that the labor of women should be taken advantage of in those branches in which the females of Switzerland are found to succeed so well. Of course any attempt to introduce female labor will meet with the opposition of the workmen, who would imagine that such a proceeding would be taking the bread out of their mouths. As experience, however, has proved, in the introduction of machinery, that the apprehended evil is a positive blessing to the working man, so would it be found in this case that the employment of females, far from injuring the male operatives, would ultimately tend to their advantage. By cheapening the production, the demand for watches would increase. The work would be classified as it is in Switzerland, and those portions of it requiring the greater manual strength would be given to the males, while those in which delicacy of manipulation is desiderated could be given to females. He is of opinion that the amount of work required of the men would be more than it is now. We think he is right, for the more we bring any article of necessity down in price, the greater is the consumption. Watches are now a necessity, and there cannot be a doubt that the cheapening of them would largely increase the demand, not only for home consumption, but for exportation.—Clerkenwell News.

CHICAGO AND GALENA GRAIN HOUSE, CHICAGO, ILLINOIS.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

IMPROMPTU

Of Thanks to my Husband for his bountiful supply of Writing Material.

BY BLANCHE D'ARFOIS.

When Boreas winds around our dwelling roar,
And the sere leaf is fallen thick and fast,
Th' o'erwearied baskets pile their golden store,
And thicker garments ward the searching blast,
 Ofttimes the game, the sprightly dance and song,
Convivial meetings, or reunions planned—
Disgust Old Winter, till he stays not long:
And hearts twine summer in their golden band.
But thou, my rural god, dost more than bring
Thy share of blessings to our household tree;
While I, thine empress, can but tamely sing
Poor sonnets for thy watchful care of me:
'Mongst various accessories of pleasure,
Thanks for those reams of paper—priceless treasure.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

HENRY THE FIRST, BEAUCLERCK.

BY HENRY WILLIAM HERBERT.

"HENRY, the youngest son of William the Great, was born in England the third year after his father's arrival; a child, even at that time fondly cherished by the joint good wishes of all, as being the only one of William's sons born in royalty, and to whom the kingdom seemed to pertain. The early years of instruction he passed in the liberal arts, and so thoroughly imbibed the sweets of learning, that no warlike commotions, no pressure of business, could ever erase them from his noble mind; although he never read much openly, nor displayed his learning, except sparingly. His learning, however, to speak the truth, though obtained by snatches, assisted him much in the science of governing; according to the saying of Plato, 'Happy would be the commonwealth, if philosophers governed, or kings would be philosophers.'"

Not slenderly tinctured by philosophy, then, by degrees, in process of time, he learned how to restrain his people with lenity; nor did he ever suffer his soldiers to engage but where he saw a pressing emergency. In this manner, by learning, he trained his early years to the hope of a kingdom; and often in his father's hearing made use of the proverb, that "an illiterate king is a crowned ass." They relate, too, that his father, observing his disposition, never omitted any means of cherishing his lively prudence; and that once, when he had been ill-used by one of his brothers, and was in tears, he spirited him up by saying, "Weep not, my boy, you too will be a king."

It appears that he was knighted by his father's own hand, at Westminster, during Pentecost, and then accompanied him to Normandy; where, as has been related, he alone of the brethren was present at the funeral of the great statesman and warrior, who, but for him, of all his conquests, would scarcely have had a grave.

Concerning this strange race of Normans, the brilliant and fanciful Michelet, who would he, perhaps, the best historian of early France, were he not too intensely a Frenchman of the old school, an English and German hater, to be trustworthy, has some remarks worthy all consideration; not the less so that they throw much light on the character of the clerk-king—by no means, however, monk-king—who is now under our consideration. "I have spoken elsewhere," he says, "of the origin of the Normans. They were a mixed race, in whom the Neustrian predominated by far over the Scandinavian descent."

This opinion, by the way, is questionable and undoubtedly exaggerated; as is also the stress laid, a few paragraphs below, on the French titles of the Norman followers of the conqueror. Undoubtedly the race was mixed; since the invading Norsemen brought few of their women with them, but took to themselves wives of the daughters of the land which they subdued. Still, the paternal element, the animus, the vigor, the education and the customs—as he subsequently admits, in regard to the fashion of their arms—were all Norse. Even to this day, Normandy betrays a large element, which is not French, and which has always displayed an inclination to mingle with the Cymric element of the adjacent province of Brittany, the population of which was almost identical with that of Wales, the Brittany beyond the channel. In regard to their names, the first Norse invaders had each but one name, as Rou, translated into French, Rollo, Odo, and other such, often qualified by some by-name, derived from a personal peculiarity, an accident of dress, or a trait of character—a Norman peculiarity which continued long after they had become Christianized, and taken to themselves territories and territorial denominations!

The French names to which he points so complacently as showing the Neustrian element in the Norman race, shows only that, having torn the lands and cities from the Neustrian owners, the Norse victors added to their own rude names, the title of the demesnes they had seized, with an intervening "of," proving the title to be distinctive only, as Odo of Bayeux, William of Normandy. The very Norman kings of England had, until the second century of the conquest, no surname; and the first they assumed, Plantagenet, was but a by-name, from the flower worn in their caps, the Planta genista, or broom plant, assumed as a token of humility by the proudest and most fiery race in Christendom.

"Undoubtedly," proceeds our author, "as seen on the Bayeux tapestry, with their scale-armor, peaked casques and nose-pieces, one would be tempted to believe these iron fish the pure and lawful descendants of the old pirates of the north. However, they spoke French from the third generation, at which period not one among them understood Danish. They were obliged to send their children to learn it of the Saxons of Bayeux. The names of William the Bastard's followers are purely French. 'The conquerors of England,' says Ingulphus, 'abhorred the Anglo-Saxon tongue.' Their predilections lay towards Roman and ecclesiastical civilization. We discern in them, as early as the tenth and eleventh century, the character, composed of scribe and legist, which has rendered their name proverbial in Europe. The famous Lanfranc, who raised the school of Bec to such celebrity, before he passed the strait with William and became in some sort the pope of England, was an Italian legist. A compound of audacity and stratagem, conquerors and chicaners, like the ancient Romans, scribes and knights, shaven like the priests, and good friends of the priests, at the beginning at least, they made their fortune by the church, and despite the church. They made it by the lance, and by the lance of Judas, too, as Dante says. The hero of their race is Robert l'Aïse—Guiscard—the Wise."

This is in the main a true picture of the race—and of the royal race, more especially, all of whom, with one or two rare exceptions, such as John, Henry III., Edward II., and Richard III., who were accidental anomalies, naturally defective, were both brave and wise—wise, I mean, with the wisdom of the children of darkness; a wisdom, which in the Norman kings was a mixture of keen sagacity and deep craft, not untinged with a dark hue of treachery.

In some the warrior, in some the scribe, in not one did the monk prevail. So long as they could use the monks, they were friends of them; but they never suffered the monks to use them, nor ever to interfere much with their vicious pleasures. Becket learned, when it was too late, that the edge of the knight's sword was too keen for the bishop's crozier. Priestcraft and popery never had much hold on the island soil; nor did interdiction or excommunication ever produce there the terror or the terrific results which it did on the adjoining continent.

Of the scribe-kings of England, Henry the First may be considered the first example; as of the monk-king, Edward, the last Saxon monarch, was the last dreary instance; for William the Conqueror, though largely imbued with the spirit of chicane, and as crafty as the craftiest, had far more in him of the warrior, and preferred ever to win by the hawk and the lance, rather than by the ink-horn and quill; although doomsday book and sixty thousand knight fees made out of Saxon freeholds by one dash of his pen, showed what he could do when he turned his mind that way.

Rufus, also, although of the soldier, the hunter, and the reveller type, in the main, was not altogether impotent in the clerk department; as he showed when he raised an army of twenty thousand men, made them buy their discharges at the then enormous sum of ten shillings each man, and suppressed the rebellion, to meet which he had levied the men, at half the cost of a campaign; and again, when he took Normandy in pawn from his brother Robert for the sum of ten thousand marks, about the one-hundredth part of its value, raising the money with which to make the loan, by the easy device of stripping the shrines and altars of their gold and chalices.

Robert was the true type of the soldier-king, and the being so, though it kept him ever the favorite and chosen candidate of both the military and the priestly nobles, effectually prevented him from ever being a king at all. He sold his dukedom for ten thousand marks, in order to fit out a crusade against the Saracens in the Holy Land, performed feats of soldiiership and courage never excelled and equalled only by those of Cœur de Lion; and, when he was offered, as his guerdon fairly won, the crown of Jerusalem, refused it because he could not be at the trouble of being king. Having received as his wife's dowry from her father, William of Conversano, a vast sum whereby to reclaim his duchy, he spent it in a few days in largesses to parasites and buffoons, and returned home powerless and penniless.

In the meantime, Henry, the clerk-king, had succeeded easily and quietly to the crown on the decease of William the Red. He had at once suppressed all the riot and debauchery of the court; put an end to all pillage and extortion; relaxed the extreme cruelty of the forest laws; annulled the illegal ordinances of his brother and his tool, Ranulf; remitted the taxes; released the prisoners; banished the flagitons from the vicinity of his palace; re-established the revenues of the land; and set himself to govern in earnest for the good of his people at large.

Therefore the nobles and knights, almost to a man, deserted him, when Robert returned and claimed the kingdom as his right; and all the Norman priesthood. For in England, the Normans had already fallen away much from the temperance and sobriety of their original habits, and subsided into the debauchery of the Saxons, mixed with a cruel licentiousness of their own, indulged at the expense of the conquered race.

Henry had married Matilda, the grand-niece of Edward the Confessor, a woman of character and virtue, and enforced the strictest decency and sobriety in his realm—whereupon they christened him Godric and her Godiva, in contempt for an order of things which they regarded as God-government, for such is the interpretation of Godric, and deserted in a body to his brother Robert.

Anselm, however, the primate, the Saxon bishops, and all the English, on whose fidelity he threw himself, stood staunchly to him. He raised a competent force, drilled his Saxon infantry with pike and shield, until he believed them capable of withstanding the thundering charge of the barbed Norman horse, and took the field to resist his brother, in defence of his crown.

But he had no thought of risking the chances of a field; so, calling to his aid his clerk-craft, he bought off Robert's claim by a promise of a pension of three thousand marks, on which the luxurious and careless soldier thought to pass years of idle enjoyment. Not a mark of it was ever paid. The very next year, he cheerfully surrendered it, at the request of his brother's queen, because she asked him for it.

This settled the question as regarded England; although, for a few years, turbulence and disaffection among many of his nobles, and the continued rebellions and risings of the Welch, kept him constantly at work with both head and hand, acting now the part of a knight, now that of a clerk; and it were difficult to say which with the most effect. With rare policy he bridled the rebellious Welch by the establishment of Flemish colonies, half military, half manufacturing, in Cheshire and Lancashire—the germs of the vast manufacturing and commercial wealth and enterprise of these regions at the present time. With equal courage and talent he put down the traitors, enforced the laws, established firm and constant order throughout England, which he thus made for the first time to wear the aspect of a regular and homogeneous government.

At first, he was severe in the infliction of punishment—but punishments were severe and cruel in those days, and, it may be, necessarily so. In the early years of his reign, mutilations were common, and the cutting off of hands and feet not an unusual penalty for the higher crimes.

It is to his credit, and goes to establish the necessity of the early rigor, as well as to prove the lenient and progressive character of his government, that in latter years, as his power became settled, as the realm gained tranquillity and order, and as crime decreased, he diminished the severity of his enactments, and substituted fine and imprisonment for mutilation and death.

Soon afterwards, loud cries and complaints from Normandy, which was still in pawn to the English crown, reached Henry's ears. Frightfully misgoverned by Robert, who, become utterly careless, imbecile and impotent to govern, gave himself up entirely to luxury, and was alternately the slave of his favorites, his monks, his enemies, any one, in a word, who chose to govern him, resigning his subjects to every species of extortion, cruelty and oppression,—the province cried aloud to the kingdom for aid.

The aid was given, some say, reluctantly by Henry, who was unwilling to deprive his brother of his patrimony. Others say, eagerly, as by one who but watched and seized the occasion which he had long coveted. The struggle was bloody but brief. Henry lost some of his bravest barons and best adherents; but he conquered all his opponents, and exacted bloody retribution.

It is the darkest spot on his character, that he held his conquered brother a lifelong prisoner in a fortress donjon, with none but sensual gratifications; for of mental pleasure he was incapable. He was not in chains, nor really in prison—in the loathsome and abject sense of the term—but he was detained a whole, long lifetime, in a building which he was not suffered to leave, though provided with means of amusement consistent with his safekeeping.

It was a hard and cruel fate for the bold, dashing, heroic crusader; a cruel doom to have been inflicted by a brother on a brother—but in that hard age, when men in similar positions were blinded and emasculated, it seems to have been regarded as a mild one. Certainly Robert was unfit to govern, possibly he was not fit to be trusted at large, with a due regard to the safety and peace of the kingdom. If it were not a crime and a stain on Henry's character so to confine him, at least the necessity was a misfortune.

A greater misfortune yet awaited him. He had two children by his wife, Matilda, besides many others illegitimate; a son William, a youth of rare promise, whom he idolized—a daughter Matilda, married to the greatest potentate of the day, the emperor of Germany.

Father and son were at Barfleur in Normandy, where they had been celebrating the young man's betrothal to the daughter of Foulke, Earl of Anjou. The day had been all festivity and joy; at nightfall they set sail for England; the king an hour or two in advance, in the royal galley; the boy to follow in a splendidly equipped vessel, la blanche navire, fitted on purpose for that gay occasion, and manned with the flower of England's and Normandy's young nobility.

Almost in sight of the father's galley, she ran upon a rock, off the raz de gat, and went down in deep water. The prince was got into the pinnace, and might have been saved; but he ordered the crew to put back, in order to save his natural sister, the Countess de la Perche, when the frail boat was submerged by the drowning wretches, and all were lost. William Fitz-Adhelm, the captain, who might have been saved on a floating spar which he had gained, drowned himself, rather than survive his trust and face his bereaved monarch. Only a butcher of Boulogne and Bertrand Count de l'Aigle survived to tell the tale.

Henry lived years, he prospered, he thrived in policy, in consideration, in wealth, in greatness. He was the mightiest and the most highly reputed, as he was the wisest king in Europe. But he had no more sons. His heart was in the deep, deep sea, with him that he had lost. It is an authenticated fact, that he never smiled again.

When the emperor died, he recalled his daughter to her native land, and declared her his heiress. Dying, the first English-born Norman king of England, out of his realm, he was entombed at Rouen; and scarcely was he in his grave, before his daughter was robbed of her inheritance by Stephen, Count of Blois. She struggled for her birthright with a courage worthy of her race, and if she might not recover it for herself, she regained it for her son.

Henry was not a great man, but, for his time, he was a good man. He was a great king, because he was a good king, which is the greatest. England, which has had as few bad kings as any other kingdom, perhaps the world itself, has had few greater.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE STORM-SPIRIT.

BY JAMES FRANKLIN FITZ.

Thou with the glaring eye,
Unseen, terrific form,
Spirit of wintry storm,
Say, whither dost thou fly?
Dweller of mountain caves, with winter's breath
Dost thou not come, and with him die his death?

Thou hast despair's deep tone,
Sweeping the leaden sky;
Ho! come to me not nigh!
Thou fight'st at me with thy moan.
Call off thy winds—seek now thy mountain home;
My easement's shut: to me thou shalt not come.

Dire enemy to man,
Thou hast felt thy power,
When, in a dismal hour,
Thou overhast'st his clan.
Not me and mine, servants of thine,
Emerged old Neptune, moved by power divine.

A demon thou must be:
Good deeds are all unknown
To thee; thou mak'st earth groan,
And moest the tidily sea.
Man's works to thee are naught—thou com'st in gloom,
And fabrics fall as at the voice of doom.

Yet, in His mighty hand
Whose footstool is the earth,
Who gave to thee thy birth,
Thou and thy ruffian band
Are powerless. He speaks the potent word,
And lo! thy dismal notes are all unheard.

Then exercise thy rage!
Show thy destructive hand,
Sweep over every land,
Warfare with nature wage!
We know thy mighty power, thy purpose fell;
Stern demon! evil spirit, fare thee well!

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE EMPEROR'S DREAM.

BY EMILY B. PAGE.

EVERY one has heard the story of the "Children in the Wood"—how the father of the now immortal "Babe" died, leaving them to the care of a wicked uncle; how that treacherous guardian committed them to the care of two robbers; how the heart of one of these robbers became softened by their innocent prattle; how they fought, one killing the other; how the children, when deserted by the survivor, "wandered up and down," picking blackberries, and longing for the return of the robber; and how they died clasped in each other's arm, and were covered with leaves by little Robin Redbreast, who ever since has been an almost revered bird.

Some years ago, when travelling in Germany, I was forcibly reminded of this good old story, by one of the incidents in a legend connected with the beautiful cathedral in the old town of Speyer—I mean that part of the English tale in which the hesitation of the robber to shed the children's blood, is set forth. I will relate the German story as it was told to me by the chapel-master of the cathedral, and one in which the possible and improbable are equally blended in a manner we do not often meet with. It is, in fact, a veritable romance of history.

Conrad, the second emperor of Germany, was one of those terrible tyrants on a small scale, who, at the head of their bands of bold barons, rode roughshod over the rights and liberties of their subjects. Such sovereigns were common enough in that country some hundreds of years ago, and were as much objects of awe and dread then, as the paltry princes of the same land are of ridicule and contempt now. In the matter of rapacity, however much the manner of displaying it may be altered, much the same state of things exists in modern, as in ancient days; for the grim baron robbed his retainers without scruple then, and the grand duke derives his revenues from the gaming-tables now.

The Emperor Conrad had among the officers of his court, a nobleman named Count Coln, who on some occasion or other—no matter what—had the misfortune to fall under his high and mighty displeasure. As it was quite certain that if he remained at court, his head would take leave of his shoulders, or that he would be precipitated entire into one of those terrible aubettes which are to this day to be seen among the ruins of almost every old German castle, Count Coln fled from the capital, and, with his young wife, concealed himself in a wretched hut in the recesses of the Black Forest, where they dragged out a miserable existence, their sole consolation being the real love which they felt for each other, and which adversity had not power to destroy.

Now it happened that the emperor, who was remarkably fond of hunting, in one of his excursions, got detached from the main body of his party, and with only a few attendants, sought to find a shelter for the night. By the merest accident, in the world, he chanced to discover the hut of Count Coln, who happened to be away at the time. As the emperor fortunately did not know the countess personally, he was of course ignorant of the former position of his poor-looking hostess, when he demanded her hospitality.

That very night, as the emperor lay on his rude pillow, there appeared to him as in a dream, an old man of venerable appearance, who uttered these words:

"This night thy hostess will give birth to a son who shall become thy son-in-law and successor."

Conrad, however, again fell asleep, and forgot all about his dream and the prophecy, until the following morning, when one of his attendants entered his chamber and told him that during the night the inhabitants of the house had been increased by the advent of a little son. The emperor was exceedingly superstitious, and fearful that his dynasty might be obliterated, he determined, unlikely as it seemed that a poor peasant's child should succeed to his throne and dignities, to make assurance doubly sure by destroying the infant at once.

Accordingly he summoned two of his retainers, and having enjoined them to the strictest secrecy, revealed to them his diabolical plot. This was to steal the child from the countess's chamber, carry it away into the forest and murder it. Stimulated by the promise of immense rewards, these wretches, after some hesitation, consented to perform the atrocious deed.

Conrad was as crafty as he was cruel, and that no imposition might be practised upon him, he stipulated that before the promised rewards were paid, the assassins should produce the child's heart, as proof of the accomplishment of the deed. This they agreed to do, and departed on their wicked mission.

Having managed to pour a strong narcotic secretly into the broth of the countess, they succeeded, during the deep sleep which followed, in stealing the child from her side. Wrapping the little fellow in a cloak, they left the hut, but before going into the forest, sat down at the foot of a tree close by, to refresh themselves with a flask of the red wine of Hungary.

While they were so employed, the cloak became disarranged by the struggles of the awakening infant. Its remarkable beauty immediately attracted the attention of one of them, and when the babe opened its little blue eyes, the man was so touched that his heart failed him, and he vowed that he could not perform the sanguinary orders of Conrad. His more savage companion vainly strove to reason him out of his qualms of conscience, and at length they both agreed to deceive the emperor and spare the child.

Unwittingly, Conrad had himself furnished the means of deception. At the door of the hut had been thrown, the previous morning, a quantity of game, among which was a very young fawn, which had been slain by one of his own imperial arrows. The attendants took from the body of this animal its heart, and exhibited it to the emperor as that of the child, which, in fact, they had left sleeping under the tree. The monarch, being more of a monster than anatomist, did not discover the cheat, and duly rewarded the supposed murderers.

The child had not long been exposed to the mercy of the elements, and the rapacity of wolves and wild boars, which abounded in that region, when Herman, Duke of Suabia, chanced, with a long train of attendants, to pass by and discover it. Attracted by the singular beauty of the infant son of Count Coln, he directed it to be taken care of, and at once adopted it as his own. It was carried to his castle, treated with the utmost tenderness, and every day the boy became dearer to his preserver and protector. In course of a few years, he grew up a handsome, frank-hearted, intelligent lad, the favorite of all who knew him, and the pet of the duke, who denied him nothing.

When the young count was eighteen years of age, the Emperor Conrad, in the course of a tour through his kingdom, paid a visit to Duke Herman at Suabia, and was so greatly struck with the appearance of the youth, that he took the first opportunity of questioning Herman concerning him, and of ascertaining how he came in possession of him. The duke candidly related the story, and the emperor at once suspected, on comparing dates, that this was no other than the child alluded to in the prophecy while he slept in the hut in the Black Forest. Concealing his surmises, however, he pretended to take uncommon interest in the fortunes of the lad, and after much persuasion, induced the duke to transfer him to his service as page—a position which was at that day very often the stepping-stone to future greatness.

Away went the young count with the emperor, at the termination of the visit. As soon as Conrad arrived at his palace, he sent for the two attendants to whom he had committed the child, eighteen years before, and at once charged them with having practised a fraud upon him. Terrified by threats of being put to the torture, they confessed; but on condition of their keeping the matter secret, they were dismissed from his presence with a mere rebuke.

Determined to avoid the threatened calumny, Conrad now employed all his time in devising the best means of ridding himself of the lad without attracting suspicion of foul play on his own part. In the meantime he treated the young count with great apparent kindness, so as to throw him completely off his guard; and, to publicly show his regard, he one day informed him that he should have the honor of being the bearer of a special and very important despatch to his empress at Aix la Chapelle.

The despatch was prepared, sealed with the imperial arms, and committed to the charge of the young page, who was directed to spare neither whip nor spur, and to deliver it into the empress's own hands. Poor youth! little dreamed he that he was the bearer of his own death-warrant,—for the sole contents of the despatch were the following words:

"TO THE EMPRESS.—As you set a value on your own life, see that the bearer of this be secretly and speedily destroyed."
CONRAD."

For several days the messenger travelled with all speed, until he arrived at the city of Speyer, where, in order to rest himself and horse, he lodged for a night at the dean's house. This reverend official was greatly delighted with the young gentleman, who, on his part, was not a little annoyed by the inquisitiveness of his host. The dean, for some reason or other, was excessively desirous to know what the contents of the despatch were; but as the young man, not being himself acquainted with them, could not divulge them, he was compelled to resort to artifice to satisfy his desire.

That night, when the tired messenger was fast asleep, the dean stole softly into his chamber and took the packet from the pocket of his travelling dress. Carefully opening it so as not to break the seal, he read the contents. The good man was aghast with terror, and at once determined if possible to secure his guest from so terrible a fate. To accomplish this, he took another piece of parchment, and in a hand-writing as much like the emperor's as he could make it, wrote the following:

"TO THE EMPRESS.—As you value your life, see that the bearer of this be secretly and speedily married to our daughter."
CONRAD."

The dean then re-sealed the letter, placed it in the messenger's pocket, and the next morning the youth proceeded to Aix la Chapelle, and delivered it in person to the empress. Her majesty did not dare disobey the commands of her lord—and the daughter, when she saw the handsome young page, did not feel inclined to; so the archbishop was at once sent for, and young Count Coln was metamorphosed, much to his own astonishment, into a married man.

As soon as the emperor learned that his menial had wedded his daughter, he was greatly irritated and dismayed; but when it was told him that the young man was no peasant, but the first son of Count Coln, he forgave and restored the latter, and raised his son-in-law to be co-regent of the government—thus fulfilling the prophecy.

Out of gratitude to the dean, who had prevented him from spilling innocent blood, he made him chancellor, and founded the imperial vault in the minister of the magnificent cathedral of Speyer, over the door of which, to this day, is a tablet recording the fact of its being designed as the burial place of himself and all of his family who might die on the western side of the Alps.

CURIOUS FACTS.

Serpents are said to obey the voice of their master. The trumpeter-bird of America, follows its owner like a spaniel, and the jennet acts as a guard to poultry, protecting them in the field all day from birds of prey, and escorting them home at night. In the Shetland Isles there is a gull which defends the flock from eagles; it is therefore regarded as the privileged bird. The chamois, bounding over the mountain, are indebted to their safety in no small degree, to a species of pheasants. The bird acts as the sentinel; for as soon as it gets sight of a man, it whistles, upon hearing which, the chamois, knowing the hunters to be near, sets off at full speed. The artifices which partridges and plovers employ to delude their enemies from the nest of their young, may be referred to as a case in point, as well as the adroit contrivance of the hind, for the preservation of her young; for when she hears the sound of dogs, she puts herself in the way of the hunter, and starts in a direction to draw them away from her fawns. Instances of the effect of grief upon animals, are no less remarkable. The writer already cited says—"I knew a dog that died of sorrow at the loss of his master; and a bullfinch that abstained from singing ten entire months, on account of the absence of its mistress. On her return it immediately resumed its song." Lord Kaimes relates an instance of a canary, which, while singing to a mate, hatching her eggs in a cage, fell dead; the female left the nest, and finding him dead, rejected all food, and died by his side—Notes and Queries.

LIVING WITHIN ONE'S MEANS.

We are beginning to hear again the cry of "hard times," "a full hard times." There is more truth than fiction in the cry, all will admit. How can the "times" be made easier! How can the intense "hardness" be taken out of them? There is one sovereign remedy,—as a general thing it is a cure all. Let every one live within his or her means. Cut off your luxuries. If your income is four or five hundred dollars, conform yourself to your circumstances. Don't let your manner of living be as expensive as if your income was one thousand dollars. Let your rents, your dress, your food, your pleasures, be curtailed. There is no honesty in living beyond your means. If it costs you one thousand dollars to live, when your means are only five hundred, the excess is sponged out of those who give you credit. There is no policy in thus living beyond your means. For your credit will soon be exhausted, and you will then have "a hard road to travel." But extravagance in living is not the only cause of "hard times." The abuse of the credit system is another cause. Too many are allured by it to desert the firm for the store, and employments and business that are already over-crowded. There are too many consumers and not enough producers,—too many go-betweens in business. There is too great a rush from the country to the large city,—too great a desire to gain a livelihood by any other process than that entailed upon us by the primeval curse,—"the sweat of the brow."—Nashua Gazette.

ONE DOLLAR.
WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has sixteen years experience on the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 73,200 copies.

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the ninth copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

LIEUT. GEORGE H. PREBLE, U. S. N.

The accompanying portrait was drawn expressly for us by Mr. Barry from a photograph by Messrs. Masury, Silsbee and Case of this city, and is pronounced a good likeness. George H. Preble, a son of Captain Enoch Preble (who was a brother of Commodore Edward Preble), and a grandson of Brigadier-General Preble, was born in Portland, Maine. Educated at the public schools of that city, he entered a bookstore at the age of fourteen, but obtained a midshipman's warrant in 1835, and sailed from New York on his first cruise, in the frigate United States, in the spring of the following year. After visiting Jerusalem, Bethlehem, Alexandria, Tyre, Sidon, and other noted places, he came back in the ship, in November, 1838. He served on board the Warren on the West India Station. Returning, he joined the naval school at Annapolis, subsequently passed his examination, and was sent on the Florida expedition under Lieut. McLaughlin, and did good service. After a year's arduous service as an acting lieutenant along the Florida shores and keys, and in the everglades, hunting Indians, he returned to Norfolk with the squadron, crippled and an invalid from the exposure he had been subjected to. He arrived home just in time to watch his father's death-bed, and after a few weeks' rest, still lame, was ordered to the receiving ship Ohio at Boston, where he continued through the winter and until the May following, when he was appointed acting master to the U. S. sloop St. Louis, now equipped and ready for sea at Norfolk. He sailed in her for the East Indies—was appointed an acting lieutenant on board soon after she left the United States, and remained in her through 1843 and 1844, and until her return to Norfolk in Sept., 1845. Lieut. Preble was in China during the negotiation of Mr. Cushing's treaty with China, and at that interesting time was sent to Canton in charge of a party of marines for the protection of the American Consulate and residents, during some local disturbances. This was the first American armed force ever landed in China, and for the promptness with which it was despatched at such a delicate time, Capt. Tilton received a handsome service of plate from the merchants of Canton. At New Zealand, the St. Louis in 1845 performed good service. On the return of the St. Louis to the United States, Lieut. Preble was married, in November, 1845; but in the following spring, when war with Mexico was declared, he was ordered to join the schooner Petrel as acting master, at New York. The Petrel was a small gun boat purchased for the war. In her he proceeded to the seat of war in the Gulf of Mexico, where he was actively employed in the squadron under Commodores Conner and Perry. He was present at the surrender of Alvarado, Laguna, Tampico, and at the bombardment and capitulation of Vera Cruz and the fortress of San Juan de Ulloa. After the fall of Vera Cruz, his health being impaired by the climate and harassing nature of the service of blockading in so small and contracted a vessel as the Petrel, he returned home in the Ohio ship-of-the-line, an invalid. He was soon after his return promoted "a master in the line of promotion," and in February, 1848, received a commission as a lieutenant, and at the same time orders to the United States ship Saratoga; and returned in her to the gulf before the final declaration of peace, and witnessed the re-embarkation of our troops on their return from Mexico. After a year's service, with his health again impaired, he was compelled to leave the station. Greatly benefited by the journey from Pensacola by New Orleans up the Mississippi River to Ohio, and having partially recovered, he was ordered to the United States Coast Survey. He remained on that duty until February, 1851, when he received orders to join the frigate St. Lawrence, the ship that took to England the American contributions to the World's Fair. On her return to New York he was at once, without the usual leave of absence, re-ordered to the coast survey, and continued on that duty until ordered first to the Vermont and afterwards to the Macedonian, and sailed in the latter ship for China and Japan. While on that station he assisted in the various surveys of bays and harbors, and improved the navigation of the Yang-tse-King, by placing a lighthouse, buoys and marks, and furnishing full and complete sailing directions for the navigation to Shanghai—a work of immense importance to the commercial world of England and America. He commanded for eight months the chartered steamer Queen, a little vessel of 137 tons, and armed with four four-pounders and a brass howitzer or field carriage, employed for the protection of Americans at Canton during the disturbed state of the country consequent upon the rebellion. On relinquishing the command, he went to Shanghai in the Macedonian, and on board steamer Confucius, with thirty men from the Macedonian, assisted in the safe convey of 270 Chinese timber junks from Chowfoo to Ningpo, incidentally destroying five pirate boats on the route. He returned in the Macedonian in August, and has recently been appointed Lighthouse Inspector of the First District, extending from Eastport, Me. to Portsmouth, N. H. Lieut. Preble has been a little more than twenty-one years in the navy, sixteen of which were on sea service, two on other duty and only three years unemployed. He enjoys a well-earned reputation as a gallant and accomplished officer, reflecting honor on the name he bears.

LIEUTENANT GEORGE H. PREBLE, U. S. N.

THE PIFFERARI AT ROME.

The picture below is a striking characteristic street scene in Rome. A group of "Pifferari" or itinerant musicians are playing before a niche enshrining a statue of the Madonna and infant Saviour. One, dressed in his sheepskin coat, performs on a sort of clarinet, the instrument of another is the bagpipe, while the boy who makes up the group is simply furnished with a triangle. A Roman peasant woman and her boy glance at the trio as they pass along. In the distance we have a sketch of the architecture of the "Eternal City"—the marvellous dome of St. Peter, the structures of the middle ages that surround it, with the bridge of St. Angelo spanning the tawny Tiber. Few artists have passed any time at Rome without sketching the "Pifferari," with their peculiar type of physiognomy and dress.

THE PIFFERARI AT ROME.

FRANCIS A. DURIVAGE, ASSISTANT EDITOR.

Published every SATURDAY, by
M. M. BALLOU,
No. 22 Winter Street, Boston.

The Poet's Corner.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

GUITAR PICNIC SONG.

BY FRANK FEELOVE.

Morn upon the waters!
Our hearts are very gay;
With nature's sons and daughters
We'll dance a roundelay.
Greet them with a friendly smile;
And set their bosoms bounding;
For a convention for awhile,
And all the arts surrounding.
Hail, for the glen! Ho, for the plain!
Hail, for the mountain hoary!
Summer may not long remain
In masquerade of glory.
Slip thee of the fountain
Up-gushing from the plain,
Beside the shady mountain,
As morn beams o'er the main.
Paint thee with the dewy drops
Empearing from the roses;
Adorn thy wavy, golden locks
With wreath of woodland roses.
Hail, for the glen! Ho, for the plain!
Hail, for the mountain hoary!
Summer may not long remain
In masquerade of glory.

NIGHT.

Where grisly Night, with visage deadly sad,
She fends forthcoming,
Before the door her iron chariot stood
Already harnessed for journey new,
And coal-black steeds....
Her twofold team....
Did softly swim away....
The messenger of death, the ghastly owl,
With dreary shrieks did also her betray.—SPENSER.

PINE SMILE.

The weeping sea, like one
Whose milder temper doth lament the death
Of him whom in his rage he slew, runs up
The shore, embraces him, kisses his cheek,
Goes back again and forces up the sand
To bury him.—CYRIL TOWNESKE.

SINGING.

Sweet are the pleasures that to verse belong,
And doubly sweet a brotherhood in song.—KEATS.

Editor's Easy Chair.

GOSSIP WITH THE READER.

The effect of pictorial illustration is strikingly exemplified in the mental history of Alfred the Great, king of England. We are told that he was twelve years old before he could read; and that, admiring a beautifully illuminated book of Saxon poetry in the hands of his mother, she allowed him to learn by promising him the splendid book as a guerdon of success. Parents and guardians might take a hint from this. Addison said that indolence was a stream which flowed slowly on, yet undermined the foundation of every virtue. Dr. Johnson used to pray fervently for strength to overcome his indolent habits. Miss Benger tells a good story of a chemical professor in a northern university, who, in making an experiment, held a phial which flew into a hundred pieces. "Gentlemen," said the doctor, "I have made this experiment often with this very same phial, and it never broke in this manner before." The French have it among their old sayings, that "a good lawyer is a bad neighbor." Formerly, rings were given away at weddings. In Queen Elizabeth's time, one Kelly, at the marriage of one of his maid servants, gave away gold rings to the value of $20,000. Rather an expensive custom that! Melton, in his Astrologaster, says that it is a sign of ill-luck to find money; yet few people would pass by a quarter-eagle on the sidewalk for fear of the consequences. We think twenty miles an hour slow travelling on a railroad train; but a writer of the reign of William III., of England, speaking eulogistically of the coaches, says:—"Here one may be transported without over-violent emotion, and sheltered from the injuries of the air, to the most noted places in England with so much speed, that some of these coaches will reach about fifty miles in a summer's day." Charron has a golden sentence:—"Wisdom is not only to be gotten by us, but to be enjoyed." Many persons amass learning, as misers do gold, without ever employing it. Sailors still cling to many curious superstitions. To throw an eat overboard, or drown one at sea, is still considered ill luck. Children are considered lucky to a ship. Whistling at sea is only permitted in a dead calm, because it is supposed to increase the wind. It is strange what vitality such absurdities have. Dr. Thomas Sprat, afterwards Bishop of Rochester, was sitting at dinner with the Duke of Buckingham, whose chaplain he was, when the duke, noticing a goose opposite the divine, said he wondered why it generally happened that geese were placed near the clergy. "I cannot tell the reason," said Sprat, "but I shall never see a goose again without thinking of your grace." Horse-racing was established in the reign of James I., of England, and the usual prize was the silver bell. Hence the popular phrase, "to bear away the bell," as descriptive of success. Coffee drinking is of quite recent introduction, comparatively. Evelyn, in his Diary, under date of 1637, says:—"There came in my time to the college, Oxford, one Nathaniel Canopios, out of Greece; he was the first I ever saw drink coffee, which custom came not into England till about thirty years after." Quin, the English actor, was very bitter sometimes. He was once delegated by the manager of Covent Garden Theatre, to make an apology for a dancer who was incapacitated from appearing. He addressed the audience as follows:—"Ladies and gentlemen, I am desired by the manager to inform you that the dance intended for this night is necessarily postponed, on account of Mademoiselle Holian having dislocated her ankle—I wish it had been her neck." De Foe makes a remark in one of his works not inapplicable to Young America. "If any whimsical or ridiculous story is told, 'tis of an old woman. Those were brave days for young people, when they could swear the old ones out of their lives, and get a woman hanged or burned only for being a little too old—and as a warning to all ancient persons who should dare to live longer than the young ones think convenient." Soon after Bulwer's "Last Days of Pompeii" was published, a young lady was asked if she did not greatly admire the style? Reviewing the incidents in her memory, she replied, "The style—the style? O, sir, I am not come to that yet." We attended a country theatre once, where the pronunciation was exceedingly rich. We remember that "fatigued" was pronounced "fattygued," "pageantry" styled "paggyantry," and "Ami-lar," "similiar." When we survey a well furnished library, the first thought that suggests itself is the immortality of intellect. Sancho, prince of Castile, being present at a papal consistory at Rome, wherein the proceedings were conducted in Latin, which he did not understand, and hearing loud applause, inquired of the interpreter what caused it. "My lord," replied the interpreter, "the pope has caused you to be proclaimed king of Egypt." "It does not become us," said the grave Spaniard. "to be wanting in gratitude. Rise up and proclaim his holiness caliph of Baghdad." Advice is the most dangerous commodity a man can deal in. We always dread to be asked for it; for if a person wishes to be universally hated, avoided and despised, he has only to give advice. There is a good story told illustrative of excessive politeness. A French gentleman entered a chapel to perform his devotions, but found it was undergoing repairs; whereupon, to show that he had not been remiss in his duty and attentions, he pulled out a richly decorated pocket-book, and walking with great gravity and many genuflections up the aisle, very carefully placed a visiting card upon the principal altar. All our words of necessity are derived from the German; our words of luxury, and those used at table, from the French. Ox, calf and sheep, when alive, are called the same in English as in German; but when cooked, they become beef, veal and mutton, after the French. A Scotch pastor recognized one of his female parishioners, sitting by the roadside, a little the worse for liquor. "Fie, fie, Janet!" said he. "Do you know where all drunkards go?" "Ay, sure," said Janet; "they just go whar a drap o' gude drink is to be got." Mr. Burton, the manager, received the other day a comedy from a Fifth Avenue gentleman, who politely informed him that he might have it for nothing. After reading it, Burton remarked drily, that the author seemed to know its exact value. Maturin, speaking of the severity of literary labor, said:—"Moore is often a month working out the flag-end of an epigram. 'Pon my honor, I would not be such a victim to literature for the reputation of Pope, the greatest of them all.' Charles II., of England, was spending a convivial evening with some friends, when one of the company stupidly enough thought it a proper time to press for a favor he had solicited. Charles instantly and very acutely replied, 'Sir, you must ask your king for that.' When Lord Maskerry went to Newfoundland, one George Rooke went with him as a volunteer. "George," said Lord Maskerry, one day, "I wonder you will not leave off your abominable custom of lying." "I can't help it," replied Rooke. "Pooh, pooh!" said his lordship, "you can do it by degrees. Suppose you were to begin by telling one truth a day." It is a common observation, that unless a man takes a delight in a thing, he will never pursue it with pleasure or assiduity. Diligence, diligence, is from disigo, to love. Pope's line, "A little learning is a dangerous thing," is often quoted approvingly without reflection. Campbell, the poet, said:—"It appears to me as absurd to consider a little learning valueless, or even dangerous, as some will have it, as to talk of a little virtue, a little health, or wealth, or cheerfulness, or a little of any other blessing under heaven, being worthless or dangerous." We came across this passage in Perron, the other day:—"Line applied to trees makes them put forth leaves and flourish, and produce fruit early, but then it kills them. Wine cheers and stimulates men, and makes them thrust forth flowers of wit; but then, there is no doubt, it shortens life." Zeno detected his slave in a theft, and ordered him to be flogged. The slave thought to escape by quoting his master's stoical doctrine against him, saying, "It was fated that I should commit this theft." And also that you should be flogged for it, was the ready reply of the philosopher. Dr. Burney relates of some parish officers, that they applied to Stetzel, a famous organ-builder, to examine their organ and make some improvements on it. "Shentlemen," said the honest Swiss, "your organ be wort two hundred pound just now—vell, I will spend von hundred pound upon him, and zen he shall be fort fifty." Of course they didn't have it repaired. The worth of everything is determined by the demand for it. In the deserts of Arabia, a pitcher of cold water is of more value than a mountain of gold. A kind and thoughtful subscriber in Springfield, Vermont ("may his tribe increase!"), sends us a jar of maple syrup, some of his own manufacture—and a very pure and agreeable article it proved. Vermont is a great State, but not half so big as the hearts of its inhabitants. The Rev. Mr. Alger lately delivered a lecture before the Art Club, of this city, the subject of which was "Life as a Fine Art." It was a production glowing with eloquence, and stamped with the purest originality. We suggest the publication of this series of art-lectures in a volume. Somebody writes there is not a solitary beautiful woman in San Francisco. We suppose the wag meant to say they were all married. The governor of Canton, China, was of a very nice sort of person, we think. During his brief period of office, he has beheld over 70,000 persons. It doesn't appear to cost him much of an effort to go ahead. When Booth was playing Richard III. at the old Tremont, and shouting for "a horse!" a Vermont jockey in the pit sang out: "Old fellow, I reckon I have got a fast rate parade horse that will suit you down to the city stables." When reminded of their want of progress in agriculture and manufactures, the Spaniards relate a legend, that Adam, once upon a time, requested leave to revisit this world. Leave was granted, and an angel commissioned to conduct him. On wings of love the patriarch hastened to his native land; but so changed, so strange almost seemed to him, that he felt at home nowhere till he came to Portugal. "Ah, here," exclaimed he, "sit me down here; everything here is just as I left it." The Hindoos are promised a thousand years in paradise for every hair of the head or beard they part with. The sons of Chief Justice Marshall are now the largest land-holders in Fauquier county, Virginia. A master mariner, who went to sea four years ago, leaving his wife in Springfield, returned recently to find her married to another man. He had been shipwrecked on a distant coast, and she believed him to be dead. In the presence of the two husbands, the wife decided to cling to the second. An oak tree, which was planted at Châtillon sur Seine (Côte d'Or), in 1070, by a count of Champagne, France, was struck by lightning last summer. It measured 71.2 metres in circumference, and up to 1890 bore acorns. The heart sickens when it sees how many and how powerful are the causes in operation to pervert, crush and waste man's intellect, and to keep those powers grovelling in the dust which should be soaring among the stars. Lady Bulwer's vulgar novel, "Very Successful," in which she satirizes her husband in the coarsest style, has had no other effect but to excite the indignation of his friends and contempt for the woman. Bulwer's speech at his inauguration as Lord Rector of the Glasgow University, was a splendid production. Mr. Alger tells us that to insure prosperity, we should be prepared, by being well furnished, to reap advantages from every recurring emergency. A man in this city, who has just reached his twenty-eighth year, recently married his third wife. He will certainly pass for a "marrying man" among the ladies. Only a month ago, the northern part of Wisconsin was covered with snow forty feet deep. No wonder people are afraid that the Arctic circle is increasing in circumference.

Every man is the builder of a temple, called his body, to the god he worships, after a style purely his own, nor can he get off by hammering marble instead. We are all sculptors and painters, and our material is our own flesh, and blood, and bones. Any nobleness begins at once to refine a man's features, any meanness or sensuality to imbrute them.—Thoreau.

Health is the ground which great persons cultivate, whereby they exchange the light dying hours into golden usage. To them it is industry represented in its power; the human riches of time. The minute-glass runs willingly sand of centuries when great ideas are in the beautiful moments.—Wilkinson.

Choice Miscellany.

WOMAN.

There is beauty in the helplessness of woman. The clinging trust which searches for extraneous support is graceful and touching. Timidity is the attribute of her sex; but to herself it is not without its dangers, its inconveniences, and its sufferings. Her first effort at comparative freedom is bitter enough; for the delicate mind shrinks from every unaccustomed contact, and the warm and gushing heart closes itself, like the blossom of the sensitive plant, at every approach. Man may at once determine his position, and assert his place; woman has hers to seek. And, alas! I fear me, that however she may appear to turn a calm brow and a quiet lip to the crowd through which she makes her way, that brow throbs, and that lip quivers, to the last—until, like a wounded bird, she can once more wing her way to the tranquil home where the drooping head will be fondly raised, and the fluttering heart laid to rest. The dependence of woman in the common affairs of life is, nevertheless, rather the effect of custom than necessity. We have many and brilliant proofs that, where need is, she can be sufficient to herself, and play her part in the great drama of existence with credit, if not with comfort. The yearnings of her solitary spirit, the outgasings of her shrinking sensibility, the cravings of her alienated heart, are indulged only in the quiet holiness of her solitude. The world sees not, guesses not the conflict; and in the ignorance of others lies her strength. The secret of her weakness is hidden in the depths of her own bosom; and she moves on, amid the heat and the hurry of existence, and with a seal set upon her nature, to be broken only by fond and loving hands, or dissolved in the tears of recovered home affection.—Bethmont.

SNOW-BIRDS.

The snow-birds' habits are regular. As the sun gets fairly up, and their breakfast is over, they perch themselves on the warm southern side of the thick hemlock close to the window, and commence their sun-bath and their toilet. I have often called my children from their studies, to look through the muslin curtain at these bird-laden branches. The backs of the little titlers are of pencil-brown; but, with their white breasts relieved upon the dark foliage of the hemlock, as we look up at them, the gleam, at first sight, is like the confectioner's Christmas tree, with a gay gift on every spray. And their enjoyment of the sheltered warmth, while they stroke down their wind-tumbled feathers, is curious to watch so closely! We could look under the lifted wing, while the busy head plied its combing beak, and see every fold of down that was so daintily smoothed into its place. And, when the combing and sun-bath were over (a full hour, by their testimony, being nature's allowance for toilet-time), they gave themselves, apparently, a waking dream! With their little heads almost sunk out of sight between their feathery and fat shoulders, they sat motionless in the sun for a half hour or more—an after-breakfast reverie, apparently, while the cap of existence was at the full. Happy birds, to have the privilege of this hush-nerve idleness of morning—the instinct for which, so forgotten even when long unlearned by habits of industry, is so prophetic of a life perfect without toil!—N. P. Willis.

HABITS OF MACKEREL.

The habits of these fish are very peculiar. And although they have been taken in immense numbers for three quarters of a century, their habits are not well understood. They often move in immense numbers, apparently filling the ocean for miles in extent. They are found near the surface. Sometimes they will take the hook with the greatest eagerness; at other times, not a mackerel will bite for days, although millions of them are visible in the water. They usually bite more freely soon after sunrise in the morning, and towards sunset in the evening. They all cease to bite about the same time, as if they were actuated by a common impulse. They are easily frightened, and will descend into deep water. It has often happened that a fleet of vessels lying off the cape, say a mile or two from shore, in the midst of a shoal of mackerel, and taking them rapidly on their decks, when the firing of a gun, or the blast of a rock, would send every mackerel fathoms deep into the water, as suddenly as though they had been converted into as many pigs of lead, and perhaps it would be some hours before they would return. They are caught more abundantly near the shore, and very nearly out of sight of land.—Literary Repository.

New Publications.

THE SCIAN AND HIS PEOPLE. By C. OSCANTAN, of Constantinople. New York: Derby & Jackson. 1857. 12mo. pp. 456.

A very clever and vivid picture of Turkey and the Turks, by one who is singularly fitted to describe them—a native Constantinopolitan, liberally educated in New York. It is a perfectly reliable, very interesting, and very valuable book. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

HISTORY OF RICHARD I., (COURT DE LION) OF ENGLAND. By JACOB ABBOTT. Illustrated. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1857. 16mo. pp. 336.

The life of the lion-hearted king of England affords ample material for a most interesting story—and Abbott has related it with his accustomed accuracy and felicity of diction. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

ABOUT RIGHT, AND ABOUT WRONG. By JACOB ABBOTT. New York: Harper & Brothers.

A collection of capital stories for very young children, beautifully illustrated. One of Harper's favorite picture-book series. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

VILLAS AND COTTAGES. A series of Designs prepared for execution in the United States. By CALVERT Vaux, architect (late Downing & Vaux, of Newburg, on the Hudson), with 300 engravings. New York: Harper & Brothers. 8vo.

This work supplies every variety of plan for house building that an amateur of rural architecture, about to make a home for himself and family, could desire. There are elaborate details, estimates of cost, everything in short, to be taken into consideration. The book is beautifully printed, bound and illustrated. Among the views is one of N. P. Willis's pleasant villa, "Idlewild." For sale by A. Williams & Co.

ARCTIC ADVENTURE BY SEA AND LAND. Edited by EPES SARGENT. Boston: Phillips, Sampson & Co. 12mo. pp. 480.

This book is admirably compiled and got up, and embraces the whole history of Arctic adventure. We fully intend it, with specimens of its fine engravings, in the last number of the Pictorial.

ELEMENTS OF PLANE AND SOLID GEOMETRY, ETC. By GERARDUS BREEMAN DOUGLASS, LL.D. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1857. 12mo. pp. 189.

This work is by the professor of mathematics in the New York Free Academy, the author of scientific works that have given him a reputation. Besides plane and solid geometry, it treats of plane and spherical trigonometry, and embraces an article on inverse trigonometrical functions. For sale by A. Williams & Co.

NEW MUSIC.—From Oliver Ditson & Co., we have received "O, Time is like a River," a canonet; "One by one have passed away," a ballad; "The Memory of other Days," a ballad; "Marry in haste, and repent at leisure," comic song; "Melange à la Valse," from the "Night Dancers;" Spanish Fandango, for the guitar; "Traß Song," for the piano, by Himmel; Norelle's Cathedral Voluntaries, No. 4, and "O, Happy Home," from the opera of Haydee.

FEROUK KHAN, PERSIAN MINISTER TO THE COURT OF FRANCE.

TOWN HALL, LEEDS, ENGLAND.

We have placed on this page an accurate representation of the splendid Town Hall, recently erected in Leeds, England. Not only is it an elegant object in itself, but may possibly serve as a model for some of our own structures; for the time has passed by when, in our public buildings, it was necessary to consult the most rigid economy. With the increase of our prosperity, we are able to embellish our cities with the beautiful as well as the useful. A beautiful building will always be considered as a great acquisition to civilization, for its influences on the mind are healthful and instructive. In England, great activity and liberality are manifested in the improvement of architecture. Scarcely a week passes but some new edifice of mark is completed. While old London does not appear to undergo much change, the towns and cities of the provinces are subjected to rapid modifications. This is particularly the case, we are informed, with the large commercial and manufacturing towns of Lancaster and York; Liverpool, Manchester, Sheffield, Leeds, Hull, and other industrial places, have undergone a complete transformation. Were James Watt to rise from the grave, he would hardly, it is thought, be able to recognize the places he had benefited by his inventive genius. Squalor and ugliness are rapidly giving place to decency, convenience and beauty. In respect to public buildings, especially those required for municipal institutions, and for the administration of justice, it is gratifying to learn that the intellectual and recreative wants of the people have not been neglected. Following the example of Liverpool, with her magnificent St. George's Hall, the great towns of Lancashire and Yorkshire, while endeavoring to concentrate their public offices under one roof, have devoted a large portion of the new building to the use of the public, and gone to the expense of building organs, and providing all the architectural accessories essential to giving successful musical entertainments. In these artistic and economical efforts, Leeds, the opulent capital of the woolen manufactures, has just afforded a fine specimen of what a liberal and enlightened corporation can accomplish in the way of improvement and embellishment, in the splendid hall we have delineated—the finest in England. As regards utility in the arrangements, it is pronounced superior to any other; for it combines, in one vast block of building, assize courts, a police court, offices for the corporation and its officers, and a large hall for public meetings, lectures and musical performances. Its estimated cost, exclusive of land, internal fittings and the organ, is $250,000. The walls externally are of stone, and the form is a rectangle of 250 feet by 200 feet. The structure stands on an elevated platform, and is surrounded by Corinthian columns and pilasters, supporting an entablature and attic. The height altogether is about 65 feet. In the centre of the building rises the great hall to an altitude of 92 feet from the ground. This is one of the largest rooms in England, the dimensions being 161 feet in length, 72 feet in width, and, internally, 75 feet in height. The ceiling is arched, and divided into panels. The sides of the hall are indented by five bays, with coupled Corinthian column and pilasters, 30 feet in height. In each bay there is a window. At the north end of the hall there is a circular space for the orchestra and the organ; the latter cost $25,000. The southern or principal façade differs from the rest, by having a deeply recessed portico of ten columns, and a flight of twenty-five steps leading up to the same, 105 feet in length, with large pedestals at the corners. The intercolumniations, at the sides of the building, are divided into two ranges of semicircular-headed windows. The principal entrance is at the southern end, and the large central hall is approached from the portico, through a marble vestibule seventy feet in height, and surmounted by an imposing dome. At each side of the central hall there are refreshment, retiring and dressing-rooms. The kitchen establishment, connected with this portion of the building, is on the basement floor. There are also on the ground floor, at each corner of the building, three large courts, and a spacious council room for the use of the corporation. The borough court and the council room are at the south end of the building, and the two assize courts at the north end. There are separate entrances to the different departments, and the whole building is connected by a corridor ten feet wide on each floor, which surrounds the large hall. The dome and ventilating shafts, which appear above the roof, are additions to the original design. The former is 225 feet in height, and about 50 feet square at the base. It is intended to contain a peal of bells and an illuminated clock. The architect was Mr. Cuthbert Brodrick. Such is the new Town Hall, Leeds, which, it must be admitted, reflects credit on all concerned in its construction. To Leeds it is a valuable acquisition, both ornamental and commercial.

FEROUK KHAN, PERSIAN ENVOY TO FRANCE.

The portrait on this page, a likeness of his excellency, Ferouk Khan, ambassador from the Shah of Persia to Louis Napoleon, emperor of France, is authentic. It is an accurate copy of an elaborate miniature painted by a Persian artist. His costume consists of a green tunic crossed by a blue ribbon; a cashmere pelisse lined with fur, and having on each side a diamond sash; his sword and belt are also studded with magnificent diamonds of almost inestimable value, and he wears suspended from his neck a portrait of the Shah of Persia set in diamonds. Such is the highly ornamental gentleman, who, with his suite, is now the observed of all observers in that gay capital, always avid of novelty, and ready to lionize a distinguished stranger, whether he comes from the snows of Moscow or the minarets of Ispahan. Moreover, apart from personal claims to distinction as representing a nation rarely holding communication with the west of Europe, the present political position of Persia invests his excellency with peculiar interest. He is watched by French diplomats and Russian spies—stolid John Bulls gaze after him in public, and hover near his interpreter when he is conversing in salons and antechambers. Some of the French papers state that Ferouk Khan is the first Persian ambassador who has made his appearance in Paris for nearly a century and a half. But this is a mistake; envoys from the Shah of Persia have been received at the French court at various times during the present century. Be this as it may, Ferouk Khan is lionized to his heart's content by the Parisians. He appeared in full costume at a magnificent ball at the Tuileries, recently, and divided the honors of the evening with a Russian prince of an unpronounceable name, who was habited with equal splendor. Each of them wore diamonds by the pint, and none who scrutinized these lions could decide which wore the greater amount of jewelry.

TOWN HALL, LEEDS, ENGLAND.

BALLOU'S PICTORIAL

M. M. BALLOU, { NUMBER 22
WINTER STREET.

BOSTON, SATURDAY, APRIL 18, 1857.

$2.00 PER ANNUM } VOL. XII., No. 16.—WHOLE No. 304.
6 CENTS SINGLE.

RETURN OF THE CHARLESTOWN (MASS.) CITY GUARD.

The picture on this page was drawn expressly for the Pictorial, by Mr. Hill, and represents the Charlestown City Guard, Capt. Wm. W. Pierce, as they appeared on their return from their visit to Washington, D. C., marching into the Square, Charlestown, preceded by the honorary escort, commanded by T. T. Sawyer, mayor of the city, on Tuesday, March 10. The reception of the Guard made quite a gala-day in Charlestown, and the city, as seen by our engraving, was splendidly decorated for the occasion. The City Hall was beautifully dressed with flags, while at the principal window was a large gilded eagle, surmounted by the flags of England and America, and holding in its beak a scroll inscribed with the word "Welcome," in large letters. The escort consisted of one hundred and sixteen "fine" members of the Guard, who marched to the Lowell depot to receive their friends. As the train containing the Guard entered the depot, the Brigade Band (including Ned Kendall) played the beautiful melody, "Home, Sweet Home," with fine effect. As the two companies were passing over the old Charlestown Bridge, a salute of thirteen guns was fired by the Artillery from the Maine Railroad bridge. After marching through Bow, Washington, Union, Franklin, High and Winter Streets, they proceeded to their armory and deposited their muskets. The whole body then proceeded to Harvard Hall, where they partook of a bountiful collation served up by Mr. True W. Seaver, of the Mansion House. Mayor Sawyer then made an eloquent and complimentary speech to the Guard, to which Capt. Pierce responded in a handsome manner. Other speeches were made by Dr. A. R. Thompson, Hon. G. Washington Warren, Col. Charles B. Rogers, W. W. Wheildon, R. Frothingham, Jr., of the "Boston Post," Gen. James Dana and others. In the evening a "Citizen's Reception Ball" was got up at City Hall, which was splendidly decorated for the occasion by Col.

Bent, of Boston, with flags, mottoes, pictures and various devices. Among the decorations was a fine portrait of Gen. Warren, by Copley, kindly loaned by the owner, D. W. Wells, Esq. The music was furnished by the Germania Band. Many military guests of distinction were present, as well as members of other companies, in uniform. Officers of the navy, and civilians of note, were among those present. The beauty of Charlestown and its vicinity found many fascinating representatives, and "all went merry as a marriage bell." We believe this corps is the first from this quarter that ever visited the capital on the occasion of a presidential inauguration. At Washington they were honored with marked attention; and on the great day, the 4th of March, they occupied a conspicuous position in the splendid column that escorted President Buchanan to the capitol. We are happy to add that not a man was sick during the whole tour, and the company returned, as it went, with its full complement, delighted with their visit.

RETURN OF THE CHARLESTOWN CITY GUARD FROM WASHINGTON.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE JEWELLED TALISMAN: —OR— THE PURITAN AND CAVALIER.

A TALE OF AMERICA AND ENGLAND IN THE TIME OF CHARLES II.

BY MRS. CAROLINE ORNE.

[CONTINUED.]

CHAPTER III.

THE ASSEMBLING OF THE HOUSEHOLD.

AFTER Mildred Dacres had resumed her seat, an awkward silence had ensued for several minutes, when, without the ceremony of first knocking, the door was thrown open, and a man in drab-colored garments and a steeple-crowned hat was seen standing at the threshold. Judging from his appearance, he could have been only a few years younger than Mr. Walworth. His face was a coarse one, and so extremely pale as to appear almost cadaverous. His eyes, which were in color very light, and looking out from beneath shaggy brows, were ordinarily dull and heavy, though, at times, as was at present the case, as they happened to fall on Harleigh, they dilated with a fierce, angry glare, which was absolutely startling.

"Peace be with him and his who dwell beneath this roof," said he, "but shame and confusion to those who have sought its hospitality for a season, and who have not refused to bow the knee to Charles Stuart, who, like themselves, is a feeble worm of the dust."

"Meaning you and me, Clarence," said Falkland, pinching Harleigh's arm, and speaking in an undertone.

"Gabriel Guthry, you are welcome," said Mr. Walworth. "Come in and take a seat with us."

Gabriel hesitated, looked first at Harleigh, then at Mildred, and finally fastened his gaze on Falkland.

"It is hardly meet that I should sit with idolaters and scorners," said he; "nevertheless, for the sake of others who may listen to wholesome reproof, I will not refuse your invitation."

"I have been thinking," said Mr. Walworth, "why the king of England has been permitted to harden his heart against us, and to take away the governors chosen by the people, and in their stead, set over our New England provinces one whose administration already begins to be arbitrary and oppressive."

"Need you ask," said Gabriel Guthry, "when there are such provoking sins in our midst? Even those from whom we might expect better things, have they not been enticed into following the example of the ungodly in other lands, who sit in high places and receive their food from the lordly dish, as Sisera of old took the butter offered by the hand of Jael, which was meant as a snare? Even now there is one present who, tempted by pride and the delectation they afford to the eyes of those who behold them, wears ear-rings of gold and precious stones, such as were worn by the Ishmaelites, who fell before the sword of Israel, and which were given as a gift to Gideon. Those of the stronger sex, too, who should disdain the vanities of dress, array themselves in costly velvets, adorned with gold and silver, and with ruffles of fine lace. The number of such is increasing, and though now, Nathan Walworth, you have rich and goodly lands, which were lately overrun by the heathen, you and I may live to see the day when they will so mightily prevail and multiply, that it will be no marvel if we are put to the same straits as were the children of Israel, who, when the hand of Midian prevailed against them, were compelled to dwell in the dens which are in the mountains, and in caves and strongholds."

"It will be no more than our brethren of Scotland have been forced to do," replied Mr. Walworth; "but I have faith to believe, that in the hour of need, there will be those raised up who will break asunder the cords of oppression as if they were burnt flax, and free the people from the power of the king, and his nobles, and his governors."

As Mr. Walworth finished speaking, the clock commenced striking eight. It was the hour for family worship, and as the last stroke died away, Joseph Walworth, a boy of thirteen, with the dark complexion and sedate countenance of his father, and his brother Benjamin, two years younger, with bright curling hair, and eyes full of the same cheerful light which beamed from his mother's, entered the room, and quietly took their seats on a low bench a little apart from the others. They were followed by the subordinate members of the household, all of them demeaning themselves not only in an orderly, quiet manner, but in a way which showed that any inclination to lightness of spirits was carefully subdued.

When all were seated, Mr. Walworth, removing little Ella from his knee, and telling her to go to her mother, drew his chair to the table, on which lay a large Bible. It had been brought to this country in the May Flower, by a dear friend of Mr. Walworth's, and at his friend's decease, accepted as a most precious legacy. A chapter was selected, which he read with a countenance expressive of earnest devotion, and a voice deep-toned and full of solemn fervor. The reading of the chapter was followed by a prayer, and during the performance of each, the different demeanor and aspect of the auditors might have formed an interesting study to a spectator.

Mildred Dacres now and then winked at Falkland, who in return smiled derisively. But it was in vain that either of them attempted to catch the eye of Harleigh. There was to him, whose emotional nature was more earnest and profound than theirs, something touching, even sublime, in the simplicity with which all was conducted, which could not fail to inspire a feeling of reverence.

To him, the greatest drawback to the solemnity of the scene, was Gabriel Guthry, who, by attempting to mould his features into what he considered a look of peculiar sanctity, twisted them, instead, into a kind of starched grimace, which was supremely ludicrous.

"Tarry the night with us, Gabriel," said Mr. Walworth, when, as the clock struck nine, he rose to go.

"I came for that purpose," he replied, "but now I don't feel fully satisfied in my own mind. It might have been a temptation."

As he said this, his eyes suddenly dilated, and for a moment were fastened upon Clarence Harleigh, burning with the same fierce glare as when they rested on him in the earlier part of the evening, as he stood at the threshold.

"You are too scrupulous," said Mr. Walworth. "It surely can't be aniss for you to sleep beneath the same roof with those who differ from us?"

"It isn't that—it isn't that," he said, hurriedly; and then walking up to Alice, he seized her hand. "Alice," said he, "you stand on the brink of perdition. If your feet slip, remember that I didn't neglect to warn you."

"I don't know what you mean," said Alice, attempting to withdraw her hand from his vice-like grasp.

"None are so dull as those that won't understand. This very evening, you gave a pleased ear to the honeyed words of one who, being not with us, is against us. I was near at hand, and heard all."

"Then you've been acting the part of the eaves-dropper."

"If I have, it was in the way of duty. Once more I warn you—warn you to avoid the ungodly Harleigh, and woe to you and him if you neglect to pay heed to what I say!"

"Gabriel Guthry," said Mrs. Walworth, who stood near, "I don't know what is in your mind, but as you have taken it upon you to warn Alice, I take it upon myself to warn you, and not mistake fanaticism for religion, for in more than one instance, I have had opportunity to observe that the fanatic is very apt to mistake his own will for that of the Most High."

"Can it be so?" said he.

"It is so," was her answer.

Gabriel stood in a musing attitude a few moments, and then abruptly left the room.

"How strange he seems, Annt Esther!" said Alice. "He makes me afraid."

"I don't think that he means any harm," replied her aunt, "but he needs checking. I will speak to your uncle about it."

All present had by this time risen, in order to separate for the night, nine o'clock, in those primitive days, being the customary hour for retiring.

"Harleigh," said Mildred, as she passed him, "I shall leave here to-morrow morning, early."

"Not before breakfast?"

"Yes; soon after sunrise."

"Shall you walk home?"

"No; I shall cross the bay in the little canoe in which I am accustomed to cross it."

"And do you not fear the water, after what took place yesterday?"

"Why should I? I have crossed the bay in the canoe a hundred times, and if some one—the Indian girl, I suppose, I have heard called Bird-Voice—hadn't made free with it yesterday, I shouldn't have been obliged to employ Silas Watkins, and then the accident might not have happened. You must hunt it up, and have it ready for me at the foot of the stone steps."

"Your command shall be obeyed," was Harleigh's reply, though it did not escape Mildred's quick eye or ear that the promise was reluctantly given.

The time which he would be obliged to devote to the required service would have enabled him to speak a few words to Alice, who was an early riser, and the more he thought of it, the more he felt determined to have what Mildred had insinuated respecting Falkland either confirmed or denied by her own lips. Though, as has been said, Mildred saw that Harleigh's promise was given with reluctance, she felt no disposition to release him. The few moments it would give her alone with him—for she intended to be in season to meet him at the foot of the steps,—she could, as she believed, turn to good account.

"My sweet Alice," said Mildred, encircling her waist with her arm, as they left the room, "don't put me into the spare chamber; let me share yours."

"But the spare chamber will accommodate you so much better."

"No matter; your company will more than make up for any lack of accommodation; so remember that to-night, and all future nights I may spend here, I am determined to share your room."

CHAPTER IV.

DANGER AVERTED.

MORNING had scarcely begun to kindle its fires in the east when Harleigh rose. Soon afterward he left the house, and directed his steps towards that part of the bay, opposite a lodge, where dwelt the Indian maiden alluded to by Mildred. He did not notice Gabriel Guthry, who was approaching the house by a different path from the one he had taken.

Gabriel, when he saw Harleigh, stopped short for a few moments, and then, instead of continuing to proceed towards the house, turned aside into a piece of woods which, a little further on, skirted the path selected by Harleigh.

Alice had risen, and was at her chamber window. Though she soon lost sight of Harleigh, she could see Gabriel Guthry, as he glided in and out among the trees. A feeling of dread fell upon her as she recalled what he said to her the previous evening, for the thought occurred to her that he was following Harleigh with some evil design, as she saw him stealing cautiously along in a direction nearly parallel to the path taken by her lover.

She had already thrown a short cloak over her shoulders, with the half-formed intention of following him, and by her presence defeat any sinister purpose which he might have formed against Harleigh, when Mildred, whom she imagined to be still sleeping, suddenly roused herself.

"You are preparing for an early walk, this morning, my dear Alice," said she. "I half suspect that there's a lovers' appointment to fulfil."

"I can assure you there is nothing of the kind," she replied.

"You are merely tempted by the beauty of the morning, I suppose, then?"

Alice, who still stood close to the window, instead of answering her—for though she heard her voice, she did not hear what she said,—bent eagerly forward, having, through an opening among the trees, again caught a glimpse of Guthry, whom, for a few moments, she had lost sight of. Mildred was at her side in an instant, and in time to see a man holding aside the branch of a tree, as if to prevent its intercepting the view of some object.

"Ah, Alice," said she, "I thought when you told me you had no appointment, that you were guilty of one of those evasions which are always considered allowable in such cases."

"I made use of no evasion," said Alice, "but I saw—"

She was about to tell Mildred of her alarm, and what had caused it; but she thought that as, after all, her suspicion might be unjust, she had no right to mention it.

"Why not proceed with what you were going to say, my dear Alice?" said Mildred. "You can certainly tell me, and save your blushes into the bargain."

"I had better not tell even you."

"Well, I won't quarrel with you, because you practise a little of the puritanical reserve in which you were educated, though with me, I think you might cast it aside. But your enamored swain will be sure to wait, at least, half an hour beyond the time appointed for meeting, and as in making these little neighborly visits I can't well take my waiting-maid with me, I must beg that you will perform for me the office of tire-woman. You know it won't do for me to confine my hair with a ribbon, or even attempt to cover it with one of those little coquettish caps, such as I have seen you wear. My style of beauty won't bear it."

"Excuse me, Mildred, for five minutes—even one might make me too late. When I return, if I feel at liberty so to do, I will explain whatever may now admit of a false construction."

"When you return, I shall be gone."

"At any rate, I shall see you soon," and Alice hurried from the room.

Mildred watched her from the window, and saw her hasten to the woods, which she entered, and soon disappeared.

"I should begin to think," said she, to herself, "that what I told Harleigh concerning her and Falkland has some truth in it, if I hadn't seen that steeple-crowned hat looming up in the morning mist. It cannot be that she has taken a fancy to the grim Gabriel. Compared with him, Mr. Walworth is a pattern of refinement and amiability. But never mind. Falkland or Guthry, I can make equally to subserve my purpose. She might have staid long enough to arrange my hair." And she went to the looking-glass, which was about the bigness of a common-sized window pane.

Before commencing the unwonted task, she opened a small pearl box which sat on the table.

"I thought this was where she kept Harleigh's gift when she didn't wear it," said she, as one of those rare opals, whose lively play of colors makes it one of the most precious of gems, met her view. As she removed it from the box, the sun darted his first beams in at the window, and kindled it into a dazzling brilliancy. "I am half a mind to make sure of it now," she added. For a moment she stood irresolute, and then returned it. "No; it will be premature. The broad Atlantic must roll between him and Alice when she misses it, or an explanation will make all right between them," were the thoughts which passed through her mind.

Fearing to miss Harleigh, Mildred now used all possible despatch in making her toilet, and was soon on her way to the place where she had directed him to bring the canoe.

Alice, meanwhile, after fairly entering the woods, stopped and looked in the direction where she had last seen Gabriel. He was nowhere in sight, but just as she was about to again move forward, she heard a slight crash, like the breaking of a dead limb, at some distance in advance of her. The woods, which on the side next the house were open and free from underbrush, were now dense and tangled, so that she could make but slow progress, though the bent and broken boughs served to guide her towards him she sought. It was not long before she came in sight of him. The sun had now risen, and she could see distinctly.

Gabriel's usually pale face was now pale to ghastliness. He stood as if rooted to the ground, with his eyes glaring still more fiercely than when, the preceding evening, they fell on Harleigh. Alice was near enough to see that they were fastened on some object at no great distance. All at once she heard voices. One of them was Harleigh's, the other a sweet girlish voice, which she knew was the Indian maiden's, who dwelt in the lodge hard by.

At that moment, Gabriel Guthry changed his attitude, and then she saw that he held a rifle in his hand, which, previously to his entering the woods, the imperfect light prevented her from seeing. He partly raised it, and Alice, springing forward, was about to utter a cry of warning, when he suffered it to fall back again to its former position.

"A curse on the ungodly cavalier, and on the little copper-colored heathen by his side. I should have had him if it hadn't been for her," said Gabriel, in a voice quivering with rage.

The next moment he turned and plunged deeper into the woods, while Alice, with an unuttered prayer of thanksgiving in her heart, pressed close to the farther edge of the woods, that with her own eyes she might see that Harleigh was safe. At a little distance, the waters of the bay broke on a beach of hard, silvery sand, and Harleigh, in a tiny canoe which would hardly have afforded space for the accommodation of a second person, and which Alice knew belonged to Mildred Daeres, was just pushing off from the shore.

Bird-Voice, with the golden arrows of the sun glancing in and out among her ebony hair, which was ornamented with a wreath of delicate and many-colored shells, and with lips parted with a smile, stood in front of a rude though picturesque lodge, watching him. Harleigh waved his hand to her, and then applied himself diligently to paddling his canoe.

A minute after he turned away, the clear, liquid whistle of a blackbird, so he imagined, was poured from a tree near the lodge. Nothing could have sounded more delightful, as it came to his ear, floating on the balmy breeze of morning. He turned and looked into the tree for the author of the exquisite music. A gush of laughter almost as sweet as the song broke from the girl's lips, and then the clear, liquid strain was repeated. Harleigh knew then why he had been given her the name of Bird-Voice.

Once more his light canoe was gliding swiftly along, while the bay, ruffled by the fresh air, broke into thousands of bright sparkles beneath the light of the morning sunbeams. In a few minutes he rounded the headland, and could see that Mildred was standing on the upper step, awaiting his arrival.

She was skilful in the science of attitudes, and the haughty grace of her magnificent, almost Amazonian beauty, which, the evening previous, had won the reluctant admiration of Silas Watkins, was now artfully softened and toned down, in a way which she knew would be more fascinating to Harleigh. Her pensive air, in striking contrast with the sparkling and breezy freshness of morning, as she had imagined, produced a favorable impression.

"A lovely morning," said she, in a soft and sad tone of voice, as he stopped close to the foot of the lower stair.

"Exhilarating, too, is it not?" said Harleigh, while at the same time he remarked that her countenance wore an expression of melancholy, equal to the sadness of her voice.

"It should be, I suppose," was her reply; "but the truth is, my spirits are too much depressed for me to be alive to the cheering influences of nature."

"What causes the depression? Has anything happened?"

"I believe I should answer you in the negative; for why should it affect me thus, even if Alice is guilty of an indiscretion?"

"What second indiscretion has she been guilty of? I thought her eagerness last evening to net upon Falkland's hint was enough for the present."

"Nothing so very serious. I am foolish for letting it affect me thus. But then, you know she is the same to me as a dear sister."

"Tell me what she has done."

"That for which I, at least, should hardly blame her. She took an early walk, and so have I. I expected to meet you, and she, no doubt, knew very well who the one was that was waiting in the woods, though the distance and the morning mist, still hanging round, prevented me from having a distinct view of him."

"It was Falkland."

"I don't say that it was."

"I have no doubt of it."

"I wish there was room for more."

"More? There isn't a particle. Do you think I can forget last evening?"

"Don't allow yourself to be thus excited. Wait and watch."

"Calmly?"

"Yes, or not at all."

"You advise an impossibility."

"Remember your promise last evening."

"I am unequal to its performance."

"By no means. I know you better than you do yourself. You have the strength; all that is lacking is the will."

"Say no more. I will wait and watch, and that calmly, too, during the short time I have to remain here."

"That will be doing as you should do. It will be acting worthy of yourself. I will seek an early opportunity to question Alice, and warn her against Falkland. He is artful and unprincipled; she is unsuspecting and innocent."

"Fickle, you should say."

"We should be lenient in judging others, severe only in judging ourselves. While the task of speaking to Alice is left to me, it may not be amiss for you to question Falkland in such a way as will not excite his suspicion. He will undoubtedly let fall something, unawares, which will serve to show what his intentions are."

"It may be well to question him."

"You may be certain it will. I will detain you no longer. For the sake of relieving your anxiety, I will see Alice soon—in a day or two at the furthest."

Harleigh, without making any reply, sprang from the canoe, where he had remained during the foregoing colloquy, and Mildred, descending the steps, took his place.

"You are not afraid to cross alone?" said he.

"Not on such a smooth sea as this. Once when crossing, I was overtaken by a sudden thunder-shower. The wind rose, changing the ripples into foaming waves, and my little canoe was tossed about as if it had been an egg-shell."

"And you escaped unharmed?"

"Yes; for which my thanks are due to Silas Watkins. And yet, though he imperiled his own life to save mine, he disliked me, and does still, though yesterday he, or rather you, again saved me."

"For what reason does he dislike you?"

"I never knew; probably he doesn't know himself."

With a graceful inclination of the head, Mildred now turned away, and the next moment was darting lightly over the blue waters.

Harleigh did not move from the spot where she had left him. During the conversation which had passed between them, there was something in her manner which had inspired confidence. Now, however, when freed from the spell of her presence, confidence gave place to distrust—why, he could not tell, for he had not the most distant suspicion of her designs respecting himself, nor of the plot which she and Falkland were so sedulously endeavoring to weave.

"Were Alice here now," was the thought which passed through his mind. "I believe that I should be tempted to break the promise I made Mildred Daeres; for, after all, a straight-forward course is the best."

His eyes continued to follow Mildred, as she swiftly propelled her tiny bark, till in the distance she might have been mistaken for some bird of brilliant plumage skimming lightly over the waves. Even when Mildred had reached the opposite shore at a point half a mile distant from where she stood when she hailed Silas Watkins, Harleigh continued to stand on the promontory. He was endeavoring to decide in his own mind if it would not be right to disclose to Alice his suspicion relative to Falkland.

"Harleigh."

His name was spoken in a low, sweet voice, and a hand, at the same moment, was laid timidly on his arm. He turned at the sound of his name.

"You are abroad early," said he.

"Yes. I have sought you to tell you that you are in danger, and may be still."

"If danger threatens any one, I should think it was you rather than me."

"O no; I have nothing to fear from him."

"You think he likes you too well for that?"

"It may be that he does."

"You own it, then?"

"Should I conceal it, what reason could I give you for his attempting your life?"

"Attempting my life?"

"Yes."

"How? When?"

"This morning; not an hour since. Had not Bird-Voice been close by your side, he would have shot you with his rifle."

"I had little opinion of Gilbert Falkland's morality, but I didn't think him bad enough to attempt a person's life."

"It isn't Falkland that I mean."

"Who can it be, then?"

"Gabriel Guthry."

"He who came to your uncle's last evening?"

"Yes."

"And you didn't meet Falkland in the woods this morning?"

"Neither in the woods nor elsewhere."

"It was Guthry you went to meet?"

"No—not to meet, but to watch him."

And Alice related to Harleigh those incidents of the morning already known, and how her fears for his safety had taken alarm, in consequence of what Guthry had said to her the preceding evening.

"I have wronged you, Alice. I have suspected you without sufficient cause," said Harleigh, when she had finished her recital.

"Of what have you suspected me?" she inquired.

"Of preferring Falkland to me."

"It was indeed without cause."

"Not entirely."

"You wrong me still to think so."

"I am willing to believe that you meant no harm by it, yet was it not indiscreet when, last evening, at the risk of displeasing your uncle, you showed yourself so ready to please Falkland?"

"In what respect?"

"Have you forgotten, that at his request, carelessly made, you released this beautiful hair from its bondage? It was a request I shouldn't have ventured to make, even though a half hour before, you had permitted me to believe that you preferred me above all others."

"He never made any such request, and if I was not sorry that Mildred refused to restore the ribbon which, at the moment we were about to enter the room, she playfully snatched from my hair, it was because I hoped what I believed to be my improved appearance would please, not Falkland, but you."

"Can what you say be possible?"

"It is true."

"I believe you, my sweet Alice. I have been basely deceived."

He was about to tell her the way and manner, when Gabriel Guthry, whose approach had been concealed by some bushes, suddenly stood before them.

"I thought your time had come, and that it was I who was to deal with you," said Gabriel, addressing Harleigh, "and so, unseen by you, I raised my hand against you. But it was a lying spirit that whispered in my ear. You need not fear me now."

"I fear no one—not even an enemy, who is not mean enough to steal upon me unawares," was Harleigh's reply.

"My spirit is still exceedingly bitter against you, and I may again be tempted. Yet I shall wrestle hard against the temptation, though you have, as it were, touched the apple of my eye."

"I am not aware that there is any reason for your accusation," said Harleigh.

"Is it not known to you that Alice Dale is mine?"

"No, nor to her, either."

"Why do you say so, Gabriel?" asked Alice.

"When you were no higher than my knee, I said to Nathan Walworth, 'I will serve you seven years, and then seven more added to them, for your niece Alice, even as Jacob of old served Laban for his daughter Rachel.'"

"And did he accept your services on the condition you named?" inquired Harleigh.

"He said if I labored for him, he should recompense me with silver and gold, but when twice seven years were accomplished, if I remained in the same mind, I was free to win the maiden if I could, and he smiled graciously on me, as he said these words."

"And the twice seven years are now gone?" said Harleigh.

"They are. Last evening, half an hour after sunset, they were finished; but there was one standing in my path, whose apparel was ornamented with gold and silver, such as dazzles the eyes of a thoughtless maiden, and I knew she would not listen to me. Soberly was I tempted to cause my own garments to be adorned with shining gauds, in order to please her eye, and thus obtain favor in her sight. I even listened to the tempter so far as to fasten ruffles of fine lace about my wrists, and mightily did it please my vanity to see them fall over these hands." And by way of giving force to his words, he held up and spread out to their full capacity his large, ill-shaped and ill-kept hands.

"But, after all, you concluded not to wear them," said Harleigh.

"I did. Strength was given me to tear them from my wrists, and cast them down into the dust, where I trampled on them with my feet, till they bore no likeness to what had so tickled my fancy. But as it did not seem good unto me that they should be lost, I told the girl Rebecca what I had done, and she rescued them from the dust and dirt, and cleansed them with water and with soap."

"A very praiseworthy piece of economy," said Harleigh, "in you as well as in the girl."

"And that I might not again be tempted to adorn myself with them, I sold them to her for the price demanded for such merchandise, thereby making fourpence-halfpenny by my bargain, the dealer having been prevailed upon to abate thus much from the price he at first demanded."

"A sum worth looking after," said Harleigh, with a smile.

"Verily it is to those who would thrive. Silas Watkins told me, on my way hither, that you intended soon to go beyond the sea. Is it true?"

"It is."

"How soon?"

"In a week or ten days."

"Then I shan't have to strive long with the temptation which urges me to adorn my person with worthless gauds; for when you are gone, I shall no longer have a rival. Come, Alice, leave this ungodly cavalier, and return to your home with me. You belong to me, and it isn't my pleasure for you to remain with him."

"It must be time for breakfast," said Alice, turning to Harleigh. And then drawing nearer to him, she added, in a low voice: "I am alike afraid to go with him or to refuse."

"I should be afraid to trust you," was Harleigh's reply. "Look! If that isn't the glare of frenzy burning in his pale, almost colorless eyes, I know not what to term it."

"And so you can't go without him," said Gabriel. "It is well that he has only a short time to tarry among us, or the temptation to deliver you from the snare which he has laid for you might grow too strong and mighty to resist. But I will shield her from you, if the power is given me."

Saying this, he took Alice by the arm, though she involuntarily recoiled as he did so, and with rapid strides, which showed little regard for her comfort or accommodation, urged her forward in the direction of the house, while Harleigh, though an excellent walker, was barely able to keep so near as to assist Alice whenever the width of the path permitted.

[TO BE CONTINUED.]

DR. KANE'S DOG.

The Arctic dog brought home by Dr. Kane has strayed away off in Alleghany. He has become the property of James McArthur, timber dealer, in Oramel. The recent cold weather has kept this large, black, shaggy animal in high spirits. When they take him into the forest among the timber-hewers, where he can do no harm, and remove his muzzle, he cuts all sorts of pranks, seeking the deepest drifts, and actually burying himself for delight; you can see the dry snow move, but no semblance of a dog, till on a sudden out he pops, giving his hairy fleece a tremendous shake, and away he runs for another dive. Mr. McArthur calls him "Es-ki-mo" (Esquimaux), not a very smooth name, but characteristic. To look "Es-k" fair in the face, you see almost a likeness of a black bear, though his eyes are rather languid. His long, soft, shaggy covering is nearly equal in bulk to his body. When left to run at large in the village, he wears a muzzle to prevent his destroying the pigs and chickens.—Newark Daily Advertiser.

WASHINGTON IDOLIZED.

Did you know that Washington had been placed in the calendar of saints? There is a church at Iltas, over the principal portal of which is a very well-executed bust of the leader of the American Revolution, and, on inquiry of a native of the town, I was informed that it was a bust of the "good saint George Washington." I confess that as I passed this church, I felt like taking off my hat, and did it—not because of custom, but because I couldn't help it.—Newark Correspondent.

CHINESE SKETCHES.

We present on this page some curious descriptive engravings of the queer people in the "Central Flower-land," illustrating "John Chinaman" at home. The first represents a Chinese girl gathering tea, a process we have heretofore described. The second picture delineates a Chinese drummer, or rather he unites two duties, for he is also a standard bearer. He beats with a single stick, his left hand being occupied with a sabre. The next figure is a swordsman of the rebel army. Some account of the military system of China in this connection may not be uninteresting. It would be difficult to estimate the military forces of the celestial empire. Different authors who have examined this question differ in their figures. Van-ta-Zhin, the military maodurin who accompanied Lord Macartney during his sojourn in China, affirmed that the Chinese army, comprising the Tartar troops, amounted to 1,000,000 infantry and 800,000 cavalry. The embassy could admit, from its own observations, the exactness of the first figures, but saw few cavalry. Timkowski, in the narrative of his journeys to Pekin, gives the following valuations, which agree pretty nearly with those of Father Duhalde, but are probably below the truth: Manchoes, 67,000 men; Mongols, 21,000; Chinese noticed to the Mongols after the conquest, 27,000; ordinary Chinese troops, 500,000; militia and irregular troops, 125,000; making a total of 740,000 men. Finally, Thomas, an English writer, gives the figures which he obtained from a sort of Chinese calendar, and which amount, for infantry, 822,000 men; cavalry, 410,000; sailors, 31,000; total, 1,263,000. We see how these estimates differ; still, the fact remains that, even admitting the largest statement, the Chinese army, in proportion to the general population of the empire (300,000,000), is about three times less than that of France. The military, like the civil grades, are obtained by competition. Every year there are examinations for the different promotions; so that a soldier skilled in drawing the bow, managing the lance, or riding, may rise to the highest dignities in the army. Muscular strength is also taken into consideration. Europeans who have had occasion to see the Chinese generals must have remarked their good condition and robust appearance. These are qualities highly esteemed in China, and which inspire great respect in the soldiers and the populace. The soldiers also receive promotion when they have distinguished themselves in battle. If they fall, a pension is granted to their families, and their names are inscribed in the sacred books, to be comprised in the promotions which will take place in the other world. The dress of the soldiers is very simple: it is a red vest with blue trimmings, or a blue vest with red trimmings; the blue cotton trousers, like all Chinese garments, are very ample, and reach to the lower part of the leg. Each soldier wears on his back and breast the number of his regiment and the character young, which signifies bravery. The hat is of rattan, and ends in a point. When he has served his time, the Chinese soldier has only to take off his hat and vest, and is then clothed like a plain citizen. Thus, at Ningpo and Amoy, when the English found themselves masters of the city, after the defeat of their enemies, it was impossible to recognize the soldiers and pursue them; they had mixed with the rest of the population, leaving their uniforms upon the field of battle. The arms employed by the Chinese in the north are not exactly the same as those used in the southern part of the empire. In the north, the cavalry is more numerous. They are armed with bows and arrows, and generally poorly mounted on small horses of degenerate Tartar race. A few cuirasses of polished steel have been noted, like those worn in Europe by the knights of the middle ages. In the south, few cavalry are met with. The mandarins have sabres with short, straight blades, the scabbards covered with fantastic ornaments. They wear them on the right side, to prevent their interfering with the quiver which hangs from the left shoulder. This quiver is of leather, more or less ornamented, according to the grade. The arrows are of different lengths; some end in a ball pierced with several holes, which produce a sharp whistling in the air, designed to strike terror into the enemy's ranks; the feathers are selected of the most brilliant colors, particularly those of the pheasant, which are used only for the mandarins. The private soldiers have bucklers, guns, lances, bows and arrows, and sabres with two blades. The buckler forms a circle of plaited rattan, representing on the exterior the figure of a warrior, or rather a demon; the eyes are enormous, the mouth disproportioned, the face formidable; sometimes they have a tiger or a dragon, whose aspect alone ought to put an enemy to flight. These shields are easily pierced by a bullet, but are proof against a sabre or lance stroke. The Chinese only use match-locks of the clumsiest model. If it be true that they were the first to make use of gunpowder, it must be acknowledged that in their employment of it, they are far behind us. The match-lock is at least as dangerous to the Chinese soldier as to the enemy. The cartridges are contained in a cotton or leather box, which contains fourteen or sixteen wooden tubes, each holding a charge. The guns are of different lengths; the wood is usually painted red, and the barrel is fixed by rings of copper. The rest is placed almost at the end, and it must be fired without bringing the arm to the shoulder. There are lances of all kinds; some are ordinary pikes, others resemble European halberds. The steel is commonly very broad, and sharp only on one side. These lances are capable of inflicting terrible wounds, but are difficult to manage, on account of their length and weight. The bow is the favorite arm of the Chinese soldier; it is made of a very hard and elastic wood, bent by a cord of silk and twine, extremely strong. It is employed in hunting as well as war, and a fine bow is as much prized as a handsome fowling piece is with us. An agate ring serves as a thumb-piece. It is not unusual in the houses of the lettered mandarins to see a species of panoply in which figure a costly bow, and arrows feathered with the plumes of the golden pheasant, together with horns of the animals that have been slain by the huntsman. The double sabre is a singular but not very formidable weapon. There are two blades in the same scabbard, which is divided into two compartments. The soldier holds a sabre in each hand, and thus advances on the enemy. The Chinese did not fight the English at close quarters enough to show the utility of this double blade. In the sing-songs, or theatrical representations, you often see performers who handle the sabre very dexterously, and defend themselves, by rapid movements, against numerous assailants; but these are only jugglers, and warriors of the stage. What can sabres, even double-bladed sabres, do against the bayonets and balls of Anglo-Saxons! The general administration of the army and navy is centralized at Pekin, in one of the six grand councils which preside over the government of the empire. Each one of these councils forms a species of ministry, whose jurisdiction extends over all the provinces, and descends, by a long suite of degrees, to the mandarins of the inferior order. If we examine the mechanism of the Chinese government, and its theoretical organization, we are struck with the order and regular classification which it seems must reign in all its wheel-works and ranks. Dignities and grades are open to competition; the principle of centralization has existed in China from time immemorial. But when we observe the practice and the details of this administration, apparently so severe, we perceive a crowd of abuses, bribery and corruption substituted for fair competition, and this long thread, every moment broken, either through the remoteness of subordinate, or the impotence of those who govern. Thus the council of war at Pekin would be unable, in a given time, to set on foot and organize a Chinese army. It is now an acknowledged fact that the Chinese invented gunpowder, but Europe has long since outstripped them in the use of this terrible means of war. It is curious to compare the Chinese with the English powder, and to remark that in the composition of the two powders, the same elements enter in nearly the same proportions. Thus the English powder is composed of 75 parts of saltpetre, 15 of charcoal and 10 of sulphur, and the Chinese powder contains 75 parts seven-tenths of saltpetre, 14.4 of charcoal and 9.9 of sulphur. Saltpetre is found abundantly in the celestial empire, and the manufacture of gunpowder is of great importance. The consumption is enormous. On all occasions of festival and rejoicing, the Chinese burn crackers and fireworks, the pieces of which vary infinitely and produce the most singular effects. On the Canton River, at sunrise and sunset, you hear from all the boats which cover the river and form an immense city, peopled by 300,000 souls, noisy detonations mingling with the sounds of the gong and announcing the hour of prayer. When a junk leaves port or arrives, her guns announce the arrival or departure. The numerous flotillas of fishing-boats which go to sea every day, see which can make the most noise and fire the most crackers to render the divinities favorable. There are, in all the towns, vast store-houses, wholly filled with cases of fireworks, whose sale is considerable in China, furnishing an important article of export to foreign countries. Unfortunately, gunpowder is only of use to the Chinese in noisy celebrations and religious ceremonies; they cannot employ it as a means of defence. We have already noticed their match-locks as more dangerous to those who serve them than the enemy. Their cannon are not worth more. When the Jesuit missionaries had access to the court of the emperor Kang-hi, they attempted to naturalize the arts and sciences of Europe in China. They introduced astronomical and mathematical science, and some principles of general physics, into the schools of the celestial empire; they perfected the manufacture of fire-arms and cannon foundries; but the old routine soon got the upperhand, and the Chinese, given up to themselves, found themselves incapable of continuing the progress which the strangers had commenced among them. As to their fortifications, they exhibit the same inexperience and neglect of all rule. The masonry is fine, and from a distance they present a tolerably imposing aspect. The walls are thick, but the embrasures are disposed in such a manner that the guns can only carry straight forward. Moreover, the majority of the forts are only defended on one side; the walls which form the three others are not provided with batteries. It is enough, therefore, to land a few paces from the fort, to turn it and obtain possession of it with the least trouble in the world. The English often performed this very simple manoeuvre to the great astonishment of the Chinese, who had never thought of it. The walls which surround the cities are, in general, too low to oppose the least defence; they are built of brick and stone. Besides, cities of any importance are surrounded by suburbs, which extend at the foot of the ramparts, and would not give free play to the artillery.

CHINESE GIRL GATHERING TEA.

A CHINESE INSURGENT OFFICER.

CHINESE DRUMMER, REGULAR ARMY.

IRISH PEASANTS GOING TO MARKET.

IRISH PEASANTRY.

The two pictures on this page illustrate life in Ireland in a very happy manner. The first represents some of the Irish peasantry going to market with their produce. Here we have pedestrians trudging along, a man with a one-horse cart astride of the shafts, and accommodating a couple besides his marketing in the vehicle, a peasant on horseback with his wife behind, a girl on foot with her basket on her head, and a little barefooted gossoon beside her—all, in spite of their evident poverty, looking cheerful and contented. The next picture presents us with an Irish schoolmaster. Perhaps there is not a more distinguished individual than the "Hedge Schoolmaster" in the Emerald Isle. He is greatly respected by the peasantry, whose children he has undertaken to educate, is ever a welcome guest at their homes, and gets the best bit and sup, and the warmest corner at their firesides. Here he seems as much at home, and more at his ease, than the hospitable owner of the domicile he has condescended to visit, repaying his hospitality from the stores of his knowledge. He is generally a proficient in music, and in the summer time often plays on his violin, while the boys dance on the green. Sometimes two rival schoolmasters have a very amusing trial of professional skill.

THE IRISH SCHOOLMASTER.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THY PORTRAIT.

BY M. P., JR.

Daguerre! I reverence thee—thy genius bless!
How but for thee would I to-day
Be basking 'neath affection's ray
Heartfull of happiness?
How but for thee could I portray
Each beauteous feature, and each charm convey
To my fond heart, whose love is measureless?

Though memory paints with faithful hand,
Still love confused might fail to trace
Each gentle charm, each lovely grace,
Each smile so sweet and bland.
But through thy art her own sweet face
Comes vividly to me, and in my heart finds place,
Filling love's strong demand.

That brow, which in the picture wears
A self-reliant calm, hath ever worn
To every prayer a queenly scorn,
Crushing the heart that dares.
Those deep gray eyes—as opening morn
Lights nature's face—e'en thus those eyes adorn
Thy countenance, so free from worldly cares.

Thy tresses dark, sweep backward from thy cheek;
Luxuriant they retrace their graceful flow,
And fall caressingly towards thy heart below,
As if they would a sanctum seek.
Art thou unconscious of the glow
Thy beauty lends to hearts else slow?—
Art thou so truly meek?

Though I may never hope thy hand to press
As the acknowledged thy heart,
And feel thy whispered love impart
A joy enhanced by womanly caress:
Still I possess thy self in part—
Thy semblance from the painter's art,
And it will soothe my wretchedness.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE ARTIST'S PRIZE.

BY MISS OPHELIA M. CLOUTMAN.

THE last rays of the setting sun penetrated the heavily draped windows of a large and spacious apartment and fell aslant the half exposed canvass upon which was pictured in fresh and glowing colors a newly finished Madonna and child. Before the easel sat the painter Rubens—an old man of some fifty-five summers—with his eyes fixed intently upon the warmly-tinted picture, his arms folded complacently across his breast, and his whole soul, as it were, revelling in the flood of golden light which seemed to invest the heads of both mother and son with a soft and heavenly lustre. The shadows of evening were already deepening into twilight, when a faint tap at the door aroused the artist from the long and abstracted reverie into which he had fallen. Rubens started, and in a low voice said:

"Come in."

The door opened, and a tall and graceful youth, who had numbered some twenty years, entered, bearing in his hand a portfolio and sketch book. With a modest mien and faltering step the young man advanced towards the artist, who had risen from his seat and now stood quietly surveying the intruder. For a moment silence was preserved by both parties, at last the former ventured to speak:

"I have come in to request the great favor of becoming a pupil of the illustrious and world-renowned Rubens."

"May I ask by what means you have become so well acquainted with my labors in the field of painting, that thus you eulogize and extol me?" said the old man, calmly.

"Sir," replied the youth with enthusiasm, "are not the galleries of Brussels freighted with the rich productions of your skilful pencil?"

"You have been in Brussels then?" said Rubens, with an inquiring glance.

"Yes, I have sojourned there for the past ten years of my life. My history is a short one, and if I am not encroaching upon your patience, I will give it you at once," said the young man, with a sorrowful glance.

"I pray you do relate it. My ears are most attentive listeners," said the old man, becoming momentarily more and more interested in the strange youth before him.

The two being seated, the younger one commenced the recital of his tale.

"My earliest recollections of home were in Rome, that glorious city of the past. My father, Alexandre del Sarto, was an artist, professing ever a strong love and attachment for his favorite and chosen profession. But in Rome his efforts were but slightly appreciated, and the trivial sum received by him for the sale of his pictures was quite insufficient for the daily support of his family. Discouraged and vexed at his want of success, my father conceived the somewhat rash idea of visiting Brussels to try once again his luck in painting. Accompanied by his wife and two children, he embarked for Brussels, with many hopes and bright visions of future success. Arriving there safely, our little family had hardly established themselves, before my little and only sister was seized with a terrible fever. The day which dawned upon her burial witnessed, also, the complete prostration of my father; and ere two weeks had flown, the inanimate body of my loved father was laid beside that of my sister."

At this point of his life's sad history the young man paused, while tears coursed slowly down his cheeks.

"And your father's property?" said Rubens, his heart's deep sympathies fairly aroused.

"Alas! the only inheritance left to his orphan child was a natural taste and inclination for that same profession in the pursuance of which fortune had only tempted but to frown upon him."

I will not farther detail the particulars of that long and protracted meeting between the great master and the poor stranger youth in whom he had become so suddenly yet deeply interested. Suffice it to say, that the next morning after their interview found Andrea del Sarto an inmate of the studio of the painter Rubens, notwithstanding the latter had long since openly avowed his determination to receive no more pupils in his profession as an artist.

Months passed by, and the young student had made rapid progress in his studies. Rubens himself was fairly delighted with the fertile genius and wondrous talents of his protege. Already had he entrusted Andrea del Sarto with the execution of many family portraits, for which he had received orders; and although such pictures were supposed by the public to be the genuine productions of Rubens's skilful pencil, it was sufficient compensation in the eyes of Andrea to know that his style was so near the counterpart of his master's as scarcely to be distinguishable from that artist's works except by the most fastidious and critical eye.

On entering his studio one morning, Rubens found his pupil apparently so much absorbed in the contemplation of a miniature which he held in his hand as to be entirely unconscious of the existence of all outward circumstances. Perceiving that his entrance had been unnoticed by the youth, the old master advanced noiselessly behind the chair of the young man and glanced at the miniature before him, which was one of great female loveliness. It was executed upon ivory, and was a work of rare merit. But as the old man's gaze rested a second time upon it, he started back and uttered an exclamation of surprise, which caused Andrea to turn quickly around to ascertain the cause of such a sudden and unlooked-for intrusion. For a moment, Andrea stood dismayed and overwhelmed with confusion, as his eyes encountered the stern gaze of his master. The latter, however, instantly recovered himself, and said:

"You will doubtless wonder at the emotion betrayed by me when my eye fell upon the miniature with whose great beauty you seemed lost and rapt in admiration. It was the striking resemblance which the picture bore to the face of my only daughter, which arrested my attention and surprise; for never before have these eyes, so accustomed to look upon the human face in its greatest variety, beheld a face so ethereal in its perfect loveliness as is that of Clara Rubens." A smile passed over the face of the old man, as turning to his companion he quickly added: "I trust you will pardon an old father's vanity in having thus frankly spoken of the beauty of his child."

"Most assuredly, sir," said Andrea, respectfully, "it would give me much pleasure to know the daughter of my honored and beloved master. In regard to the original of the miniature which you found me examining," said the youth, slightly coloring, "I must tell you that I know almost as little concerning her as yourself, the miniature having come into my possession under peculiar circumstances."

"Indeed! Perchance it is some ideal creation of the painter's fancy," said Rubens, good naturedly.

"O, no! You are mistaken," said Andrea, quickly; "for it was from the hands of the original that I received it, some three years since."

"Some lost friend, perhaps?" queried Rubens.

"Listen, and I will tell you the circumstances which made me its happy possessor," replied the young artist.

"It was early one summer evening, some three years since, that, heated and fatigued by the extreme sultriness of the day, I strolled into the country for the purpose of recruiting my enfeebled and weakened energies preparatory to the labors of the following day. Indifferent to both time and distance, I wandered on, scarce knowing where I went, until I found myself in the midst of a large tract of woods, some three or four miles distant from the city. I was just upon the point of retracing my steps homewards when a loud shriek rang through the woods. At first, I supposed it to be the scream of some night bird, making still more desolate the usual solitude of the place. I paused. Again that cry of distress fell upon my ear. Half breathless, I hastened forward toward the spot which the sound proceeded from. But all around me was darkness and gloom, while a gentle breeze sighed through the thick and overspreading foliage. The ground beneath my feet was cold and damp, and a chilling sensation began to creep through my veins. But still I hastened on, while the sounds, which I now supposed to proceed from some human voice, seemed growing fainter and fainter. Suddenly a dim light, as from a lantern, attracted my attention. That feeble light served as a beacon to guide me onward in the path of duty. With increased velocity I sprang forward, and ere many moments elapsed I had reached the spot of action. As I neared the thicket I heard the pawing of hoofs upon the ground, as of a steed impatient to be gone. At this moment, a stream of light issuing from the lantern revealed to my sight the slight form of a female figure, apparently a girl of some fifteen summers, struggling in the embraces of a large and swarthy-looking man. I could bear no more. Seizing a broken bough which lay near by, I cautiously advanced from behind a tree and aimed a blow at the head of the monster before me. With a muttered curse upon the unseen author of his injury, the villain fell senseless to the ground. It was but the work of an instant for me to spring forward and release the horse which had been tied to a neighboring tree; then lifting the fainting form of the girl from the ground, I sprang into the saddle, and we were soon out of reach of all human harm. I had not rode far before my companion began slowly to revive, the heavy night dew acting as a restorative to her senses; and from her trembling lips I learned the particulars of that fearful adventure from which, stripping as I was, I had rescued her.

"A stranger in Brussels, she had rode forth, towards sunset, into the country; but being suddenly overtaken by night, she had lost her way. Passing through the woods, her passage was arrested by the strong and powerful arm of a man, who seized the reins of her horse and in a loud voice demanded her purse. The young girl, terrified with fear, obeyed; but even that did not satisfy the heart of the ruffian, and tearing the weak and powerless girl from the saddle, he began to strip her person of the few jewels which she wore. Having succeeded in gaining all but a small diamond cross, it was in her struggle for the keeping of that precious relic that Providence appointed me her deliverer. The next day I received a note from the fair unknown, expressive of her heart's deep gratitude, and urging my acceptance of this little miniature likeness of herself until time could better reward me for the service rendered her."

"And have you never seen the lady since that eventful night?" said Rubens, as Andrea concluded his narrative.

"No; as she steadily refused disclosing her name, and was not a resident of Brussels, it was in vain that I sought to find her out; and though three years have passed, thus far success has baffled all my efforts to obtain a clue to her whereabouts."

"A strange bit of romance, truly," said Rubens, rubbing his hands smartly together, and taking his hat to leave.

It was not many weeks after the above conversation before the youthful artist was called away from the scene of his labors to attend the bedside of his dying mother. With mingled feelings of sorrow and regret, Andrea del Sarto bade adieu to one who, out of the boundless charities of his heart, had done so much towards shaping the future career of the young artist. Rubens, with tears in his eyes and a prayer upon his lips for the success and prosperity of the untiring student, witnessed the departure of Andrea for Brussels.

One month from the time of his return home the old master received a letter from his protege announcing the death of his only surviving relative. Impressed by the bitter loneliness of his situation, now that all who were dear to his heart had been taken from him, he was determined to seek his fortune in some distant quarter of the globe, when, God granting him success, he would return to Antwerp, there to lay his hard-earned laurels at the feet of his respected patron and master, and in his charming society spend the remaining years of his life. Such was the bright picture of the future which the young enthusiast beheld in his day-dreams. Would to God that the reality were always as beautiful and truthful as the ideal!

In a luxurious apartment of one of the most beautiful hotels situated upon the Rue de la Francie, behold the lovely and accomplished daughter of the artist Rubens. The somewhat slight, yet fully developed form, the rose-tinted complexion, the pale and lofty brow, over which a shower of golden ringlets cluster in rich profusion, the deep and azure blue of her eyes, together with the sweet and radiant smile which ever illumines her countenance, combine to make Clara Rubens a vision of almost angelic loveliness.

Four years have past since the opening of our story, and as the youthful bud of promise has gradually developed into the full-blown rose, the old father has watched with tender solicitude the daily expansion of the charms of both soul and body of his idolized child. Yes, Clara Rubens was fair to look upon. All Antwerp rendered her homage. Sonnets were indited to her, musical ballads were dedicated to her, while her fairy-like portrait graced not only the walls of the gallery of fine arts but was found embodied in many a sculptor's group in the various and numerous studios of Antwerp.

The daughter of Rubens was in the twenty-second year of her age; and though she had never failed for lack of admirers and suitors for her hand in marriage, yet up to that time the fair girl had courteously declined all proposals. Her father, conscious of the decay of nature and his declining years, was anxious to see his only child the established wife and partner of some person worthy her position in life. Having communicated this desire to his child one morning, to his great surprise he found that Clara, who had ever been set and immovable on that point, now yielded a ready assent to his wishes. The following plan, by which to make choice of a husband, was conceived and proposed to his daughter, which having met with her acceptance, ran as follows.

As Clara Rubens, besides possessing wondrous beauty, was also a reputed heiress, she would doubtless receive numberless offers from both the wealthy and matrimonial speculators. To prevent any ambitious and unworthy motives on the part of the lovers of his daughter, it was publicly announced in the journals of the day that to him who should be artist enough to cut from a solid piece of iron an elaborate and beautiful wreath of roses only by the aid of the hammer and chisel, in an allotted space of time, should be given the hand of the daughter of Rubens in marriage.

As the list for competitors to the prize was open to both old and young, poor and rich, of the opposite sex, you may readily believe its columns were not long in filling. Three days only was the above list to be kept open, at the end of which time it was to be closed and sealed, and they who had enrolled their names thereon were to be granted a week's time only for the success or failure of their work. Sculptors who had gained many laurels in their profession embarked with new zeal upon this expedition of skill, while many hands that had never been accustomed to the use of the chisel were none the less anxious to compete for the rare prize offered them.

It was near the close of the last day for which the list for candidates to the hand of Clara Rubens in marriage was to be kept open, that a stranger snatched along through the principal thoroughfare of the splendid city of Antwerp. A close observer would at once recognize in the tall yet finely moulded man before us the once poor student of the artist Rubens. There was the same degree of enthusiasm which manifested itself in the early part of his studies still gleaming from the depths of his large and expressive eyes; but the few lines of care visible upon the broad and expansive forehead, showed plainly that Andrea del Sarto had been unrelenting in the toils and labors of his profession. It is true, he had gained riches; but what did that avail him, since they with whom he would gladly have shared his last frains were one by one snatched from his grasp? For years he had wandered the earth, like an Orpheus, in search of his loved yet lost Eurydice; and although he had long since despaired of ever seeing again, on the face of the globe, the original of the miniature which he still held sacred, he looked forward with all the faith of his spiritual nature to the time when he should meet in heaven at last the ideal of his soul.

As the young man glanced about him on either side, as his eye recognized from time to time some familiar object, his attention was suddenly attracted to a notice placed in the window of one of the large warehouses. Surprised beyond measure at its words of import, Andrea del Sarto entered the store and requested permission to place his name upon the list of competitors. He was told that the list was already full, and in a few moments would be withdrawn, but that if he was particularly anxious to enlist in such a cause, and could find a place whereon to write his name, he was welcome to do so. The artist, perceiving that the names of some of the first sculptors and artists in Antwerp and Brussels were down, resolved to try his chance in the game, for a mere lottery it seemed to be in his eyes. So filling up the only remaining space at the bottom of the list with his name, written in a very fine and disguised hand, Andrea del Sarto left the store.

His first thought was to call at once upon his former teacher and reveal his intention of contending for the prize, but when he recollected that the effort he was about to make was an entirely new feature in his profession, his small chance of success dwindled into entire nothingness; and with a degree of pride peculiarly his own, he resolved to conceal himself from his friend's sight until the day appointed for the awarding of the prize. So taking lodgings in an obscure part of the city, Andrea procured a large piece of iron, although it was at an exorbitant price that he purchased it, the price of iron having been raised at that time on account of the unusual demand for it, and stealthily set about his new work.

A week was but a short time for the execution of so elaborate a piece of workmanship, and with only such rough tools as were allowed; but still the young man toiled from daybreak till near midnight, allowing himself but little or no time for sleep and refreshment. One would have thought, to have seen him bending so constantly over his task, that his very life's blood depended upon his success or failure. At the end of five days Andrea had the pleasure of seeing his work completed; and it was with no slight degree of satisfaction that he beheld the triumph of genius over so many obstacles. Attaching no name to his work of art, Andrea had the chiselled wreath boxed up and sent to the hotel of Rubens.

The first day of the ensuing month was the one appointed for making known the name of the successful candidate. At an early hour in the morning the hall in the hotel of the artist Rubens was densely filled with people, many of whom were led thither by curiosity, for such an important matter afforded to those not interested, at least, no slight degree of food for gossip in the circle of society. Andrea, too, was there; but it seemed as though he shrank from public gaze and contact, for he had chosen a seat in the extreme corner of the hall. Few, if any, recognized him, for during his brief stay in Antwerp, Andrea had devoted himself so exclusively to his studies that he made but a slight acquaintance in that well-filled city. He had not even seen the daughter of his master, although he now remembered that the latter had spoken of the striking resemblance between his daughter and that of the miniature he possessed; but that was years ago, and now that Clara had grown to be a woman, even that faint resemblance must have faded away.

Busy with such thoughts as these, Andrea remained silent and motionless for some moments, until the whisper of "she comes" ran through the crowd, and falling upon the youthful artist, recalled him to a consciousness of things about him. Looking in the direction of the door, it swung slowly open, and Clara Rubens entered, attired in a robe of snowy white, and leaning upon the arm of her father. Andrea cast one look upon the almost angelic being before him, and murmuring a few incoherent words, sank back into his seat, and drawing the miniature from his breast, sat wildly gazing upon it.

Rubens stated that out of the many hundred who had enrolled their names as competitors for the prize, but some six or eight had succeeded in accomplishing the designed work of art. Each of the wreaths was then submitted in turn to the view of the assembly. All eyes rested upon Rubens as he said:

"The single wreath upon which my choice has fallen, as being the great master-piece, has, unfortunately, no name affixed to it."

The eyes of the crowd were now diverted from Rubens to one another; each one seeking, if possible, to discover the successful victor. But the deep scrutiny reached not the little observed corner in which our hero sat, although his trembling frame and heaving breast were guilty tokens of his impending fate. At last, Rubens said, in a loud voice:

"If the author of this elaborate piece of workmanship be present, I conjure him at once to make himself known, for upon him has my choice fallen."

For a moment all was breathless silence in that vast throng. With an unsteady step and swimming brain, Andrea del Sarto emerged from his obscurity and advanced towards the stand occupied by Rubens. As he approached, with his eyes bent towards the floor, Clara uttered an exclamation of joy, and sprang forward and fell upon the neck of the artist-sculptor.

"Clara," said Rubens, addressing his daughter for the first time in his life somewhat sternly, "what does this burst of emotion mean? Explain the mystery, my child."

"This is the preserver of my life, father," said Clara, seizing the hand of the young artist, and presenting him to her father. Then with a sigh, the fair girl turned aside and murmured: "Alas, how poor the reward of such a noble act!"

Andrea raised for the first time his eyes to the faces of both father and daughter. Rubens started. The words "Andrea, my pupil, my child!" escaped from the lips of the old man, who would have fallen powerless to the ground but for the strong and manly arm of Andrea, which supported and led him to a seat. The excitement which such a scene produced throughout the crowd was great; and though all seemed to joy in the happiness of the reunited trio, but few knew the circumstances of the case.

In a short time the old master recovered himself, and having proclaimed Andrea del Sarto the successful aspirant for the hand of his daughter in marriage, the crowd quickly dispersed, but in idle conjecture, as to who the stranger was and what particular claim he could have on the affections of Rubens and his daughter.

When once left to themselves, Clara explained to her father how the noble youth had rescued her from the arms of a ruffian when she was benighted in the woods near Brussels, many years ago, while visiting an aunt in the city. She told him, also, that but for the timely aid of Andrea she would have lost the diamond cross, so valuable to her as being the dying gift of her mother.

"No wonder, then," said Rubens, as Andrea drew forth the miniature from his pocket and stood gazing first upon the real and then the ideal, "that even my dim eyes discovered a resemblance between the original of that picture and my own Clara."

"Yes, father, that likeness was designed as a gift to yourself, but impressed with a deep sense of gratitude towards my deliverer, I sent it to him the next morning after my escape from peril, begging him to accept it as a slight token of my never-failing regard and respect towards one who had proved himself so worthy my remembrance and esteem."

"Since you are now the rightful, and soon will be the lawful, possessor of the real Clara, you will probably surrender the imaginary one to my safe keeping," said Rubens, smiling; "for you know I cannot be left wholly childless in my old age."

A few days after witnessed the marriage nuptials of the happy pair; and though time has long since obliterated the lives of that once joyous and devoted household band, still are the names of Rubens and Andrea del Sarto familiar to posterity by the mighty efforts of their genius, which ages can never efface. And to this day may be seen the bronze statue of Rubens, near the site of the Hotel St. Antoine; while at a short distance from the cathedral where repose the remains of that illustrious master, is the identical wreath of chiselled iron, raised on a pedestal at a slight height from the ground, the sight of which has led to the recital of the story of The Artist's Prize.

THE SICK-ROOM.

The progress of science has taught us that air and cleanliness are quite as necessary to abate illness as to maintain health. Frequent changes of linen and thorough ablution will mitigate the severity of any feverish attack, and contribute greatly to recovery. Vinegar in tepid water, or a little camellia-cologne thrown into it, is most refreshing, besides lessening the danger of cold. The same linen should never be worn during a consecutive day and night, unless in cases of extreme illness. Everything in the way of linen should be thoroughly aired and well warmed, so that no chill may be felt on coming in contact with it. Medicine should be given with the greatest exactness; and as the capacities of spoons are as various as those of people, those to be used in measuring physic should be shown to the medical man that he may decide on the suitability. Never give medicine without looking at the label to see if it is right. Beware of disturbing a patient from sleep, even to take medicine, unless especially desired to do so. For any other reason it is most improper. Do not urge food or drink when nature does not seem to require it, and beware of irritating by an appearance of over-oliosness. How many nurses, with the kindest intentions, cause so much irritation to a patient that they become almost odious! They stand at the foot of the bed, and perhaps lean on it while talking, and shake at once the bed and nerves of the sufferer. They drop the tongue and poker, or throw the coals on the fire with an energy which is excruciating; they bring up a little tea or gruel, and it is slopped over the cloth, and the sickly appetite is too much disgusted to remain. They enter into some long story without noting the weary eye, the contracted brow, the languor which denotes fatigue, and then they wonder at the impatience with which they are told not to talk.—Maternal Counsel to a Daughter.

ARABIC HORSE PROVERBS.

All horse science is summed up with the Arabs in a vast number of proverbs. We give a few of the most important ones:

Make the colt eat at one year; mount him at two or three years, as soon as he can be broken; feed him well the third and fourth; then re-mount him; if he does not suit you sell him without hesitation.

When you have bought a horse study him with care, and give him barley in progressive quantities till you have arrived at the precise amount requisite for his appetite.

A good horseman ought to know the measure of barley which suits his horse, as well as the measure of powder which suits his gun.

To prepare a horse that is too fat for the fatigues of war, make him poor by exercise, but never by deprivation of nourishment.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

LEGEND OF THE "LOVE TREE."

BY T. D. LEE.

No person who has ever traversed the valley of the Saginaw but remembers the "love tree," which stood upon the east side of the river above Portsmouth, alone and isolated in the prairie far from its fellows. It looked like some lone misanthrope, who, having become disgusted with the follies of human nature, had taken up his abode in the desert where, far from the busy haunts of his fellow-man, he might pour out his heart's bitterness to the wild winds, and waste his spleen and discontent upon the "desert air." Alone it stood, majestic in its loneliness, like the last rose, whose companions are gone. A spirit of romance certainly seemed to linger about it. A whisper of the past gently breathed through its desolate branches, and the question naturally arose, Why is it that this tree thus stood alone? A greater interest to it was imparted by the fact of its having been for years the abode of a white owl, whose nightly dismal whoop fell mournfully upon the ear of night.

The Indians had a great reverence for this tree, and also for its occupant, which they said was a spirit bird. There is a beautiful belief existing among the aborigines of our country in regard to a guardian spirit, which they say is often seen, and which appears in the form of a bird—sometimes the dove, sometimes the eagle, but more frequently assuming the form of a night bird, though the disposition of the deceased while living has much to do with the species. For instance, a great warrior dies whose disposition had been fearless, ambitious and untamed; his spirit bird personifies an eagle. A blood-thirsty chieftain's spirit bird is a hawk. A gentle maiden passes away to the spirit land, and her friends know that she is hovering near them when they hear the mournful notes of a mourning dove.

A legend or tradition concerning the "love tree" exists among the Indians of the Saginaw Valley. Many, many long years ago, before the white man's foot had left its impress in this valley, Ke-wah-le-won ruled his people with kindness. He was a patriarch among them, and beloved for the gentleness of his manners and the mildness of his government. He had been a great warrior in his day; but his youth had departed, and the languid pulse and feeble footsteps told, alas, too plainly, that he would soon be treading the hunting-grounds of the Great Spirit. The good old man felt that he was indeed passing away—dying—and he was desirous to see once more his tribes in council and bestow upon them his last blessing, and impart his dying advice. The old chief lay upon his death-bed, and around him were gathered in mournful silence his beloved people, eager to catch the first and last words that would drop from the lips of the dying chieftain. It was a mournful and a melancholy picture that death-bed scene in the wilderness. At length the chief spoke, while the fire of youth seemed to kindle again in his dim eye, and his voice, though weak, was calm and clear.

"My children," said he, "the Great Spirit has called me, and I must obey the summons. Already is the tomahawk raised to sever the last cord that binds me to my children; already my guide stands at the door to convey me to the hunting-grounds of my fathers in the spirit land. You weep, my children, but dry your tears, for though I leave you now, yet will my spirit bird ever watch over you and protect you. I will whisper to you in the evening breeze, and when morning comes you will know that I have been with you through the night. The good spirit beckons for me, and I must hasten. Let my body be laid in a quiet spot in the prairie, with my tomahawk and pipe by my side. You need not fear that the wolf will disturb my rest, for the Great Spirit will place a watch over me. Meet me in the spirit land, my children. Farewell." And the old chief slept the sleep that knows no waking till the end of time.

They buried him in a lone spot in the prairie, near the beautiful river, with his face towards the rising sun. His remains were never disturbed by beast or bird; for it would indeed seem that so the Great Spirit had ordered it. Time passed on, and a tree arose from his grave and spread its branches over it, as if to protect it, and a beautiful white owl took possession of it. The Indians tell us that the "love tree" marked the last resting-place of Ke-wah-le-won, and that the white owl was the spirit bird sent to watch over it.

ONE DOLLAR!

WHAT IT WILL DO.

IT WILL PROCURE FOR YOU A WHOLE YEAR

BALLOU'S DOLLAR MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

There are one hundred pages of reading matter in each number of Ballou's Dollar Monthly.

Two pages of finely executed, original humorous illustrations also embellish each number.

Over twelve hundred pages of reading matter per annum, for the unprecedented price of one dollar.

It is just such a work as any father, brother, or friend, would introduce to the family circle.

In all respects it is fresh, original, and what it purports to be, the cheapest magazine in the world.

It is carefully edited by Mr. Ballou, who has been for sixteen years connected with the Boston press.

Devoted to news, tales, poems, stories of the sea, discoveries, miscellany, wit and humor.

Each number contains original articles from more than twenty regular contributors.

Though published but two years, it has reached the extraordinary circulation of 72,300 copies!

Any person enclosing one dollar to the proprietor, as below, shall receive the Magazine for one year; or any person sending us eight subscribers and eight dollars, at one time, shall receive the same copy gratis.

M. M. BALLOU, Publisher and Proprietor.

No. 22 Winter Street, Boston, Mass.

MADISON, THE CAPITAL OF THE STATE OF WISCONSIN.

The fine large engraving on this page was drawn expressly for the Pictorial by Mr. Hill, and exhibits an accurate and striking representation of Madison, the point of view selected being the water-cure establishment, the roof and grounds of which are seen in front. Those who have had the good fortune to visit Madison will readily recognize the various prominent buildings in our panoramic view. The city of Madison, Dane county seat, and capital of the State of Wisconsin, perhaps, combines and overlooks more charming and diversified scenery calculated to please the eyes of fancy and promote health and pleasure, than any other State capital, or even any other city in the Union. Bright lakes, fresh groves, rippling rivulets, sloping hills, shady vales, and flowery meadows and lawns are here commingled in the greatest profusion and disposed in the most picturesque order. The city is situated upon a ridge, of land about one mile in width, between Lake Mendota—a crystal body of cool spring water, eight miles in length, six in breadth, and from fifty to two hundred feet in depth, which always preserves its pure clearness and sealike appearance, washes a fine gravelly beach, from Congress, a part of which have been sold, and the property of the university is estimated to be now $250,000. Two large edifices have been erected for the accommodation of students who, under the instruction of learned professors, may obtain here a complete education. About two miles from the capital, on a charming point of land projecting into Lake Monona, stands the "Lake Side Water Cure." It is a large and beautiful structure, built on a gentle eminence, and surrounded by trees. This establishment is the resort, during many months of the year, not only of those from the neighboring country and cities who desire the advice and care of the medical superintendent of the establishment, but also of many who come from a distance to enjoy themselves in this lovely spot and inhale its pure and delightful atmosphere, and be fanned by the cool and refreshing breezes of the lake. In this brief sketch we have given the reader only a very imperfect idea of Madison, whose beauty of location, healthy climate, business facilities and superior educational advantages are so combined as to render it one of the most favored cities in our broad land. Every one who has visited Madison has been charmed by its attractions. Daniel S. Curtis, in his graphic

Butler wrote the following enthusiastic account of this young city in the Knickerbocker Magazine: "The next evening we arrived at this place. I feel convinced that this place was once called Eden; but in the language of mortals it is now called Madison. I have been looking about for Eve's bower, but there are so many places that seem to answer the description that I am unable to decide between the rival claimants. Madison is situated on rising ground, between two lakes, as lovely as a fairy dream. Indeed, I consider it a very prosaic sort of place in comparison with this. On one side is Lake Mendota, nine miles long and six wide; on the other is Lake Monona, about three miles long and space between the lakes, on which the town is built, is from three-fourths of a mile to a mile in width. Around the town, stretching away in every direction, is a beautiful undulating country, consisting of prairie and 'oak-openings.' These 'oak-openings' are said to bear a great resemblance to the English park scenery. The town is situated on undulating ground. The university buildings are on the highest ground, and when completed will present a most imposing appearance. The capital is admirably situated on a lovely square of fourteen acres, covered with

LIFE AS IT IS.

we make an excursion down the street and see what we can learn. The wreck of a man's son. He was permitted to grow up without employment, went and came as he pleased, and spent his time in the gratification of his spontaneous passions, desires and inclinations, no one to check him when his course was evil, or encourage him in ways of wisdom. His father was rich, and for that reason the son had nothing to do; no part in honest labor to perform. The father died, and his son inherited a portion of his abundant wealth, and having never earned money by honest toil, he knew not how to use it, and gave loose reins to his appetites and passions, and ran at a full rate down the broad road to dissipation. Now behold him—a broken-down man, bowed with infirmity, a mere wreck of what he was, physically and mentally. His money is gone, and he lives on the charity of those whose hearts are open with pity. Such is the fate of those who are born to fortunes, and who spend their all as they go. And there, on the opposite side, in that comfortable mansion, lives the

FEMALE SHARP PRACTICE.

Some years ago a young gentleman living in Crawford county "went west," settled in a western city, and soon became independently rich. He married a lady residing in the city where he located. After he had been married about six months, he prepared to visit Crawford county in company with his bride. But a few days before he was to start he was accidentally killed by a crate of crockery falling upon him from the second story of his warehouse. The event was duly communicated to his family in Ohio. That was about eighteen months ago. About three months since the father of the deceased was startled to see a carriage driving up to his door. A very interesting lady, dressed in mourning, stepped out and introduced herself as the widow of the dead son. Great was the joy of the household at the visit of their beloved son and brother's relic. She said she was going to Rhode Island, and could not resist the opportunity of seeing the parents and relatives of her "beloved Harry." This was accompanied by a flood of tears and "furnace sighs." Three weeks passed by, and she had worked her way into the affections of the family. She was regarded as a daughter—as a sister.

HISTORY OF ONE OF OUR NATIONAL SONGS.

Judge Hopkinson gives the history of his famous song—"Hail Columbia"—in the following interesting manner: "The song was written in the summer of 1798, when a war with France was thought to be inevitable—Congress being then in session at Philadelphia, deliberating upon that important subject, and acts of hostility having actually occurred. The contest between England and France was raging, and the people were divided into parties for the one side or the other—some thinking that policy and duty required us to take part with Republican France, as she was called; others were for our connecting ourselves with England, under the belief that she was the great preservative power of good principles and safe government. The violations of our rights by both belligerents were forcing us from the just and wise policy of President Washington, which was to do equal justice to both, to take part with neither, but to keep a strict and honest neutrality between them. The prospect of a rupture with France was exceedingly offensive to the portion of the people which espoused her cause, and the violence of the spirit of party has never risen higher—I think not so high—as it did at surrounded by high, romantic bluffs that are clothed with nature's richest verdure, and mirrors the broad canopy of heaven and the overhanging forests—and Lake Monona, which is smaller than Lake Mendota but not inferior to it in beauty. The first settler of Madison erected his log hut there in 1837. In 1846 the place contained a population of only 283. In 1850, immediately after the improvement of the water power between Lakes Mendota and Monona, by the erection of flouring and sawmills, the population increased to 1672. The population at the present time, January 7, 1857, is over 10,000, showing a very large increase during the last five years, caused by the opening of railroads and the settlement of the rich agricultural country which surrounds the city of Madison. Situated about midway between Lake Michigan and the Mississippi River, it lies on the direct route of western travel. Nine chartered railroad lines intersect here, some finished and in profitable operation, and others under energetic progress. The capital was built in 1838, and stands in the centre of a park containing fourteen acres and occupying the most elevated part of the city. The university of Wisconsin is located a mile west of the capital, on a beautiful and commanding site. This institution received a large endowment of lands work entitled "Western Portraiture," has given us his impressions of Madison, in 1851, as follows: "At some time in our travels or observations, all of us have met with some location that was at once and indelibly impressed upon the fancy as the paragon of all outdoor loveliness and beauty—the place with which all others were contrasted, and to which they must bear some respectable degree of resemblance to be esteemed delightful locations. With many persons, Madison is this paragon of landscape scenery. As the brilliant diamond, chased around with changing borders, which sparkle on the swelling vestment of some queenly woman, so this picturesque village, with its varied scenery, sits the coronal gem on the broad and rolling bosom of this rich and blooming State. Nor is it less noteworthy for its business advantages and healthful position. Situated on elevated ground, amid delightful groves and productive lands, it must be healthy; while the abundance and convenience of fine streams and water-power must facilitate a sound and rapid advancement here in agricultural pursuits and the mechanic arts. There are, also, several liberal charters for railroads, connecting Madison with Milwaukee, Chicago, and the Mississippi River, some of which are already being pushed ahead with energy." In 1853, Professor Noble forest trees. From the top of the 'Capital House,' which, by the way, is a capital house in more senses than one, the visitor has a splendid view. The enterprise and energy of the Madisonians are absolutely astonishing. The hills and valleys look at them with suspicion. If a visitor sees a Madisonian take a 'mildroad look' at it, it begins to sink at once in the language of the poem to Captain Scott, it says: 'I might as well come down.' When a mere visitor has been to Madison for a few days, if he looks rather intensely at a valley, it begins to 'swell up.' Madison contains about nine thousand souls, and I believe this includes the whole population; for, judging from appearances, I should say every individual has a soul. Well, among these nine thousand there was a gas of many formed last January. On the evening of our arrival the town was lighted with gas! They have determined to have water-works, and you should come this way in a few weeks, do not be surprised if you should see Neptune and all his Tritons spouting here. Madison is to be a resort for those who wish to retire from the turmoil of a busy life. Around these beautiful lakes there will be seen many a home reflected in the clear waters. Those to whom the bustle of New York and Saratoga gives no recreation, will enjoy such a place as this.

VIEW OF MADISON, THE CAPITAL OF THE STATE OF WISCONSIN.

a poor cobbler. Fifteen years ago he left the humble room of his father and went forth in the broad world to seek his fortune. All his principles, industrious habits, and twenty-five coppers. Now he is the owner of that elegant mansion, is doing a thriving business, possesses an unbroken constitution, and bids fair to live to a good old age. Go into the city and you will almost invariably find that the enterprising men are of poor parentage—men who have had to contend against wind and tide; while on the other hand, a majority of the wealthy men possess only a mediocrity of talents, live a life of drones on the labor of others, and then go down to their graves. What a lesson should this be to those who are by means, either by fair or foul, accumulating treasures for their children! If the rich would train their children to regular habits of industry, to be a resort for those who wish to retire from the turmoil of a busy life, and the descendants of wealthy men would not be, as they are, but drones, as to all the best interests of social well-being.—York Republican.

The hour came for her departure—they exchanged miniatures—the farewells were said—the blubbing was at its very height, when she called the old gentleman to one side, and with great embarrassment told him she had lost her pocket book on the cars, containing all but a trifle of her funds. She felt a diffidence in making the request, but if she could not apply to her "beloved Harry's" father, to whom could she go? The old man's heart melted, and in a moment his wallet was produced, ten X's of the Seneca County Bank were tendered and accepted. She departed—alas, that dear friends must part. Time flew, and a month passed, but nothing was heard from "beloved Harry's" relic. The old gentleman became alarmed, and addressed a letter to the father of his son's wife, detailing the circumstances of her visit. An answer came. It stated that the widow of his late son was at home—had not been away—and that from the description given, the woman who personated her was a servant girl who had lived with them, and had gleaned enough of the history of Harry's family in Ohio to enable her to play his wife. Fancy the feelings of the old gentleman when he found out how he had been victimized by the artful dodger, who had thus palmed upon his credulity.—Pittsburgh Advertiser.

that time on that question. The theatre was then open in our city. A young man belonging to it, whose talent was about to take his benefit, I had known him when he was at school. On this acquaintance he called on me in the afternoon, his benefit being announced for the following day. He said he had no boxes taken, and the prospect was that he should suffer a loss, instead of receiving a benefit from the performance; but that if he could get a patriotic song adapted to the tune of the 'President's March,' then the popular air, he did not doubt of a full house; but that the poets of the theatrical corps had been trying to accomplish it, but were satisfied that no verses could be composed to suit the music of the march. I told him I would try for him. He came the next afternoon, and the song, such as it was, was ready for him. It was announced on Monday morning, and the theatre was crowded to excess, and so continued night after night for the rest of the season; the song being encored and repeated many times during each night, the whole audience joining in the chorus. It was also sung at night in the streets by large assemblies of citizens, including members of Congress. The enthusiasm was general, and the song was heard, I may say, in every part of the United States.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

THE SHADOWS O'ER ME ROLL.

BY IRENE MONTAGUE.

I cannot weep—I cannot pray!
Dull misery overpowers my soul,
Like fate impending o'er the way:
I dream to fly life's tedious goal!
My heart is seared—my breath is pain.
Faint hope scarce lives within my soul;
Despair comes on with dismal train,
While dusky shadows o'er me roll.

I own 'tis weak—I feel 'tis vain:
But can the will o'erawe the soul?
Maddened by life, despair and pain,
I long—I long to fly the goal!
To fly the earthly goal, and find
Bright morning dawning on the soul:
That day-dawn of th' eternal wind,
When no more shadows o'er us roll.

Suicide? Ha! 't were darkest night
To escape unhidden life's long goal!
Eclipse of that most perfect light
That brightens up the darkest soul.
Courage, awhile! though life be dark,
And doubt envelope like a scroll,
High faith shall guide thy shattered bark
Where no more shadows o'er thee roll.

[Written for Ballou's Pictorial.]

HOLBECK'S DAUGHTER.

BY MRS. J. D. BALDWIN.

By the blind and aged painter's bedside, watching his sunken and withered features, stood a young, fair girl of sixteen. A profusion of glossy ringlets floated over her sloping shoulders, like a mist wreath seen at sunset, while her violet blue eyes had in their depths the elements of love and gentleness, ill suited to the squalid wretchedness that pervaded the place. The exquisite beauty of that delicate girl, watching there by the debilitated, dying painter, was a study worthy an artist. And so thought the young Englishman, Frank Howard, who, travelling for pleasure, had stopped at Harlem, two years before, to take lessons in his great creative art from its now blind painter, Holbeck.

If to the aged artist Pauline was the sole being shrouded in his affections, since so fondly cleaving to him in the desolate and darkened winter of age, and to whom was given the all of enthusiasm and love that had once centred in his bright and beautiful creations, she was more worshipped than saint, or art, than country, home, or aught beside in life, by the young English student, who had quitted Harlem some months previous, summoned to England by the sudden death of his father, promising, with throbbing heart and quivering lip, to return with all speed, to claim her for his bride.

Since then, the Low Countries had revolted against the tyrant and bigot, Philip II. of Spain, and the persecution of the Protestants in the Netherlands had commenced, and the stern rule of Philip's favorite general, Alva, had driven many of the chief Spanish towns to open rebellion. Many of these were sacked, and every species of cruelty perpetrated upon the defenceless inhabitants, while others held out for a time, defying the utmost power of Spain to subdue them.

Chiefest of these ranked Harlem. At the period when our story begins, it had been invested some months. The sufferings of its resolute burghers, driven to despair by sickness and famine, were equalled only by their unyielding patriotism; but now, famine, gaunt and hollow-eyed, stalked in their midst. The siege was drawing to a close; Harlem could hold out no longer, and the blind painter, Holbeck, its glory and its pride, lay stretched upon his pallet, to die. In truth, he was starving. Everything available was sold, to procure wherewith to eke out a few days' subsistence. That devoured, he had but to fold his hands and die. Never for a moment quitting his side, his beautiful Pauline was the last link that bound him to earth, the sole bow of heavenly love left to span the dark gathering clouds of despair and death.

As the famishing painter lay flickering between life and death, the shouts of the Spanish soldiery roused him from his torpor.

"Pauline, go and bar the door. That is surely the enemy. Has the governor capitulated?"

"Yes, my father; the soldiers have entered the city. Men, women and children are fleeing before them, vainly trying to escape death by hiding in their houses." And she drew mechanically nearer the bed on which the old blind painter lay.

"Open your smoky hatch, mynheer!" was shouted without. "Open, or we'll soon find a way to unearthen you!"

The latter threat was immediately followed by a blow, as from a bludgeon. A crash followed; the lower panels were forced in, and crawling through, their iron pikes in their hands, the fierce Spanish soldiery, with glaring eyes and huge moustaches, gazed on the dying man and shrinking girl, who instinctively drew nearer her life-long, enfeebled protector.

"Men, I am miserably poor, blind and dying. If the bolts on my door led you to suppose I had money, you have but to look around you, at the destitution, to see your error," said the venerable painter, when they demanded his money bags.

"No trifling! Where do you keep your gold thorns, mynheer?" Pauline, clinging to her destitute, blind father, besought them to believe him, while the dying painter held her in his feeble arms with the tenacity of despair, with the anguish of a last embrace.

"Take not my innocent child from me. O, men! are ye fathers? Slay me; wreak your vengeance on me; but spare her."

A fierce-looking trooper caught her by the arm roughly, to drag her away; the old man whispered a parting word, and the young girl, first taking something from under his pillow, said:

"Have no fear now, my father; in life or in death, I am safe."
"Thank Heaven! My heart grows cold. God protect and nerve thee! Farewell!"

He had ceased to breathe; but no tear told of Pauline's sorrow. The fire in her heart and brain burned too determined to permit such signs of weakness. The desperate exigence of the moment had turned the gentleness of that young bosom to frenzy; grandly towering in her proud resolve, she flung back the golden ringlets from her calm brow, as if awaiting and defying their approach.

The soldiers looked upon her in silent wonder; they had seen her draw a dagger from beneath the dying painter's pillow, and they smiled at each other in derision, wondering if that slight girl thought to defy his majesty's guard with her poignard.

"Dead or alive, my pretty one, I take on myself your tanning."

The speaker approached; yet ere his hand touched her shoulder, a blow caused him to turn, scowling and muttering from beneath the cold glance of his superior, Captain Lopez, who that moment entered the house. Yet ere the latter could prevent, the painter's daughter had plunged the poignard deep, deep, in her own breast; looking the while in his face with the stern resolve and calm majesty of a heroic woman; the gentleness of the girl merged in the frenzied resolve of braving death—triumphing over its fear. Ere Lopez could reach her, she had fallen on her dead father's breast, her crimson blood deluging the wretched bed, her cheek growing gradually pale as marble, while the waxen lids veiled the dimming eyes.

"Freed!" the only word that passed the pale lips, whereon the breath scarce fluttered; then her arms fell powerless, and all was still.

As soon as the siege was raised, the young Englishman, true to his promise, sought the painter's residence in Harlem, but sought in vain. To his distracted inquiries he received but vague replies. The old man was dead, the house burned, the daughter for a time supposed dead, but carefully guarded by Captain Lopez, borne to the convent of Santander, and placed with the abbess, she had recovered, and this was all they knew. Passing over the coast and region of La Mancha, young Howard learned that the convent had been demolished, and Pauline carried off by order of Captain Lopez, none knew whither.

Travelling toward the north of Spain, where, at Rio-Seco the enemy had rallied, Howard learned that Captain Lopez, bound by no other ties than those of a volunteer, had quit the army in disgust, which, retreating from Rio-Seco in all directions, were concentrating their forces again on the frontier. To return to England, while yet ignorant of the fate or whereabouts of old Holbeck's daughter, seemed impossible. Restless and dispirited, he was journeying through the village El Retiro, when rumors of a haunted castle on its marge had taken such a foothold of his imagination, that all arguments proved ineffectual to check the adventurous spirit of the artist, determined upon sketching it.

Accompanied by a villager who reluctantly consented to indulge his fancy for ghosts and ruins, Frank Howard set out down a wooded descent that became less obstructed on gaining the foot of the mountain, where a tolerable path lay continuously along the side of a stream, till on getting near the castle it abruptly turned to the left, quitting the rivulet, and winding up the eminence on which the castle stood. The walls in many places had given way, and the gloomy pile bore sad evidences of time's ravages, as its stately turrets rose gloomily above the once spacious entrance, now narrowed by the growth of brushwood. The window frames that had once opened upon a terrace running the whole length of the castle, had long mouldered away. Still, having scrambled up over huge heaps of stones, the scene that presented itself to our artist was one of indescribable beauty. The view, looking northward through a sombre valley so canopied by the giant branches of oaks, the growth of centuries, that the sun's rays could never penetrate their interlacing foliage, was terminated by the mountain they had descended, whose peak, covered with snow, was then glittering in the morning's sunbeams.

Entering the castle, Howard found it in a most dilapidated state; all the staircases, save one, having fallen in, while the greater portion of the apartments were unroofed, and cumbered by the fallen ruins. Passing out into the courtyard, he entered what had once been a spacious garden, now an almost impenetrable weedy. Still skirting the castle wall, he noted a pathway leading from the wood, which, rounding one of the turrets, stopped at a low porch, where a modern door, with strong bolts and hinges, had been hung upon the opening, recently cut in the solid masonry. Pushing it open, he entered a well-lighted passage, and seeing a massive oaken door on the right, found it opened into a spacious hall. Our sketcher was much struck with the appearance of this apartment. Its large and lofty windows were boarded up to within a few inches of their peaked arches, admitting but scanty light to show the round table in its centre, on which knives and plates were spread, while a fire still smouldered on the hearth, bestrewn with culinary utensils, while fragments of a late repast bore evidence that it had been lately occupied.

Pondering on this, Howard remembered having noted in several parts of the road that it bore marks of recent travel, and came to the conclusion, notwithstanding all his host had told him about its having been built four hundred years before by the baron Gonzalez of Saragossa—who, becoming jealous of his lovely wife, had murdered her, and afterward committed suicide by throwing himself from its battlements into the foamy cataract that rushed thundering by—the castle remaining ever since uninhabited, haunted at night by the spirits of the vindictive baron and his murdered wife. Despite his love of the wild and legendary, our artist could not but think the castle inhabited by living spirits. The guide offered to show the chamber where the baroness had been murdered. But they found it fastened by a newly-constructed oaken door, securely barred. The peasant proposed that they should return to the village, and procure men and implements to break open the strongly-bolted door, although he said they would likely find only an empty room for their trouble.

Turning away, they were about to retrace their steps, when they were arrested by seeing a tall, soldierly-looking man in the way, armed to the teeth.

"What do you want here?" he asked.

"I am an Englishman, travelling for amusement, and hearing of the haunted castle, came here to sketch it."

Two other armed men now approached; but Frank Howard noticed that the first came as their commander, as they addressed him as "Zemeste." He bade the Englishman follow, who, keeping near, noted a slight female figure as the door opened of the mysterious dining-room, who, stopping suddenly, cast an anxious look of warning upon him, that turned to a wild, burning gaze, as his name, spoken in tones never forgotten, passed her lips, just as the chief, turning round, laid his hand roughly on his collar.

"Who is he? Do you know him?" he asked.

"He was—a student of my father's," was her low-voiced, trembling reply. No farther word was spoken; and she left the room. And was it thus they met—and parted?—they who had been lovers—were so even yet, how and when to meet again in a world rife with change and disappointment, who might tell?

Courteously inviting the man, so wholly in his power, to be seated, the robber chief, for such he was, asked him what had brought him to that part of the country, divided, as it was, by internal commotions. In return, Howard repeated his previous account, in corroboration of which, he produced a passport granted him by the secretary of state for foreign affairs in London, wherein he was described as "Francis Howard, an English gentleman, travelling for pleasure." This, like all passports, being in the French language, the chief showed his scholarship by immediately reading.

"I will countersign it, so as to facilitate your progress," he said.

Drawing from the rough table-drawer pen and ink, he appended his name, saying:

"This signature will have greater weight in protecting you, and facilitating your progress through Santona and the rural districts, than the other."

Gratefully acknowledging the consideration evinced for his safety by the unknown, our artist remarked on the lateness of the hour, and his wish to return to El Retiro before dark.

